BEAR-HUNTING.*

ALL men who are eloquent on the cruelty of hunting, beat their wives. That is a general rule, admitting of no exceptions. There is another. All men who stammer on the cruelty of hunting, are beaten by their wives. Fortunately these classes are not numerous, otherwise we should be a cock-pecked and hen-pecked generation. Humanity, in the long run, rejoices in pursuing unto the death, on foot or horseback, lions, tigers, bears, wolves, hyenas, foxes, marts, and hares. Were you to talk to himself of the cruelty of killing a lion, he would stun you with a roar of derision—to a tiger, his stripes would wax blacker and brighter in contempt—to a bear, he would hug you to his heart, as the choicest of all imaginable ninnies—to a wolf, he would suspect you of being a man-trap—to a hyena, he would laugh in your face—to a fox, he would give you such a brush as you never had in your life—to a mart, he would look so sweet upon you that you would be scented like a milliner—to a hare, he would prick up his ears in vain emulation of the length of your own, and wonder to see an ass among the Bipedes. They all perfectly well know that they were made to be hunted—that they are provided, to fit them for that end, with certain organs and members, which otherwise would be, comparatively speaking, of little or no use, and would get so rusty, that ere long the creatures would be almost incapable of locomotion, and would absolutely die of fat—the most cruel death in all the catalogue. Therefore, let Sir John Brute and Jerry Sneak henceforth—on the subject of hunting—belong to the dumb animals.

Lion-hunting and tiger-hunting are merely cat-hunting on a considerably larger scale;—wolf-hunting and fox-hunting are the same modified by climate;—of mart and hare-hunting, more hereafter;—but of bear-hunting it is now our intention to speak, under the guidance and direction of our sporting friend Mr Lloyd, who was born under Ursa Major, and does credit to the celestial sign of Bruin.

The passion of the chase is strong in Mr Lloyd's constitution. It seems for years to have been his ruling passion, and to have made him a perfect model of perpetual motion. But like all other passions, ruling or ruled, it can be thrown off ad libitum by a strong-bodied, strong-minded man. All of them, we hold, are in our own power, and at our own disposal. True, that while they are at their acme they hurry us away like whirlwinds. But then they are whirlwinds of our own raising, and we are still the magicians who can either allay the storm, or leap out of it, down upon the soft calm green of tranquillity and peace. Take ambition. You see the same man mad for power or fame in spring, and in summer lying half-asleep on a hillside, conversing dreamily with the clouds. Take Love. In May, a young gentleman knows of the existence in this world but of one auburn-haired, hazel-eyed, fragile-figured angel, with a slim ankle and small foot—and on the twelfth of August he is flirting with a red-headed Highland goatherdess, supported on pedestals barely human, and the terror of all worms. Just so with any other sport. In Wermeland and Dalecarlia, Mr Lloyd's whole soul was filled with bears. Then and there,

"How easy was a bush supposed a bear!"

In sleep, Bruin hugged him in his arms—awake, Bruin hobbled "before that inward eye which is the bliss of solitude." Between sleeping and waking, one cry was in his ears—"The Bear—the Bear!" And had he died of fever—which, thank Heaven, he did not—he would have confounded his medical and religious attendants—both alike ghostly—with apostrophes to Bruin. Occasionally the violence of his passion was a little relieved by a slight and transient change of its object—a wolf, for example, a lynx, a capercaillie, or a salmon. But we defy any man to cherish a permanent passion for a wolf. 'Tis a dirty, dingy-coloured, lean, hungry, cruel, cowardly brute, whom 'twould be paying an undeserved compliment to kill otherwise than in a pitfall, into which no sooner does the villain play plump, than his base heart dies within him; he coils himself up like a sick turnspit, pretends for a while to be a carcass, and, ere long, is so, out of pure, filthy bodily fear. As for your lynx, he is a person with whom we have little or no acquaintance; but, though sharp-sighted enough, we believe, he seems to be an insignificant devil; if not really scarce, he generally contrives to make himself so; and it is not to be supposed that a man of Mr Lloyd's abilities would give himself the trouble to pursue such a pitiful individual. Of the capercaillie on his pine, and of the salmon in his pool, heaven forbid that we should ever speak in any other terms but those of the highest respect and admiration. But the feathered and the finned people, the one dwelling in air, and the other in water, do not readily enter into the same day or night-dream with the bear, to whom they have little, indeed no resemblance, but are entitled—each per se—to the whole of our imagination. Accordingly, though, throughout these most amusing and interesting volumes, they do now and then whirr from the forests and plunge in the floods, the bear is the prevailing, paramount, and predominant object of our friend's passion. He scampers in every paragraph, and gives up the ghost at the end of every chapter. The whole work is delightfully redolent of hides and tallow; and so full is our fancy at this moment of images of bears, that the very hands now tracing this rambling article, seem covered with hair,— and most alarming would they be, were they to squeeze the "downy fist," and encircle the tender waist, of a virgin in the Gallopade.

There is something exceedingly contemptible in visiting, now-a-days, France and Italy, Paris and Rome. The talk of such tourists is versch indeed—nay, young gentlemen are tiresome at table who have gone up or down the Rhine. All the world and his wife have visited all the cities in Europe. But give us for our love and money, a man like Mr Lloyd, a gentleman, a scholar, and a sportsman, who has swept on shidor through the frozen forests of Scandinavia. Snow is inspiring, and ice bracing to the nerves of the soul; in narrating adventures in such a clime and country, a man's style gets as glowing and ruddy as his cheeks—as rapid as the motion of his limbs on snow-skates;—in writing about bears, he leaps over a chasm with as much agility as in hunting them—and his reader never falls asleep, so anxious is he to be in at the death.

As for picturesque description of scenery, our author seems to have lost no time in looking at it, and he loses none in describing it; but he gives us many striking touches as he moves along, and at the close of the volume, we feel that our imagination has been enriched with materials out of which to form to itself Scandinavian forest scenery at once singular and magnificent. Some night-bivouacks are painted with great spirit.

We admire Mr Lloyd. He is a fine specimen of an English gentleman, bold, free, active, intelligent, observant, good-humoured, and generous,—no would-be wit—no paltry painter of the picturesque,—above all, no pedant and philosopher, forsooth—like your paid and professional vagrants, who go up and down untry book-making, and article-mongering to order, haunted all the while by the image of some far-off editor or publisher, and living at inns like bagmen, at the rate of two guineas a-sheet. Mr Lloyd's mind was wholly engrossed by his own wild and adventurous Scandinavian life; but when it was flown, he then began to lead it over again in imagination,—and, to ! “Field Sports of the North of Europe”

Mr Lloyd, it appears, was four years wandering over almost all parts of Scandinavia. In the summer of 1827, he lived at some eighty miles to the northward of Carlstad, a town situated at the northern extremity of the noble lake Wenern, among the largest and finest in Europe. The province of Wermeland is about a hundred and fifty miles in length, by one hundred in breadth, containing about 150,000 inhabitants. The more northern parts are hilly, mountainous, almost one continued forest—studded with numerous fine lakes, and watered by several large streams. Of the multitude of lakes we may form some idea, from the parish of Tuna in Norrland, which is commonly said to contain as many lakes as there are days in the year. Throughout the whole range which separates Sweden from Norway, nature assumes a most imposing aspect, and is sometimes seen on a magnificent scale.

There the winter is most severe, the snow usually remaining on the ground six months; but the summers are, in general, excessively warm, and vegetation proportionately rapid and rich. The principal river in Wermeland is the Klar, which, rising in the Norwegian mountains, after a course of three hundred miles, falls into the Wenern, near Carlstad. Mr Lloyd fixed his residence at a small hamlet, called Stjern, near the Klar, and on the bank of a lake eight or nine miles long, the Råda. He occupied a single room, twenty feet square, in a peasant's cottage. Its great comfort was a large open fireplace or hearth—much needed—for on one occasion, when a friend had paid him a visit from Stockholm, some portwine, which he had brought along with him, and over which they had been enjoying themselves—as was right—in a sort of Noctes Ambrosianæ, till past midnight—Temperance Societies would not do there—was next morning frozen into so solid a mass, that they were unable to get a drop of it out of the bottles. Here he soon formed the friendship of Mr Falk, head-ranger or chief hunting-master of the Wermeland forests, which title alone would have given him the rank of a captain in the Swedish army. But in addition to this, and in consequence of his meritorious services in having ridded the country of very many noxious animals, he had received the honorary title of Hof Jägmästare, or Hunting-master to the Court, which put him on the footing of a colonel. He was a tall and handsome man, about forty years of age; his appearance, with which his actions fully accorded, denoting him to be possessed of great quickness and intelligence. In the different shalls, or battues, which he had commanded, he had killed, many of them with his own gun, 100 bears—but in all his conflicts never had received a wound. This gentleman found Mr Lloyd an apt scholar; and under his tuition the Englishman soon became as good a chasseur as in all Sweden. Mr Lloyd gives many interesting details of the domestic economy and character of the Swedish peasantry; and his volumes are well worth buying for the sake of these alone; but at present we have less to do with the boors than the bears—and therefore must forget our landlord, Sven Jansson, though somewhat of a bear himself, for sake of the veritable Bruin.

But one moment of dogs. Mr Lloyd had three:—Brunette, with pricked ears, and, but for her tail, which turned over her back, like a fox. She was a great coward, and frightened almost out of her senses at the sight or smell of a wild beast, but incomparable at capercailzie. Hector was black, with ears pricked, tail curled, and in appearance a cur,

Mr Lloyd purchased him in Norway, from a celebrated bear-hunter, named Daniel Anderson, residing at a place called Tissjöberget, who said he had killed in his day sixty bears, and thirteen of them with the aid of Hector. But Mr Lloyd had to exclaim—

“Hec quantum mutatus ab illo Hectore!”

For he by no means turned out the capital dog his master's representation had led him to expect. The third was Pajjas, or Harlequin,—of a good size, very strongly built, and, with the exception of his toes, which were white, he was of a coal-black colour,—his ears were pricked,—and his tail, which was bushy, he usually carried much in the manner of a fox, while his countenance depicted, and truly, a great deal of courage. He, too, was a Norwegian, and presented to Mr Lloyd by Mr Falk. But he was old, and somewhat worn, and now incapable of great exertion, though in his younger days, a better dog for bears had never been seen in that part of Sweden. In his puppyhood, the first time he saw a bear, he flew at his head, and attempted to fasten, but was seized in the iron paws of the brute, and dashed with violence on the snow; his master, at that time a celebrated chasseur, came to the rescue; but Harlequin ever after tempered his courage with caution, and would hang on the hind-quarters of Bruin, worrying him for leagues through the woods. Such were Mr Lloyd's four-footed friends, with the two latter of which he did wonders. At one time, that noble animal, the Elk, abounded in all parts of Scandinavia. But Mr Lloyd tells us it is now seldom to be seen, and then only in particular districts—the line of demarcation running between Sweden and Norway a hundred miles to the northward of his abode. Roebuck and red-deer are there, too, to be found; and rein-deer are still numerous in the north, Mr Lloyd having fallen in with them in a wild state, as well upon the Hardanger and Dovre mountains in Norway, as upon the range of hills separating Swedish from Norwegian Lapland. But now for bears.

A bear is a fine fellow—whether white, black, brown, or grizzled—pugnacious, voracious, salacious, and sagacious;—at times full of fun and frolic as O'Doherty—next hour grave as the Archbishop of Canterbury;—to-day feeding contentedly, like Sir Richard Phillips, on vegetables—to-morrow, like any alderman, devouring an ox. Always rough and ready, his versatility is beyond all admiration. Behold him for months sound asleep, as if in church—he awakes, and sucks his paw: with alacrity and elegance—then away over the snows like a hairy hurricane. He richly deserves hunting for the highest considerations—and for the lowest, only think on—Pomatum.

The Scandinavian bear—generally a dark brown—but frequently black, and then he is largest—and sometimes silver—for you seldom see two skins altogether alike—is, as we have hinted, fond of flesh; but auts and vegetables compose his principal food. Indeed, that excellent authority, Mr Falk, very justly observes, that an animal which is able to devour a moderate-sized cow in twenty-four hours, would, if flesh formed the chief part of its sustenance, destroy all the herds in the country. He thinks that the destruction which the bear commits upon cattle is often owing to the latter attacking him in the first instance; for, when provoked by the bellowing and pursuit of him, which not unfrequently commence as soon as they get a view of him, he then displays his superior strength, falls foul of them, and eats them up before sunset. Bears, Mr Falk says, may reside in the neighbourhood of cattle for years without doing them any injury, if they will but keep quiet; yet it is equally notorious that they will sometimes visit herds solely from the desire of prey. Young bears seldom molest cattle; but old bears, after having been insulted by them, and eaten a few, often become very destructive, and passionately fond of beef. Beef every day, however, palls on the palate of a bear, just as ton-jours perdrix did on that of Henry the Fourth of France. Accordingly, he varies his diet judiciously, by an intermixture of roots, the leaves and small branches of the aspen, mountain-ash, and other trees, such succulent plants as angelica and mountain-thistle, and berries, to which he is very partial—during the autumn devouring vast quantities of ripe cranberries, blaberries, raspberries, strawberries, cloud-berries, and other berries common to the Scandinavian forests; and there can be no doubt that in a garden he would be an ugly customer among the grozets. Ripe corn he also eats, and seating himself on his haunches in a field of it, he collects, with his outstretched arms, nearly a sheaf at a time—what a contrast to Ruth!—and munches the ears at his leisure. By way of condiment, he sucks honey—plundering the peasants of their beehives; and, to subdue the excess of sweetness, he ever and anon takes a mouthful of ants, of which the taste is known to all amateurs of acids to be pungent. “If any of these little creatures,” quoth Professor Nillson, “sting him in a tender part, he becomes angry immediately, and scatters around the whole ant-hill.” That is scarcely decorous in a “budge doctor of the stoic fur;” but it is good exercise, and promotes digestion. Mr Lloyd says, “This may be perfectly true, for all I know to the contrary; if so, however, I apprehend the bear is generally in an ill-humour with the ants; because, wherever I have met with any of their nests at which the bear had been feeding, they had most commonly been turned inside out.” On the other hand, when a bear gets old, grows sick, and dies, the ants pay him back in his own coin; and, without getting angry, pick him—pomatum and all—to the bones. This, in Scandinavia—as elsewhere—is called tit for tat.

During the summer, of course, the bear is always as lean as a post—but in autumn, as fat as a pillow. He is not often found in poor hilly countries, but in the wildest recesses of the forest, where there are morasses and wild wood-fruit in abundance. These are his favourite haunts. Towards the end of October, he leaves off eating altogether for that year; his bowels and stomach become quite empty, and contracted into a very small compass, while the extremity of them is closed by an indurated substance, which in Sweden is called tappen. He retires to his den, and very wisely falls asleep. Professor Nillson avers he gets fatter and fatter in his slumbers on to the end of February; but Mr Lloyd is sceptical on that point; because, says he, “in the first place, it seems contrary to reason; and, in the next, I do not know how the point is to be ascertained.” Here we take part with the hunter against the Professor; yet one thing is certain, that, let the bear be killed at what period of the winter he may, our gentleman or lady is always embonpoint, nor can you feel his ribs. He retains his fat from the time he lies down in the early part of winter, till he rises in spring; and that is surely as much, if not more, than you can have any reason to expect. As spring approaches, he shakes off his lethargy—parts with his tappen—and enters on a new career of cows, ants, branches, plants, honey, berries, and corn. Rarely—and but very rarely—he passes his tappen during winter—and then he becomes a scarecrow. At first his stomach is nice, and he eats sparingly—not more, perhaps, than a large dog; confining himself to ants and other delicacies, till his stomach has resumed its natural tone, and then he devours almost every thing edible that comes in his way, according to his usual practice during the preceding autumn.

The story of the bear sucking his paws for nourishment, Mr Lloyd justly says, has long since been exploded; but still he does suck his paws—and the question is—Why? Mr Lloyd says, he has reason to believe that the bear obtains a new skin on the balls of his feet during the winter. If, therefore, he does suck his paws—and there is generally some truth in all old beliefs—may it not be done, he asks, for the purpose of facilitating this operation of nature? We think it is very likely so. Some tame bears in our author’s possession, were constantly sucking or mumbling their paws; the operation, which was often continued for hours together, being attended with a murmuring kind of noise, which might be heard at some distance. In consequence of this, their legs or feet were covered with saliva, or rather foam, which by ignorant people might not improbably be taken for the milk which it was at one time said the bear was in the habit of extracting from his paws. But it was not the want of food that caused Mr Lloyd’s bears to be so continually mouthing, for they were seen to be thus engaged most commonly immediately after they had been fed.

It is a calumny against the cubs to assert, that when first born they are misshapen lumps, which the mother licks into form. They are no more misshapen lumps than the young of other animals—say man—but “bears in miniature.” The lady-mother bear is generally confined about the end of January, or in the course of February, and has from one to four at a birth. She suckles her progeny until summer is well advanced; and should she happen to be enceinte again in the same year, she does not suffer her former cubs to share her den next winter, but prepares quarters for them in the neighbourhood, within an easy walk. The succeeding summer, however, she is followed by both litters, who pass the ensuing winter all together in the mother’s den. Some people have talked of seeing thirty bears in one squad scampering through the Swedish woods. But they are not gregarious; and such tales are either lies altogether, or a double family, with Madame Mère at their head, amounting, perhaps, to some half dozen souls, have been multiplied by wonder into a whole regiment.

The bear is a fast and good swimmer—quite a Byron. In hot weather he bathes frequently, and runs about to dry himself in the air and sun, just like an Edinburgh citizen on the beach at Portobello. All the world knows he is a capital climber, and like ourselves, or any other rational animal, on descending trees or precipices, always comes down backwards. In a natural state he walks well on his hind-legs, and in that position can carry the heaviest burdens. Professor Nillson, erudite in bears, says, that he has been seen walking on his hinder feet along a small tree that stretched across a river, bearing a dead horse in his fore-paws. He is very fleet—continues to grow until his twentieth, and lives until his fiftieth year. The Scandinavian bear occasionally attains to a very great size. Mr Lloyd killed one that weighed four hundred and sixty pounds—and as it was in the winter-time, when his stomach was contracted, he was probably lighter by fifty or sixty pounds than he would have been during the autumnal months. The Professor speaks of one that, when slung on a pole, ten men could with difficulty carry a short distance, and that weighed, he thinks, not less than seven hundred and fifty pounds English. It was killed during the autumnal months; and it had so enormous a stomach, as almost to resemble a cow in calf. After receiving several balls, he dashed at the cordon of people who surrounded him, and severely wounded seven of them in succession—one, in thirty-seven different places, and so seriously in the head that his brains were visible. One of Mr Falk’s under-keepers assured Mr Lloyd, that he had killed even much larger, the fat of which alone weighed one hundred pounds—and its wrists were so immense, that with both of his own two huge hands, he was unable to span either of them by upwards of an inch. “It was,” says Mr Lloyd, “a Daniel Lambert among his species,”—or rather an Irish giant. The powers of such animals must be indeed tremendous—for as the Swedes say, “together with the wit of one man, he has the strength of ten.” Sometimes they climb on to the roofs of cow-houses; tear them off; and having thus gained admittance to the inmates, they slaughter and carry them away, by shoving or lifting them through the aperture by which they themselves had entered. Capital Cracksmen. Mr Lloyd heard of a bear that, in the agonies of death, thinking he had got his opponent in his arms, hugged a tree, and tore it up by the roots in his fall. Inferior animals he strikes at once with his paws on the fore part of the head, laying bare the whole skull and beating it in; but Mr Lloyd never knew of any case in which a bear either hugged a person in his arms, or struck at him with his forepaw in the same manner as a tiger or a cat. He seems to tumble men down, and then to fasten his teeth in their arms or throat. A Swedish boor alleged, as the reason of this difference in Bruin’s procedure with men and animals, that “he supposed he was forbidden by Providence.” Mr Lloyd gives us many anecdotes of the strength and ferocity of bears. On one occasion a bear dashed in among some cattle, and first dispatching a sheep, slew a well-grown heifer, and carried it over a strong fence of four or five feet in height into a wood. Having been frightened from his prey, he absconded, and the peasants, felling several trees, placed them over the dead carcass. But Bruin soon returned to the spot, and having by his enormous strength removed the trees, he had not left an ounce of flesh on the bones—and of the bones themselves but a few fragments.

Yet bears seldom—never—eat up the young children that watch the herds. Occasionally they devour a woman; but only when she foolishly attacks them, as in a case recorded by Doctor Mellerlong, who was an eye-witness to a hand, which was all that was left by a bear, of a woman who had chosen to hit him on the head with a billet of wood. Jan Finne, one of Mr Lloyd's Swedish friends, informed him that a bull was attacked by a rather small bear in the forest, when, striking his horns into his assailant, he pinned him against a tree. In this situation they were both found dead; the bull from starvation, and the bear from wounds. A bear is a match for a dozen wolves. Daniel Jansson, one of Mr Lloyd's guides, informed him that once during the chase, when he and his companions were far behind both the bear and a dog that was pursuing him, a drove of five wolves—as they knew by their tracks in the snow—attacked and devoured the dog. They had afterwards attacked the bear, but after a severe conflict, as was apparent from the state of the snow, and the quantity of hair both from the bear and the wolves that was lying about the place, the bear came off victorious, and was afterwards killed by the hunters, with his skin useless from the bites of the wolves. Jan Finne mentioned two instances of bears having been killed by wolves—in the one case, seven wolves, and in the other, eleven, having been engaged in the combat. From the immense powers of the bear, if his hind-quarters were protected, as in his den, Mr Lloyd thinks he would be a match for at least a score of wolves. He frequently attacks horses. With one of his terrible paws the ferocious brute keeps his hold of the poor horse, while with the other, he retards his progress by grasping at the trees. He thus destroys—and then devours him. Sometimes the bear, by grasping with one of his paws at the surrounding trees, as he is carried along by the wounded horse, tears them up by the roots. But if the tree stands fast, so does the horse—such is the enormous power of the bear's muscular arm. That a bear should run down a horse, seems strange; but Swedish horses are often not very speedy, and doubtless lose their senses through fear. The bear never uses his teeth till he brings his victim down; but strikes him on the back and sides with his dreadful paws as if with a sledge hammer. Bears are often killed by the hunters, with their faces disfigured apparently by the kicks of horses. The wounds inflicted by bears on cattle are hideous. In the back and neck of a horse, Mr Lloyd saw holes of such a size, that he could have buried both his hands in them; and he has heard of the whole of the hind-quarters of a cow or a horse having been actually devoured, and yet the poor creatures found alive.

Such is a slight sketch of the character and common achievements of the Scandinavian bear, whom Mr Lloyd went to hunt in the forests. He thinks, both from personal experience, and from information derived from others, that these animals are exceedingly scarce now throughout Scandinavia; and that should such progressive inroads as have of late years been made in the forest continue, there is a fair chance of the breed being exterminated in the course of another century or two. Formerly they were to be found in all parts of Sweden; now, they are rarely to be heard of in the more southern provinces of that kingdom. They disappear with the great woods. Our countrymen, however, see bears whenever they choose to do so; and never more readily than in those districts where, Mr Lloyd truly says, they have ceased to exist for a century.

Let us suppose ourselves, then, to be along with our clever and spirited friend Mr Lloyd, at Malung, in Dalecarlia, ambitious of capturing and killing the lord of the Scandinavian forests. From the map, we should suppose this place must be some sixty or eighty miles from Stjern—the road, such as it is, lying for the most part through a wild range of forest, destitute of inhabitants. Near to the hamlet of Ytter, or Lower Malung, where there is a considerable population, the party fell down upon the western branch of the river Dal, which flows almost in a line parallel with the Klar. Between these two streams, the deeply wooded country is more numerously infested with wild beasts than perhaps any other part of Sweden. The governor of the province had ordered a skall to take place on the 11th of June, 1827, in consequence of the great devastation which the bears had committed among the horses and cattle in that part of the country. One of these ferocious animals, in particular, (his tracks being known in consequence of his having lost a claw,) killed, it was said, not less than three horses in a single night. Mr Lloyd once saw a trap that had been set for this fellow: a frame of timbers placed over a horse which he had recently destroyed, on the top of which large quantities of stones were laid, so that, in the event of its falling upon him, the weight of it might crush him in pieces. The bear, however, was not to be thus caught; for, instead of making his entry at the mouth of the trap, as had been anticipated, he removed the stones, and broke through the top of it, and thus got possession of the horse without any danger to himself. A skall is a battue, implying a number of people acting in concert, and engaged in the chase of wild animals. This one was to be conducted on a very grand scale. It was to be composed of fifteen hundred men, and to embrace, at its first setting out, a tract of country of about sixty miles in circumference. The skall-plats, or skall-place, was situated on the side of a lake (Vän) about twenty miles to the eastward of Malung. This was an area, in the form of a half circle, the diameter of which might be about two or three hundred paces, marked by a pathway cut through the forest. This pathway was called the shoot-ing-line; and for some little distance in advance of it, the underwood, where it happened to be thick, was cleared away, so that the view of the shooter might not be obstructed. On this line, the people, after driving the country before them, were to converge from all points; and within this the skall was, of course, to terminate. As the eastern side of the country intended to be embraced by the skall was flanked by rivers, lakes, &c.—obstacles which, unless hard-pressed, wild beasts seldom attempt to pass—a large portion of the people were left to form the remainder of the cordon; and in consequence, when first placed in position, it was calculated that they would not be at more than fifty paces apart from each other. In the great range of country to be hunted on this occasion, there were neither lakes nor rivers; the nights were short; and as bears, and other wild beasts, were known to be numerous therabouts, vast slaughter was anticipated. But it appears that the skall, though consisting of various divisions, each with its leader, was very badly commanded and conducted. By the laws of Sweden, every house where cattle is kept is required to contribute one man as a contingent to the skall; and should a Sunday or other holiday intervene prior to the skall taking place, a little before the conclusion of divine worship, a notification is given out from the pulpit, specifying the number of people required, the districts whence they are to come, and the day, hour, and place of rendezvous. Strictly speaking, neither women nor boys ought to form a part of it, but that rule is often transgressed by the boys, and sometimes by the women. "As in most cases," quoth Mr Lloyd, "wild beasts are turned by the shouts of the people, and as the sex in Scandinavia have to the full as good use of their tongues as our fair countrywomen, I am not sure that they are not almost as useful auxiliaries in a skall as their male companions. Indeed, if it comes to real fighting, women will often keep their ground on these occasions, and I have heard of instances in which they have come into actual personal conflict with the bear, and conducted themselves in the most gallant manner." Dogs are never allowed in skalls, for were they to be at large, they would irritate and annoy the bears to that degree that they would probably break through all obstacles.

The skall moved forwards, on the morning of Monday the 11th June, and about mid-day on Wednesday, approached the skull-plats. Very bad order, however, had been kept, and through wide gaps on the line, many animals made their escape. The line became closer and more regular towards the close of the march—and our author thus describes the result.

“In this new position I had not remained more than a minute or two, when the heavy firing, to my left, evidently rapidly advancing towards me, together with the tremendous shouts of the people, gave me plainly to understand something was coming. In this I was not deceived; for, in a few seconds, a large and noble-looking bear, his head rather erect, and with the fire and spirit of a war-horse in his appearance, dashed at full speed into the small opening of which I have just made mention. His stay there, however, was but momentary; for, seeing probably that the people were too thick on the ground to give him a chance of escape, he wheeled about, and in another instant he was lost in the thicket. In the interim, however, I had time, though without taking any deliberate aim, to discharge both my barrels (a double gun made by John Manton, and a capital one of course); when one or both of my balls, as it was very evident from the growl he gave, took the desired effect: he did not, however, fall at the instant, though, after he had proceeded a few paces, and in that while it was said no person fired at him, he fell to rise no more.

“I now commenced reloading; but I had only got a ball into one of my barrels, when another bear dashed into, and was almost as instantaneously out of, my little opening; so that, by the time I had taken up my gun from the ground and placed it to my shoulder, he was all but out of sight. I fired, however, at random; but, as he was in the thicket and went off, I had no means of ascertaining whether my bullet took effect or the contrary.

“When one considers the apparently unwieldy shape of a bear, the pace that he goes at, if the snow be not very deep upon the ground, is really extraordinary. In this instance, these animals were galloping in every direction within the skull-plats, with the quickness and agility of so many rabbits. For the best of runners to escape from a bear in the open country is totally out of the question; and indeed, were the ground ever so favourable, a man, in the event of an attack, would have to thank his stars if he could manage to get out of his way.

“It was laughable, all this while, to see the peasants, or rather those with firearms; for, on the slightest alarm being given, their guns were shouldered, and, with their fingers on the triggers, pointed towards the place whence the enemy might be expected to make his appearance. In general, however, there was an expression depicted on their countenances, which looked to me something beyond that of extreme interest; indeed, I am almost inclined to think their ‘over anxiety’ in some instances, converted hares, of which there were numbers running up and down, into bears, and that they fired at the former in consequence. Skalls, however, I should remark, were of rare occurrence in that part of Sweden; and the people were therefore less accustomed to the sight of bears than in some other districts in Scandinavia.

“After a while, and when the firing had ceased along the whole line, that part of the cordon where I was stationed had orders to move forward. At first we had to force our way through an almost impenetrably thick brake, which formed, as it were, a belt within the skull-plats. Subsequently, however, we came to some enclosures deeply intersected with ravines immediately overhanging the Wan lake, from which we might then be at about two hundred and fifty paces distance. We now heard tremendous shouting, and presently afterwards we saw a bear, at some forty or fifty paces from the land, swimming for the opposite side of the lake. Its escape, however, was next to impossible, as, to guard against a circumstance of this kind happening, several boats had been previously stationed on the water; these went in immediate pursuit, when a shot or two through the head presently put the bear hors de combat; and subsequently we observed its carcass towed to the land.

“The ground where we now stood was considerably elevated, and commanded a fine prospect of the boundless forest which surrounded us on every side, as well as of the beautiful lake Wan, which lay immediately beneath us. Added to this, the chase by the boats, and the death of the bear in the water, together with the formidable appearance of the fifteen or sixteen hundred armed men who composed the battue, and who, drawn up in the form of a crescent, and attired in as many various costumes as the number of parishes they belonged to, were now fully in view, formed a picture that was both highly interesting and animating.

“In the enclosures were still some small brakes, and these, it may be supposed, we took care to beat very closely, as nothing was more likely than that a wounded bear might have crept into them for shelter. We did not, however, meet with any of those animals; but, from a close thicket, a lynx, a fine long-legged fellow, nearly as red, and twice as large, as a fox, went off at an awkward gallop. This animal, or at least one of the same species, I had previously seen when we were firing at the bears; but at that time I did not care to waste my powder and shot, when so much better game was on foot. When he first started, he was within about fifteen paces of me, and then I could probably have killed him; but at that time some of the people were in the line of my fire, and I was therefore obliged to let him go off unmolested. When he was at some sixty or seventy paces distance, I sent the contents of both my barrels after him, though, as far as I could judge, without any effect; his escape, however, was next to impossible, for the people at this time were eight or ten deep; so, after running the gauntlet of twenty shots at the least, he was at length slaughtered.

"Thirty or forty hares were still within the cordon, perfectly bewildered with the noise and uproar that was going forward. When, however, we had beaten the few remaining brakes, and ascertained beyond a doubt, that neither bear nor other wild beast was remaining, a war of extermination was carried on against them. Some of these poor animals were knocked on the head as they were running among the legs of the people; whilst others, and by far the greater part, were shot; this indeed was altogether contrary to orders; for, in skulls, no one is permitted to fire, except at bears or other wild beasts. Such shooting, however, I never before witnessed; for, in more than one instance, I saw twelve or fourteen shots fired in succession at the same hare, when within only a few paces of the muzzles of the guns, without its being touched; and after all, I almost suspect more of them died from fright, than in consequence of any actual injury they received.

"By the time all the hares were killed, we had advanced close upon the edge of the water, when, nothing else presenting itself, the skull of course terminated, and the people dispersed.

"The game was now to be collected from the different parts of the skull-plats; this was effected by slinging it on poles, and carrying it on men's shoulders. It was found to consist of a lynx and three bears. It was, however, reported that several bears had been killed during the battue, and secreted by the peasants and others for their own individual benefit. How far this story might be true I know not; though I certainly believed it the less, as I myself was numbered among the delinquents.

"One of the bears, the same that I had at least some hand in killing, was rather a large male; the other two were females. I did not very particularly examine any of them; but, from what I saw, I had reason to suppose that they had only received very few balls; this I should have been surprised at, had I not known what wretched performers the peasants usually are on these occasions, for I have no doubt but that between one and two hundred shots were fired at the bears alone during this particular battue. Their guns, however, and more particularly the locks, are commonly of a very sorry description; and in the course of the day, near to where I stood, I certainly heard as many clicks, or miss-fires, as explosions. At fixed objects, many of the Swedish peasants are capital marksmen; but in general they have little idea of hitting in rapid motion.

"Here was but a sorry return for the loss of time occasioned to fifteen or sixteen hundred men who composed this skull, many of whom, in consequence of residing at long distances, were absent from their homes for five or six days. The expense altogether I heard estimated at about five thousand rix-dollars, or two hundred and fifty pounds of our money, which was no inconsiderable sum in Sweden. I had the skull, however, been as well conducted in the commencement as it seemed to me to be towards the conclusion, I have little doubt, from what I know of that part of the country, that instead of three bears, ten or fifteen of these animals, together with many other wild beasts, might, with every facility, have been slaughtered. In this case the trouble and expense would have been well repaid.

"The bears in this instance died tamely, for I did not hear of their making an attack upon any part of the line; this however, as I have already shown, is not always the case in skulls; for those animals will occasionally dash at the people, when, if not quickly put hors de combat, they sometimes do much mischief.

"Neither elks nor wolves were seen, that I am aware of, on this occasion; the former, however, are sometimes to be met with in that part of Dalecarlia; and the latter are rather numerous.

"Some time after the battue was terminated, the game, with the exception of hares, which the peasants were allowed to keep themselves, was sold by public auction. The sale seemed to create a good deal of interest, though but little competition in regard to bidding; for, altogether, it produced the mearest trifle. This was the less to be wondered at, as there were few besides peasants present on this occasion; indeed, with the exception of the Länsmän of the several parishes, and two or three others, I hardly noticed a person at all in the rank of a gentleman.

"When the sale was concluded, the people dispersed, and every one made for his respective home."

In summer skulls, which are generally the most interesting, wide tracts of country, as we have now seen, are often driven, or rather hunted, and a great variety and quantity of game is frequently collected together. Yet they are not certain of success; for as at that season it is not exactly known where a bear or other wild beast is to be found, it is only the suspected part of the forest that can be beaten; and in consequence, a blank day may sometimes occur. Mr Lloyd, on his return home from the summer skull above described, came up with five or six peasants, who were returning from it to Döngsjö, from which they had started on the preceding Sunday morning. The distance from that place to where the skull terminated, could not be less than fifty miles; and thus these poor fellows, independently of the sacrifice of their time, for five whole days, had nearly a hundred miles to travel, without any remuneration. Sometimes they had to travel a still greater distance; and to be absent from home a week or ten days. Yet such seems to be their stupidity and ignorance of the sport, that they do not kill one in ten that would fall a prey to more accomplished rangers. Sixteen hundred North-of-England men, or Highlanders,—witness the Tinchels of old,

When the hunter of deer and the warrior trode

would have swept the whole forest before them of bears, and wolves, and all other wild animals. But these Dalecarlians seem, with few exceptions, to be clumsy louts, and incapable of discipline, even in an expedition in which they have all an interest, and which has been for ages a national pursuit and pastime. They are miserable marksmen—or rather no marksmen at all—missing bears sitting, and always taken by surprise.

They are all so afraid of shooting one another, that Bruin sometimes breaks through the cordon without a shot being fired; and when they do let bang, it would seem they always shut their eyes, a preliminary process often unnecessary, as the pulling of the trigger is seldom followed either by pluff or explosion. A skull consisting of a score of English poachers, like the Westmoreland Allonbys, would kill more bears than a cordon of a thousand Dalecarlians. In former times, the sport was somewhat better understood; though the details of a skull got up for Frederick the First are, though imposing, rather barren of blood. Many thousand persons used to form those royal skulls—but the result of the greatest we read of, was but some five or six bears, a few wolves, and an elk or two, with some score of hares and such small deer—"great cry and little wool" indeed!

For our own part, we should much prefer a winter skull. Then the extent of country embraced is very limited in comparison, and a smaller number of people—who may be picked—are required. It is ascertained by ringing (tholma) where a bear has taken up his quarters in the winter time, and the skull narrows in upon his lair, with almost a certainty of success. Ringing is thus accomplished:—

When there is snow upon the ground, and the track of the animal (something resembling, in more respects than one, that of a human being) is discovered, a person follows it, until there is reason to believe that the bear may have taken up his quarters in the vicinity. This is indicated by his proceeding very slowly, and in a crooked direction, or rather by his doubling in the same manner as a hare; for, as long as he goes in a straight line, he has no intention of lying down. The man now leaves the track, and commences making an extended ring or circle round the suspected part of the forest: should he succeed in completing this without again meeting with the track, he of course knows to a certainty the bear is within it. If on the contrary, however, he finds the animal has proceeded beyond his intended circle, he commences another ring, and thus he continues until he succeeds in accomplishing his object.

The size of a ring depends altogether upon circumstances,—the season of the year, the state of the snow, the localities, &c.; and in consequence, though some may not exceed a mile or two in circumference, others again are six or eight, or even more. To ring a bear properly requires great experience; and during the operation, if so it may be termed, the greatest silence and caution are necessary.

Mr Lloyd on several occasions commanded small skalls himself; but he prefers giving an account of one under the direction of his friend, Mr Falk, in the neighbourhood of Stjern, a celebrated general, who has published a pamphlet on skalls, of which Mr Lloyd gives us a translation—and it is a curious document enough. The place of rendezvous was near a lake called the Boda, and there assembled about five hundred men formed into two divisions, armed with axes, pikes, or spears, and presenting rather a warlike appearance. Mr Falk took command in person of the dref, or driving division; the other, the hillet, or stationary-division, he intrusted to one of the under-forest-keepers (krono skogvaktare), who was on all such occasions his right-hand man. His name was Daniel Andersen; but being of Finnish origin, he was known all over the country by the appellation of Jan Finne. Among these Fins—whose ancestors came to Sweden in consequence of an invitation from Charles the Ninth—are now to be found many of the most daring and successful bear-hunters in the kingdom; but Jan Finne was the champion. Though still in the prime of life, he had killed sixty-five bears with his own gun, independently of all those he had assisted in destroying in skalls. In all his combats he had never been wounded, owing chiefly to his incomparable activity on the shidor or snow-skates, of which more anon. A short time subsequent to the skall which Mr Lloyd describes, Mr Falk represented to the government Jan Finne's general good conduct as forest-keeper, and government awarded him a handsome silver medal, with which his person was on Sunday decorated in the church at Råda. In presenting him with the medal, Mr Falk stated, in presence of the whole congregation, why such distinction had been conferred, and subsequently gave a sumptuous dinner in honour of the illustrious hunter, to which our author, in compliment to his gallantry and skill, was invited, and where he played an admirable knife and fork, as well as a spoon and cup. Indeed, though Mr Lloyd speaks of his own achievements with much modesty, we know that he is a first-rate sportsman; nor should we be afraid, now that he has led the skall repeatedly himself, to back him even against the Silver Medalist.

The winter skall, of which we now speak, formed a circle, the circumference of which was four thousand paces. On reaching the vicinity of the ring, a general halt took place—knapsacks were deposited, and the troops underwent a rigorous bodily search, for brandy—for a few drunk men disorder a whole skall. Mr Lloyd was with the stationary division, and on coming to a part of the forest where the trees were rather open, and where there was little brushwood, he placed himself in a favourable position in front of the cordon.

“Here I had not waited more than ten minutes, the people all the while keeping the most guarded silence, when to my left a great shout was set up of ‘The bears! the bears!’ In looking in that direction, I very indistinctly saw one of those animals at about a hundred paces distance; but he was so shrouded in the thicket, and my view of him was so transitory, that I did not think it worth while to fire. One of the peasants, however, discharged his piece at the bears, the four being together, though I believe without effect. This shot nevertheless, together with the shouts of the people, was the means of turning them, for they instantly headed about and faced towards the opposite, or eastern, side of the ring. It was fortunate they took this direction, as, had they made to the northward, from the cordon at that time being incomplete, they would in all probability have escaped. I was much afraid this would have been the case; and so, as I afterwards learnt, were Mr Falk and Jan Finne, both of whom, however, on hearing the shot, and apprehending what might happen, hurried forward their respective divisions as fast as possible, and luckily they were in time to form a junction before the bears made their appearance in that direction.

"Every thing now remained perfectly tranquil for a long while; for, even when the cordon was completed, it became necessary to strengthen those parts that were the weakest, as well as to make certain other arrangements. To effect these objects, Mr Falk, Jan Finne, and the other officers, were kept very actively employed for a considerable time.

"At about one o'clock, three shots, the one from the centre, and the other from the wings of the opposite division, (the usual signals on these occasions,) together with the cries of the people, which might now be indistinctly heard in the distance, announced that it was advancing towards us. Two hours or more, however, must have elapsed, during which, from the quicksilver being little above zero, and from my only being provided with my common shooting-jacket, I was almost perished with cold, before we heard another discharge, or saw any thing of the bears; for, now that these animals found themselves environed on every side, they kept the closest and most tangled brakes; and the people, as is usual on these occasions, proceeded at a very slow pace.

"Beginning to tire at last with remaining so long idle in the same position, I advanced alone about 50 paces farther within the cordon, when I stationed myself in such a situation, that I could command a tolerable view of the surrounding forest. This, however, for the reasons already given when speaking of the skull in Dalecarlia, was altogether contrary to rule.

"Here I had not remained a very long while, when a shot to my left gave me to understand that the bears were not far off; and the next minute, at about one hundred and fifty paces from where I stood, I caught a glimpse of them as they were crossing a small opening among the trees. The old bear was in advance, and the cubs, which were of a very large size, were following in succession upon her track. I might now, by possibility, have done execution; but thinking, from the direction they were taking, that they would come nearer to me, I refrained from firing. In this, however, I acted wrong; for, instead of facing towards me, as I had anticipated, they made for the opposite side of the ring; presently afterwards, indeed, the shouts of the people, together with several shots, plainly indicated that they had made their appearance in that direction.

"Some little while subsequent to this, I was joined by Lieutenant Oldenburg, of the Swedish army, who resided in the vicinity of my quarters at Stjern, and from whom, on various occasions, I have received much civility and attention. This gentleman and myself were conversing together in an under tone of voice, and I had my double-gun, which was on the full cock, in my hand, when two of the young bears, either of them nearly as large as animals of that species we are accustomed to see in England, suddenly made their appearance on the outskirts of a thick brake, at about twenty paces from where we stood. On seeing us, however, they squatted like rabbits; or at least this was the case with one of them, for of the other I got the merest glimpse possible.

"We both now fired, the Lieutenant a little after myself, and the foremost of the bears as instantly fell; but the other, at the same moment disappearing in the brake, I had no time to discharge my second barrel. As that which was down, however, showed some disposition to get on his legs again, I ran close up to him, and sent a bullet through his skull. Besides the latter ball, the bear only received one other, which, on his body being opened at a subsequent period, was recognised to be mine. Indeed, when Lieutenant Oldenburg fired, the animal was in the act of falling; and of this he was himself fully aware. My first ball shattered the bear's right shoulder (the point exposed to me) to pieces, and after passing through his body and ribs, it lodged in the skin on the opposite side; in fact, it was within an ace of going through him altogether: the ball was, however, quite flattened, and as large as a halfpenny.

"For a while, all remained pretty quiet; but presently afterwards, the tremendous shouts of the people opposite to us, and these, probably, at little more than two hundred paces distance, together with the very heavy firing that was kept up, plainly told us the remaining bears were endeavouring to make their escape in that direction. The scene had now become very animating and interesting, for at one period we counted no less than ten shots in the space of about a minute.

"After a time, however, the firing ceased altogether; and Lieutenant Oldenburg and myself were then almost led to conclude that the whole of the bears were slaughtered. In this supposition, nevertheless, we were mistaken; for presently we viewed the old bear, which, from the manner of dragging herself along, was evidently much wounded, as she was slowly making her way across a small glade in the forest. Though Jan Finne, who by this time had joined us, called out to me it was useless, I nevertheless sent a ball after her; but as she quickly disappeared in a thick brake, we had no great reason to suppose it took the desired effect.

"In the space of two or three minutes, during which several shots were fired immediately opposite to us, we again saw the old bear. Owing to an intervening brake, however, my view of her was much more indistinct than that obtained by my companions, who were a pace or two to the left of me. At this time she was standing motionless, with her front towards us, and at about 90 paces distant. Jan Finne and Lieutenant Oldenburg now lost no time in discharging the rifles with which both of them were provided. Jan Finne fired the first; and, though without a rest of any kind, with so good an aim, that his ball, as we subsequently found, entered her breast near to the shoulder, and ran the whole length of her body, when it lodged in her haunches. She did not, however, alter her position, and only noticed the wound she had received by a little shake of her head. Lieutenant Oldenburg was, however, more fortunate; for, dropping on one knee, and though like Jan Finne, without a rest, he took so good a direction, that his ball entered the heart of the animal, when she instantly fell dead upon the spot.

"The firing in front of us was, at intervals, still kept up for a minute or two longer, and then ceased altogether. On this Jan Finne, after we had advanced up to the bear, which Lieutenant Oldenburg and himself had just shot, hallooed to the people to halt; though at this time we were hardly 50 paces distant from them, not one of whom could we distinguish, in consequence of the closeness of the cover. Jan Finne now informed Mr Falk, who was along with his division, and immediately opposite to us, that three of the bears were dead within the ring; for, independently of the two that we ourselves had killed, we observed a third lying hors de combat at some little distance. In reply, that gentleman told us a fourth was killed near to where he stood; so that the whole of those of which we had come in pursuit—and we had not the good fortune to meet with others in the same ring—were now all slaughtered.

"The skull, as may be supposed, was then quickly brought to a conclusion; for, with the exception of a few hares, which the people knocked on the head with sticks, there was neither wolf nor other animal remaining within the ring.

"Thus ended this battue, which was said to have been among the most successful Mr Falk ever commanded; for four bears, all of which might almost be termed large, were not to be killed in the Scandinavian forests every day in the year. The result, however, would probably have been different, had it not been for Mr Falk's precaution in ordering Jan Finne to lead with his division under the wind in the first instance; as, had the contrary been the case, the bears would most likely, for the time at least, have made their escape. Indeed, from the variability of the weather subsequently, and the consequent state of the snow, I am not quite sure but that, if those animals had escaped on this occasion, they might have got off altogether.

"During the skull, I think not less than sixty or seventy shots were fired at the bears, no one on this occasion daring to shoot at any other animal, and the greater part of them at very short range. Towards the conclusion of the skull, indeed, those animals principally held to an almost impenetrably thick brake, where it was hardly possible to see them at more than a few paces distance; and it was here the greater part of the firing took place. The number of shots, therefore, will give some little idea of the kind of performers the peasants usually are on these occasions.

"The whole of the arrangements of this skull were admirable; and the personal exertions of Mr Falk on this, as on all similar occasions, were most unremitting. Indeed, at its conclusion, that gentleman was so hoarse from hallooing to the people, that he was hardly able to articulate a word.

"The bears were now collected together; these, with every other animal killed within the skull, were the perquisite of Mr Falk, as Ofwer-Jägmästare. The old bear was of a large size; and, from the appearance of her teeth, claws, &c. she appeared to be aged. Her weight was supposed to be between three and four hundred pounds. The cubs were thought to be three years old, and to weigh about one hundred and fifty or sixty pounds a-piece. They were all slung on poles, and then borne to the nearest vehicles, by them to be conveyed to Mr Falk's residence at Risäter.

"Three hearty cheers were now given to celebrate our success, when the people dispersed and made for their respective homes."

Casualties at skulls are of course not unfrequent. At one of them, a badly wounded bear rushed upright on his hind legs on a peasant who had missed fire, and seized him by the shoulders with his fore-paws.

The peasant, on his side, laid hold of the bear's ears and shaggy hair about his head. They were twice down and up again without loosening their hold, during which time the bear had bitten through all the sinews of both arms from the wrists upwards, and was at last approaching the throat, when Mr Falk in lucky time arrived, and by one shot ended the conflict. On another occasion, a soldier's wife engaged a bear in single combat, armed with a club. Several times Bruin upset her, so as that she performed a somerset, to the infinite amusement of the whole skall. Still the amazon kept banging him, as she arose for the third time from her head; and finally the monster, previously much mangled by shots, gave up the ghost. The following is a well-told incident:—

"The skall to which this anecdote relates, and at which Captain Eurenus himself was present, took place about the year 1790, in the parish of Yestram, in the province of Wenersborg. It was conducted in the usual manner, every person having his proper position assigned to him: one man, however, an older soldier, who was attached to the hälet, or stationary division of the skall, thought proper to place himself in advance of the rest in a narrow defile, through which, from his knowledge of the country, he thought it probable the bear would pass. He was right in his conjecture; for the animal soon afterwards made his appearance, and faced directly towards him. On this he levelled and attempted to discharge his piece; but, owing to the morning being wet, the priming had got damp, and the gun missed fire. The bear was now close upon him, though it is probable that, if he had stepped to the one side, he might still have escaped; but, instead of adopting this prudent course, he attempted to drive the muzzle of his gun, to which, however, no bayonet was attached, down the throat of the enraged brute. This attack the bear parried with the skill of a fencing-master; when, after wresting the gun out of the hands of the man, he quickly laid him prostrate.

"All might still have ended well; for the bear, after smelling at his antagonist, who was lying motionless and holding his breath, as if he had been dead, left him almost unhurt. The animal then went to the gun, which was only at two or three feet distance, and began to overhaul it with his paws. The poor soldier, however, who had brought his musket to the skall contrary to the orders of his officers, and knowing that if it was injured he should be severely punished, on seeing the apparent jeopardy in which it was placed, quietly stretched out his hand, and laid hold of one end of it, the bear having it fast by the other. On observing this movement, and that the man in consequence was alive, the bear again attacked him; when, seizing him with his teeth by the back of the head, as he was lying with his face to the ground, he tore off the whole of his scalp, from the nape of the neck upwards, so that it merely hung to the forehead by a strip of skin. The poor fellow, who knew that his safety depended upon his remaining motionless, kept as quiet as he was able; and the bear, without doing him much farther injury, laid himself along his body.

"Whilst this was going forward, many of the people, and Captain Eurenus among the rest, suspecting what had happened, hastened towards the spot, and advanced within twelve or fifteen paces of the scene of action: here they found the bear still lying upon the body of the unfortunate man: sometimes the animal was occupying himself in licking the blood from his bare skull, and at others in eyeing the people:—all, however, were afraid to fire, thinking either that they might hit the man, or that, even if they killed the bear, he might in his last agonies still farther mutilate the poor sufferer. In this position, Captain Eurenus asserted that the soldier and the bear remained for a considerable time, until at last the latter quitted his victim and slowly began to retreat, when, a tremendous fire being opened upon him, he instantly fell dead.

"On hearing the shots, the poor soldier jumped up, his scalp hanging over his face so as completely to blind him; when, throwing it back with his hands, he ran towards his comrades like a madman, frantically exclaiming, 'The bear, the bear!'

"The mischief, however, was done, and was irreparable. The only assistance he could receive was rendered to him by a surgeon, who happened to be present, and who severed the little skin which connected the scalp with the forehead, and then dressed the wound in the best manner he was able. The scalp, when separated from the head, Captain Eurenus described as exactly resembling a peruke.

"In one sense, the catastrophe was fortunate for the poor soldier. At this time every one in the army was obliged to wear his hair of a certain form, and he in consequence, being now without any, immediately got his discharge."

From the skull the transition is striking to the gäll—the contrast between the bustle, animation, and crowd of the one, to the silence and solitariness of the other. There, thousands, perhaps, of shouting peasants—here, one patient and silent watcher, perched aloft, perhaps for a fortnight, waiting for a bear! The gäll is a small stand, erected between two or three trees growing near to each other, at some twenty or thirty feet from the ground. Beneath this the carcass of a cow or horse is deposited, and the marksman, as soon as the shades of evening set in, for bears feed during the night, takes his station aloft, and in silence and watchfulness remains till the sun ascend above the horizon. The approach of the bear to the carrion is so cautious that the slightest noise will alarm him; and he generally makes his appearance at the lure soon after sunset and a little before sunrise—for you know, gentle reader! that in these latitudes the night is sometimes scarcely as long as this article. A worthy friend of Mr Lloyd's, a Finnish peasant, named Elg, or the Elk, has sometimes waited for fifteen successive nights, during which, though he heard the bear rustling among the bushes, he was never fortunate enough to see him, and caught nothing but a cold upon his lungs, from which, according to his own account, he never had recovered. Bruin is not only a most suspicious, but also a most suspecting character; and when he has killed and partly eaten a horse or cow, he is very shy of returning to the carcass. Gälls are frequently erected over such carcasses; but the Elk, in one instance, after watching for a fortnight, till his patience was exhausted, gave his place to another peasant for the same period of time. But the bear, having smelt a Fin, and then a Swede, kept his distance; and a month's watching was lost. Nevertheless, from one gäll, the Elk shot three bears, one of which, on receiving his mortal wound, gave such a growl, that his Elkship was terrified on his stance, while the whole midnight forest echoed to the sound. Mr Lloyd, who was up to every thing, tried the gäll. An enormous bear had killed a cow not many miles distance from Lapp-cottage, where he then had his summer residence. He erected a gäll near the carcass, consisting of a few boughs, so interwoven together that he could not well tumble out, between two pines, at about twenty-five feet from the ground. There he posted himself for five successive nights—preyed on by mosquitoes—but no bear appeared. On comparing dates, we find that on one of these five nights we were celebrating one of our Nortes Ambrosianæ, at which two bears made their appearance, who were carried off dead. "There was something interesting," says Mr Lloyd, "in being perched up in my gäll. The gloomy solitude of the forest in the night season—the melancholy hootings of the great horned owl, which were to be heard every now and then in the distance—the slaughtered cow lying in a small glade before me, mangled in a dreadful manner by the fangs of the bear—and, lastly, the excitement kept up by momentarily expecting the rugged monster himself to make his appearance." In summer you have a better chance of shooting a bear from a gäll than in winter; for then the carrion emits so noisome an odour, that the effluvia proceeding from a man—unless he be very red-haired indeed—must, as Mr Lloyd remarks, be little perceptible. Our author heard of an instance, in which two persons posted on their stand beheld a bear advancing, when, just as they were in the act of firing, the gäll suddenly gave way, and, to their great discomfiture and consternation, they were both precipitated to the ground. But it does not appear the bear eat them—being probably as much alarmed as themselves. On another occasion, two brave fellows, who had waited a fortnight for Bruin's approach, were so dumbfounded when he appeared, that they dropped their muskets, and he retired to his lair. Considering the shortness of human life, a fortnight at a time past in a gäll seems to us disproportionately long—especially in a country where there is no access to periodical literature. A few numbers of Blackwood's Magazine, to a man so situated, would be a great solace and relief. We must give Mr Lloyd's friend the Elk a niche in Maga. His real name was Henrick Mattson; but having served in the army, the soldiers, who were in the habit of giving one another fictitious names, such as the names of animals, birds, trees, &c. had dubbed him Elg or Elk, by which alone he was now known all over the country. He had been one of twelve children; but the whole family but himself were dead—father and mother, and all. He was about thirty-five years of age, short in person, stout and robust, and able to undergo great fatigue, though Mr Lloyd, on one bear hunt, which lasted for weeks, fairly knocked him up. He excelled in the use of the rifle, and was admirable upon the skidor. When only twelve years of age, he and his brother engaged at midnight an enormous bear, who was disturbing his father's cattle, and had helped himself to a goat. It made its escape; but next day Elk, in company with two grown-up brothers, attacked him, and slew him after a dangerous combat, in which the boy behaved with great bravery, and one of his brothers was badly wounded. When in his fourteenth year, he distinguished himself by pursuing with a dog—a mere cur—a huge bear, that had made a dash at the cattle. He soon came upon him at about twenty paces distance, on the opposite side of a little ravine, and taking aim at the monster, whose attention was occupied by the cur, with a gun, a mere plaything, only two feet long, and of which the cock was so defective that he was obliged to hold it back with his hand, he fired at the breast of the bear, and shot the animal through the heart. Often afterwards, when a man, he had desperate encounters; and one of them is thus narrated:—

“In the afternoon of the same day, and when Elg was alone, in a very wild part of the country, covered with much fallen timber and immense fragments of stone, he suddenly came upon the track of a bear; the next minute, and within a short distance from where he stood, he discovered in the cleft of a great mass of rocks, the den of the animal.

“As he had no confidence, however, (according to his own account,) in the lock of his rifle, he did not care to go immediately up to the den; he therefore mounted a pretty high stone, immediately overlooking it, at about fifteen paces distant.

“From this position he discovered the bear lying fast asleep near to the entrance of the den; and as he got sight of her ear, under which (supposing the side of the animal's head to have been towards him, as he imagined was the case) is one of the most fatal of places, he lost no time in levelling and discharging his rifle.

“For a moment after he had fired, the bear lay still; and in consequence, Elg almost imagined she (for it was a female) was killed: had he thought otherwise, he would have had ample time to get out of her way; presently, however, the bear raised herself up, when, fixing her eyes steadily upon him, and uttering at the same time a terrific growl, she dashed at him (to use his own expression) ‘with the rapidity of a bullet out of a gun,’ and was close upon him in almost the twinkling of an eye.

“Very fortunately for Elg, the stone on which he was standing was situated on a declivity, the after part of it being some five or six feet from the ground; down this, in his hurry to escape, he tumbled all but headlong; it was well he did so, for the bear, followed by two of her cubs, which were more than half as large as herself, almost at the same instant made her spring, and passed clean and far over him.

“In this situation, Elg lay for a short while, frightened, as he said, almost out of his senses; when finding all quiet, and supposing, as was the case, that the bears, from not seeing him, had taken themselves off to another part of the forest, he ventured to get up, and to reconnoitre the den; he then discovered, that besides the three which had made a leaping-bar of his person, a fourth had taken an opposite direction.

“Though all four bears for this time made their escape, yet in the course of the eight or ten succeeding weeks, Elg, with the assistance of several other peasants, managed to kill the whole of them.

“On taking the skin from the old bear, which he described to have been of a very large size, he found the bull which he had first fired at her, flattened out, and set fast on the back part of her skull. By this, it would appear that he had mistaken the position in which she was lying, so that, instead of aiming at the root of her ear, as he imagined was the case, he had fired at her length-wise.”

But from the silent, solitary, and sedentary bear non-shooting on the gäll, let us turn to the noisy, companionable, and rousing bear-shooting on the skidor, or snow-skates. The skidor, in the parts of Scandinavia of which Mr Lloyd speaks, for the left foot, was usually from nine to eleven, or even twelve feet in length, for the right, six or seven, the inequality enabling a person to wheel about with greater facility, and, in broken or bad ground, to lean the whole of his weight, if necessary, on the shorter skate, which was constructed of stronger materials. The breadth of these skidor is between two and three inches, and the foot is fixed with leather straps about the middle of the length, the points being considerably turned up to avoid all impediments. A pair may weigh from ten to fifteen pounds. In very mountainous districts, the under part of the skidor is covered with seal-skin, to prevent a retrograde movement in ascending steep acclivities. In running, they are never lifted from the ground, but the motion is a glide, something similar to that of our own skates. The skater carries, frequently, a stick in each hand, to impel or retard his progress, his rifle being swung across his shoulders. On pretty level ground, it is easy to run on skidor; but, in a deeply-wooded and mountainous country, thickly studded with fragments of rocks, prostrate trees, &c. like the Dalecarlian and Wermeland forests, it requires immense practice. During Mr Lloyd's noviciate, he used to sustain two or three hundred tumbles in the course of a day, and occasionally to come with such violence against trees, as to think he should be dashed to pieces, or the trees uprooted. Ere long he became a decent skater, and supposes he could go fifty miles, over tolerable ground, considerably under the twelve hours. He was astonished with the skill and address of some of the first runners in Scandinavia whom he saw on the descent of a lofty and precipitous hill, going at an immense pace, at times stooping nearly double, to avoid the overhanging branches, at others, swerving their bodies to save their guns from the trees, and at almost every instant, shifting their legs so as to avoid rocks, stones, and other obstacles. He believes that men might be found who could perform fifty miles in seven or eight hours, and not impossibly a hundred miles in double that space of time. But over bad ground, when the snow is loose, the pace is but slow, the skidor enabling a man to get along under circumstances which, without them, would bring him to a stand-still. They are used chiefly in the more northern districts of Wermeland, and particularly among the descendants of the Fins.

Intelligence having been received by Mr Lloyd, that a large bear was safely ringed at Aspberg, a Finnish settlement, about ninety miles to the north-west of his quarters in Lapp-cottage, (to which he had now removed,) he set off on a sledge to shoot him; and after many difficulties, and a bivouac, picturesquely described, in the forest, he reached the village or hamlet of some dozen families, situated near the summit of a hill of considerable elevation. The country all around is mountainous, and deeply covered with pine forests—the scenery of a bold and picturesque character. The village is thirty-five miles from the parish church, and, owing to the wretched roads, a journey to and from their place of worship not unfrequently occupies a week. Here the peasantry excel in the use of skidor. Indeed, for many months in the year, they have no other means of communicating with their neighbours, or of carrying on their necessary avocations in the forest. Like many other Finnish settlements in the northern forests, they have their skidor-bucke, or skidor-hill. On Sunday afternoon, or other holidays, the people, both young and old, male and female, congregate in considerable numbers to amuse themselves with sliding down the steep. Children of a very tender age join in the amusement, and thus early become proficient in the art. The Aspberg bear baffled his pursuers the first day, but on the afternoon of the second, he fell. Mr Lloyd had pursued him on skidor for eleven hours, and fired the fatal shots.

A few days afterwards, our author, in company with the Elk and other two followers, resumed their quest, and the result is thus spiritedly described:—

“The spot where he was challenging was a small opening in the thicket. There, however, nothing was to be seen but a little aperture of less than a foot in diameter, in the surface of the snow, which was perfectly level, and near to which he stood, furiously baying. This I, of course, instantly knew to be Bruin's lair, and I was also very certain, from the manner of the dogs—for Pajjas had now come up—that he was within it. Not caring to waste time, therefore, and having confidence in my gun, which was loose in my hand, I at once ran my skidor, one on each side of the hole.

"On looking down this pit,—the snow on every side being nearer five than four feet in depth,—I espied the bear very snugly coiled up at the bottom. By this time, the animal had partly awakened from his nap, which had probably been of many months' continuance, and was beginning to move his head about, as if at a loss to know what was going forward. I now pointed my rifle downwards between my legs, it being then in a perpendicular direction, and pulled the trigger; but, instead of splitting his skull, as I fully anticipated would have been the case, the piece, as ill luck would have it, missed fire. This must either have been owing to the snow that was coming down, or the powder falling from the pan, in consequence of the position in which I stood. In another moment I drew the other trigger, though, unfortunately, with as little success, for my second, like my first barrel, also refused to perform its duty.

"The bear had by this time roused himself, and was just springing from his lair, when Elg, who had followed closely in my rear, put my rifle, ready cocked, into my hand; this I as instantly discharged at the animal; and though the muzzle of it was within less than a foot of his head, strange to say, I managed to miss him altogether. I suppose most people will imagine this arose from trepidation; but, according to my own notion, it was from shooting in too great a hurry; I had no time, indeed, to take aim; my ball, however, I apprehend, all but grazed his skull, the point at which it was directed.

"The bear now bolted from between my legs, and reached the surface of the snow; and, in consequence, we were, as the old saying goes, 'cheek by jowl' with each other. Here, as he stood grinning, I drove the muzzle of my rifle with considerable force under his ear, the point exposed to me, by which I partly succeeded in upsetting him. This foolish act arose rather from a feeling of ill nature and disappointment at my having so stupidly allowed him to escape, than from entertaining any apprehension of his attacking me, which he looked well-inclined to do. Very fortunately, the beast only resented this assault by seizing hold of the barrel of my rifle; for, after indenting this with his teeth, at about a foot from the muzzle, he thought it the wisest plan to walk himself off.

"Fortunately for me, this bear was not large; had the contrary been the case, it is more than probable he would have given me a broken head. Escape at the time was impossible, and both Elg and myself were entirely unarmed, after I had discharged my rifle. It is true, one of our peasants was provided with an axe; but this man was far in the background, and it is besides more than doubtful whether he would have ventured to have rendered us assistance in the event of its turning out a serious affair.

"I now reloaded my rifle, but the locks of my double gun being filled with the falling snow, I had no leisure to put it in order. Letting it remain in statu quo, therefore, we forthwith gave chase.

"During the little delay that necessarily took place whilst the above operation was going on, the bear seemed to have made good use of his legs, as, to judge by the challenges of the dogs, who kept pretty well up with him, he had by this time got some distance ahead. Fortunately the snow was in good order for our skidor, and we were therefore enabled to proceed at a good pace. For a while, we had to contend against rising ground, and to force our way through a large and densely thick brake; but, when we had surmounted those difficulties, we pushed quickly forward, and gained rapidly upon the bear.

"The run might now have lasted for near three quarters of an hour, during which the animal had proceeded in almost a direct line from the point where he had started; when, on reaching an eminence, we had the gratification of viewing him at about two hundred and fifty paces ahead: at this time he was galloping slowly forward, though occasionally stopping, as if his attention was taken up with the dogs that were following a little in his rear.

"We now dashed after the bear at the very top of our speed. The forest hereabouts was fortunately open, and the ground falling, and of course very favourable for our skidor; so that, from going at a killing pace, a very short time sufficed to bring us within sixty or seventy paces of the animal. We then halted; when, taking my rifle from Elg, who had it loose in his hand, I discharged it at the beast. He was still in the gallop, and rather crossing me; but my ball took the desired effect, for, entering one side of his neck, it passed out at the other, when he sank down, and instantly expired."

Some days afterwards our indefatigable friend again set out from Asp-

berg, in quest of two bears, one in the vicinity of Lutenis, in Norway, a hamlet situated on the Klar, about fourteen miles to the north-west, and the other in the parish of Lima, in Dalecarlia, about fifty miles in a south-easterly direction. The first gave him two or three very severe runs. One day, in particular, when the snow was in capital order for the skidor, they drove him about fifty miles. At intervals they were in pursuit of this bear for about a fortnight, driving him over a vast tract of the Norwegian and Dalecarlian forests. Yet they never once got a shot at him—and finally took a farewell glimpse of him on the summit of the Faxefjält, about fifty miles from the place where he was started, and a hundred and forty from Lapp-cottage! The party then wended their way on their skidor across the forest, to attack the other bear in the parish of Lima, which was about sixty miles distance in a south-easterly direction. He was couched in his lair in a very wild range of country to the westward of the Wenja Lake. Him, with little intermission, they pursued for a week, without once viewing him—the snow being in such a slushy state from the effects of the sun, that they had literally to plough their way through it. During all the time they were badly off for provisions, all that part of the country being uninhabited. They generally bivouacked on the snow—and sometimes took up their lodgings at such sätterwalls as they fell in with in the forest. The heat from exertion was often so excessive, that Mr Lloyd, though stripped to shirt and trowsers, was often wet through, and the frost then changed his garments into plates of ice. The Elk was fairly done up, but Mr Lloyd stood it out famously, and was nothing the worse of wear at the last. The chase of the bear on skidor, he exultingly exclaims, is a noble amusement—for even should it prove unsuccessful, one has at least the satisfaction of enjoying an animated run. It would appear that Mr Lloyd, on his return to Aspsberg, must have travelled, on sledge or on skidor, between three or four hundred miles—and that both bears are probably alive at this day.

-In bear-hunting on skidor, the chasseur ought always to be accompanied by a couple of dogs. But good dogs are now scarce in Scandinavia. Sometimes when the bear is pursued by dogs, he becomes so enraged that he takes hold of the nearest stick or stone he can lay his paws upon, and flings it at his assailants. But he is a bad marksman; for instead of sending his weapon in the direction of his opponent, he not unfrequently whizzes it over his own head. So says Professor Nilsson. We presume the Swedish and Norwegian boors take lessons from Bruin—and that accounts for the small slaughter done by a cordon of fifteen hundred men. Sometimes even the old bears (the young ones do so frequently) take to trees. Mr Lloyd's friend Svensson, when chasing one on skidor, all of a sudden lost his track—but looking upwards he saw the shaggy monster seated among the branches of a pine. The rifle soon made him bite the snow, and when he fell to the ground, he was so completely enveloped in that covering, that only one of his paws was to be seen. The chasse of the bear on skidor is very dangerous. It requires great skill to avoid his rush; and Mr Lloyd has heard of several men having been killed. Many are seen with faces disfigured, and otherwise maimed. Their eyes are occasionally torn out—fingers bitten off—and arms pierced from wrist to shoulder.

When tumbled down by a bear, you must instantly sham Abraham, and pretend to be dead. That ruse always takes; and simple Bruin removes his carcass from above yours, and hobbles off—leaving you probably “face, breast, arms, and legs, all a mass of blood.”

Mr Lloyd himself was once in great danger from one “of these fellows.” The animal had committed great ravages among the cattle in the line of forest situated between the river Klar and Dal. Twenty horses, in one summer, had fallen victims to his voracity—and he was the terror of the people of those parts. Accompanied by the Elk, Svensson, and two peasants, Mr Lloyd pursued him for a fortnight, and after an unsuccessful shot at him, and afterwards driving him from his lair, which occupied the whole surface of an immense ant-hill, at last, in a rather open part of the forest, Bruin suddenly reared himself up from among a cluster of small pines on a little eminence at about twenty-five paces distance, and presented a fair object of attack.

"I now lost no time in slipping my double gun out of its case, when, as the fellow was slowly retreating among the bushes, I discharged both my barrels at him almost at the same instant. On receiving my fire, the monster, with his jaws distended, partially swung himself round, when, growling furiously, he seemed as if he was on the point of dashing towards us. The snow, however, therabouts was unusually deep, which, coupled with the state of exhaustion he must naturally have been in from the long run we had given him, caused him probably to alter his determination, and instead of attacking us, he continued his retreat. This was perhaps fortunate; for, as he had the vantage-ground, and we were encumbered with our skidor, it might have been difficult for us to have got out of his way.

"Svensson and the other peasant now shortly came up, when, after reloading my gun, and making the locks as water-proof as possible in my usual manner, which I effected by means of a candle-end that I carried about me for the purpose, we lost no time in following up the bear, which was evidently much wounded, as we saw by his tracks being deeply marked with blood.

"As it was the post of danger, I now led the way; Elg and the peasants following in my wake. Thus we proceeded for some distance, until we came to a very thick and tangled brake. Having a suspicion that the beast might have sheltered himself here, I made a little detour around his tracks, and succeeded in ringing him. I now lost not a moment in taking off my skidor; for, in the event of an attack, these machines are highly dangerous, as I have said, in close cover; and advanced on foot into the thicket.

"I had not, however, proceeded more than two or three paces, when a most terrific and lengthened growl announced that the bear was still in existence; and the next moment, and at only some ten or twelve paces distance, the quantity of snow which was hanging in the trees having prevented me from previously observing him, I viewed the fellow dashing forward at the full gallop; fortunately, I was not altogether taken by surprise, for my double gun was not only out of its case, but both the locks were on the full-cock. This was well, for the beast came at such a rattling pace, that, by the time I had discharged my second barrel, he was within less than a couple of paces of the muzzle of my gun. When I fired my last shot, he was not coming directly towards me; for either my first had turned him—which the people asserted was the case,—or he did not observe us, owing to the closeness of the cover. By swerving my body to one side, however, for I had no time to move my feet, he luckily passed close alongside of me, without offering me any molestation. This, indeed, I apprehend, was out of his power; for, after receiving the contents of my last barrel, he slackened his pace, and by the time he had proceeded some few steps farther, life was extinct, and he sank to rise no more.

"Elg, who was only a short distance from me, behaved very well on this occasion; for, though my rifle was in readiness in his hand, he refrained, agreeably to my previous instructions, from discharging it. My orders to him were, as I have said, only to fire in the event of the bear actually having me in his gripe; and to these directions, which few other men, under the circumstance, would probably have attended to, he paid obedience.

"Our prize proved to be an immense male bear; indeed, Svensson stated, he had never seen but one equally large, in his lifetime. I subsequently caused him to be conveyed to Uddeholm, a distance of between forty and fifty miles, when we ascertained his weight to be four hundred and sixty English pounds. This, it must be recollected, was after a severe run, during which he had probably wasted not a little; and also, that it was in the winter time, when, from his stomach being contracted, he was naturally very much lighter than he would have been during the autumnal months; in point of fact, had this bear been slaughtered during the latter period of the year, his weight would probably have been between five and six hundred pounds.

"On opening this beast, thirty-six hours after his death, and during the intermediate time he had been exposed to the open air, when the temperature was pretty severe, we found that, owing to his excessive exertion, nearly the whole of the fat of his intestines was in a state of liquefaction, and in consequence we were necessitated to scoop it out with a cup. I have already made mention of this circumstance when speaking of the chasse of the bear during the summer season.

"On taking the skin from the beast, we found he had received my eight bullets; for, though I only fired four times, I had on each occasion two running balls in either barrel. The balls from the two first discharges (as it was supposed) took effect rather high up in his side, the point exposed to me; those from the third were received in the animal's mouth, as he was coming with distended jaws towards us, when they carried away half his tongue and one of his fangs; whilst those from the fourth discharge passed either through or immediately near to his heart, and caused his almost instant dissolution."

So much for the chasse of the bear on skidor. But Mr Lloyd slew several bears with his own rifle, on simple foot-sole. Once in a very close thicket, when stooping down and peering under the surrounding trees, his eye caught a suspicious-looking object, which he presently made out to be a bear, coiled up like a dog, at the foot of a large pine, and apparently fast asleep. He lost not a moment, but running up close alongside of the monster, shot him through the head. Death was so instantaneous, that he never moved in the slightest degree from his position. This system of stealing in upon and attacking bears at close quarters, though seldom adopted in Scandinavia, Mr Lloyd holds to be the most fatal method of destroying these animals. But the danger is great. For, when smothered with snow, both below and above, what if you miss your aim? Instant death.

On another occasion, Mr Lloyd shot "the Branberg Bear;" and on another, he destroyed a whole den-full.

"Though the dog had found the bears, I did not at the first moment observe the entrance to their den, which was an excavation in the face of a little rising situated between, and partly formed by, the roots of the surrounding trees. On discovering it, however, I at once sprang on to the top of the hillock; and though at that time immediately over the den, the bears still remained quiet.

"On my hallooing, they felt so little inclination to leave their quarters, that the old bear simply contented herself with partially projecting her snout. At this, from its being the only point exposed to my view, I levelled my rifle, which was then pointed in a perpendicular direction. On reflection, however, I refrained from firing, as I considered that, though I might have smashed the fore part of her head to pieces, there was little chance of my killing her outright.

"Instead, therefore, of firing whilst in that situation, I stepped, (and it certainly was not 'the most prudent step' a man ever took,) with my left foot in advance, directly over her to the opposite side of the hole, when wheeling about on the instant, and having then a full view of her head, from which the muzzle of my gun was hardly two feet distant, and my left foot still less, for it was partially in the entrance to the den itself, I sent a bullet through her skull.

"I now called loudly to the people, none of whom, nor even the other dogs, which had been questing to some birds in another part of the forest, had as yet come up,—for I was rather apprehensive the cubs might attempt to make their escape. To prevent this, I stood for a while over the den in readiness to give them a warm reception with the but-end of my rifle.

"Three or four minutes, however, elapsed before Jan Finne, who was to the left of our line, Svensson, and the peasants, made their appearance; for, strange to say, though Puljas had been in Jan Finne's possession for several years, he either did not recognise his challenge, or he had not a suspicion it was to the bears; and in consequence, neither he nor the people moved from where I had left them, until they heard my shot.

"My apprehensions as to the cubs attempting to escape were, however, groundless, for they still continued quiet; at first, indeed, we could see nothing of them for the old bear, who, as is usual with those animals when they have young, was lying in the front of the den, and we therefore almost began to think we had hit upon a bear distinct from those of which we were in search.

"On the people, however, introducing a stake, and moving the old bear a little to the side, one of the cubs, and subsequently a second, and a third, exhibited themselves, all of which I dispatched, either with my own or with Jan Finne's rifle.

"The work of death being at length completed, we drew the bears out of their den. This, however, was of such small dimensions, that it was the admiration of us all how they could have stowed themselves away in it. Bears usually prepare their winter-quarters during the autumnal months, and some time previously to taking possession of them; the animals, however, of which I am now speaking, having been disturbed from their original lair at a time when the ground was hard frozen, probably accounted for the small size of the excavation in which we found them.

"The old bear had attained her full growth; the cubs were nearly a year old, and of about the size of large dogs. The whole of them were in tolerably good condition."

Mr Lloyd then describes the process of skinning and cutting up bears. The weather being unfavourable, the operation took place within doors. The animals were laid on their backs on a table, and when divested of their skins, they much resembled, in many respects, their breasts and arms in particular, so many human beings. We remember a shaved bear being exhibited in Edinburgh as a non-descript animal—and he appeared to us to be liker a human being than the showman. The sight, Mr Lloyd says, was a shocking one; and forcibly reminded him of a disgusting exhibition he had witnessed a few years before at a celebrated anatomist's in London—the horrors of which—the macerating tub, with its attendant vulture—will never be effaced from his imagination. The galls were carefully preserved, being considered in Scandinavia a specific against a variety of disorders; and the fat, which is said to possess such extraordinary virtue, that if a deal-box be rubbed with it overnight, on the following morning it will be converted into a hair-trunk. Only the fat (ister) about the intestines is used in Scandinavia medicinally, or for the hair; of which there is but a small quantity; the fat itself, (fat,) which on a large bear may weigh sixty or eighty pounds, is merely used for culinary purposes. The hams, smoked, are great delicacies; and the remainder of the carcass is either salted, or eat fresh—in which state it resembles excellent beef. The paws are an exquisite dainty. The skin—in this case eight feet long—is worth several pounds. In Sweden, it is an understood thing in the interior of the country, that the man who rings the bear is entitled to him, and in consequence, without express permission, no other person dreams of disturbing the beast. In Norway, there is an ordinance making the bear the property of the man who rings him in the first instance, and in consequence, those who either disturb or destroy the animal, without authority, are subjected to rather severe penalties. As the peasants who,

in this case, attended Mr Lloyd, were very poor, he took only the fat, the tongues, and a little of the flesh of the bears, so that besides the flesh, their spoil was worth about five pounds—no inconsiderable sum in Sweden; or, indeed, as the world wags, anywhere else.

We now take farewell of Mr Lloyd, and place his volumes in that department of our library marked "Nimrod." He has added not a little to our knowledge of the character of the Bear, and his work contains much good natural history. Of men and manners, he has also given many interesting sketches; and we have a clearer conception now than we had before, of Scandinavian scenery and climate. Mr Lloyd ought to write some more books of the sort, and they will sell. By the by, we remember meeting him, a good many years ago, on board a Wick packet. He was somewhat sea-sick; and being enveloped in a monstrous dreadnought, he was not unlike a bear. Sea-sickness makes a man surly; and our author had nearly devoured a worthy friend of ours, who chanced to tread upon his toes as he lay upon a coil of cable. Under exasperation, he had a most formidable aspect, and his growl was fearsome. We heard some talk about throwing somebody into the sea; but we came forward in our character of peace-maker, and with our crutch stopt the conflict. Mr Lloyd's wrath subsided into a calm; and for the remainder of the voyage, he resembled a halcyon. We were much struck with the spirit and intelligence of his conversation; and seeing that he was a sportsman far above the common run, advised him to go to Scandinavia, and belabour the bears. He had no idea, at the time, who we were, as we were voyaging incog. But the hint was not lost upon him; and hence these two able-bodied octavos. It will doubtless please Mr Lloyd to know that the old lame gentleman in the Quaker garb was Christopher North. In a month or two we must pay our respects to another admirable brother sportsman, Colonel Hawker.

A TALE OF ARARAT.

ONE sultry afternoon in the month of September, three travellers on horseback, followed by a single attendant upon a mule, which also bore a pair of muffruses, or Persian travelling-bags, were traversing the extensive plain of Erivan, intending, if possible, to reach that city early enough for procuring fresh horses to carry them on upon their journey. Of these travellers, two were easily to be recognised as Franks, or Europeans, in spite of their semi-Asiatic garb and appearance; the third, by his rough Persian cap, brown weather-beaten countenance three parts covered with a thick black beard,—his red leather boots, wide shulwars, or riding trowsers, and great brown cloke, as well as by the silver-mounted pistol and Turkish yattaghan, might no less readily be known as the tatar, conducting the two strangers. All the three, as their jaded horses and dust-covered persons sufficiently indicated, were travelling chupper, or post, along the great highway which leads from Persia into Asia Minor.

In the grey of the preceding morning, these travellers, from the height of the winding pass which overlooks the great plain of the river Aras, had, for the first time, caught a faint glimpse of the venerable Ararat, rearing his summit in two almost visionary peaks above the sea of vapour in which the boundless plain was rather lost than terminated. But as they pursued their course, and the sun arose in the heavens, the dust and exhalations ascended together in a darkening haze which enveloped all the distance, and gradually deepened into masses of gloomy clouds. These in their turn became more dense, congregating upon all the mountains around, and veiling even the plain in unusual darkness, through which the sun sent a stifling heat, unrelieved by a single breath of air, more oppressive though less scorching than his unquenched rays would have shed from a cloudless sky.

"There will be a storm soon," remarked Kara Moustapha, the tatar. "We shall have it here by and by, unless old Agri-Daugh* keeps it all to himself and his evil spirits; I see it thickening over him yonder. Would the agas choose to take shelter some where, until it passes over?"

But the agas,† having changed horses more cleverly than is usual upon such occasions, at Shereer, were resolved to maintain their advantage, and press forward. Perhaps the prospect of a drenching might be rather pleasant than formidable in so heated an atmosphere as that which surrounded the travellers, and they therefore continued to urge on their horses at a brisk pace, over the rough irregular ground and long plain which intervenes between Shereer and Develoo.

When they reached the latter place, the storm still lowered, but had not burst; and, regardless of the remonstrances of the villagers, who felt no eagerness to produce their horses in such threatening weather, and even unheeding the hints of the tatar, who spoke mysteriously of the danger of storms in these parts, they insisted upon proceeding: and accordingly, having wrung a change of beasts from the reluctant Ketkhodah,‡ they left the shelter of the village, somewhat late in the afternoon, just as a great body of cloud, detaching itself under the influence of a sudden flaw of wind, from the mass which shrouded the mountain, first covered the whole grey vault of heaven with a dense sheet of curdling vapour, and then, after a few warning drops, descended in such a sweeping deluge, that for more than an hour the travellers could see nothing around them, and had enough to do in urging on their frightened horses, and keeping to the track which they believed to be the right one.

Clokes, jubbas, bashlogues,§ afforded no defence against the pelting rain. Wetted in a moment to the skin, the travellers, who had just before been melting under the influence of a sultry breathless air, were at once exposed to the unmitigated severity of a cold and heavy rain, driven against their persons by a piercing wind;—and they soon suffered as much from the cold as they had lately done from heat. It was no trifling addition to their distress to find that in the confusion and darkness of the storm, they had managed to miss their road, and had got entangled in a maze of hillocks and irregular ground which bounds the plain upon the north-east; and although the tatar assured them that neither ill consequence, nor even material detention, could ensue from the accident, the travellers could not entirely divest themselves of anxiety, as delay in any shape was what they most wished to avoid.

So intently was the party occupied in remedying their error, that the changes which now rapidly took place in the weather, and upon the face of the heavens, attracted but slight attention. When the violence of the rain, and the depth of the darkness abated, they had indeed remarked, that a huge pile of clouds still remained around the mountain, rearing themselves high into the blue sky which began to break out overhead—and that the flashes of fork lightning, which darted and played among the mazes of this lurid mass, no less than the sullen roar of distant thunder, betokened the elemental strife which was still maintained within its recesses. But while threading the intricacies of the ground in which they were entangled, they neither noted the gradual subsidence and dispersion of this murky congregation of vapour, nor the clearing of the heavens above them; so that they were in no degree prepared for the scene which was about to burst upon them—a scene, which pen or pencil would in vain attempt to delineate, and to which, for its peculiar simplicity and grandeur of effect, the world itself perhaps cannot afford a parallel.

After winding for some time along a hollow between gravelly hillocks, the travellers stood upon the brow of a gentle eminence which sloped gradually down to a plain, from twenty to thirty miles in breadth, stretching far on either hand, and speckled with villages and gardens. But the effusion of purple and golden light shed over half its surface from a setting sun of such glorious splendour as Eastern skies alone are blessed with, rendered every object indistinct. In front, bathed in the same mellow radiance, arose from this noble plain, in solemn majesty, the grand, the venerable Ararat, gracefully rearing its two lofty peaks, until their snowy summits, richly lighted up by the same declining beam, were relieved against the clear pearly sky. A misty play of rich and delicate tints pervaded the whole atmosphere, and threw over the landscape that filmy golden haze, so enchanting in autumnal evenings, softening every harsh line and too prominent feature into ineffable harmony; while the recent shower had lent to the hues of the foreground, ruddied as they were by the fast sinking sun, a freshness which contrasted not less powerfully than happily with the rich but mellow tones of the distance. The deep and lengthened shadow of the mountain which fell across the plain, shrouding half its extent in mysterious darkness, finished the picture, by giving tenfold lustre and effect to its more brilliant features.

“Glorious! Splendid! Magnificent indeed!” burst, after a moment, from the lips of the two Franks, as this sublime spectacle flashed, as it were, upon their senses. “Behold, old Agri-Daugh—there’s a mountain for you, agas!” echoed the tatar, more keenly alive perhaps to the honour of his country and its wonders, than to the splendour of the scene before him. Yet not insensible to the enchanting contrast of the present hour to that which had preceded it, he continued, “See how the grim old fellow smiles at us after the passion he has been in;—one would think that he never could frown, and that neither storm, nor thunder, nor lightning ever played around his head.”

—“By Heavens, C—,” exclaimed one of the Franks, after a pause, “it is well worth riding a few hundred miles to see this—well worth a drenching, and a cold too, should it follow—was there ever such a mountain! See how it rises in solitary grandeur from that noble plain, disdaining all connexion with the pigmy hills around!”—“And to see it under such happy circumstances,” returned his friend; “what a rich crimson and orange light is powdered, as it were, over all that shoulder—there just where the sun rests—and how it trembles in lines of radiance down to our very feet. And mark how finely the sober grey that clothes the rest of the mountain, contrasts with that rich light—how gauzy and visionary is the contour and substance of that loftiest peak, as it retires into the warm yellow sky which now rises behind it—and see! how fine and calm the effect of yon streak of grey cloud which rests upon the upper shoulder—almost the only remaining trace of that violent storm!”

“And of what nature is the ground upon the mountain side?” enquired the elder of the travellers, addressing the tatar, after a pause of some continuance.—“To me, from hence, the slope seems even and gradual, and the ground smooth—is it so in reality? has the summit ever been ascended, pray?”—“Smooth? any thing but that, aga; take my word for it. Many a height and hollow is there, many a rocky chasim and ravine that would stop the march of an army. Observe these dark shadows and lines; these are deep hollows and clefts of unknown wildness; but there is plenty of good pasture land also. See that shoulder there, all red with the rays of the sun—the *yeiläk of the Sirdar† is there, and he is somewhere thereabouts himself with his flocks and herds.”—“You have been upon the mountain, then?”

—“Ay, sir, often enough; that is, as far the yeiläks extend.”—“What, no higher?—never tried to get to the top?”—“Allah-il-allah!—the top of Agri-Daugh? me?—no, no, aga—not to be the Sirdar himself, would I try such a prank—in fine, it is not to be done.”—“And why not, pray? It seems easy enough from hence, and there is not much snow.”—“Ai! aga, who can judge of the difficulty or danger from such a distance as this?—All I can say is, that few have attempted the thing, and none have succeeded. I have gone pretty far myself—once, when I was a mad-cap youth, I was tempted, by the devil I believe, to go and peep into the tail of that ravine yonder; there, just under the cloud to the left of that great patch of snow; I got to the craggy shoulder below, and just peeped in. But it was quite enough,” added the tatar, with a shudder; “I should like to see the man that would venture further.”—“And what should hinder him, pray?”—“Hinder him?” echoed the tatar; “why, devils, ghouls, death would hinder him! for what is that place but the very khelwut‡ of them all?—and who would go and thrust his head into the devil’s own house?”—“Psha! what do you talk of—devils? I should like to see the devil that would keep me from the top of Ararat, if I were inclined to try.”—“Don’t speak so, aga; you don’t know—others have said and thought the same, but—who can tell the horrors of that chasim—how deep—how dark!—the pit of hell is not more terrible, with its black shaggy rocks, and awful precipices of ice and snow, from which great masses are tumbling every minute into the gulf at their feet with a noise like thunder!—and smoke ascends, and forms, oh, too horrible to think of—I could only look for a moment, and turned away my eyes for very fear of what might come.”—“And, in the name of God, what worse than the rocks and precipices could have come to frighten you, friend?—What did you dread?”—“What can I tell, aga? who knows what might come from Shytaun’s own den? They say that the devils and gins of the pit below, are thing to the ghouls and spirits which haunt the snow-rifts and the ice-cracks above—creatures of dim unspeakable shapes, with pale bluey bodies, which flit about with a ghost-like motion, and fix upon the sons of Adam their visionless eyes, that glare like those of a dead man in the moon-light, until life and sense are sucked as it were away!—Ugh!” exclaimed he, with a half start, half shudder, “it seems as if I saw them now.”

“But if no one has ever ventured among the ice and snow, how is it known that all these fearful things exist? it must at best be conje-

ture.”—“ Ah, no, aga! not so neither—people have gone, although few have returned; and fewer still have kept their senses. Some have become dumb; some have raved until they died; and others have laughed and shuddered alternately like idiots, for the remainder of their days, unable to answer any questions, but becoming terribly agitated at the sight of snow or ice. Even the few who have preserved their reason, can speak only in doubtful and mysterious terms.”—“ But if such is the ill repute of this same mountain, how happens it that any one has ever been tempted to try the enterprise?”—“ Oh, sir! what madness will not money make men commit? and what lengths will not zeal and superstition carry others!”—“ But what has this Agri-Daugh to do with your zeal or superstitions?”—“ Nothing, aga, with mine, praise be to God! but much with that of these poor misguided Armenians. You know, agas, that it is said the ark of Iluzrut Nool* rested upon Agri-Daugh, after the great deluge which destroyed the world; and the priests of Etchmiadzin—the great Armenian monastery which you see yonder, with the three black churches—say that this same ark, unchanged by time or decay, is still upon the mountain, among the eternal snows of its summit. To the wood which formed it, the poor infidels attribute many virtues, and covet the possession of it above all things. And well they may, for they sell the smallest pieces at a great price; but whether it be truly the wood of this ark, God only can tell. At all events, to get hold of this wood is a mighty object with them; and the Kalifah, (or Patriarch,) who declares that he can tell the true from false as easily as you would do a sweet from a water melon, is always trying to persuade thoughtless fellows, both Mussulmans and Armenians, to go and fetch it for him. The former go for gold, the latter generally for the blessing of God, which the old father assures them will attend upon so pious an act. But it seems that none who ventured for money have ever come safely back, while those who have taken their chance of the danger for the sake of the blessing, have now and then returned with fearful accounts of their adventures, sometimes bringing bits of wood, for which they swore they had to fight with the spirits that guard the ark.”—“ And did the Kalifah believe all this?” asked the Frank. “ What can I tell?” replied the tatar; “ at all events, he profits by the tale, and shews and sells the wood as that of the true ark.”

“ And you never heard of any one undertaking the adventure from mere curiosity?”—“ Curiosity, aga! what good would that have done them?—no, but other motives have sometimes prevailed over fear, as I have heard; not that any one ever reached the summit—that is on all hands admitted to be impossible.”—“ But what motives do you allude to?”—“ Ah, strange ones enough—and many strange tales have I heard on the subject—but you Franks laugh at all such things, so there is no use in saying any more about them. But see, agas, the sun has set, and if you wish to reach Erivan in time enough to get horses this night, we have not a moment to lose.”—“ Well, friend Moustapha, we shall attend you; but as you have somewhat excited our curiosity, you shall just exert yourself to satisfy it by telling us some of these same wonderful tales, to shorten the way, as you have done more than once already—and an excellent kissago† you are.”

The travellers cast one more look at the majestic form of the huge grey mountain, which rose against a sky still glorious with the purple and golden light of the departed luminary; then turning their horses into the proper track, rode swiftly along for a while, until the nature of the road forcing them to moderate their speed, the tatar, flattered by the compliment to his abilities in narration, collected his ideas, and intimated his readiness to commence. They regulated their pace accordingly, and he began as follows.

“ In the earlier part of the reign of Aga Mahomed Shah, while the brave Looft Alec Khan still struggled for his life and crown in the south and east of Persia, and the rest of the country was in a very unsettled state, there lived in these parts a chief of great power and influence, named Doozd Mahomed Khan, of the Zookh-auloo tribe which ranged the heights and pastures of Aberaun and Goom-ree, in the neighbourhood of Erivan. He was a heartless, cruel, rapacious chief—a great plunderer of caravans and travellers; but by dint of a frankness of demeanour, and great liberality to his followers, he had collected a force with which he succeeded in overawing his neighbours, and became the scourge and dread of the surrounding country. But it was the poor Armenians who chiefly suffered under his tyranny; he visited their peaceful villages with fire and sword, wringing money and goods of all sorts from the men, and carrying off their wives and children as slaves, or for the use of his harem. I know a good deal of the Armenians, agas, and they are not bad people, although they are infidels. Many a good pillow and comfortable night's quarters have I had from an Armenian, and I owe my life, I believe, to their good old Khalifah—for once I was robbed and nearly murdered, not very far from hence, by some rascally Turkish Eelants;* and an Armenian priest going by, found me, stript and bleeding, and carried me straight to the convent, where the Khalifah paid me every possible attention, and came himself to see my wounds dressed—may his prosperity increase! and in the long fever that followed, for more than a month they took care of me, and sent me away a whole man again; so I don't like to see the poor creatures abused. But Doozd Mahomed only looked upon them as beasts of burden—creatures made to contribute to his pleasures, or to supply his wants.

"Well—one day his rascally gang of robbers had gone forth, and surprised an Armenian village, some five pursungs distance from the monastery; and after driving off the greater part of the cattle, and such articles as were worth their while, they carried off a number of girls and boys, and returned to the camp of their master.

"It happened, that among the females there was one lovely young creature, who was already betrothed and all but married to a fine Armenian youth, named Gregoor, the inhabitant of a neighbouring village. Imagine, agas, the horror and dismay of this young man, when, ignorant of the catastrophe, he came to seek his beloved, and found the village in ruins, the remaining inhabitants weeping and lamenting their losses, and his dear Annah gone—carried off—none could tell whither! He raved like a madman, and committed a thousand foolish actions—but of what avail was all his grief—it would not bring back his mistress—the poor girl was lost to him! All he could learn was, that the mischief had been done by the people of Doozd Mahomed Khan, who were known as well by their fierce audacity, as by their dress and appearance. And it was also too well known, that to recover goods or chattels, man or beast, from the gripe of Doozd Mahomed, was as easy as to wrest the lamb from the wolf's jaws, or the dead from the grave.

"But young Gregoor had a spirit by far more bold and fearless than most of his countrymen, and was not so easily persuaded to abandon all hope of recovering his betrothed wife. He could not indeed immediately decide on what was to be done, but he was certain that his Annah had been taken to the Khan's camp, and from thence only was she to be recovered. There, therefore, hateful and terrible as was the place to all Armenians, did the bold Gregoor resolve on proceeding, to act as circumstances might determine. The remonstrances of his own parents, and even of the father of his Annah, were unheeded—go he would—and all they could wring from him, was a promise to be prudent—wary—calm. Calm!—a lover—and that lover Gregoor—calm or prudent?—but however, away he went, carrying with him nothing but his arms, and a relic—some nail parings of his own patron saint and that of his country, St Gregory, bound round his arm like a talisman, in a small silver case.

"It was not until he had arrived within sight of the camp that the young Armenian began to consider how he should proceed, or even present himself, so as to avoid inconvenient suspicions. An open declaration of his errand would not only defeat its purpose, but cause, in all probability, his own destruction. Address was his only chance; and he at length resolved to come forward boldly as a young man seeking service, as it was well known that the Khan omitted no opportunity of retaining handsome youths about his person as pipe-bearers and body servants. His project succeeded perfectly. He entered the camp;—was stopped, interrogated, and taken before the Khan, who, delighted with his manly beauty and handsome address, received him instantly into his service; and in a very short time he was in attendance—gorgeously equipped—upon the great man himself.

“In this situation he soon became acquainted with the particulars of the late exploit; and heard enough to convince him that it was in the harem of the Khan his mistress was to be found, and from thence, if at all, must she be delivered. But to violate the sanctity of a Persian chief’s harem, and such a chief as Doozd Mahomed!—it was an enterprise of danger and difficulty enough to have daunted the courage of most men,—if any thing, it sharpened that of Gregoor.

“But fortune was adverse to the poor young man, at least in his first attempts. For, applying to a countrywoman of his own, a servant in the harem, as a means of communication with his poor Annah, his intrigue was either discovered or betrayed; and he was immediately seized, and led bound into the Khan’s presence, who, having been indisposed for several days before, was in a worse than ordinary humour. ‘Base-born scoundrel!’ thundered he, as the young man appeared before him; ‘cursed Armenian dog! what dish of filth is this you have been eating?—what infernal business have you been about?—have you a mind for the stake, or to be torn by horses, that you have ventured to interfere with my harem?—Speak, miscreant!—what answer have you to make?’

lain. I have not sought for, nor interfered with, any thing but what was my own, and what justice would assuredly restore to me. Nay, my hope is strong that a just and generous master like your lordship will not hesitate in so doing, as soon as you have heard my story. In entering your service, Khan, it is true that your slave did entertain a hope of recovering his lost wife—for such is Annah already in the face of Heaven. In so far has he deceived your lordship—but in all other matters he had resolved to conduct himself as a faithful and zealous servant should do. Such has he been, my Lord—and such will he continue in all duty. He seeks in return but his own—his betrothed wife, who will die if she be separated from him, as he should do were he to lose her. Be generous then, Khan; imitate the Lord of the universe; dispense happiness around you, and convert two miserable, broken-hearted creatures into faithful and devoted servants!’

“‘What says the Armenian dog?’ said the Khan, with darkening face, to his attendants. ‘What have I to do with his wife?—this is some dirt that he is eating, to excuse his abandoned attempt at intriguing in my harem. But his effrontery shall not avail the unclean scoundrel—he shall feel that Doozd Mahomed has teeth as well as eyes, and will not have filth thrown in his face with impunity. Ho, guards, there!—see him strictly confined until our pleasure be known. Ourselves will see his punishment, and it shall be signal—at present we are somewhat indisposed.’—And the luckless Gregoor was hurried away to a prison, from whence he had no hope of returning, except to a painful and disgraceful death.

“But Fate, which had played the young man so mischievous a trick, seemed now willing to befriend him, for the Khan’s illness increased so rapidly, that, before the hour of evening prayer, he was in a burning fever, and all business, executions included, was suspended, until at least the fate of the chief should be decided.

“Next day passed in anxiety and doubt. The most learned physicians which the country afforded, were called in, and were unremitting in their attendance. Every remedy they could think of was applied, but all was in vain; the malady increased; the Khan was in extremity, and the whole camp in consternation. Before night delirium came on, and the mind of the Khan seemed labouring with some sore distress. He talked confusedly of his deeds of blood and plunder, of women violated, of men cut to pieces, of villages burning, and of fiery hands which gripped his heart or weighed upon his head, and would not suffer him to have a moment's ease. The physicians were puzzled; but all agreed in one thing, that the distemper was of a very hot nature, and could only be combated successfully by the coldest remedies. Accordingly, iced sherbet and vinegar were poured down his throat, and broken ice was laid upon his head. His burning limbs were even wrapped in clothes dipped in iced water; but nothing would do. No sooner, they say, did the ice come in contact with the Khan's person than it hissed, dissolved, and flew off in vapour, as if it had been thrown upon red-hot iron; and still the burning heat continued unabated.

"'It is all folly,' at length exclaimed the wise Hakeem Khooshhâl Allee, 'natural remedies are ineffectual here—natural cold is insufficient—Khodah Buzoorg!—God is great! but there is nothing on earth that can save the Khan, unless we could get him one of those mysterious creatures, the kirm-e-yehk,* or ice-worm, which frequent the eternal snows upon the summit of Agri-Daugh.'

"'And how is that to be had, in the name of Allah, oh Hakeem?' enquired the Khanum, or chief wife of Doozd Mahomed Khan, who, more deeply interested than any one else in the Khan's recovery, was seated behind a curtain of the anderoon, listening anxiously to the opinions and conversation of the physicians. 'Inshallah,' continued she, 'if money or power can get hold of it, my lord and husband (blessings be upon him) shall not expire for want of it.'—'May the riches of the Khanum increase!' replied the physician—'May God grant her husband's life! But for that wonderful creature, neither money nor force can procure it

—nothing but the zeal of a devoted slave—of some friend or servant, who would lay down his life for his master, can obtain that blessed remedy; for he who seeks the ice-worm among the snows of Agri-Daugh, must be content to encounter all the horrors of death and hell itself.'

"'And has not my husband an hundred such devoted servants?' exclaimed the Khanum, impatiently. She gave her orders for the chosen gholams to be summoned. But when the adventure was proposed, was there among all who eat of the Khan's salt, one single man to step forward and save his master's life? No, agas;—not one! All stood silent, gazing at one another; each, even those who were most zealous in their former professions, terrified lest in any way the chance should fall on him. And the physician shrugged his shoulders, and the Khanum was in despair, while the ravings of the sick man grew more violent than ever.

"While matters were thus in the tent of the Khan, poor Gregoor, in irons, and under strict guard, remained awaiting his fate in a place not far from the Khan's quarters, where he heard the bustle occasioned by that chief's illness; and remarking the perturbed countenance of the man who brought him food, he had no great difficulty in learning the truth; for the attendant, whose head was occupied with the event which engrossed the whole camp, scarcely remembered that the youth was a prisoner under sentence of death.

"The next day's report was still more unfavourable, and the attendant entered with still more earnestness into the dangerous condition of his chief, and the reports of the physicians, as received from the servants about his person. 'The will of Allah must be done,' said he. 'What is written must come to pass—but the Hakeem says that he cannot recover unless they get him a kirm-e-yehk, or ice-worm, from Agri-Daugh.'—'A what?' said the youth. 'An ice-worm,' replied the man. 'An ice-worm! Ah! I have heard something of them. They are to be found in the ice-cracks at the top of Agri-Daugh.'—'Yes, they live there, if it can be called life—the white, cold, deadly creatures—the very touch of which would wither up a living man, soul and body. But the Hakeem says it is the only thing to cool this burning fever in the Khan.'—'And are they to get it, then?'—'Get it!' echoed the man,—'where would they find it? and who is to bring it from that fearful mountain? Who is to face the ghouls and the gins that inhabit it?—And, if there was such a Delhi Khan* to be found, how is he to get hold of this same unknown creature?'—'And has no one yet offered to make the attempt?' said the youth, with a kindling eye. 'Al-lah Kerem! No!' replied the attendant, with a stare. 'How should there? The duty has been proposed to the truest and boldest of our young men, including the Khan's best ghoulns; but they have not found one among them all mad enough to undertake it. "No, no!" say they, "give us men like ourselves to fight with, and, Bismillah! we are ready; but when it comes to ghouls, and devils, and unknown creatures, bebuksheed! excuse us." In fine, all have refused, the plan is given up, and the Khan abandoned to his fate.'—'Then I will go!' exclaimed Gregoor. 'Tell them I am ready; and lose no time, I beseech you—remember the Khan may die.'—'You!' exclaimed the man, measuring the youth with his eye,—'you climb the Daugh for this ice-worm?'—'Yes, yes!' reiterated the youth, impatiently, 'I am ready—tell them—lead me to them.'—'Punah-be-khodah!† but you're a bold one!' responded the attendant, with something of an admiring grin. 'It is almost a pity—and yet,' added he, with a shrug of his shoulders, 'perhaps the devils and ghouls themselves may be as merciful as the Khan will, if he recovers.'—'He shall recover, man,' said the youth. 'Go—be gone—tell them—But I must speak with his son—or the Khanum—or his Naib—and then I will instantly set off.'

* Called also Ellung-Booz.

"To make short of this part of my story, agas, the young man was sent for, and in presence of the Khan's eldest son, and in hearing of the Khanum, who sat behind her screen, he pledged himself to ascend the mountain yonder, in quest of this same ice-worm; provided, that if he should survive the adventure and return, his wife, the Armenian girl Annah, should be given up to him, and that both should be at liberty to proceed where they chose. To this the Khanum had not the smallest objection—well pleased, indeed, would she have been to empty the harem of a dozen more of her rivals—and the son, less interested in any part of the proceedings than his mother, agreed with her in pledging themselves, by all that was holy, to fulfil their part of the engagement, and prevail on the Khan, should he recover, to do the like. Gregoor, on his side, conceiving, that in case of success, he would have the means of forcing them to be honest by threatening to retain in his possession the fruits of his adventure, was contented with their promises. Where all parties were willing, no time was likely to be lost; and Gregoor, taking only his sword and matchlock, with the precious relic of St Gregory, quickly left the camp.

"It was not until he had gone a considerable way, in a direction straight towards the mountain, that the young man's enthusiasm and excitement had cooled enough to admit of his bestowing any consideration on the enterprise in which he had so rashly embarked,—and although he certainly did not repent of the step, he could not entirely suppress certain internal misgivings as to his ultimate success, when he reflected on his total ignorance of the means by which his object was to be attained. That the mountain was in truth the haunt of mysterious beings, differing widely in their nature from man, he had from his youth been accustomed to believe, not only upon the authority of his brethren, but of the Mussulman peasantry and tribes that dwell around the mountain, or range its lower regions; who, in their turns, had received the same account from their forefathers. And, agas, there is no doubt of the fact, for

* Mad fellow. † Shadow of the Almighty!—A Persian exclamation of astonishment, Solymann, ibn Daood, the wise and the powerful, who could command the gins and deeves to do his bidding, when he prevailed against certain powers of darkness, made the bottomless Gulf of Ararat their prison,—and there they roar and rave within it, unable to overpass the mysterious boundary traced out by his powerful wand—and woe to the child of clay who heedlessly may trespass beyond this fatal barrier! All this had Gregoor been informed of, and believed. But although he had more than once traversed the habitable regions of the mountain, it never had been in his power, and still less in his inclination, to search into the truth of the fearful tale which now came over his mind with oppressive force. His utter ignorance of every thing connected with the object of his expedition, became more palpable as he approached this awful point, and the horrors he anticipated, assumed a more formidable shape.

“Thus ruminating, but resolved—perplexed, and awestruck, perhaps, but perfectly undismayed—did Gregoor proceed until the shades of evening began to descend, for it was late before he left the camp, and he felt the necessity of seeking for some spot in which to pass the night; for wandering in the dark could have done no good; and, you know, agas, it would have been utter madness to have encountered the spirits of darkness in their own dens and at their own chosen hour. But he was far past the last village, and having with difficulty forced his way through the low wooded and marshy ground which in many places skirts the mountain, he had already ascended one of the shoulders which rise gradually from the plain—so that to turn back was entirely out of the question;—on the other hand, to proceed, or to spend the night upon the bleak and barren hill side, was neither likely to forward his object, nor to fit him for the next day’s arduous work.

“In this perplexity, it occurred to him, that among the Fakeers or Santons who make their abode in the wild and desert places of the mountain, from motives of piety, there was one whose residence could not be very distant from the line of his ascent. If he could but find out this, it would not only allow him shelter for the night, and security from all approach of evil spirits, but its inhabitant, if at home, might possibly assist him with some hints as to the mode of attaining his purpose. Revived by this hope, he mended his pace, and took a direction towards the spot where he believed the Santon’s retreat to be.

“For more than a fursang did he maintain his full speed, ascending in a direction to the left of his first route; when he found himself upon the brink of a very savage-looking and gloomy chasin, which the darkness of night, now fully set in, rendered ten times more dismal. Descending by a precipitous and dangerous way, and scarcely able to see where he placed his feet, the young Armenian held on along the bottom, clambering over huge fragments, sometimes stepping into great holes, and scarcely avoiding chasms where he heard the roar of an unseen torrent. At length, when, wearied and harassed, he thought of laying himself down under the first overhanging rock for the night, and was looking about for a place fitted for the purpose, he found himself unexpectedly treading upon a level terrace, extending, so far as the darkness permitted him to see, for several yards under a cliff, the height of which was lost in the obscurity; but blacker than the night itself, he could distinguish in this very cliff a yawning chasm, which formed, as it were, an arch in the wall of rock.

“Drawing his sword, to be prepared against the worst, the young man entered, cautiously groping his way with the weapon, and thus he advanced upon a slight descent for several paces, in utter and almost palpable darkness; when his eyes, growing more accustomed to their situation, became aware of a slight glimmer of light. For a moment he doubted whether this might not be the glare of a wild beast’s eye; but another glance reassured him, for, sparkle after sparkle appearing for a moment and then becoming extinct, he felt convinced that it could only proceed from the embers of a fire, and with renewed energy, but still with caution, he made his way towards it.

“It was in truth the embers of a fire, formed of dried weeds and wood, the remains of which, raked together, and excited by the young man's breath, were soon rekindled into a blaze, displaying the whole cavern into which accident had so strangely conducted him. It was a cavity formed by nature in the solid rock; its dark roof rose above the influence of the fire-light, but the extent otherwise did not appear great. In one corner lay a mat, spread over some grass and dried leaves, near to which was placed a broken earthen vessel containing water. In a remoter corner, agas, the light glimmered upon that symbol so highly esteemed by the Armenians and other followers of Huzrut Issau.* These, and a few more trifling articles, formed the whole contents of the cavern; and they convinced Gregoor, that, in all probability, he had reached by accident the very place of rest he wished for. But its owner was apparently absent, for no human being was to be seen.

"This was a disappointment; but to have obtained shelter and fire, with the protection of a holy roof, was no trifling blessing. So Gregoor, having eaten sparingly of a cake of bread, the only provision he had taken along with him, and drinking from the broken pot of water, once more scraped together the embers of his fire, and placing his arms in readiness in case of attack, he lay down upon the bed of leaves and grass, and soon fell fast asleep.

"It is not wonderful, agas, that the same matters which occupied the waking thoughts of Gregoor should visit his dreams—nor need I remind you how often it pleases the Omnipotent to send forth the angels of his presence, and shadow out through them to his creatures, in the hours of sleep, the images of those coming events which concern their misery or their welfare. The young man, as he afterwards declared, dreamed that he was toiling up the mountain, until at length he reached the brink of a fearful abyss, where he stopped in horror; for deformed shapes were sporting in its darkness, and hovering in the thick air. The moment they perceived him, forward they flew towards him, with hideous din and frightful gestures, as if they sought to destroy him with their terrible talons. How long these visions continued he knew not, but his agony was extreme; and just when the demons appeared to have caught him in their gripe, a sudden light burst forth, dispelling the darkness, and the figure of an old man, clad in a robe of ancient form, with a strongly marked countenance, and a huge flowing beard of grizzled hue—just such as he remembered to have seen the likeness of his patron saint represented at Etchmeadzin—appeared therein, stretching forth his hand, as if to drive the fiends from their prey. In a moment they all vanished, and another form, of more pleasing character, appeared in company with the saint—it was his Annah herself, whom the holy man led towards him, and he rushed forward to embrace her. The exertion awoke him—he opened his eyes, and, by the grey light of dawn which fell upon him through the entrance, saw bending over him an old man, whose only clothing was a sheepskin tunic, which, girt round his waist, and reaching nearly to the knee, covered the middle of his person, while a portion of the same material thrown over his back and shoulders, still left the greater part of his breast and arms exposed. His hair and beard were matted together, covering most of his face, from which a pair of keen grey eyes looked piercingly forth, and such parts of his body as were visible were thickly covered with grey curling hair.

"'Hoh! up, my son!' said the old man, addressing Gregoor, without any previous preparation, or evincing the smallest sign of surprise at finding him in the cell—'Up!—the morning is grey—thy journey is long, and thy need is urgent—up and be doing!'—'Father,' replied the youth, after staring around him for a minute with a bewildered air, and rubbing his eyes to try if he were really awake, 'father, you speak as if you knew me and my errand. It is strange; yet, if it be so, you cannot fail of knowing my difficulties. Instruct me, if you can, how to conquer them—teach me how to proceed—how to act—and may the Almighty reward you for it!’—‘My son,’ returned the old man, ‘thou hast a good cause—thy object is virtuous—and the might of the Most High will not fail to strengthen the chosen instrument of his beneficent designs. Thou couldst not err while thus upheld—see only that thy soul fail not, nor let thy heart wax cold in the work, and blessings shall follow thee here and hereafter.’

“‘Father,’ replied the youth, ‘behold me ready—shew me but the work, and the means of performing it—but as yet I wander in the dark, unknowing whither to direct my steps.’—‘Forward, my son, forward! Behold the mountain summit and the eternal snows of Ararat, where, thousands of years ago, the ark of Noah rested, and the world began afresh—seek only to reach that summit, and fear not but thy duty shall be taught thee. Forward, then, boldly. But see—first taste of this wine and this bread—they will strengthen thee against the hour of trial; and take this chaplet of dark beads, formed of a stone from the first altar which the holy Noah raised to the Almighty, when, uncertain like thee on which side to bend his course, he descended with his family from the mountain. These beads are endowed with peculiar virtues. Proceed thou steadily and boldly; and when thy mind becomes darkened, and thou art doubtful which track to pursue, take one of these beads, drop it thus upon the earth, and follow the direction it will indicate. But leave behind thee these arms of human fabric, unsuited to the conflicts thou wilt have to maintain. Trust thou alone in the strength of the Most High, whose servant thou art; and throw aside what may encumber, but cannot aid thee.’

“Onward and onward did he thus toil for many hours, often panting and fatigued with the steep ascent, and the rough ground over which he had to pass, but never losing courage nor fainting in heart; until, after the sun had long declined from the meridian, as he reached an elevated shoulder of the mountain, he caught a view of the summit and its deep eternal snows, hanging still far above him, like a mighty mass of clouds in the blue air, but greatly nearer than ever he expected to attain to them. Encouraged by his progress, and anxious to make the best of the remaining hours of daylight, he had recourse to his chaplet, and the bead, after bounding upwards as formerly, flew like a stone thrown by the hand, in a direction slanting upwards to his left, and pointing to the eastern face of the summit. Gregoor followed gaily, and after another hour’s hard walking, he discovered that he was approaching the brink of a wide and profound cavity; for the bosom of the summit, to which he had by that time more closely approached, appeared to recede in a semi-circular form, exhibiting a lofty, precipitous face, the upper part of which rose in terrific cliffs of broken ice and snow, while the lower descended, in a wall of black and rugged rock, sheer into the dark gulf below.

“His heart beat thick, as he saw himself approaching this scene of anticipated horrors; and seeing that his progress must soon be stopped, or his course changed, he had once more recourse to his chaplet. The bead, after its customary bound, as if to gain free and uninterrupted scope, rolled onwards still—and onwards was Gregoor forced to follow, wondering where this extraordinary course would terminate, until, after traversing a tract of broken ground with a facility which was incomprehensible to himself, (for he felt as it were upborne and hurried onward by some unseen power,) he found himself suddenly standing upon an elevated point of rock, and overlooking a scene which froze his blood with horror.

“He had approached the highest region of the mountain, in a manner as unaccountable as the almost preternatural rapidity of his latter progress, and was involved, as it seemed,

in the heart of its eternal snows. Around him rose precipices and peaks of cold blue ice, surmounted by the more recent snow, which adds yearly to the mass, more than is abstracted from it by the action of summer suns and thaws. In front, rose in all its savage majesty the great snowy cone which strikes the eye from below, a mingled aggregation of rock and ice, the base of which was lost a thousand *gez below, in the gulf that opened at its very feet,—a fearful gulf, the depth of which mocked the straining eye. Masses of rock and ice, with all their superincumbent snow, were every moment detached from the edge of the cliffs; and, thundering down with a crashing and hollow sound, mingled their din with the distant roar of unseen torrents. ‘Here then, at least,’ thought the astounded youth, ‘must this enterprise terminate in some way or other—here, if at all, unless I have been altogether mocked by evil spirits, must my course of duty be revealed to me—and, oh God! thou wilt not desert an honest youth and a true Christian, who has gone forth among these perils in firm reliance on thy aid!’

“Thus, agas, prayed the Armenian youth; and from these words he received, as he affirmed, a support and a courage which astonished even himself. It soon became all required, for on appealing for the last time to his chaplet, to his astonishment no less than his horror, the dark bead glided forward for a few yards, along the very verge of the giddy precipice, and then leaping downwards, he saw it bound from one slight inequality of rock to another, slanting along the blackest and deepest side of the abyss, until at a yawning rift in the rock it disappeared, and was seen no more.

“‘Oh, God! deliver me in this peril and perplexity,’ exclaimed the young man aloud, as he gazed with a shudder of dismay at the indicated track. But it was the weakness of the flesh, not of the spirit; for his resolution did not falter; and neither seeing nor hearing any farther token, he boldly, but cautiously, addressed himself to examine his appalling path.

“On reaching the point at which the bead had descended, he remarked, what had not been perceptible before, a slight irregularity upon the face of the rock, like a ledge, which, had the place been one to yield pasturage, would scarcely have afforded to the most adventurous goats a way to reach such stray herbs as might have sprung upon the face of the cliff; but neither goat nor herb was ever seen there; not even moss, nor the green coating of dampness, ever grew upon that black rock—no living thing existed there.

“Casting off his sandals, in order to cling more firmly with his feet, Gregoor flung himself over the edge of the cliff, and commenced his fearful course, suspended upon the narrow ledge, above an abyss he dared not look at. So narrow, indeed, was this ledge, and so perpendicular the rocky face along which it led, that even the thickness of his slender body projecting from it almost destroyed his balance, and the irregularities by which he held were so slight and far between, that they scarcely afforded him the means of dragging himself forward; and sometimes a jutting angle would occur, the danger of doubling round which, while ignorant of the footing beyond, was extreme.

“Thus, sticking like an insect to the rocky wall along which he slowly crawled, Gregoor had proceeded several yards, intent only upon preserving his precarious hold, when a new and fearful horror assailed him. The gulf, before so silent and dreary, resounded now at once with cries and groans, and dismal howlings; and the involuntary sidelong glance of his eye fell upon forms dim and indistinct, but of appalling character, which flitted through the murky atmosphere, and fluttered upwards with fierce and uncouth gestures. Muttering an earnest prayer, with a powerful effort he withdrew his eyes, but turning them upwards in hopes of relief, he saw the snow and ice-cracks above him tenanted with visionary shapes more ghastly yet than those below. Oh, agas! how shall I describe—how can you conceive—those terrible ghosts of the snow!

* Yards.

Stark and stiff, like stretched and awathed corpses, were they—and yet they had a movement, a wandering flitting motion, which the eye could not catch, nor the mind comprehend. No human tongue could name their forms;—dim and colourless, they seemed void of substance;—the very glare of their glossy eyes cast a deadly chill, which seemed to freeze the marrow in the young man's bones.

"The dream of the preceding night rushed forcibly into the mind of Gregoor, as he gazed upon the scene around him; but the remembrance rather recalled his slinking courage than added to his alarm, for he doubted not that the visionary aid he had then experienced, would not desert him now in the reality of his danger. Casting forward his eyes, therefore, he saw at no great distance the chasm where the last head had disappeared. 'May God grant that the adventure shall terminate there, and happily for his servant!' ejaculated the youth, and on he went.

"Scarcely had he reached its nearest verge when a mass of ice and snow appeared above him towering to the very clouds, and horribly tenanted by the ice ghouls, while a glance downwards betrayed to him a deeper and blacker gulf, with the dim glimmer of a roaring torrent at an immeasurable distance beneath. A sudden pang of horror seized his heart—his limbs trembled, and his hold almost relaxed; for now the rock and ice rose high on all sides, cutting off retreat; and there hung the unhappy youth above a fathomless abyss, into which it seemed that, sooner or later, he must drop. His courage, which till now had been unshaken, at that moment almost failed him, when his eye was attracted to a quivering rapid motion in a part of the ice above, but almost within his reach. A second and more attentive glance shewed him a creature like a serpent, of the same pale hue and transparent substance as the spirits of the ice, which was playing in and out of the cracks and crevices in the snow. 'Thanks be to God!' exclaimed the young man, aloud; 'behold it—it is mine!' and forgetting his precarious situation, he darted desperately forward to seize it. A fearful cry arose from below—his footing failed him, and at the same moment the enormous mass of ice and snow which rose above him, bent forwards for an instant, then crashing downwards, bore with it the shrieking youth into the awful gulf below! His head reeled, but ere his senses quite fled, a mild benignant voice whispered, in tones which were heard in spite of the hideous din,—'Well done, brave and virtuous youth! thou hast fought the good fight, and thousands will bless thy name.'

"How long Gregoor remained insensible, or what may have occurred to him during his swoon, he never could tell. But, strange to say, agas, when he recovered his senses, it was neither upon the summit nor among the eternal snows of Agri-Daugh, nor in the fearful gulf below it, but just in the very cavern from whence he had set forth that morning—upon the same bed of leaves on which he had cast himself the preceding night; and over him was standing the recluse himself, in the identical sheepskin tunic which he had worn in the morning of this eventful day!

"The youth gazed long upon the hermit, rubbed his eyes, shook himself heartily, lay still, and reflecting for some moments, shuddered at the recollections which dawned upon him, and then turning again to the recluse, who stood patiently bending over him, stared with a bewildered air, and exclaimed,—'In the name of God and St Gregory! what has happened—and where am I?'—'In safe quarters, my son, by the favour of God, who has dealt with thee in great mercy,' replied the recluse, with solemnity. 'And how came I here? Surely—surely—' and again he shuddered.—'My son,' said the recluse, 'thou art here by the will of God—let that content thee; be thankful for thy safety, and seek no farther. It is time thou wert on thy journey—up, and be going.'—'And whither must I go, father?—How can I return?—Ah! I thought—I believed, that all was well—that I had done my duty—that voice declared so.'—'And that voice was right, my son—mistrust it not—return whence thou camest, without delay or doubt. Boldly present thyself, and claim the promised reward. Fear not that it will be denied thee; but, in thy own prosperity, forget not the misery of others—extend to those who need it the mercy thou thyself hast tasted. Remember thy afflicted countrymen when thy voice has power, and fail not to let it rise in their behalf. And now, delay not farther—rise, and begone.’ The wondering and still bewildered youth hesitated no longer; hastily partaking of the food which the recluse placed before him, he ‘received back his arms, which, with his sandals, were laid by his bedside, and quitting the cavern, clambered up the side of the rocky ravine, and was soon on his way to the camp of Doozl Mahomed.

“And what, agas, think you, had been going on there since the time of the young man’s departure? The Khan’s distemper had risen to its height just about that time. He raved frantically—abused every one around him—roared incessantly for water! water!—and for cold! cold!—and besought his attendants to cut open his breast, and take out his heart, which had become, he said, a burning coal. The physicians ordered a last application of ice, gave their last dose of iced vinegar and water, and then left him to his fate. This frenzied state was too violent to continue very long; it gradually subsided into a less furious, though scarcely a more tranquil condition. Cries and shrieks gave place to low moanings, and his terrible convulsions to a less uncontrollable restlessness.

“Towards midnight, the sick man’s mutterings became more distinct. He talked as if he had been addressing some person present, and in less distracted phrases. At length his attendants could distinguish some of his expressions. ‘Allah! have mercy!’—‘Oh, holy Mahomed!’—‘By the holy Koran!’—‘by the Sacred Caaba! yes! yes! I promise, I swear! Inshallah! Inshallah!’—and each ejaculation was accompanied by a corresponding movement of head and hands, as if confirming what he said. This seemed to be the crisis of his disorder; for after it he grew still and tranquil, and, to the astonishment of those who looked every moment for his death, the heat and fever subsided from that moment, and late on the ensuing day the Khan awoke from a long sleep, perfectly collected, and free from all disease, although still weak and exhausted.

“Many were the ‘Shukhur Khodahs!’ and ‘Alhumdulillahs!’* that were poured out upon this occasion by the attendants and all the household—but the first demand made by the Khan was for the Armenian youth whom he had ordered into confinement at the commencement of his illness. His servants, alarmed, and unwilling to tell the truth, looked at each other in silence. It was the Khanum alone who dared to inform him that the youth was no longer in camp. ‘Not in camp!’ echoed the Khan; ‘and what, then, has become of him? By your own soul, Khanum, and by the holy Caaba! tell me where he is!’

“‘I know that,’ said the Khan impatiently—‘I know it as well as you—but where is he now? for he has returned from Agri-Daugh.’—‘Returned?—who?—Gregoor the Armenian? no, Khan—not a bit of him—nor ever will doubtless—who ever returns from the top of Agri-Daugh?—and who cares about a scurvy Armenian, since your Lordship has got rid of your fever? Let the poor wretch go about his business.’—‘Who cares?’ echoed the Khan.—‘By the head of my father, there is cause to care!—for it is just this—his life and mine—if he goes, so do I; we are bound up together in a strange fashion—so where is the lad?’

* Thank God!—Persian.

Ye surely have not slain him?' added he, suddenly fixing his frowning eye upon them. 'God forbid!—no, by the head of the Prophet!—no, by the Khan's salt!' burst forth the whole attendants in reply, greatly relieved as to the object of their Lord's urgency, and now, on their own accounts, wishing for the youth's return. 'Then let every one of my people set off this moment in search of him,' said the Khan; 'nor let them return till they bring him.'—And accordingly the tent was soon cleared, and every one sallied forth to hunt for poor Gregoor.

"By this time the physicians, hearing of the great man's unexpected recovery, had all come back to offer their congratulations on this fortunate event, hinting at the same time at their own great merit, and the handsome reward they expected for it. 'May your fathers all be well roasted, ye cousins of an ass!' cried the Khan, whose strength and energy appeared hourly to revive. 'This is no dish of your cooking—I'll eat all you have in this matter any day of the Ramazaun, and never break my fast. Away with your long beards, big bellies, and empty heads!—your long yellow faces make me sick—Pack—go!—Hearken,' continued he to a few of his favourites, when the apartment had been cleared of intruders—'I will tell you how it all came about. Those wise heads thought that all was over with me—and bad enough truly matters were. I heard what they said about the ice-worm, while they believed me to be insensible, although well did I know that mortal hands would never bring it from the old Daugh, yonder. Soon after, my head began to spin round and simmer like a boiling pot—and wild fancies passed through my seething brain. Sometimes I was among ice and snow, sometimes in flames and fire. Then again I was upon my old war-horse, careering forward at a fearful rate, along with a whole troop of fiendish-looking riders, trampling and cutting down thousands of these miserable Armenians, while our very foot-tramps set their villages on fire. There was a terrible hurly-burly—and my whirling head was like to burst with pain from the heat of the burning houses; at last, out rushed the old white-bearded Ket Khodah of the last Armenian village we plundered, throwing himself before my horse's feet, and beseeching me to spare his grey hairs; and there was something in the old man's look that troubled me—my liver melted within me like water, and strongly checking my horse, he bounded to one side, and the old man was saved. Suddenly his form altered in my sight, he wore long floating garments, and his countenance assumed a grave and noble, yet not unpleasing aspect. 'The Khan has done well,' said he, 'the mercy he has shewn he shall find;' and I found my heart soften in that moment, and the pangs that had so long gnawed my vitals experienced a momentary relief. But the whole scene had passed away, and I was lying in this very tent with all my attendants sleeping around my couch; and I tried to awaken them, but they would not hear me, when the same venerable person entered, accompanied by the Armenian youth Gregoor, who held in his hand a small basket of twigs. 'Chief,' said the former, addressing me, while every one around still slept profoundly,—'behold, thy heart has been touched;—unworthy though thou art, thou hast tasted the mercy of the Omnipotent, who sends by the hands of his servant the remedy which will heal thy bodily ailments—take heed that thy mind partake the cure—beware that thou turn not good to evil—a blessing to a curse. Abandon thy evil ways—devote the life which has been granted thee, to repairing the evil thou hast already committed, rather than to increasing it—persecute no more my people the Armenians—set free the captives thou hast taken—rebuild the villages thou hast burned, and, to the youth who freely risked his life to preserve thine, restore what thou hast taken—dismiss him and his wife with blessings and with benefits—for know that to his zeal thou owest thy life.—Dost thou promise all this?' I need scarcely say, friends, that I gave the promise in ready and in earnest terms.

"The old man then turning to the young man, took from his basket a wonderful creature—how shall I describe it?—it resembled a serpent of pure ice, its very look was chilling ; and as it moved to and fro with a quick wavering motion, I felt its power in every vein. He stooped over my bed, and taking the creature, which lay passive in his grasp, wound it like a fillet round my head. The touch was magical—in a moment all the burning heat and restless confusion were gone, and gave place to a thrill of delicious calm, the more enchanting from my long previous sufferings. ‘Thou art healed, and at peace,’ said the aged man, ‘and the continuance of that peace rests with thyself—the delicious coolness which the touch of this pure creature sheds over a repentant heart, will turn to fiercer tortures than yet thou hast experienced, if thy vows are ever broken—be virtuous and be happy.’ With these words my aged physician and his companion vanished from my sight, and a deep sleep came over my senses, until I awoke just now, restored, as you all see, to health. And now, my friends, you will comprehend the cause of my solicitude for the young man’s safety—God grant that no evil may have befallen him!”

“Agas, the Khan’s fears were soon dissipated; for while he was yet speaking, a bustle at the tent-door announced an arrival, and the attendants entered, bringing in Gregoor, who had been met on his return close to the camp by those who were sent to seek him. I scarce need assure you, that the Khan, taught by his sufferings and his dream, never forgot his promise to the old saint. Not only did he restore to the youth his wife, and loaded them with presents, but he set all his Armenian captives at liberty, restored the plunder taken, rebuilt the burnt villages, and made good their losses to the inhabitants; in fine, until the day of his death, Doozd Mahomed Khan became the patron and protector of the very district and people, whom before this singular event he had bitterly persecuted.

“Thus, agas, you see that there is truth in what has always been told of the terrors of old Agri-Daugh, and the impossibility of reaching his summit, when even the good Gregoor failed, after encountering such terrible danger. You smile, as if you had still doubts?—Ah, well, agas, you are not the first Frank sahebs,* who have expressed this strange incredulity after they had heard this very story. I even remember one—may God forgive him! who ventured to hint a doubt of the Armenian youth having ever gone further than the cave of the recluse; that all the rest was merely a dream proceeding from an over-excited imagination, and that the Khan’s recovery from his fever was more attributable to the cold applications of the despised physicians, than to this wonderful ice-worm—La-illah-il-allah! Some people can never be convinced! But come—we are late; and behold, yonder are the walls of the castle shining in the moonlight—Let us push forward.”

* Gentlemen.

WE RETURN NO MORE!*

BY MRS HEMANS.

When I stood beneath the fresh green tree,
 And saw around me the wild field revive
 With fruits and fertile promise, and the Spring
 Come forth her work of gladness to contrive,
 With all her reckless birds upon the wing,
 I turn'd from all she brought to all she could not bring.
 CHILDE HAROLD.

"We return—we return—we return no more!"
 —So comes the song to the mountain-shore,
 From those that are leaving their Highland home,
 For a world far over the blue sea's foam:
 "We return no more!" and through cave and dell Mournfully wanders that wild Farewell.

"We return—we return—we return no more!"
 —So breathe sad voices our spirits o'er,
 Murmuring up from the depths of the heart,
 Where lovely things with their light depart;
 And the inborn sound hath a prophet's tone,
 And we feel that a joy is for ever gone.

"We return—we return—we return no more!"
 —Is it heard when the days of flowers are o'er?
 When the passionate soul of the night-bird's lay
 Hath died from the summer woods away?
 When the glory from sunset's robe hath pass'd,
 Or the leaves are borne on the rushing blast?

No! it is not the rose that returns no more;
 A breath of spring shall its bloom restore;
 And it is not the voice that o'erflows the bowers
 With a stream of love through the starry hours;
 Nor is it the crimson of sunset-hues,
 Nor the frail flush'd leaves which the wild wind strews.

"We return—we return—we return no more!"
 —Doth the bird sing thus from a brighter shore?
 Those wings, that follow the southern breeze,
 Float they not homeward o'er vernal seas?
 Yes! from the lands of the vine and palm,
 They come, with the sunshine, when waves grow calm.

"But we—we return—we return no more!"
 The heart's young dreams when their spring is o'er;
 The love it hath pour'd so freely forth,
 The boundless trust in ideal worth;
 The faith in affection—deep, fond, yet vain—
 —These are the Lost that return not again!

* "Ha til—ha til—ha til mi tuldic"—We return—we return—we return no more,—the burden of the Highland song of emigration.

STORY OF ADAM SCOTT.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

On a fine summer evening, about the beginning of July, on a year which must have been about the latter end of the reign of Queen Anne, or some years subsequent to that, as Adam Scott, farmer of Kildouglas, was sitting in a small public-house on North Tyne, refreshing himself on brown bread and English beer, and his hungry horse tearing up the grass about the kail-yard dike, he was accosted by a tall ungainly fellow, who entered the hut, and in the broadest Northumberland tongue, enquired if he was bound for Scotland. "What gars ye speer that, an it be your will?" said Scott, with the characteristic caution of his countrymen.

"Because a neighbour and I are agoing that way to-night," said the stranger, "and we knaw neything at all about the rwoad; and mwore than that, we carry soomthing reyther ower valuable to risk the losing of; and as we saw your horse rooging and reyying with the saddle on him, I made bould to call, thinking you might direct us on this coarsed rwoad."

"An' what will you gie me if I guide you safely into Scotland, an' set ye aince mair upon a hec road?" said Scott.

"Woy, man, we'll give thee as mooch bread as thou canst eat, and as moorch beer as thou canst drink—and mwore we cannot have in this moorland," said the man.

"It is a fair offer," said Adam Scott; "but I'll no pit ye to that expense, as I am gaun o'er the fells the night at any rate; sae, if ye'll wait my bijune, for my horse is plaguit weary, and amaisit jaded to death, then we shall ride thegither, and I ken the country weel; but road ye will find nane."

The two men then fastened their horses, and came in and joined Scott; so they called for ale, drank one another's healths at every pull, and seemed quite delighted that they were to travel in company. The tall man, who came in first, was loquacious and outspoken, though one part of his story often did not tally with the other; but his neighbour was sullen and retired, seldom speaking, and as seldom looking one in the face. Scott had at first a confused recollection of having seen him, but in what circumstances he could not remember, and he soon gave up the idea as a false one.

They mounted at length, and there being no path up the North Tyne then, nor till very lately, their way lay over ridges and moors, and sometimes by the margin of the wild river. The tall man had been very communicative, and frankly told Scott that they were going into Scotland to try to purchase sheep and cattle, where they expected to get them for next to nothing, and that they had brought gold with them for that purpose. This led on Scott to tell him of his own adventures in that line. He had come to Stagshaw bank fair, the only market then for Scots sheep and cattle in the north of England, with a great number of sheep for sale, but finding no demand, he bought up all the sheep from his countrymen for which he could get credit, and drove on to the Yorkshire markets, where he hawked them off in the best manner he could, and was now in fact returning to Scotland literally laden with money to pay his obligations.

After this communication, the tall man always rode before Adam Scott, and the short thick-set sullen fellow behind him, a position which, the moment it was altered, was resumed, and at which Scott began to be a little uneasy. It was still light, though wearing late, for there is little night at that season, when the travellers came to a wild glen called Bell's Burn, a considerable way on the English side of the Border. The tall man was still riding before, and considerably a-head, and as he was mounting the ridge on the north side of Bell's Burn, Adam Scott turned off all at once to the right. The hindmost man drew bridle on seeing this, and asked Scott, "Wherenow?"

"This way, lads. This way," was the reply.

The tall man then fell a swearing that that could never be the road to Liddisdale, to which he had promised to accompany them.

"The straight road, honest man—the straight road. Follow me," said Scott.

The tall man then rode in before him and said, "Whoy, man, thou'at either drunk, or gone stooped with sleep, for wilt thou tell me that the road up by Blakehope Shiel; and down the Burnmouth rigg, is nwot the rwoad into Liddisdale?"

"Ay, man!—ay, man! How comes this?" said Scott. "Sae it seems ye are nae sic strangers to the road as ye pretendit? Weel, weel, since ye ken that road sae particularly weel, gang your gates, an' take that road. For me, I'm gaum by the Fair-Lone, an' if Willie Jardine's at hame, I'll no gang muckle farther the night."

"The devil of such a rwoad thou shalt go, friend, let me tell thee that," said the tall fellow, offering to lay hold of Scott's bridle. "It is of the greatest consequence to us to get safely over the fell, and since we have put ourselves under thuyne care, thou shalt either go with us, or do worse."

"Dare not for your soul to lay your hand on my bridle, sir," said Scott; "for, if you touch either my horse or myself but with one of your fingers, I'll give you a mark to know you by." The other swore by a terrible oath that he would touch both him and it if he would not act reasonably, and seized the horse rudely by the bridle. Scott threw himself from his horse in a moment, and prepared for action, for his horse was stiff and unwieldy; and he durst not trust himself on his back between two others, both horses of mettle. He was armed with a cudgel alone, and as his strength and courage were unequalled at that time, there is little doubt that the tall Englishman would have come down, had not the other, at the moment the bridle was seized, rushed forward and seized his companion by the arm—"Fool! madman!" cried he; "What do you mean? has not the honest man a right to go what way he pleases, and what business have you to stop him? Thou wert a rash idiot all the days of thy life, and thou wilt die one, or be hangit for thy mad pranks. Let go!—for here, I swear, thou shalt neither touch the honest man nor his horse as long as I can hinder thee, and I think I should be as good a man as thee. Let us go all by the Fair-Lone, since it is so, and mayhap Mr Jardine will take us all in for the night."

"Whoy, Bill, thou sayest true after all," said the tall man succumbing; "I'm a passionate fool; but a man cannot help his temper. I beg Mr Sewott's pardon, for I was in the wrong. Come, then, let us go by the Fair-Lone with one consent."

Scott was now grieved and ashamed of his jealousy and dread of the men's motives, and that moment, if they had again desired him to have accompanied them over the fell, he would have done it; but away they all rode on the road towards the Fair-Lone, the tall man before as usual, Adam Scott in the middle, and the gruff but friendly fellow behind.

They had not rode above five minutes in this way, Scott being quite reassured of the integrity of his companions, perfectly at his ease, and letting them ride and approach him as they listed, when the hindermost man struck him over the crown with a loaded whip such a tremendous blow as would have felled an ox, yet, as circumstances happened to be, it had not much effect on the bullet head of Adam Scott. When the man made the blow, his horse started and wheeled, and Scott, with a readiness scarcely natural to our countrymen, the moment that he received the blow, knocked down the foremost rider, who fell from his horse like lead. The short stout man had by this time brought round his horse, and Adam Scott and he struck each other at the same moment. At this stroke he cut Adam's cheek and temple very sore; and Adam in return brought down his horse, which fell to the earth with a groan. A desperate combat now ensued, the Englishman with his long loaded whip, and the Scott with his thorn staff. At the second or third stroke, Adam Scott knocked off his antagonist's wig, and then at once knew him for a highwayman, or common robber and murderer, whom he had seen at his trials both at Carlisle and Jeddart. This incident opened Scott's eyes to the sort of company he had fallen into, and despising the rogue's cowardice who durst not attack him before, two to one, but thought to murder him at one blow behind his back, he laid on without mercy, and in about a minute and a half left him for dead. By this time the tall fellow had got up on one knee and foot, but was pale and bloody, on which Scott lent him another knoit, which again laid him flat; and then, without touching any thing that belonged to them, Adam mounted his sorry horse, and made the best of his way homewards.

As ill luck would have it, our farmer did not call at Fair-Lone. Indeed, his calling there was only a pretence to try his suspicious companions; for William Jardine and he were but little acquainted, and that little was the reverse of kindness for one another. At that time the Borders were in much disorder, owing to the discontents regarding the late Union, which were particularly cherished there; and there were many bickerings and heart-burnings between the natives on each side of the Marches. To restrain these as much as possible, there were keepers, as they were called, placed all along the Border line, who were vested with powers to examine and detain any suspicious person from either side till farther trial. Of these keepers, or marchmen, Jardine was one; and he being placed in the very entry of that wild pass which leads from Liddisdale and the highlands of Teviotdale into North Tynne, he often found his hands full. He was an intrepid and severe fellow; and having received a valuable present from some English noblemen for his integrity, from that time forth it was noted that he was most severe on the Scots, and blamed them for every thing.

Now Scott ought, by all means, to have called there, and laid his case before the keeper, and have gone with him to the maimed or killed men, and then he would have been safe. He did neither, but passed by on the other side, and posted on straight over moss and moor for Kildouglas. He seems to have been astounded at the imminent danger he had escaped; and after having, as he believed, killed two men, durst not face the stern keeper, and that keeper his enemy; and as a great part of the treasure he carried belonged to others, and not to himself, he was anxious about it, and made all the haste home that he could, that so he might get honestly quit of it.

But, alas! our brave farmer got not so soon home as he intended. There is a part of the thread of the narrative here which I remember but confusedly. But it seems, that immediately after Scott left the prostrate robbers, some more passengers from the fair came riding up, and finding the one man speechless and the other grievously mauled, and on enquiring what had happened, the tall man told them in a feeble voice that they had been murdered and robbed by a rascally Scot called Adam Scott of Kildouglas. As the matter looked so ill, some of the men galloped straight to Fair-Lone, and apprized the marchman, who instantly took horse and pursued; and having a privilege of calling one man out of each house, his company increased rapidly. Jardine, well knowing the wild tract that Scott would take, came up with him about midnight at a place called Langside, and there took him prisoner.

It was in vain that our honest yeoman told the keeper the truth of the story—he gained no credit. For the keeper told him, that he had no right to try the cause; only he, Adam Scott, had been accused to him of robbery and murder, and it was his office to secure him till the matter was enquired into. He assured Scott further, that his cause looked very ill; for had he been an honest man, and attacked by robbers, he would have called in passing, and told him so. Scott pleaded hard to be taken before the Sheriff of Teviotdale; but the alleged crime having been committed in England, he was carried to Carlisle. When Scott heard that such a hard fate awaited him, he is said to have expressed himself thus:—"Aye, man, an' am I really to be tried for my life by Englishmen for felling twa English robbers? If that be the case, I hae nae mair chance for my life than a Scots fox has amang an English pack o' hounds. But had I kend half an hour ago what I ken now, you an' a' your menzie should never hae taen Aidie Scott alive."

To Carlisle he was taken and examined, and all his money taken from him, and given in keeping to the Mayor, in order to be restored to the rightful owners; and witnesses gathered in all the way from Yorkshire, such as the tall man named;—for as to all that Adam told in his own defence, his English judges only laughed at it, regarding it no more than the barking of a dog. Indeed, from the time he heard the tall man's evidence, whom he felled first, he lost hope of life. That scoundrel swore that Scott had knocked them both down and robbed them, when they were neither touching him nor harming him in any manner of way. And it seemed to be a curious fact, that the fellow really never knew that Scott had been attacked at all. He had neither heard nor seen when his companion struck the blow, and that instant having been knocked down himself, he was quite justifiable in believing that, at all events, Scott had meant to dispatch them both. When Adam related how this happened, his accuser said he knew that was an arrant lie; for had his companion once struck, there was not a head which he would not have split.

"Aha! it is a' that ye ken about it, lad," said Adam; "I fand it nae mair than a rattan's tail! I had baith my night-cap an' a flannen sark in the crown o' my bannet. But will ye just be sae good as tell the gentlemen wha that companion o' yours was; for if ye dinna do it, I can do it for you. It was nae other than Ned Thom, the greatest thief in a' England."

The Sheriff here looked a little suspicious at the witnesses; but the allegation was soon repelled by the oaths of two, who, it was afterwards proven, both perjured themselves. The Mayor told Scott to be making provision for his latter end; but, in the meantime, he would delay passing sentence for eight days, to see if he could bring forward any exculpatory proof. Alas! lying bound in Carlisle prison as he was, how could he bring forward proof? For in those days, without a special messenger, there was no possibility of communication; and the only proofs Adam could have brought forward were, that the men forced themselves into his company, and that he had as many sheep in his possession as accounted for the whole of the money. He asked in Court if any person would go a message for him, but none accepted or seemed to care for him. He believed seriously that they wanted to hang him for the sake of his money, and gave up hope.

Always as Adam sold one drove of sheep after another in Yorkshire, he dispatched his drivers home to Scotland, and with the last that returned, he sent word of the very day on which he would be home, when all his creditors were to meet him at his own house, and receive their money. However, by the manœuvres of one rascal, (now one of his accusers,) he was detained in England three days longer. The farmers came all on the appointed day, and found the gudewife had the muckle pat on, but no Adam Scott came with his pockets full of English gold to them, though many a long look was cast to the head of the Black Swire. They came the next day, and the next again, and then began to fear that some misfortune very serious had befallen to their friend.

There was an elderly female lived in the house with Scott, called Kitty Cairns, who was aunt either to the goodman or the goodwife, I have forgot which; but Auntie Kitty was her common denomination. On the morning after Adam Scott was taken prisoner, this old woman arose early, went to her niece's bedside, and said, "Meggification, hinny! sic a dream as I hae had about Aidie!—an' it's a true dream, too! I could tak my aith to every sentence o't—aye, an' to ilka person connectit wi't, gin I saw him atween the een."

"Oh, auntie, for mercy's sake haud your tongue, for you are garring a' my heart quake! Ower weel do I ken how true your dreams are at certain times!"

"Aye, hinny! an' did you ever hear me say that sic an' sic a dream was true when it turned out to be otherwise? Na, never i' your life. An' as for folk to say that there's nae truth in dreams, ye ken that's a mere meggification. Weel, ye shall hear; for I'm no gaun to tell ye a dream, ye see, nor aught like aye; but an even-down true story. Our Aidie was sair pinched to sell the hinderend o' his sheep, till up comes a braw dashing gentleman, and bids him a third mair than they were worth, wi' the intencion o' paying the poor simple Scotchman in base money. But, aha! let our Aidie alane! He begoud to poize the guineas on his tongue, an' feint a aue o' them he wad hae till they were a' fairly weighed afore a magistrate; and sae the grand villain had to pay the hale in good sterling gowd. This angered him sae sair that he hired twa o' his ruffians to follow our poor Aidie, and tak a' the money frae him. I saw the hail o't, an' I could ken the twa chaps weel if confrontit wi' them. They cam to him drinkin' his ale. They rade on an' rade on wi' him, till they partit roads, an' then they fell on him, an' a sair battle it was; but Aidie wan, and felled them baith. Then he fled for hame, but the English pursued, an' took him away to Carlisle prison; an' if nae relief come in eight days, he'll be hanged."

This strange story threw the poor goodwife of Kildouglas into the deepest distress; and the very first creditor who came that morning, she made Auntie Kitty repeat it over to him. This was one Thomas Linton, and she could not have repeated it to a fitter man; for, though a religious and devout man, he was very superstitious, and believed in all Auntie's visions most thoroughly. Indeed, he believed farther; for he believed she was a witch, or one who had a familiar spirit, and knew every thing almost either beneath or beyond the moon. And Linton and his brother being both heavy creditors, the former undertook at once to ride to the south, in order, if possible, to learn something of Adam Scott and the money; and, if he heard nothing by the way, to go as far as Carlisle, and even, if he found him not there, into Yorkshire. Accordingly he sent a message to his brother, and proceeded southward; and at a village called Stanegirthside, he first heard an account that a man called Scott was carried through that place, on the Friday before, to Carlisle jail, accused of robbery and murder. This was astounding news; and, in the utmost anxiety, Linton pressed on, and reached Carlisle before the examination concluded, of which mention was formerly made; and when Adam Scott asked through the crowded court, if any present would go a message for him into Scotland for a fair reward, and all had declined it, then Thomas Linton stepped forward within the crowd, and said, "Aye, here is aue, Adam, that will ride to ony part in a' Scotland or England for ye; ride up to Lunnon to your chief in the House o' Lords, afore thae English loons shall dare to lay a foul finger on ye!—An' I can tell you, Mr Shirra, or Mr Provice, or whatever ye be, that you are gaun to get yourself into a grand scrape, for there never was an honest man breathed the breath o' life than Aidie Scott."

The judge smiled, and said he would be glad to have proofs of that; and, for Linton's encouragement, made the town-clerk read over the worst part of the evidence, which was very bad indeed, only not one word of it true. But Linton told them, he cared nothing for their evidence against a Scot; "for it was weel enough kend that the Englishers war a' grit lecars, an' wad swear to ony thing that suited them; but let him aince get Adam Scott's plain story, an' then he wad ken how matters stood."

He was indulged with a private interview, and greatly were the two friends puzzled how to proceed. The swindler, who really had bought the last ewes from Scott, had put a private mark upon all his good gold to distinguish it from his base metal, and made oath that all that gold was his; and that he had given it to his servant, whom Scott had robbed, to buy cattle for him in Scotland. The mark was evident; and that had a bad look; but when Scott told the true story, Linton insisted on the magistrate being summoned to Court, who saw that gold weighed over to his friend. "And I will mysell tak in hand," said he, "not only to bring forward all the farmers from whom Scott bought the sheep, but all the Englishmen to whom he sold them; an' gin I dinna prove him an honest man, if ye gie me time, I sall gie you leave to hang me in his place."

The swindler and robber now began to look rather blank, but pretended to laugh at the allegations of Thomas Linton; but the Scot set up his birses, and told the former that "he could prove, by the evidence of two English aldermen, who saw the gold weighed, that he had paid to his friend the exact sum which he had here claimed; and that, either dead or alive, he should be obliged to produce the body of the other robber, or he who pretended to have been robbed, to shew what sort of servants he employed. "I'll bring baith noblemen and lawyers frae Scotland," added he, "who will see justice done to so brave and so worthy a man; an' if they dinna gar you skemps take his place, never credit a Scot again."

Adam Scott's chief being in London, and his own laird a man of no consequence, Linton rode straight off to his own laird, the Earl of Traquair, travelling night and day till he reached him. The Earl, being in Edinburgh, sent for a remarkably clever and shrewd lawyer, one David Williamson, and also for Alexander Murray, Sheriff of Selkirkshire, and to these three Linton told his story, assuring them, that he could vouch for the truth of it in every particular; and after Williamson had questioned him backwards and forwards, it was resolved that something should instantly be done for the safety of Scott. Accordingly, Williamson wrote a letter to the Mayor, which was signed by the Earl, and the Sheriff of Scott's county, which letter charged the Mayor to take good heed what he was about, and not to move in the matter of Scott till Quarter-session day, which was not distant, and then counsel would attend to see justice done to a man, who had always been so highly esteemed. And that by all means he (the Mayor) was to secure Scott's three accusers, and not suffer them by any means to escape, as he should answer for it. The letter also bore a list of the English witnesses who behaved to be there. Linton hastened back with it, and that letter changed the face of affairs mightily. The grand swindler and the tall robber were both seized and laid in irons, and the other also was found with great trouble. From that time forth there remained little doubt of the truth of Scott's narrative; for this man was no other than the notorious Edward Thom, who had eluded the sentence of the law both in Scotland and England, in the most wonderful manner, and it was well known that he belonged to a notable gang of robbers.

It is a pity that the history of that interesting trial is far too long for a winter-evening tale, such as this, though I have often heard it all gone over;—how Williamson astonished the natives with his cross questions, his speeches, and his evidences;—how confounded the Mayor and aldermen were, that they had not discerned these circumstances before;—how Thom, at last, turned king's evidence, and confessed the whole;—how the head swindler was condemned and executed, and the tall robber whipped and dismissed, because he had in fact only intended a robbery, but had no hand in it;—and, finally, how Scott was released with the highest approbation; while both magistrates and burgesses of ancient Carlisle strove with one another how to heap most favours on him and his friend Thomas Linton. There were upwards of two hundred Scottish yeomen accompanied the two friends up the Esk, who had all been drawn to Carlisle to hear the trial; and there is little doubt, that, if matters had gone otherwise than they did, a rescue was intended.

Why should any body despise a dream, or any thing whatever in which one seriously believes?

THE SILENT MEMBER. NO. IV.

VOTING BY PROXY.

SUPPOSE the people of the island of Tongataboo, in the Pacific ocean, had advanced to such a degree of civilisation, that they were ripe for political institutions; and suppose, that hearing of the pre-eminence of Great Britain in these matters, they were to send one of their wisest men for the express purpose of acquiring a practical knowledge of all the principles of the British Constitution. Might we not imagine such a dialogue as the following to take place between the Tongataboo philosopher, and the Englishman, whoever he might be, who undertook to expound the theory and practice of our admirable system of government?

Philosopher. I comprehend distinctly, from your explanations, the separate functions, and the combined energies, of the three estates of the realm; and the more I reflect upon them, the more deeply I am impressed with that amazing wisdom which has perfected so noble a scheme of civil polity.

Englishman. It has been the progressive work of past ages, and will remain the admiration of future ones.

Philosopher. The welfare of that country is thrice secure, where nothing depends upon the will of one man, but where the sages of the land assemble in council to deliberate upon all that concerns the public good. I have been a witness of the laborious zeal with which they discharge this duty; unmindful of all personal inconvenience, and denying themselves, night after night, the needful rest which nature has ordained. In what other nation will you find such devotion, such ardent, such exalted patriotism?

Englishman (smiling.) The results are pretty nearly as you describe; the causes, I apprehend, somewhat more complicated. You see that lady who is in the act of drawing her purse-strings, to bestow her charity upon a poor crippled mendicant who has solicited it. I know her. She knows me; and she knows I am observing her. What a graceful attitude! How well that sandal becomes her foot and ankle! How the diamond on her finger sparkles in the sun! And what can be more beautifully contrasted than her white, delicate hand, and the squalid, shrivelled palm which is extended to receive her bounty? And now she steals a glance from beneath those jet-black arches, her eyebrows, to be certain she is noticed. It is a piece of acting, intended to be seen by all, but admired by one. What need the supplicant care? He is benefited. His wants are relieved as effectually as if pure and holy charity had administered the alms.

Philosopher. I understand you. Where good is done, it is not for man to look beyond the deed. The motive and the act are linked together in His sight only, who is alone able to unite them.

Englishman. Exactly.

Philosopher. Still you are a happy and an enviable people, to possess such beneficent legislators, who do nothing to complain of upon earth, and who, in their account with Heaven, may set off value received, against any deficiency of just intentions in their balance sheet. But before we quit this branch of our discourse, I must beg of you to explain a matter which I do not clearly comprehend. I perceive, in that illustrious and august assembly of sages, whom you call, in their collective capacity, the House of Peers, a class of nobles who are known by the title of PROXIES. They seem to be very numerous, and to exercise a most important influence in determining the final issue of all great public questions, on which occasions only, they take any part in public affairs. I suppose they are the wisest of your wise men: venerable seers, or individuals gifted by nature with extraordinary powers of mind, who constitute a sort of college of arbitrators, their functions being to listen to all that is urged on both sides, to enquire dispassionately into facts, to weigh evidence with scrupulous impartiality, to mingle with none, to know no parties, but as far as human faculties can stretch into the regions of pure, unmixed truth, to do so, and then, by their voices, to give effect to such measures as they believe, in the sacred depths of their hearts, are founded upon perfect justice.

Englishman. Ha! ha! ha!

Philosopher. What does that laugh mean?

Englishman. You shall know. That college of arbitrators, as you designate them, those wisest of the wise, those venerable seers, gifted with extraordinary powers of mind, those disciples of pure, unmixed truth, who exercise such an important influence in determining the final issue of all great public questions, (and I admit they do exercise this influence,) those proxies to whom you assign the exalted function of giving effect by their voices to such measures only as they believe, in the sacred depths of their hearts, are founded upon perfect justice, are persons who are never present, who never hear one word of what is said on either side, but deposit their "voices" in the pockets of their friends, to use them at their pleasure.

Philosopher. Impossible!

Englishman. Most true, notwithstanding. The constitution accords a privilege to Peers of Parliament, which is not granted to the other branch of the legislature, that of having their votes registered for or against a question in their absence, with the same validity and effect as if they were present; so that a noble may be fox-hunting, laid up with the gout, travelling abroad, or discharging a lucrative office in some of our foreign possessions, without being thereby incapacitated from exercising a direct influence in the national councils at home.

Philosopher. How! Does your constitution sanction such an absurdity?

Englishman. It never struck me as an absurdity till this moment. The practice is coeval, I believe, with the constitution itself.

Philosopher. Alas! what a veil time throws over deformity! The things that are, we reverence, because they stand before us covered with the dust of antiquity; when, if they were now to do, we should blush to ordain them so. We venerate what is old; but it is by a perverse misapplication of the term in all that relates to living man and his concerns. The age which is our own is older than that which was our fathers, even as that of our fathers numbered more years than that which was their fathers; and still the further we go back to old times, the nearer we approach to the infancy of time itself. I pray you resolve me this:—Are we to look for the perfection of things in their first beginnings? If so, all change since, has been from good to bad; and the palace and the city should be abandoned for the mountain cave and the deep forest. But it is not so. Do aged men ask counsel of children? Why then should nations, in the vigour of manhood, fetter themselves with the maxims or practices of their own youth? Could you summon to your presence those lawgivers by whom it was agreed that men should be allowed to approve or reject, without knowing what it was they approved or rejected, they would give you a reason for it as applicable to themselves, which would make you ashamed of it, as part of your own system. Imagine, for a moment, that such a privilege as you have described, did not exist, but that to-morrow, one of your peers were to propose it should be conferred on his order. Would he not be overwhelmed with ridicule? Or, if the proposition were so urged, that it must be gravely discussed, would it not be with one feeling of reprobation? "What?" it would be asked, "shall we consent to strip ourselves of all claim to confidence and respect in the eyes of our countrymen? Shall we seek a privilege which we could not exercise without disgrace to ourselves, and insult and injury to them? Shall we dare say to the people, that their rights and interests, their liberties, their welfare, of which we are the hereditary guardians, and with which our own are indissolubly blended, are so worthless in our estimation, that we will not bestow upon them the same degree of attention we do in purchasing a house, or settling the liveries of our household servants? Shall we proclaim, that while in the most ordinary transactions of private life, which concern ourselves, we employ our best judgment in determining upon them, and delegate to no second self the power to act for us, in what concerns the nation, in all that relates to the well-being of the people, we will see, and hear, and understand, through the eyes, and ears, and minds, of others? What is this but to deliver the people, and all that most nearly concerns them, into the hands of forty or fifty senators? and will not the people murmur, and require that the peerage itself should be remodelled; that ribbons, and garters, and trifles, and descent, should not carry with them the prerogative of being legislators, but that the capacity to think, and the disposition to exercise the capacity, should be the superior qualification?" My friend, you would laugh at the man who should propose to make love by proxy, to eat by proxy, to be married by proxy, or to inherit a fortune by proxy; yet, because custom has thrown her mantle over it, you cannot see the equally gross absurdity, and the infinitely greater evil, of statesmen governing by proxy.

I know not how the arguments of my Tongataboo philosopher could be overthrown. They might be neutralized a little, perhaps, by the consideration that it comes to the same end, whether men vote upon a question without knowing anything about it, or whether, after knowing every thing, they vote at the nod of a minister, or by the compact of a party; in both cases, alike regardless of the votes they ought to give, and of the votes they would give, if neither minister nor party interposed. Still, there is a marked, undisguised prostitution of principle in the one case, which does not glare so hideously upon us in the other. The peer, who, in his place, votes with the minister, may be supposed (by a great stretch of charitable interpretation, in some cases, I allow) to be convinced of the expediency or justice of the measure he supports; it is possible he may be sincere, as well as consistent; and when inconsistent, that he may be honourably converted from former heresies. But he who puts his vote upon the minister's sleeve;—who says to him, Do what you please; I am your ready, obsequious, unreasoning slave; use me whenever you want me, and for whatever purpose you want me; count me as one in every division, be it upon the dirtiest job, the most atrocious injustice, or the vilest sacrifice of national honour that ever disgraced a cabinet; unknowing, unenquiring, unsatisfied of all, save this, that a bargain has been struck between us, and that I abide by it to the uttermost condition;—he, I say, who does this—and every absent peer who leases out his vote by proxy, does in effect do it—commits an act of self-abasement, of public wrong, and of legislative mockery, which, it might be thought, only required to be thus stated, to be for ever abolished.

Let us look for a moment how the system operates. On the 25th February, Earl Stanhope brought forward his motion for the House resolving itself into a committee to consider of the internal state of the country. It was no mere party question, but one raised upon the petitions of the people, who complained of unparalleled distress, and implored the legislature to enquire into its causes, with a view to devise, if possible, some mode of relief. When the House divided, after a debate of nine hours, the numbers stood thus:—

Here, then, were sixty-one peers, (nearly one-half of the whole declared votes,) who, without hearing any one reason assigned for or against the motion, without knowing in a regular and constitutional manner what were the complaints of the people, with what justice they were urged, or with what justice they are disregarded, took upon themselves, nevertheless, to record their silent opinions (if, indeed, they had any opinions at all upon the question.) Ten of these omniscient sages were for granting enquiry; and so far as there must always be a prima facie equity in allowing those who complain to have the benefit of investigation, so far, it may be said, they were less obviously reprehensible than the 51 who intuitively saw that it would be most improper, or that it was perfectly unnecessary, to have any enquiry.

On the 18th of February, the Duke of Richmond, in a speech which produced a powerful effect—(not in the House, but upon the country)—as well from its range of research, and the facts consequently accumulated, as from the reasonings with which these facts were elucidated and applied, attempted to shew the absolute necessity, the positive duty, of appointing "a select committee to enquire into the condition of the labouring classes, and also relative to those taxes which pressed more immediately on the productive classes of the country." A debate of eight hours ensued, in the course of which Earl Bathurst, that great man and honest politician Lord Eldon, the Earl of Winchelsea, Lord Holland, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the Duke of Wellington, among others, stated their views of the expediency or inexpediency of the proposed committee. Upon the division the numbers ran thus :—

Here the omniscients and the intuitives multiply upon us in a fearful ratio—an advance from 61 to 94; the difference being but fourteen in favour of those present! Let it be soberly considered for five minutes, that a motion, affecting the vital interests of the country, is brought before the House of Lords; that, in the fiction of Parliamentary language, the sense of the House is taken upon it; that 202 members of the House are represented as gravely and anxiously and solemnly deliberating upon this motion, but that, in point of fact, 94 of that number are mere paper Lords, deposited in the pockets of the remaining 108—and what man will be hardy enough to undertake the defence of such a system?

On the 23d of March, the Marquis of Clanricarde moved sundry resolutions, part of them declaratory of admitted facts, respecting the arrival in this country of the Queen of Portugal, her recognition by his Majesty, and the departure of the Portuguese constitutionalists; and part of them condemnatory of the proceedings which took place off the island of Terceira. These resolutions involved a consideration of the laws of nations; and whether they were rightly or wrongly brought forward, could be known only by hearing how they were framed, and how supported by circumstances. But the omniscients and intuitives decided that every thing was as it should be at Terceira, with the same unerring wisdom that they decided there was no occasion to enquire into the distresses of the people. The following was the division :—

I have selected these three questions, first, because, up to the present moment, they furnish the only divisions upon which the strength of the ministry has been exerted; and, secondly, because such an exposition speaks home to the understanding better than the most forcible arguments. It is strange that this extraordinary privilege has never been adverted to with reference to that which constitutes its extraordinary character, its solemn burlesque upon legislative deliberation. Nor let it be forgotten, that the ministerial majorities, by which enquiry into grievances, real or alleged, is so peremptorily stifled, and by which measures of real or alleged mischief are so promptly carried, consist of a much larger proportion of these proxies than the minorities. The system is bad and odious both ways; but it has at least a tendency to work more injuriously this way, except, indeed, we compound the matter, by considering, that if there were no proxies, there would still be majorities; though even then I should say, "Assume a virtue if you have it not," and give us the decency of apparent deliberation, and of supposed conviction, instead of the open demonstration of an utter disregard of both.

THE JEWS RELIEF BILL.

We are a droll people. Last year, the tables of both Houses of Parliament groaned under the weight of petitions from all classes of the people, and from every corner of the country, beseeching the legislature not to pass the bill for granting political power to the Roman Catholics. The petitions were received with all possible respect, read with all possible decorum, discussed with all possible solemnity, and the bill was passed into a law with all possible contempt of the petitions and the petitioners. This year, numerous petitions are presented to both Houses of Parliament, imploring the legislature to grant relief to the Jews from the civil and political disabilities under which they labour; not one petition, I believe—not one solitary petition—has been brought forward in opposition, and the measure actually before the House for giving effect to the prayer of these petitions is rejected! It is said, the only sure way of making a pig go the way you wish, is to pull him by the tail in an opposite direction. It would certainly seem, that to petition Parliament for a thing, is the infallible mode of not getting it, as it is no less an infallible mode of getting it, vehemently to protest against having it. Upon the whole, indeed, the last and present session may be considered as singularly propitious with regard to ascertaining the exact value of that invaluable right, as Mr O'Connell might say. The Duke of Wellington (it was before he was a minister) once called the petitions of the people "a mere farce." He would not, perhaps, call them so now, content with the power of proving them no better. It cannot be long, I should think, before the people themselves will be of his Grace's opinion; before they will disdain, with "bated breath," and in a "bondman's key," to approach the honourable House with acres of parchment and oceans of ink, for the sake of asserting a privilege, the whole and exclusive benefit of which consists in its assertion; like certain forms, that are still kept up when the purposes for which they were originally instituted are gone to decay, making of an ancient ceremony a modern mummary. Should this time come, it will be followed, in the first instance, by a state of sullen apathy or quiescence—the sure precursor of a national feeling, that the period had arrived when the people must look after their rulers.

With respect to the Jews, it is a question upon the lips of every rational man—"Why should we play the squeamish hypocrite, and after having gulped down the camel, make such wry faces at swallowing the gnat?" We have built a bridge broad enough to allow of the passage of seven or eight millions of Catholics and Unitarians into the citadel of the constitution, and we refuse to make it a few inches wider to accommodate thirty thousand Jews! It is like the prudery of a prostitute, who limits the number of her bedfellows, fixing the boundary of virtue between ten and a round dozen; or rather, like that same prostitute, admitting every denomination of Christians to her embraces, but, in the spirit of my Lord Darlington's political chastity, denying her favours to "Turks, Jews, and Infidels."* It is rank af-

* The genial influence of a "Tory administration acting upon Whig principles," has had an extraordinary effect upon his Lordship. He has spoken again! Not only, therefore, has he spoken twice in seventeen years upon questions of importance, but twice in one session. He speaks so much to the purpose, that I hope, now he has begun, he will go on. "Although a friend to liberty in general, and to Parliamentary reform, I shall oppose this motion, as I consider it uncalled for." And mark at what personal hazard he opposes it. "I shall do so notwithstanding a warning I received from a friend the other day, whom I met in the street, and who asked me, if I voted against this measure, how I could ever hope to borrow money among the Jews? But I replied, that the Jew would be just as ready to lend me money as before, since it was for his own sake, and not for that of the borrower, that he afforded the accommodation; and I quoted the passage in the Merchant of Venice, in which, when Shylock says,

'Fair sir, you spat on me on Wednesday last;
You spurn'd me such a day; another time
You called me dog,'

and so on, Antonio replies—

'I am as like to call thee so again,
To spit on thee again, to spurn thee too.
If thou wilt lend this money, lend it not fection. Mr Huskisson said very truly this evening,* that the "arguments he had heard against the emancipation of the Jews were precisely the same, mutatis mutandis, which he had been in the habit of hearing urged, for the last thirty years, against the emancipation of the Catholics;" and Sir Robert Peel, as if it were his ambition to give peculiar point and emphasis to this declaration, rose immediately after the right honourable member for Liverpool, and spoke a speech—aye, just the sort of speech he was wont to utter in his better days, when he was the champion of Protestantism. I declare, before God, I should be sorely put to it, to make my election, were I asked which I would prefer to endure—the consciousness of enormous apostasy, or the intolerable martyrdom of having to deliver the sentiments Sir Robert this night delivered, to the same House of Commons, and in the very presence of the same men, who, not twelve months since, had heard and seen me declare my apostasy. The right honourable Secretary is either dead to all feeling, or every word he uttered was wormwood on his tongue, and anguish in his heart.

How innocently, how ingenuously, forsooth, he "regrets" the principle now assumed, that because, in the session of Parliament before last, "we were called upon to give our support to a measure for the relief of the Protestant Dissenters, and last session we passed a bill for the relief of his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects," therefore, "we are bound in consistency to follow up these measures by adopting the present!" "I hear this with regret, and I hear it for the first time." Very likely, Sir Robert; but not for the last time; of that you may rest assured. "In the discussions respecting either the Catholics or the Protestant Dissenters, nothing of the sort was ever intimated." No;—they were then trying to get in the small end of the wedge. "It was never stated to us, that because we admitted our fellow Christians to a participation of power, that therefore, as an unavoidable and necessary consequence, we were bound to admit to all the privileges of the Constitution, men who reject Christianity altogether." Did it require to be stated? Was not the "unavoidable and necessary consequence," at which you are now so terrified, plainly written upon the face of your own apostate measure? Or if it were not, was it for those who were seeking to subvert the Constitution by your aid, to apprise you of all the mischief that would ensue? A well-armed traveller, who delivers his pistols to a highwayman, might as reasonably complain that he was afterwards robbed by him, as you to affect to deprecate the "unavoidable and necessary consequence" of delivering up the Constitution to Catholics and Dissenters. Your distinction between Christian Papists, Unitarian Christians, and Unchristian Jews, is a poor and puling one; every way unworthy a man who aspires to the character of a statesman; and if you be sincere in your surprise at what has followed, you only prove yourself to have been grossly ignorant of consequences which the lowest clerk in your own office could have laid before you. You cannot claim our confidence in your sincerity therefore, without awakening our contempt for your imbecility.

What a fascinating air of novelty there is in the following discovery and argument! "In the speeches of Burke, and in his recorded sentiments as contained in his writings, we learn that he rested his strongest reasons upon the Christianity of the Roman Catholics; so of Mr Grattan, of Mr Canning, and of all the great and eminent advocates of that cause. Even my right honourable friend on my left, (Sir George Murray,) in pressing their claims upon the attention of the House last session, observed, that when serving with the Protestants in the army, they entered together the same breach, they fought together on the same field, reposed together in the same grave, and rested their hopes of future happiness upon the merits of a common Redeemer: those appeals were forcibly made, and successfully made; for it was not to be denied that Protestants and Catholics admitted the same great doctrines of Christianity." Theology and sentiment—twaddle and cant! These would be pretty sentences, Sir Robert, from the lips of your brother-in-law, Mr George Dawson, after dinner at a tavern, or from the pen of a very young lady, in the shape of an "Elegy upon the brave men who fell at the Battle of Waterloo;" but as an argument in the Senate, to vindicate the wisdom of a great national measure, they are contemptible. For to what do they amount? That a Catholic, having taken the King's bounty and enlisted, when on the field of battle fights as well as his brother Protestant, knowing that if he does not, he may be tried, perchance, by a court-martial for cowardice, or, that if he runs away, he will be shot as a deserter: that when a Catholic is killed in battle, he is buried in the same hole, with fifty or a hundred other Catholics or Protestants, as it may happen; and that if a Catholic has time to think about it before a cannon ball carries his head off, he thinks of the same Mediator as a Protestant. But it is in this last particular only that your parallel is perfect; for as to entering the same breach, fighting on the same field, and reposing in the same grave, I apprehend deists and atheists, of which I dare be sworn there is a tolerable sprinkling in every army, fare just as well; therefore, so far as these merits constitute a claim to the relief which the Roman Catholic has received, they who are not Christians are entitled, upon your own shewing, to similar privileges. I am ashamed to have bestowed so many words on so flimsy and puerile a piece of declamation.

"But if this bill pass," you go on to say, "though it may apparently be limited to the Jews, and though confining our view solely to this bill it does not go beyond that class; yet we shall, if this be agreed to, have to pass other bills most objectionable in my views of the Constitution." Your views of the Constitution, Sir Robert, what are they? and what are they worth? What is the Constitution itself since your views veered round from north to south? Again, "What is the case made out respecting the Jews? It would seem—I take my information from a book, which I understand is written by a very respectable Jew, and is considered a work of authority—that there are resident in the United Kingdom about 27,000 Jews, natural born subjects of his Majesty, of whom 20,000 are resident in London, and 7000 in the other parts of the kingdom; and for these seven-and-twenty or thirty thousand individuals, I am invited to depart from the principle which has been acted on from the earliest period of the Constitution." I can easily imagine how shocking, how distressing, it must be to your feelings, to be invited to depart from any principle of the Constitution. You have shewn such a reverence for the Constitution—such an attachment to the Constitution—such a love for the Constitution. Your passionate devotion to the Constitution is so notorious, that I, for one, would not be the man bold enough to "invite" you to offer any violence or disloyalty to the Constitution. I only wonder how his Grace of Wellington escaped killing last year, when, instead of "inviting," he ordered you, to "break in upon the Constitution." But enough of this. It is sickening to hear these phrases from your lips; though, to do you justice, you have adroitly shifted your constitutional ground, and now talk only of the "earliest periods of the Constitution"—"the earliest foundations of the monarchy"—"the beginning of civil government among us," and so forth. Even you have not the effrontery to play the queasy minister, and keck at being "invited to depart from the principles" of the Constitution as established by the glorious revolution of 1688.—One word more on this part of your speech. "For these seven-and-twenty or thirty thousand individuals, I am invited to depart from the principle," &c. The claim advanced on behalf of the Jews, is either founded upon justice, or it is not. If it be just, thirty, or thirty thousand, or thirty millions, can neither weaken nor strengthen it. But this argument supplies the solution of your apostasy. Had there been only thirty thousand Catholics, you would not have discovered the justice of admitting them to power; but being six millions, their right became as palpable as their magnitude,—in other words, intimidation looked big, and principle dwindled into a dwarf.

"What I contend is, that if the principle be adopted, (the principle of admitting into Parliament persons not professing Christianity,) it will place infidels on the same footing as Protestants; and if this principle be recognised, the House must be prepared for its revolting the feelings of the country." Granted. It would revolt the feelings of the country to see atheists and infidels, avowedly such, sitting in a Christian legislature, and making laws for a Christian people. But is it on this ground alone that you, Sir Robert, are so repugnant to "depart from the established usages of the constitution?" Have you no higher and better feeling on the subject? Are you only anxious to spare the feelings of the people, and to save them from being revolted? I will tell you why I ask these questions. Because I like consistency, even in bad men. A steady determined villain is of the two a more manly character, than the shifting, equivocating, ducking, half-and-half knave, who has all the moral laxity of a rogue in his composition, without the bold energy which constitutes a hero, even in a bad cause. Do not imagine I am capable of applying this comparison to you. I would do so, if I thought it applicable in itself; but I will not weaken my own cause, by casting unmerited contumely upon our opponent. All I mean to convey is this, that the sensitive regard you now manifest for the feelings of the people, was dormant or extinguished last year, when you carried a measure by which, not the feeling only of the country, but the confidence, the allegiance almost, (as some hereafter may prove perhaps,) were revolted.

I come to your last, and, from the solemnity of your manner in delivering it, I should judge your strongest argument, in your own estimation. "If," say you, "this bill were passed, other bills must come;" (aye;—as certainly as this bill has come in consequence of your Catholic Emancipation bill having passed;) "and is it wise, year after year, to disturb the country by the introduction of these separate bills, instead of a general admission to power?" It is not wise; no wiser than was the fatal measure of last session; but the evil you would now, too late, avert, is the legitimate offspring of that compound of treachery and folly. Your piteous lamentations are vain. The integrity of the constitution is destroyed; its perfect beauty is defaced; they who conjured you to desist from the sacrilege would have stood by you, a firm and faithful band, and given you victory in every struggle: you deserted them for purposes of your own, and they now stand aloof from you, in your frightened extremity. It is even possible (for revenge, as one of our old divines has said, is the most delicious morsel with which the devil can tempt the soul of a sinner) that they may exult over your embarrassment and alarm, though they see them caused by an extension of those very calamities they so bitterly deplore.

"There is no one ground," you add, "on which the Jews are sought to be relieved, that does not apply with equal, nay greater force, to the Quakers. I know no tenet of the Quakers which incapacitates them." Certainly not. And Mr Brougham, in the early part of the evening, answered this argument by anticipation. Mr H. Calvert, in a sort of preliminary discussion which took place upon a petition presented by the honourable and learned gentleman in favour of the proposed relief to the Jews, said, "I object to the measure, because it is partial and not general. The Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, will still be excluded; and that appears to me to be the height of injustice. It may be said that they do not petition; and that they are an unambitious people; but though this is true, it is no reason why parliament should not do them justice." Precisely so, replied Mr Brougham with admirable tact; "I entirely agree that it would be unjust to make a distinction between the Jews and the Quakers; but it is not by excluding the Jews, but by admitting the Quakers, that justice is to be done; and I marvel that the honourable member for Hertfordshire should be for taking up the question at the wrong end. If the honourable gentleman vote against the Jews now, on the same principle he ought to have voted twice over against the Dissenters and the Roman Catholics." You were in the House, Sir Robert, when these few pithy sentences were uttered, and yet you adopted, as your own, the specious argument they annihilated. Altogether this must have been a night of sore humiliation to you. It is impossible but that you felt your situation; and surely there were moments when, if you could have forgotten what you are, you might have fancied you were defending the Protestant Constitution of England as in days of yore; but one thought of those days was sufficient to make your tongue cleave to your mouth, and parch it like a dried potsherd. I pitied you, however, while Brougham was rending into shreds and ribbons your notable argument derived from the importance of adhering to the "ancient practice of the constitution," which admitted none but professing Christians into the legislature. His task was easy, I confess; for his strength lay in your weakness.

The Bull. By CHAPMAN and SHIRLEY, 1639.

It was well remarked by Canning, in one of his speeches against parliamentary reform, and in reference to some of the vulgar demagogues of the day, (Cobbett, Hunt, &c.) who looked to universal suffrage as the only passport they could ever hope to obtain into the House of Commons, that if they did find their way there, or if any other mob-orator, or brawling politician, the oracle of clubs and hustings, found his way there, one and all, they would soon reach their true level, and shrink to their proper dimensions. The justice of this opinion has been frequently verified. Burdett himself is a greater man at the Crown and Anchor, than on the Opposition benches; Hobhouse tells far more in Covent Garden, during an election, than he does in St Stephen's Chapel; and as to Waithman, poor body, he is the very Chatham of the Common Council, and the veriest unheeded chatterer of the House of Commons.

I doubt, however, if the contrast, in any of these, is so striking, so signal, and so complete, as it is in the person of the "great agitator," the redoubted Daniel O'Connell, liberator of Ireland, and Catholic member for the county of Clare. And the reason of the difference is obvious, partaking partly of national, partly of personal considerations. It would be ridiculous to compare O'Connell with either Grattan or Flood, both of whom sunk, in the English House of Commons, far below the standard at which they stood in the Irish one. The fact is, Irish oratory requires Irish auditors, Irish feelings, and Irish subjects, to produce its full effect. It is completely a home commodity, and fetches a good price in the home market; but being manufactured specially and exclusively for that market, the moment it is exported, it deteriorates in value. With regard to O'Connell, however, while I admit that some portion of the comparative insignificance into which he has fallen, may be ascribed to the same causes which dimmed the lustre of such men as Grattan and Flood under similar circumstances of transplantation, I am aware that by far the greater portion belongs to his own personal insufficiency. Those rodomontades—that superlative fustian—that brainless bombast and crazy eloquence, at which Englishmen only laugh as they read it, Englishmen would cry out upon with contempt and disgust, if it were attempted to make them listen to it. O'Connell has sense enough to know this, therefore he has not attempted it; and being nothing if he is not bombastical, having nothing in him but fustian, rodomontade, and crazy eloquence, he has consequently become nothing in Parliament. The success of his plans for obtaining Catholic Emancipation, has proved a complete act of political suicide. In Dublin, he had a voice more potent than the Duke's; in London, he is reduced to low (can he fall lower?) as to be taken under the protection of Joseph Hume, while he lay whinnying, like any lady's lap-dog, beneath the chastisement of Messrs North and Doherty. In vain he first tried to escape silently from his blustering accusations and pledges made in Ireland, touching the Borrisokane trials, and the Doneraile conspiracy. In vain he next sought to play the magnanimous hero, by generously offering to bury all past transactions in oblivion. "I came into this House," quoth he, "with no desire to recall them," (I give him full credit for speaking the truth here,) "but instead of having received any reciprocal feeling, I have been taunted and misrepresented both for my words and actions."*

"Yes," replied the Solicitor-General for Ireland, (Mr Doherty,) "I have at length driven you by my taunts, again and again repeated, to take something like a decided course. I have compelled you, for the first time, to take courage in this House."† But the enviable position in which the honourable member for Clare had placed himself, cannot be thoroughly appreciated, nor justice thoroughly done to Mr Doherty, without quoting a few passages from other parts of his speech on the night referred to.

"The honourable and learned gentleman," said he, "told us, that on no one evening—on no one moment, would he be absent from his place or from this House. But, sir, there was a very important evening on which he was not only not in his place, but not in this House; and this, sir, was the evening on which the honourable member for Mallow gave notice that he would move for certain papers respecting those persons who were tried for the Doneraile conspiracy. Now, sir, to all who have lived in Ireland, to all who have observed what has taken place there for many months past, it must have been a matter of notoriety, that this was a question to which the honourable and learned gentleman stood pledged; and it was an occasion on which I fully and anxiously expected to meet the learned gentleman face to face,—because he had made the strongest allegations against my personal character, and (highly as I do, and, I trust, ever shall, regard my personal character) because he had done that which affects me still more nearly—he had brought a charge against the pure administration of justice in Ireland. I looked for him, but he was not to be found!"—"I am not, sir, in the habit of entertaining suspicions respecting the conduct of honourable members of this House; but when I clearly observe a man meditating a retreat, and if he at the same time happen to be a lawyer, applying to his object all the cunning and dexterity supposed peculiar to his profession, I anxiously watch every stone he lays down to construct the bridge on which he intends to run away."—"The learned gentleman has declared he has two distinct charges to make against me. First, that I have wielded the powers of my office for the protection of the guilty. The next and deeper charge is, that I, in concert with others, as honourable and high-minded gentlemen as ever belonged to the legal profession, formed a league to pro- duce the conviction of innocent men, while even the conspirators were in possession of documents to prove the paying of the witnesses we had to bring forward on the part of the crown. These are the charges; and I admit the facts on which the honourable and learned gentleman founds his allegations. I will not trouble him about documents; and more, I would suffer him, unanswered and unheeded, to make any assertions respecting me he pleases, if my own character alone were implicated. I would not trouble the House with any defence; for there is something here that tells me there is not a second gentleman present who would believe it possible that I could be guilty of the conduct attributed to me by the honourable and learned gentleman.—(Loud and long-continued cheering.)—He has unsparingly brought charges against me in taverns—in the streets—before the rabble—(Loud cheers)—before those amongst whom I go, not as a volunteer, but as the delegate of the Lord Lieutenant, with important and sacred duties to perform, which, I trust, I do perform, faithfully, fearlessly, and, notwithstanding the assertion of the learned gentleman, mercifully.—(Continued cheers.)—I trust, that whenever the learned gentleman shall find courage to bring forward his motion, I shall be able to prove the utter falsehood of his daily and ordinary slanders.”

How Mr O'Connell made good his allegations against the Solicitor-General—how he redeemed his tavern-made pledges, when face to face with the man he so grossly accused in his absence—how the whole affair dwindled down into a tame and spiritless attack upon the constabulary force, and upon the system under which the alleged misconduct had been committed—how, in fact, the swaggering denunciations which rolled from his lips in Ireland, “like a rattling peal of thunder,” died upon his tongue in England like a lover's whisper, a soft murmuring complaint, meek and gentle as the voice of cooing doves—are abundantly known to all who have heard, and to all who have read, the debate of the following evening (May 12.) But before I notice that debate, let me advert to one part of Mr O'Connell's reply this evening, in answer to the manly and indignant scorn of the individual he had assailed. “I will not be deterred from doing my duty fearlessly by any man, however he may be supported. In saying ‘fearlessly,’ I allude not to that species of courage which is recognised in a court of honour, and of which I know nothing. There is blood upon this hand—I regret it deeply—and he knows it. He knows that I have a vow in Heaven, else he would not have ventured to address me in such language, or to presume that his insolence should go unpunished. He knows it—and there is not one man in the circle of our acquaintance but knows it also; and knows, at the same time, that, but for that vow, he dared not address me as he has done.”

This mixture of balderdash and swagger was received by the House with ridicule and disgust; and it deserved to be so received, for it was, in effect, imputing rank cowardice to Mr Doherty, by asserting that he had assumed a tone towards him, Mr O'Connell, which he would not have dared to do, except that he knew Mr O'Connell does not fight; a tone which, of course, he would not assume towards any other member of the House who does fight. Now, I am far from wishing to question the personal courage of the hon. member for Clare; I will not cast the shadow of a doubt upon the sincerity of his regret, that his hands are stained with the blood of a fellow-creature; every man must recall with horror such a calamity, even under the most aggravated circumstances in which satisfaction is sought or given for an injury, and infinitely more so, where some frivolous altercation may have led to the catastrophe. I do not condemn his Heaven-registered vow never again to engage in the strife of blood. All these things are matters of personal feeling and supposed moral duty, which concern Mr O'Connell himself, and no one else. But this I must be allowed to say, that a man who, by a voluntary act of his own, puts himself out of the condition of responsibility for his words and actions, other than by an appeal such as he knows will not, and sometimes cannot, be made—(I allude to an appeal before a legal tribunal)—who intrenches himself behind a

"vow in Heaven," while he proclaims on earth that he abjures a practice which all other men, moving in a certain sphere of society, recognise—I do say, that a person so circumstanced, and by his own free choice, not by any necessity which he deplures he cannot overrule, would, were all his feelings of the right kind, abstain, with singular delicacy and caution, from word or deed which involved consequences he knew he was not prepared to meet. He would do this, no less from a general sense of propriety and of justice towards individuals, than from a natural repugnance to incur the suspicion that he was playing the secure game of a privileged bully. In ordinary life, a man who wears a rancorous heart, and carries a foul tongue, with a craven spirit, is apt to be upon familiar terms with canes, horsewhips, and neat's leather. Mr O'Connell stands absolved from the last, not altogether so as to the other two; but his "vow in Heaven" shuts out from redress those he wrongs or insults, as effectually as a white feather would; and, therefore—but, as Hamlet says, "give every man his deserts, and who among us shall escape whipping?"—much less—Order! order! Chair! chair!

The honourable member for Clare is not a fool; consequently, he may derive a useful lesson from the memorable castigation of Mr Doherty and Mr North; for it is only "your dull ass that will not mend his pace with beating." But poor Mr Hume! I never saw the worthy calculator so irate. He "fretted like gummed velvet;" and I was really apprehensive, when he first rose, that he intended to strip and challenge both the Solicitor-General and his learned friend to a bout at fisticuffs, upon the school-boy principle of one down, and the other come on. No turkey-cock, disputing the gate of a farm-yard, ever looked so red in the gills. And then, like Audrey, who thanked "the gods she was not poetical," he thanked God he "was not a learned gentleman;" thinking, I suppose, with Mr Dogberry, "to be well favoured is the gift of fortune, but that to read and write comes by nature."—"I am surprised," said Mr Hume, "that the pompous and almost insolent speech of the honourable member who has just sitten down (Mr North) should have been received with cheers by the ministers. The honourable and learned member has applied strong epithets to the honourable member for Clare. What matters it whether the honourable member is a big lion, a puny dog, or any other four-footed animal?—(Immense laughter.)—I hope the honourable member for Clare will not shape his conduct by the advice of the "honourable and learned member, although he swells like the bull and the frog, bursting with self-importance.—(The roars of laughter might have been heard at Charing Cross.)—What a man to read a lecture! It was like the mewling of a kitten. The honourable member for Clare has not lost his teeth; he can bite still; and when the time comes, I will halloo him on," and so forth, down to his concluding boast, that his "honourable and learned friend had no occasion to be afraid of those two honourable and learned gentlemen; no, nor of ten like them." But the most edifying part of the honourable member's speech was that wherein he came to Mr O'Connell's assistance, to help him out of the dilemma of holding a different language on different sides of the channel. Mr Doherty, in reference to this, had said, "I did expect (in conformity with the custom recognised among gentlemen, that what a man says in one place, he is ready to say in another) that the honourable gentleman would have taken the first opportunity 'in this House, either of denying those words and disclaiming them, or of repeating in this House his objections to the SCOUNDREL ARISTOCRACY, the authors of the subtlety art, and boldly call upon the people to stand forward in their own defence.'" Mr Hume justified the conduct of Mr O'Connell by a felicitous illustration borrowed from himself. "Is it to be supposed," said he, "that because I am a member of Parliament, and choose to go to the Crown and Anchor tavern, and make observations there upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or it may be upon his Majesty's Attorney-General—is it to be supposed, I say, that I am compelled to repeat the same observations here? I say, that if I make use of observations out of doors, let them call me to account for them." (Mr Hume has no vow in heaven.) "I admit that I say many things in this House which I should be afraid to say out of this House, knowing that there is such a thing in existence as an Attorney-General, and that it is possible for him to find pliant juries. I may be taunted with cowardice, as I have been already, for this declaration. But my doctrine is, that in these cases discretion is the better part of valour; and then, how foolish should I look, if I were to find myself laid by the heels in Newgate, owing to the interposition of the Attorney-General!" It is impossible for me to say what difference being in Newgate might make in the foolish appearance of the honourable member; but I should not think it could be much—certainly not so much as he himself seems to imagine. I should like to hear Mr O'Connell's opinion upon this point, and whether he feels himself fortified in his own practice by the knowledge he now has of the doctrines of the honourable member for Montrose.

FATIGUING DEBATES.

We have had the usual annual complaints during the last month, of the great arrears of public business, and of the extreme difficulty—not to say impossibility—of getting through all that ought to be got through. Mr Hume complains* that he was sometimes kept out of bed twenty-one hours at a stretch; and therefore, he proposed Parliament should meet in November, that they might have the full benefit of the long nights. Mr Huskisson suggested that honourable members should not make speeches upon presenting petitions, but reserve their eloquence for the discussion of the several measures to which they respectively referred. Sir Robert Peel admitted the increasing difficulty of getting through the public business, and thought, if the House sat the whole year round, they would still be short of time, unless they devoted more hours than merely from seven to twelve each evening to the dispatch of public business. Now, it is quite certain, that not only Sir Robert himself and his right honourable friend, but Mr Hume, and every member then present, knew the evil lay in the scarcity of SILENT MEMBERS. There are not more than twelve good speakers in the whole House of Commons, and not one orator in the whole twelve. I will not name the twelve, for it would be invidious; so every man is at liberty to put himself down upon the list. But though there are only twelve good speakers, there are four hundred talkers—four hundred members who, one night with another, let off a speech, varying in duration from five minutes to half an hour. If these four hundred talkers could be induced to become listeners, and to content themselves merely with honestly voting; and if the dozen good speakers would resolve to say nothing more than was absolutely necessary upon a subject, public business would be got through easily enough; members would get to their beds in good time, to the infinite comfort of their wives and families, and the saving of their own health; and five months out of the seven would be abundantly sufficient for all purposes of public good. How much unnecessary talking there is may be guessed at by the following calculation. It has been computed, and pretty accurately, from the full notes of a short-hand writer, that a man speaking, not rapidly, but fluently, speaks from five to six columns of a newspaper in an hour. When, therefore, the House sits from four o'clock in the afternoon till three the next morning, or eleven hours, it speaks above sixty columns, or more than five whole newspapers of twenty columns each! Only imagine Mr Hume, for example, speaking three hours, or talking a Morning-Chronicle-ful in one speech! The papers, however, rarely give more than twelve columns to the debate, or one-fifth of what is said; and I put it to any one who has read twelve columns of a debate, whether he could not have spared one-half of that quantity even, and been the wiser with the other half? No, no, it is in the immoderate prating, the eternal talking of small thinkers, and not the meeting of Parliament in February instead of November, that makes the session too short for the business that has to be done, and of necessity occasional either its total omission, or what is worse for the country, its crude, hurried, and indigested performance. The parent of this evil, as I formerly mentioned, is the practice of reporting the debates. I have myself heard members congratulating themselves that the Chronicle, or Times, or Morning Post, had given them one, two, or three columns, as the case might be, with as keen a satisfaction as if they were paid so much a-line for their speeches. I remember a conversation I once had with the late Brinsley Sheridan upon this subject. "Sir," said he, "I'll give you an instance of the influence which reporting our debates has upon the length of them. In the early part of the Regency, a notice of motion was given," (I think he said by Mr Stuart Wortley,) "respecting the then Princess of Wales. The evening came. The House was crowded, even to the side galleries, and below the bar. We had all ordered our carriages and servants at one o'clock in the morning, expecting a long, animated, and important debate. Before the motion came on, however, some member on the ministerial side moved the standing order for the exclusion of strangers. What was the consequence? We had nobody but ourselves to talk to; and we soon grew tired of that. The debate was all over, and the house adjourned, by eight o'clock; and I recollect I was in time, after it, for half-price at Drury Lane theatre."

SENSITIVE PRIVY COUNCILLORS.

In one of my silent speeches, (on the 12th of February,) I observed, that "the most edifying alacrity is always displayed in paring down a salary of £500 a-year; but one of £5000 a-year, the lean hand of economy approaches not." Sir James Graham has since endeavoured to abolish this distinction, by his motion for "an account of all salaries, profits, pay, fees, and emoluments, whether civil or military, from the 6th January, 1829, to the 5th January, 1830, held and enjoyed by each of the members of his Majesty's most honourable privy council, specifying with each name, the total amount received by each individual, and distinguishing the various services from which the same is derived." In support of this motion, the honourable baronet adduced some striking proofs, not merely of the justice and decency of retrenchment in the present state of the country, but of the mockery, as well as injustice and cruelty, of making that little less, which the subaltern officers of government, the working bees of the hive, get for their labour. Nor is this all. Why make, or attempt to make, the small fry of pensioners and sinecurists give back their hundreds, when the leviathans are not made to disgorge their thousands? A clerk of the customs, for example, is superannuated upon £750 for important services; but though superannuated for the customs, though too old and feeble for his duty there, he is brisk and vigorous enough to be an agent for Ceylon, at a salary of £1200 a-year. This is bad. Granted. But it is worse to see Lord Cathcart holding a pension of £2000 a-year, together with the sinecure of vice-admiral of Scotland, worth from two to three thousand a-year, besides all his military allowances as a general officer, and colonel of a regiment. There are other minor cases equally bad; but while they are countenanced by those which are much worse, it would be paltry to single out the merely bad for reform. The first Lord of the Admiralty, for instance, has £5000 a-year, (a salary augmented during the war prices,) besides holding a sinecure of £3150 a-year in Scotland, (keeper of the Privy Seal,) while, by order of the Lords of the Admiralty, every unhappy half-pay lieutenant and subaltern officer, who goes to receive his pay, is enjoined to take the following oath: "I do solemnly swear, that I am not in holy orders—that I have not had, from (blank day) to (blank day) any employment, civil or military, under his Majesty, or the colonies, or any place beyond seas, or any other government," &c. So, in the military service: His Grace of Wellington, Sir George Murray, Sir Henry Hardinge, &c. receive all their military allowances in conjunction with their civil salaries; but a half-pay captain or lieutenant dare not draw the wages of one of the messengers of the Treasury, without first relinquishing his pittance of half-pay. These comparisons are made from no invidious motives. When the country was rich, and could afford to fill the pockets of sinecurists, placemen, and pluralists, without draining its own, it did so without a grumble. But pinching times have come; and thousands and tens of thousands of honest industrious persons, who could spend their guinea at the period described, are now fain to turn a shilling six times over before they part with it. Retrenchment, therefore, has become less a decorous duty than an imperious necessity; and in the temper which this necessity has engendered, it will not do to knock down a few thieving magpies, and leave soaring birds of prey upon the wing. Ministers, however reluctantly, will find that they must reduce not only their own salaries, but the salaries and emoluments of their followers, dependents, and relatives; they must do this, I contend, even were the necessities of the country less grinding than they are, for the measure of last session has made reformers in Parliament of men who were their firmest supporters, while the state of the nation has made reformers out of it, of those who heretofore have been contented with things as they were. Thus, the spirit of reform, engendered by distress, and the votes for reform created by disgust and disappointment, will do the work of economy; and when once the ponderous machine is fairly in motion, it will not stop—they who put it in motion will not have power to stop it—at the point which shall only strip fat sinecurists, rapacious pluralists, and over-gorged placemen, of their superfluities. In the main, some good will be done; and thus it is that short-sighted men become unconscious instruments of good in the pursuit of their own selfish and dishonest purposes.

I suppose it would be as easy to persuade the Lord Chancellor to take his seat upon the woosack in leather breeches, top boots, and spurs, carrying his wig under his arm; or the Speaker of the House of Commons to light a cigar after he had counted the House at four o'clock, as to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do any thing for which he could not find a precedent; while, on the other hand, there seems to be nothing he would not do, provided the same thing, or something like it, has been already done. Shew him a precedent, and you shew him a reason, before which he bows in reverential submission. "God's precious!" exclaims an old fellow in one of our ancient dramas, to one who had called him a dotard; "God's precious! call me a dotard!"—"I have cause, just cause, to call thee dotard, have I not?" he replies.—"Nay," rejoins the first, "that's another matter—have you cause? Then God forbid that I should take exceptions to be called dotard of one that hath cause." This is the reasoning of Mr Goulburn as to precedents. "Have I not a precedent?"—"Nay," replies the right honourable gentleman, "that's another matter—God forbid I should take exception to any thing that hath a precedent." The honourable Baronet communicated to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the motion he was about to make, and asked him if he had any objection to it. "I told him that I knew no precedent in which the members of the Privy Council as such, had ever been called upon for an account of their emoluments." And again: "To bring forward a motion for the emoluments of the members of the Privy Council was not, as it appeared to me, treating with sufficient respect a body composing the council of the Sovereign, and a high judicial court—it was treating them in an individual point of view, and it was not advisable to depart from precedent, and establish the principle that classes of men were to be held up to obloquy, not because of the situations they held, but because they enjoyed a high dignity at the same time." His horror of unprecedented motions is ludicrous enough; but, surely, the climax of his absurdity this evening was the tone he assumed as to the invidious and personal nature of such enquiries as that proposed by the honourable Baronet, and the tendency they had to hold up to obloquy whole classes of dignified persons. Wherein consists the obloquy, wherein the invidious and personal character of the enquiry, I know not; except, indeed, that it may be called personal to seek the names of persons, respecting whom we are desirous of obtaining specific facts or information. Beyond that, (but though I do not suspect the right honourable gentleman of quibbling or punning upon the word,) it is no more personal, in any offensive sense of the term, to investigate what Privy Councillors receive out of the public purse, than to examine, as is constantly done, how the Sovereign himself spends the money which is voted for the Civil List.

I am no admirer of this squeamish delicacy about confessing the receipt of money, when there is none as to the receiving of it. If men be not ashamed, nor have cause to be ashamed, of what they do, or have done, they will not shrink from the mention of it. A derives L.5000 a-year from the national purse in the shape of a sinecure or a pension, and A knows he has rendered the nation services which that sum does not overpay. He has no personal feelings to be wounded, nor will he regard it as invidious scrutiny, if they who pay the L.5000 ask to know his services. The more just his claim, the more unimpeachable his merits, the prouder will be his position, the more triumphantly will he come out of the enquiry. It can only be when enquiry would disclose insufficient claims, or establish the fact of no claims, that it will be resented as an invidious encroachment on personal feelings, and that offensive motives come into consideration. But it is holding up the Members of the Privy Council to obloquy! How? To enquire what they receive, with a view to ascertain whether they ought to receive it? If this involve any obloquy upon the parties concerned, it can be in no other way than as the consequence of dragging to light large and unmerited emoluments; and such obloquy an honest House of Commons should always be prepared to heap upon those who deserve it. It comes, in short, to this, whether they whose pockets are dipped into for the money, are to ask whether their pockets cannot be spared? As to the bastard delicacy, the spurious sense of honour, which only kicks at giving a reason for receiving thousands, but never falters at receiving them, I should be as little inclined to treat it with respect, as I should the delicacy of an Old Bailey witness, who considered it personal and invidious to have the truth twisted out of him. Give me the delicacy and honour which will not touch the gold that has not been fairly and honourably earned. Look, for example, to Sir G. Cockburn's speech. If every member of the Privy Council, in his own person, or by deputy, could stand up in the House of Commons, and give the same account of his emoluments, the country would be satisfied, poor and beggared as it is. "Let every member of the Privy Council," observed Mr Huskisson, "shew that he has earned his emoluments as deservedly as my honourable and gallant friend has, and depend upon it there will be no dissatisfaction created by the production of the original return." Not only would the country be satisfied, but the House would redeem its character, and the individuals themselves, instead of branding the enquiry as invidious and personal, must be grateful to the honourable Baronet for the opportunity he had afforded them of proving that they deserved what they received. The gallant Admiral's speech was a modest, manly, and unanswerable statement; such a one as might have made the waspish lord who provoked it (Lord Milton) ashamed of his coarseness, and the honourable Baronet, who brought forward the motion, regret the allusion he had made to his case.

A REAL VISION.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

'Tis strange that people now-a-days persist
 In bringing up their offspring mere machines;
 Pruned vegetables—flowers of formal cut;
 A class of nature wholly by itself;
 And not as relatives of heaven and hell,
 And all the mighty energies between,
 A link of God's interminable chain
 Connecting all existence.—“Please you, sir,
 Talk not of spirits here—It is our rule
 That neither ghost nor fairy, goblin stern,
 Portentous light, wraith, death-watch, warning voice,
 Or aught impalpable to human sense,
 Shall to our family ever once be named.”

Good people! some enthusiasts would despise,
 But I sincerely pity you! This mode
 May make them gentle, elegant, nay, good,
 (As Brannah makes his pens with a machine,) good,
 But never great.—Lord, what is man, whom thou
 Mad'st next unto the angels, thus instructed,
 Thus qualified? A Cockney—a mere grub!
 O, I would teach their little hearts to quake,
 And harrow up their energies of soul
 Proportionate to their allied compeers,
 And sphere of action! I would have them claim
 Connexion with the worm, the bat, the mole,
 The hedgehog's tottering brood, all helpless things,
 To twang the chords of pity on the heart.

Then, as a shred of elemental life,
 Point them the ery o'er the dizzy cliff
 With eaglets young to count their brotherhood;
 Then would I tell them of the fallen fiends
 That claim'd their fellowship. The path that led Where they with angels might communicate,
 Holding high intercourse with God himself
 Through all of his creation.—But enough.
 Thus was I rear'd, and glory in the rule;
 And had I not, the scene I here describe
 Had ne'er been witness'd, or reveal'd to you.

Some forty years ago, and haply more,
 One memorable dark autumnal day
 I lay upon a mountain, on the brink
 Of that unmoulded hideous precipice
 That walls the western side of dark Loch Skene.
 The wild was calm as death, and o'er it hung
 A lurid curtain of portentous hue,
 Dreadful to look upon. There was no mist,
 Yet every mountain that uprear'd its head
 Abrupt and sheer around that dreary scene,
 Seem'd at a weary distance, hardly seen.
 The tremulous bleat that casually was heard,
 Startled the ear as something in the air,
 It was so nigh, while yet the steep from whence
 The voice proceeded seem'd so far away.

I look'd up to the heavens—all was dark,
 A murky blue; with deathlike masses speck'd,
 That crept athwart its face like shrouded ghosts,

Or demons crawling from the wrath behind.
 I look'd down to the lake for some reprieve
 Of dread, but there the scene was darker still,
 And phantoms journey'd on a heaven below.
 Nature seem'd in her travail-throes, about
 Some elemental monster to produce,
 That might set all her energies on flame,
 And ruling principles at roaring war.

A poor secluded and bewilderd boy,
 Alone amid this dismal scene I kneel'd,
 Leaning my brow against the crested rock
 That frown'd far o'er my head, and gave myself
 To my great Maker's charge in simple guise;
 But O how fervent! I remember well!
 Could I but feel such holy ardour now!

My heart was strengthen'd, and I felt myself
 Above the terrors of the rolling storm,
 The bursting thunder, or the sheeted flame;
 An energy above the flocks, the ravens,
 The foxes, and the eagle's haughty brood,
 The only tenants of that land sublime.

But all at once my faithful dog began,
 With short and fitful growl, to manifest
 Strange terror. The old raven sped away,
 And left her young. The eagle took the cloud,
 And yell'd her terror at the gates of heaven.

From these foreboding omens, well I knew
 Some beings of the spiritual world
 Were nigh at hand. I cast my eyes around,
 And straight below my feet, on a green shelf
 Between me and the dark blue lake, I saw
 A female form rise slowly from the earth.
 It was a mist—a vapour—a pale shred;
 I wot not how composed, but yet it bore
 Resemblance all complete to one I knew.
 There was no feature wanting—not a line
 Of that mild countenance. No attitude
 Was lacking of the venerable form
 It represented. With a solemn look
 And supplicating earnestness, it stretch'd
 Its hands tow'rd me. Then I remember'd well
 Of that same attitude when late she press'd
 A solemn task on me, which I refused,
 Though urged to it with tears. My very soul
 Thrill'd at the strange appeal in such a scene.

Yet it was something. The Almighty knows
 Of what it was composed, for I know not;
 But the dumb creatures saw it with dismay.
 Two lambs were near it, nigher far than I.
 I saw them gaze at it, and still their looks
 Grew more and more intense; and then they turn'd
 Their innocent and stupid faces round,
 And, staring at each other, tried to read
 The sentiments of fear 'gendering within,
 Then stretch'd their sapient noses to discern
 If savour of humanity was there,
 Tramp'd with the foot, and whistled through the nose,
 Then fled with hesitating starts away.

But, what alarm'd me most, my faithful dog
 Lay in extremity, with closed eyes,
 And trembling every limb. Sometimes he oped

A dull and drumly eye towards the wraith,
But shut it close again and inly groan'd.

The spectre stretch'd itself upon the sward,
And roll'd and writhed as if in agony,
Then turn'd its face to me; and then I knew
That my beloved and venerable friend
Was in the throes of death. I saw the grasp Convulsive at the sward—the hand outstretch'd
For the last kindly pressure—the glazed eye—
The parched lip—the long remitted throbs—
And the last gasp, the last but vain endeavour
The lingering, longing spirit to retain!

I saw some forms around the couch of death,
To me well known, though indistinctly seen;
But at that moment a celestial ray,
Like sunbeam from an opening of the cloud,
Beam'd on the vision, melting it away,—
Then all grew dark and gloomy as before.

But she was gone! my faithful mistress
Departed then unto a better world.
Yet have I e'er forgot her? E'er forgot
That last behest, so often urged before?
No! When I do—no curses will I crave
On my own head. But had I not resolved
That last behest to cherish in my heart,
And kept that resolution—God of life!
What had I been ere now? A thing of scorn—
A blot on nature's cheek—a being lost—
Whom shepherds long with pity would have named,
To all the injurious world beside unknown.

AT TRIVE LAKE.

DAVEY JONES AND THE YANKEE PRIVATEER.*

WE had refitted, and been four days at sea, on our voyage to Jamaica, when the gun-room officers gave our mess a blowout.

The increased motion and rushing of the vessel through the water, the groaning of the masts, the howling of the rising gale, and the frequent trampling of the watch on deck, were prophetic of wet jackets to some of us; still, midshipmanlike, we were as happy as a good dinner and some wine could make us, until the old gunner shoved his weatherbeaten phiz and bald pate in at the door.
"Beg pardon, Mr Splinter, but if you will spare Mr Cringle on the forecastle for an hour until the moon rises,"—"Spare," quotha, "is his majesty's officer a joint stool?"—"Why,
Mr Kennedy, why? here, man, take a glass of grog."—"I thank you, sir. It is coming on a roughish night, sir; the running ships should be crossing us hereabouts; indeed more than once I thought there was a strange sail close aboard of us, the scud is flying so low, and in such white flakes; and none of us have an eye like Mr Cringle, unless it be John Crow, and he is all but frozen."

—"Well, Tom, I suppose you will go"—Anglice, from a first lieutenant to a mid—"Brush instanter."

Having changed my uniform, for shag-trowers, pea-jacket, and southwest cap, I went forward, and took my station, in no pleasant humour, on the stowed jib, with my arm round the stay. I had been half an hour there, the weather was getting worse, the rain was beating in my face, and the spray from the stern was flashing over me, as it roared through the waste of sparkling and hissing waters. I turned my back to the werther for a moment, to press my hand on my strained eyes. When I opened them, I saw the gunner's gaunt high-featured visage thrust anxiously forward; his profile looked as if rubbed over with phosphorus, and his whole person as if we had been playing at snap dragon. "What has come over you, Mr Kennedy?—who is burning the bluelight now?"—"A wiser man than I am must tell you that; look forward, Mr Cringle—look there; what do your books say to that?"

I looked forth, and saw, at the extreme end of the jib-boom, what I had read of, certainly, but never expected to see, a pale, greenish, glow-worm coloured flame, of the size and shape of the frosted glass shade over the swinging lamp in the gun-room. It drew out and flattened as the vessel pitched and rose again, and as she sheered about it, wavered round the point that seemed to attract it, like a soapsud bubble blown from a tobacco pipe, before it is shaken into the air; at the core it was comparatively bright, but faded into a halo. It shed a baleful and ominous light on the surrounding objects; the group of sailors on the forecastle looked like spectres, and they shrunk together, and whispered when it began to roll slowly along the spar towards where the boat-swain was sitting at my feet. At this instant something slid down the stay, and a cold clammy hand passed round my neck. I was within an ace of losing my hold, and tumbling overboard. "Heaven have mercy on me, what's that?"—"It's that skylarking son of a gun, Jem Sparkle's monkey, sir. You, Jem, you'll never rest till that brute is made shark bait of."* But Jackoo vanished up the stay again, chuckling and grinning in the ghostly radiance, as if he had been the "Spirit of the Lamp." The light was still there, but a cloud of mist, like a burst of vapour from a steam boiler, came down upon the gale, and flew past, when it disappeared. I followed the white mass as it sailed down the wind; it did not, as it appeared to me, vanish in the darkness, but seemed to remain in sight to leeward, as if checked by a sudden flaw; yet none of our sails were taken aback. A thought flashed on me. I peered still more intensely into the night. I was now certain. "A sail, broad on the lee-bow." The ship was in a buz in a moment. The captain answered from the quarter-deck—"Thank you, Mr Cringle. How shall we steer?"—"Keep her away a couple of points, ~~ste~~ steady."—"Steady," sung the man at the helm; and a slow melancholy cadence, although a familiar sound to me, now moaned through the rushing of the wind, and smote upon my heart as if it had been the wailing of a spirit. I turned to the boat-swain, who was now standing beside me—"Is that you or Davy steering, Mr Nipper? if you had not been there bodily at my elbow, I could have sworn that was your voice." When the gunner made the same remark it startled the poor fellow; he tried to take it as a joke, but could not. "There may be a laced hammock with a shot in it, for some of us ere morning."

At this moment, to my dismay, the object we were chasing, shortened,—gradually fell abeam of us, and finally disappeared. "The Flying Dutchman."—"I can't see her at all now."—"She will be a fore-and-aft-rigged vessel that has tacked, sir." And sure enough, after a few seconds, I saw the white object lengthen, and draw out again abaft our beam. "The chase has tacked, sir, put the helm down, or she will go to windward of us." We tacked also, and time it was we did so, for the rising moon now showed us a large schooner under a crowd of sail. We edged down on her, when finding her manœuvre detected, she brailled up her flat sails, and bore up before the wind. This was our best point of sailing, and we cracked on, the captain rubbing his hands—"It's my turn to be the big un this time." Although blowing a strong north-wester, it was now clear moonlight, and we hammered away from our bow guns, but whenever a shot told amongst the rigging, the injury was repaired as if by magic. It was evident we had repeatedly hulled her, from the glimmering white streaks along her counter and across her stern, occasioned by the splintering of the timber, but it seemed to produce no effect.

At length we drew well up on her quarter. She continued all black hull and white sail, not a soul to be seen on deck, except a dark object, which we took for the man at the helm. "What schooner's that?" No answer. "Heave to, or I'll sink you." Still all silent. "Sergeant Armstrong, do you think you could pick off that chap at the wheel?" The marine jumped on the fore-castle, and levelled his piece, when a musket-shot from the schooner crashed through his skull, and he fell dead. The old skipper's blood was up. "Forecastle there! Mr Nipper, clap a canister of grape over the round shot, into the boat gun, and give it to him."—"Aye, aye, sir!" gleefully rejoined the boatswain, forgetting the augury and every thing else in the excitement of the moment. In a twinkling, the square foresail—topgallant—royal—and studding-sail haulyards were let go by the run on board of the schooner, as if they had been shot away, and he put his helm hard apart as if to round to. "Rake him, sir, or give him the stern. He has not surrendered.—I know their game. Give him your broadside, sir, or he is off to windward of you like a shot. No, no, we have him now; heave to, Mr Splinter, heave to!" We did so, and that so suddenly, that the studding-sail booms snapped like pipe shanks, short off by the irons. Notwithstanding we had shot two hundred yards to the leeward before we could lay our maintop-sail to the mast. I ran to windward. The schooner's yards and rigging were now black with men, clustered like bees swarming, her square sails were being close furled, her fore and aft sails set, and away she was dead to windward of us. "So much for undervaluing our American friends," grumbled Mr Splinter.

We made all sail in chase, blazing away to little purpose; we had no chance on a bowline, and when our "Amigo" had satisfied himself of his superiority by one or two short tacks, he deliberately took a reef in his mainsail, hauled down his flying jib and gaff topsail, triced up the bunt of his foresail, and fired his long thirty-two at us. The shot came in at the third aftermost port on the starboard side, and dismounted the carronade, smashing the slide, and wounding three men. The second shot missed, and as it was madness to remain to be peppered, probably winged, whilst every one of ours fell short, we reluctantly kept away on our course, having the gratification of hearing a clear well-blown bugle on board the schooner play up "Yankee Doodle." As the brig fell off, our long gun was run out to have a parting crack at her, when the third and last shot from the schooner struck the sill of the midship port, and made the white splinters fly from the solid oak like bright silver sparks in the moonlight. A sharp piercing cry rose into the air—my soul identified that death-shriek with the voice that I had heard, and I saw the man who was standing with the lanyard of the lock in his hand drop heavily across the breech, and discharge the gun in his fall. Thereupon a blood-red glare shot up into the cold blue sky, as if a volcano had burst forth from beneath the mighty deep, followed by a roar, and a shattering crash, and a mingling of unearthly cries and groans, and a concussion of the air, and of the water, as if our whole broadside had been fired at once. Then a solitary splash here, and a dip there, and short sharp yells, and low choking bubbling moans, as the hissing fragments of the noble vessel we had seen fell into the sea, and the last of her gallant crew vanished for ever beneath that pale broad moon. We were alone, and once more all was dark, and wild, and stormy. Fearfully had that ball sped, fired by a dead man's hand. But what is it that clings black and doubled across that fatal cannon, dripping and heavy, and choking the scuppers with clotting gore, and swaying to and fro with the motion of the vessel, like a bloody fleece? "Who is it that was hit at the gun there?"—"Mr Nipper, the boatswain, sir. The last shot has cut him in two."

A STORY OF THE VALLEY OF GLEN CRUAGH.

ALTHOUGH there is no part of Ireland better known to the world, in general, than the county of Wicklow, and none so celebrated for the scenes of exquisite beauty which its mountains, lakes, and sea views, present to the eye, yet there are many quiet, delicious spots, far away among the hills, at a great distance from any public road, which escape the observation of the ordinary traveller; but which, when they are discovered, appear the lovelier from their seclusion, like some virtue suddenly found out, where modesty has long concealed it.

Amongst all of those with which I was acquainted, the little glen, which I shall call Glen Cruagh, appeared to me to be the most beautiful. At this point, several ranges of lofty hills have taken their commencement, or fixed their termination, and the openings afford long views of the sides of the mountains, as they are called, in some places covered with thick wood almost to the summit, and in others affording nothing but the stern and bare magnificence of stone and stunted heath. The effect which these different openings have upon the light, as the sun proceeds in its course, gives a continual variety to the appearance of this glen; yet the hills are so happily situated for its comfort, that they shield it from the most violent effects of the winter storms; and in no place do the flowers bloom earlier, or longer cover the earth with their simple and unspeakable beauty. There are not many inhabitants in this delightful place. About twelve years ago, there were not more than ten or a dozen cottages, belonging to poor people, built near the edge of a rapid, noisy stream, which dashed along through huge lumps of water-worn granite, overhung at the edges by bramble bushes, which marked its course till it disappeared in one of the mountain gorges, similar to that from which it emerged on the other side of the glen. These cottages were occupied by peasants who had small patches of land at the foot of the hills, with the liberty of pasture up to the summit; a liberty from which their luckless cattle derived little more than the exercise of free will in the matter of locomotion, and that degree of health which arises from exceedingly spare diet. At the other end of the glen were two houses of a different description. One was a large, substantial, well-built mansion, the residence of Colonel B——, the great man of the district; it was surrounded by a small, but well-kept demesne; it had gardens and pleasure grounds also, which were kept in good order; and the mountain, which rose high and abruptly at the back of the house, was clothed with young thick wood to a very considerable distance. The luxuriance of the young trees in such a lofty situation, and with so little soil, was surprising; at an altitude where the climber would scarcely find a particle of clay, such as would seem to be necessary to nourish a tree, were masses of branches and green foliage, out of which grey stony pinnacles shot up, as if determined to shew their rugged supremacy over the cultivation which the hand of man had carried into their lofty neighbourhood. Colonel B——, the owner of this place, and of many hundred adjoining acres, was a powerful and wicked man, feared for his power, and hated for his wickedness, by all the neighbourhood, over which he had in his power to exercise an authority, which none but those who know what the squire of a country district in Ireland, who was a county magistrate besides, might venture to do with impunity, can well imagine. He was esteemed very rich, and he was of the middle age, and a bachelor, but enjoyed the imputed paternity of a family which grew up without ostensibly lawful reason, in the lodge at his gate. Though ostentatiously dissolute in his morals, and, for the most part, coarsely tyrannical in his manners, yet there was a carefulness about him in many respects, and an energy in pushing any thing which he took in hand to its final accomplishment, that gained him considerable respect, mingled with the fear which the common people felt for him, while the ability which he posessed to assume polite, and even very agreeable manners, when it suited his purpose to do so, caused him to be well received amongst such of the gentry of the county as he had occasion to meet. In the glen, his power was absolute, his word was law, except over one man, who occupied a small, but beautifully neat dwelling, not more than a hundred yards from his gate. I have seen prettier things of the kind in England, but in Ireland I have never seen any thing to compare, for neat and comfortable beauty, with the cottage of Captain M—; for that title was still given him by all the neighbourhood, though he had no right to it, as he used to assure the poor people, who loved to do him honour by frequently repeating the military title which once belonged to him.

Mr M— had once been a captain in the regiment of militia which Colonel B— commanded; his family had, but a few generations previously, been more respectable than the Colonel's, but had fallen away in worldly wealth and importance, as that of his superior officer advanced; and as misfortune seems ever to travel swifter than its opposite, Mr M— found himself, on coming of age, with very slender means indeed, and with scarcely a relative left in the county to whose assistance he could put forward the claim of family kindred. His guardian had, however, taken care—if that be indeed judicious care, which bestows learning and accomplishments on poverty—to give him an excellent education; and, as in common with most men of an elevated and imaginative turn of mind, the young gentleman delighted in the country, and was unwilling to leave the land of the "lake and mountain," for city occupations which would have been more hopeful of gain, he engaged in agricultural pursuits on a small scale, by which, for a few years, he provided himself with an occupation, and a sufficient addition to his income, to satisfy one whose worldly ambition was by no means inordinate. The beginning of the Irish rebellion broke up his peaceful life—the emissaries of sedition found their way over among the peaceful hills—the peasantry grew intractable and insolent, and refused to perform their ordinary works, and, ere long, abandoned every thing for murder and spoliation, in the wild pursuit of they knew not what. A commission in the militia was offered to Mr M—, which he accepted, partly from a sense of duty, and partly, that as he found it impossible to continue his farming to any advantage, he might take up another occupation, which, however different in its nature, was, at the time, honourable and useful, and was remunerated with certain monies, the receipt of which was not disagreeable. An antipathy between Mr M— and his Colonel arose from the first day they met at the regimental mess. Their opposing natures clashed on the very first encounter. Colonel B— was a man capable of that bitter and undying hatred, which, springing up from no other cause than an instinctive devilishness, never sleeps from the moment of its birth, nor dreams of forgiveness in prosperity, nor pity in adversity. He took no pains to conceal it, nor did he, on the other hand, take such imprudent means for its display as might have had the effect of thwarting his object; his was a cool, business-like hatred, that waited its time, saw its time with exceeding acuteness, and then sprung to the accomplishment of its purpose with certain and deadly energy. He knew that an immediate display of his enmity towards Mr M— would not effect that, which, after the first three days of their association as brother officers, he resolved to effect if he could. Suppose he had been able to drive him from the regiment at once, he would then at once lose his power over him; and, besides, Mr M— might then return to his former pursuits, from which he was hardly as yet wholly disunited, and might in time become a prosperous man. "That is not the way," said Colonel B— to himself, "to torment and ruin him; and I may do both, if I proceed more cautiously." And he did so proceed: There was no point in which the commanding officer of a regiment on active duty could annoy his inferior officer, that was not deliberately and calmly made use of by Colonel B—. Captain M— saw all this, and felt it—felt it with all the bitterness which comes upon us when that which we scorn, we must obey;

—he was too proud to complain, and to resent his treatment was impossible; for the Colonel took care not to proceed beyond the utmost stretch of his actual authority, and in no jot or tittle to violate the articles of war. Captain M—— at last took the only means left to him of escaping from the tyranny under which he suffered; he resigned his commission after two years' service, and after his farming establishment had been completely broken up. And the Colonel had the fiendish satisfaction of believing that he had effectually tormented him for two years, and at the end had cast him upon the world—a ruined man.

Whatever was the fate, however, of Mr M—— for the next five years, no one knew; he went away, some said to England, others to America, but for that time he was not heard of. It was in the close of the sixth summer after his departure, that a melancholy-looking stranger, who seemed of the middle age, made his appearance among the little cottages on the river's side; but it was not until he had gone into one of them, and spoken for some time with the inmates, that he was recognised as their old friend Mr M——. The change that a few years had wrought in him was wonderful and mournful. When he left the glen, he seemed to be about five-and-twenty, and he now looked forty at the least. His voice was become deeper, and more subdued—his speech slower—his look more pensive and downcast, and his smile, if it were a smile at all, was one of acquiescence, and not of pleasurable emotion. He came, he said, to look for a dwelling once more amongst them, and then with languid hopelessness added, "But I fear I did not think enough about it before I came, and I do not see how I am to settle here now, much as I should wish to do it, for my old farm-house was pulled down even before I went away."

"O thin, Captain, jewel," said Ned Rooney and Ned Rooney's wife at the same time, "sure it's ourselves that's glad this minute, to see that your honour's to the fore still, an' not kilt in England, nor marrid in 'Merica, as we heerd. Och, an' a power o' hardship yourself must have gone through sence; anyhow—an' mighty sedate lookin' you're come back to us. An' sure if it's only a place to live in you want, it's just in the nick o' time you come, good luck to you, an' a good gentleman to the poor you always wor. Sure there's the steward's house, the new, purty, beautiful English cottage—the Curnel's steward, your honor, that lived here three years, an ould Scotchman, an' a hard man to be sure he was, but mighty nate and clene—an' he's dead, devil's cure to him—God pardon my sowl for sayin' so—an' the place is to be sowld, in spite of the masther they say, bekase he was cute enough, that's the Scotchman was, to get a proper lase, and now the masther won't give the proper valy of it to the people that's come to look afther what he left—an' sure you could get it, that's if the little bit of ready money made no difference—not that we mane to even the likes o' your honour to livin' where a steward lived—had luck to his stingy sowl—God pardon me—but only the place wasn't like a sarvant's place at all, but fit for any gentleman—for to be sure he kep it so nate, an' all at hardly any cost at all at all."

This long speech was suffered to go on without any interruption from Mr M——, who listened to it with some interest and attention.

He found, upon enquiry, that his informants had told him no more than the truth, and he had luckily arrived at the very moment when it was in his power to possess himself of just such a dwelling as he wished. A very neat cottage had been erected by Colonel B——'s steward on a spot of ground, which, with the adjoining garden, the Colonel thought he had leased for thirty-one years, "provided the said Andrew Campbell should so long live;" but by some accident, of which "the said Andrew" was not perhaps wholly unconscious, this little clause had been omitted, and the heirs of the man, who came from Scotland to look after his effects, insisted upon the value of the lease. This Colonel B—— refused to give, believing that it was very unlikely they would easily find a purchaser in such a place, and hoping to get it at length upon his own terms. In his absence, however, Mr M—— stepped in, and paying down the sum demanded, which was but small, he took possession of the cottage.

He left it the next morning, and in a day or two returned, but not alone, as before; he brought with him a little female child, between two and three years old, and an elderly servant, a Swiss woman, who attended upon the child with all the affection of a mother, and all the respectful solicitude of a servant. At first there was, as there is always in such cases, much wonderment and mystery concerning this new family, but by degrees the story ran, though no one could tell exactly how the information was obtained, that Mr M—— had gone to England, and fallen in love with a young lady of foreign extraction, whom he eventually married, and with whom he had lived one brief year of happiness as great as can be enjoyed without luxuries or riches to procure them. At the end of a year, in giving birth to a daughter, she died, and the joy of his heart was gone for ever. For several months his tearless stony grief bordered upon gloomy insanity, until one day as he stood with folded arms over the cradle of his child, and watched the calm awaking of her deep blue eyes, and saw her look upon him, and hold up her arms in joyful recognition, the rock of his heart was smote, and he wept for hours. From this time his grief was calm, tender, affectionate to those who approached him, but the bitterness of the preceding months had left him like a tree scathed by the storm. His hair had turned grey, his flesh had shrunk, and premature age had set its stamp upon him. It appeared that after long indulgence of his sorrowful thoughts, and finding himself incapable of the exertion which was necessary to his support, if he remained in England, he resolved upon selling his little establishment, and settling for the remainder of the life, which he had devoted to retirement, in the land of his fathers, and amid the scenes with which his earliest days had been familiar.

It is singular how beautifully the state and capabilities of inanimate nature, and the nature of man, are adapted to each other. How the devices and desires of our hearts are provided with a something whereupon to fix—how much is given that we could not create, but that we can assist, and mould, and form, and fashion, after our will, into those useful or exquisite shapes which our necessities demand, or our cultivated tastes teach us to consider beautiful. Enough is done for us to give us power, enough is left undone to give us employment; nor is it possible almost to arrive at that degree of improvement that will forbid further hope—nature herself crowns our best efforts with new and unlooked-for beauty, and we still trust, and justly so, that if our industry fail not, neither will her reward.

Mr M——'s cottage was pretty when he got it; but, weaned away from all more important pursuits, and possessed with a longing desire, which seemed to gratify his dejected heart, of making it all that his Emily would have loved, and would have assisted in making it, were she not with the spirits of the just, it soon appeared, under his tasteful and quiet, but unceasing cultivation, a very nest of beauty. His neighbour, the Colonel, saw it, and even in the midst of all his rich possessions, envied the poor man his little dwelling of peace, and his old hatred sprung up anew; but the last hatred vexed his own heart more than the first, because he had no ready means of giving it vent. He cursed the new comer within his teeth, first, for having got possession of that which his avarice had prevented him from getting for himself; and he cursed him again, because the place thrived with him and grew beautiful; but he knew, that while he held aloof from him, he had no power to injure a man, the pride of whose heart was broken, and he endeavoured to become familiar with him again, that he might twist some chain about him, by the means of which he might hurt him whenever he listed. But the solitary refused all his advances with cold civility, and he only hated him more and more, without obtaining power over him.

In the meantime the young child, the little Emily, grew up as lovely as the flowers among which she played, and altogether as innocent. Like them she was beautiful and gentle by nature, and, like them, a little wild by situation. But as soon as her mind became sufficiently matured for instruction, her father bethought him of the things which she should learn, and himself became her fond and careful tutor. To fill her quick and sensitive mind with such knowledge as was suited to her years, and to embue her heart with feelings that elevate, while they soften, was to him the most delightful task that he had known for years. Many a time would he turn away and weep, in spite of himself, at some accidental glance, or tone, or expression, so like that of her whom he had lost, that it seemed but the shadow, or the echo, or the repetition of that which lived so strongly in his memory; and little Emily's own soft blue eyes would fill with tears, as she observed his agitation, which she knew not the reason of, while she felt his tears upon her face as he kissed her a thousand times.

It happened that Mr M—— was able to teach his daughter not only the more solid parts of knowledge, which educated men all possess, but also those accomplishments which, for the most part, are more common to women—viz. music and drawing, in both of which he had once been rather a proficient; and his skill speedily revived as he found it necessary to put it in practice for Emily's advantage.

In dancing, however, he would have been at fault, were it not for the Swiss servant, who proved, in this matter, a most useful ally, as, indeed, she was in sundry other little matters relating to needles and thread, and shears, and so forth, which were of no small value, not to say necessity, in a place which boasted not of either a fashioner of dresses, or a constructor of bonnets, within seven miles. It would have been a pretty and amusing sight, if one could have seen it, to look at the beautiful young Emily receiving her lesson in the saltatory art, from her now somewhat ancient professor, while her father, at the piano-forte, supplied the requisite music. Old Marguerite knew the dances of her country well, besides that she had been a little time in Paris, where she learned some refinement upon her country fashions, so far as her feet were concerned, but her heart happily remained such as she had brought it from the mountains.

Emily reached the age of seventeen, as lovely and as accomplished a girl as ever lived unknown in a secluded valley. I have said she was innocent as the flowers, and so she was; her joy was light and free as the air that played around her own mountains; yet her soul sometimes lifted itself up, and, like their pinnacles, soared heaven-ward, or looking deep into itself, would behold therein the indistinct forms of a thousand shadowy thoughts that know not utterance, until some strong circumstance gives them more perfect shape, and calls them forth.

The joy of her father's heart was buried in the grave with his dead wife, and the more surely so, because every circumstance that would have brought joy—even his daughter's beauty and surpassing goodness—served to remind him of her who was gone, and thus dashed even the flowers of his heart with the dews of sorrow. Still, however, he had a serious gladness in the contemplation of all his Emily had grown to be, and her affection soothed his heart, and made his eyes fill with tears that were not those of pain; but as every satisfaction almost, has some anxiety attendant upon it, even as its shadow, so had this: he felt occasionally, that although in respect of years he was little beyond what is called the prime of life, yet in appearance, and in constitution, he was already old, and it was dreadful to think of what might become of his Emily, unprotected as she was, when he should be called away. His thanksgivings, therefore, to God, for the great blessing which he had vouchsafed to him in her, were not unmingled with earnest petitions, that the protecting hand of an all-watchful Providence would guard his child, and be unto her as a guide and a stay, when time to him should be no more.

His neighbour the Colonel, though but a few years his junior, still appeared, as he actually was, in the vigour of life, and continued a bachelor; but to keep down the pride of some nephews, which was sometimes troublesome to him, and perhaps, too, because it did not diminish the favourable regards of the ladies in the houses which he visited, (for we have said he had a good estate,) he was accustomed to give out that he by no means intended to continue all his life a single man—that he thought it right to consider at his leisure before he surrendered the freedom of a bachelor's life, but by and by he would certainly "settle," and, of course, an heir to his estate was to follow. He had seen Emily M—— occasionally as she grew up, and now he saw her in the almost matured loveliness of womanhood, and he felt towards her as the grossness of his nature was alone capable of feeling. At no time of his life could he have felt himself what pure love was, or understood what was meant by others when they spoke of it; now that his heart was still more hardened by time, and any little sense of delicacy he ever had, utterly dissipated by constant intercourse with the profligate and the vile, he heard of love only to laugh at it. Yet his eyes followed after the young Emily with a filthy glare, and the brute passion that burned within him, was blended with another that added to its fierceness—he still hated her father, and with as strong a hate as ever; for the respectability of his character, notwithstanding his slender means, elevated him in some sort into a rival; and the presence of an independent man so near him, was an offence in his nostrils. In the dark recesses, therefore, of his gross and guilty mind, he desired to gratify at once his lust and his hatred, and he dared deliberately to think of the means by which he might accomplish the child's dishonour, and through that dishonour, bring down her father's grey hairs with sorrow to the grave. He was a man that would not be startled by either the difficulty or the villainy of an attempt to accomplish what he wished, and his first plan was to bring himself upon some terms of acquaintance with the young lady; and with this view he invited his nephew, a youth of eighteen, to spend his college vacation with him in the country, rightly judging, that through his assistance an acquaintance would be more likely to be opened than if he trusted to any civilities of his own. The Colonel was in the habit of going to church, for which he had certain reasons of his own that had nothing to do with religion; to the same church, which was about two miles from their dwelling in the glen, went also, on every Sunday that they could walk thither, Mr M—— and his daughter, accompanied by their servant Marguerite. Here the young beauty was first pointed out by the Colonel to his nephew, as, dressed with rural, yet elegant simplicity, and her complexion heightened by the exercise of walking, she appeared a very paragon of loveliness. The boy admired, as boys will admire when they think they love; and that day he refused his dinner, and spent the evening in pensive meditation, and in turning an Epistle of Ovid into English verse. His good uncle rallied him, told him he was in love, which, to boys in a fit of admiration, is the sweetest of all flattery; and then, in a jocular way, instructed him how he was again to get a sight of Miss M——: "She goes every day," he said, "to visit a woman in one of the cottages, who is sick. These people are my tenants, and you have right to go there too, if you like. I don't see why you should not choose the time when she is there to go in—you may chance to have some particularly nice flowers in your hand—my gardener will give them to you—I dare say the young lady likes good flowers, for I perceive her obstinate, foolish father, would have such things if he were not as poor as he is proud—he does his best to have them—offer her the flowers, and then offer to attend her home. I don't well see how she can refuse—you have a tongue, and can speak—and you may invite her to come and see the conservatory here, and try to prevail on her to do this—I should like to see whether she is really pretty when one sees her close at hand—and mind you are respectful, however, for this is necessary to gain a woman, and I have a little more experience in these things than you, my boy. Now, ring the bell for some brandy and biscuits, and then we'll go to bed."

The youth acted upon all this advice, but he needed not the suggestion to be respectful. There is a something in the feeling of admiration which beauty, and simplicity, and gracefulness, cause to spring up in the youthful mind, which is associated with the very deepest feelings of respect; and upon the contrived accidental meeting, which took place as Colonel B—— had planned it, this careful deference, united with a prepossessing figure and a good address, made a most favourable impression on the unsophisticated Emily; she accepted, with grateful thanks, the beautiful flowers which were offered to her, and as Marguerite was with her, she did not forbid the young gentleman to walk by her side as she went home, nor, indeed, could she well do so, as their way was the same.

To the invitation to see the conservatory, she replied by avowing her wish to see any thing so beautiful as she had always heard it described to be; but she would ask her father whether she might go with Marguerite. She did ask, and was told that it would not be right; and so much was she accustomed to mould her wishes upon those of her father, that she assented to his negative with the same cheerfulness that she would have received his permission. Although disappointed in some measure by the ill success of this part of his scheme, Colonel B—— determined to take advantage of the acquaintance which his nephew had opened; and when Emily went abroad without her father, he contrived to walk with his nephew where they should meet her; nor did the nearer view of her innocent beauty in the least turn his cold and sensual heart from its brutal purpose. Emily, of course, told her father of these accidental meetings, to which he made no objection, unwilling to provoke any needless enmity, and not supposing it possible that any evil purpose could have been intended by them. At length his nephew's vacation ended, and the Colonel was left to pursue his plans alone. My readers will perhaps expect that I shall have to tell them, that the young collegian took away with him the heart of Emily, but it was not so; she thought him the pleasantest young gentleman she had met, because he was almost the only one; but she knew not what love was.

There was a bold decision in the character of Colonel B——, which had frequently been the cause of his success in the evil designs which he undertook, and having thus acquired a confidence in this method of carrying his purposes, it became habitual, and he had no longer sufficient patience in action for the villainy which his mind contemplated. He resolved, therefore, to bring his plans upon Emily M—— immediately to a point, and finding that, since his nephew's departure, he could not obtain more from her in the way of speech when he met her than a passing salutation, he ventured, in strong reliance upon his own merits, and the vanity which he supposed common to women, to write, and have privately conveyed to her, a letter, which he expected, if it would not at once obtain, would at least lead to the accomplishment of, his purpose. In the language of dexterous flattery, he complimented her beauty and her various accomplishments—lamented that she had not been born somewhat earlier, or himself somewhat later, that their years might have been more nearly equal, yet protested that the fire of love burned within his heart with all the fervour of youthful enthusiasm—spoke of the pride and joy with which he should see her the sharer of his fortune, and the mistress of his household, and concluded at length with a statement, that certain circumstances of a delicate nature, which he would afterwards explain, made it inconvenient that the union, which was the highest object of his hopes, should take place at home; and a proposal, that, relying upon his faith and honour, she would commit herself to his protection, while he conveyed her to France, and there made her his by all the ties which could unite faithful lovers.

He had been so little accustomed to deal with perfect simplicity and innocence, that he never once supposed it possible that Emily would immediately hand this letter to her father, notwithstanding a postscript particularly cautioning her against making the slightest mention of it to him; but she was so bewildered by its contents as scarcely to know what was meant by it, and gave it to her father as a something to be explained to her, rather than resented by him.

Her father's brow grew dark as night as he read the letter, and he bit his lip till the blood sprang from it.

Emily trembled, and besought the reason of this agitation.—“Leave me,” he said, “leave me, my child, for a while—this is a serious matter, and I must consider of it.—Unutterable villain!” he continued, as he paced about the room like a distracted man, after his daughter had left him; “insulting scoundrel! But he shall pay for this—the usage of the world gives me one mode of vengeance, and I shall take it, though I risk my life, and more than my life, to obtain it—aye, and I shall do it instantly—I shall not suffer my blood to cool, lest haply this monster should escape. I am alone—I have no friend to stand by my side—but I will go alone, and one of us shall die. Oh Emily! God shield thee then!” He covered his face with his hands for a moment, and then flung away into his study, where he had his pistols—they were kept loaded for the security of the house—he put them in his pockets, put on his hat, and rushed out, with more energy of body, and a thousand times more fury of mind, than he had ever before possessed. The shades of evening were now closing in, and the moon was rising, but he thought not of the time, nor of any thing but immediate vengeance; for he too well knew the man he had to deal with, not to understand his letter in its true light, and not to know that the foulest injury was intended. Here we must leave him for a while, to relate some other circumstances which in their consummation became connected with the catastrophe of that evening.

In a broad cleft, or hollow, in the mountain's side, about two miles from Glen Cruagh, there had lived, about eight years before, an old woman and her two sons, famed as a triumvirate of wickedness—the sons occasionally had employment as labourers, but it was understood they lived chiefly by depredation; and if a sheep was missed off the mountain's side, it was suspected that mutton, or the value of it, found its way thereupon into the cabin of the “Widdy Lynch.” If any young girl in the country side was found to have bartered her virtue for gold, Widdy Lynch was sure to have had some concern in it; and if any robbery took place, her cabin was the first searched for the stolen goods. As this woman and her sons, although more than suspected to be concerned in so much guilt, continued always to keep clear of such evidence as would convict them, the old woman obtained the reputation of dealing with the devil—a rumour which she by no means discouraged, as it gave her a double influence in carrying on her nefarious traffic, and in evading its consequences. But the pitcher, as the proverb says, though it goeth often to the well, is at last broken; and so it fell out with the family of the Lynches. Colonel B—— had some designs upon a young woman, who lived in her father's house at the mountain's foot, about two miles beyond Lynch's cabin; and the attentions of the Colonel, or intentions rather, becoming known to a young farmer who conceived he had some pretensions to the young woman of an honest character than the Colonel's, he determined upon the Irish method of making short work of the matter, by forcibly carrying her off, and for this purpose he hired the two Lynches, who were always ready to engage in any act of desperation for a reward. With their assistance the young man succeeded in his lawless attempt; but Colonel B——, who was a very active magistrate when personally concerned, resolved to deter others from future interference of a similar kind with his amusements, and seized the culprits, whose haunts he well knew.

The men were brought to trial; and merely because Mr M—— had the reputation of being a kind man, and a friend to the poor, they summoned him to “give them a character;” for the Irish peasantry cannot to this day be persuaded that a trial is merely an enquiry into the truth, but believe that it is a mode of attack, much less agreeable to them than if made with sticks and stones, but still one in which a muster of friends is of great avail. It was in vain Mr M—— protested he could say nothing to their advantage. They insisted on his being examined, because “they were sure his honour was too kind a gentleman to give them a bad word;” and he was examined, and what he said in some measure tended to their conviction. Both Lynches were found guilty, one as principal, the other as an accessory; and one was transported for life, and the other for seven years. The mother escaped being implicated in this affair; but while the proceedings were going on, she flitted up and down the country like an evil spirit—now here, now there—with a mysterious swiftness that added to her fame for supernatural agency. Supplication—vows of vengeance—curses, deep and dire, she used, as it was her purpose to coax or to intimidate those whose evidence was to be used against her sons, but all was unavailing; and when they were now pronounced guilty, her face grew black, and she muttered and trembled, but shed no tears.

When, with the rest of the grand jury, Colonel B—— was leaving the court house, she threw herself in his way, flung back her bright red cloak, the hood of which had, until then, enveloped her head, and, on her bended knees, with her hands clasped, and her long grey hair streaming behind, she cursed him with the energy and bitterness of a fiend. "Go along," she said, "and may the curse o' the widow, that's now left childless and desolate, cling about you night, noon, and mornin', as long as you live, and in the flames of hell after ye die—aye, black, hard-hearted, contrivin' villain as ye are, an' always was, an' always will be! Aye, go your ways, and may my curse be poison to your body and your soul! May you never know satisfaction or contentment in this world, and may my revenge bring you to a sudden death, and send your soul, hot an' hissin', to hell, from where it came! This is my curse, an' may it fall on you hot and heavy, I pray God!"

It was not the words alone, but the fearful demoniac wildness of the manner, which, to those who beheld the woman, gave an impression of indescribable horror. She paused as if from exhaustion; and Mr M—— went over to her, and in words of pity, which even disgust could not overcome, besought her to go away, and submit with decent quiet to the fate which the law had necessarily brought upon her sons. "Away!" she said, "away! chicken-hearted fool, that wouldn't spake a word for my boys! May be I'll have revenge of you too; but you're not wicked, an' I mustn't curse you." She disappeared, and was seldom seen afterwards in the glen; but once a-year, on the anniversary of the day on which her sons were convicted, she presented herself before Colonel B——, and renewed her curse. No matter where he went—she dogged him; and on that day, except he confined himself to his chamber, the widow renewed her malediction. Thrice he detected her in crimes, for which he was enabled to throw her into jail for a short period, but still she got free again, and again she tracked his steps, and poured out upon him the bitterness of her heart.

About a month before the evening on which Mr M—— rushed forth to seek from Colonel B—— personal satisfaction for the insult offered to his daughter, the widow's son had returned from his exile of seven years. The woman still occupied her wretched cabin on the hill-side, and to that miserable home the young man returned. The old woman now walked more erect—a gleam of fierce joy was seen now and then to shoot from beneath her projecting brow, and people said it was not like the joy she should have shewn to see her son again, for there was "no tenderness in it, at all at all." But a satisfaction in which there was nothing of tenderness lurked in the woman's heart—she had persuaded her son to undertake a murder! On the day on which Colonel B—— wrote his letter to Emily, he received a note, which was found in the hall. How it came there, no one could tell; but it was in a woman's hand, ill spelled, and asking him to be on the bank of the stream, below the widow Lynch's cabin, that evening, at the rising of the moon. There were initials to the note which he knew—he put it in the fire, and determined to keep the appointment. He had gone out before Mr M—— arrived at his gate, and the servant replied, with a look of astonishment, to the quick and fierce demand if his master were at home, "Is it the master you want, sir?"

"Yes—I want to see him directly."

"He's gone out."

"Where?"

"I thin, if its meself that knows—only he wint down the glen, an' I heerd the gossoon sayin' that he met him turnin' up be the river, as he was comin' home just now, wid some trouts."

"I shall go and find him," said

Mr M——, as he turned away, determined to seek out the Colonel before he rested. He chanced to follow exactly in his steps; but rapidly as he walked, it was some time before he perceived his antagonist at a considerable distance in advance of him, walking on the pathway which skirted the stream, as it ascended towards the mountain region. The moon had just risen, calm, and bright, and beautiful, peacefully beaming on the rocks and furze, and glancing in the rapid stream as it pounced along from stone to stone, yet almost seeming to hush its wonted murmurs, through sympathy with the calm softness of the light that trembled upon it. Such an appearance of nature formed a singular contrast with the burning fever in the heart and brain of the insulted parent, who now strode along, irritated even more than he had previously been, by the sight of the man whose injuries he sought to resent and avenge. He had now approached within a dozen paces—his hands were upon his pistols, and he was about to call out to Colonel B——, who was just going to pass round a huge lump of granite that lay in the way, and would have concealed him momentarily from the view of Mr M——, when the report of a pistol from the other side was heard, and in the same instant Colonel B—— leaped breast high from the ground, and then fell flat upon it, a dead man.

A moment before, and Mr M—— had been himself eager to inflict such a doom upon the man who now lay stretched almost at his feet, yet at the sight of what was done, he was petrified with horror, and stood for a moment, feeling as if his burning heart had been plunged in icy water. The next moment his recollection returned, and rushing round the rock, from the other side of which the shot appeared to have come, he found the Widow Lynch and her son, the latter with a pistol in his hand, still smoking from the discharge which had killed Colonel B——. "Murderers!" said Mr M——, drawing forth one of his pistols, "you are detected in your foul assassination. Surrender yourself instantly," he added to the son, "or you die as surely as the man you have just shot." The man made no reply, but flung himself upon Mr M—— to disarm him—in the struggle the pistol was discharged, and the ball whizzing past the ear of the ruffian, did him no injury. Mr M—— was soon overpowered, as his arms having been seized, he could not use his second pistol; the murderer was strong, and having flung him down, planted his knee upon his breast.

"What shall we do with him, mother?" he said. "Best send him after the Colonel, to give him a character," she replied, with a wild and fiend-like laugh. "I said I'd have my revenge of him too, an' the devil has put it in my way sooner than I expected."

The prostrate man thought of his daughter, and wished for life. "Woman," he exclaimed, "I never injured you!"—"Hah—you lie—you lie!" almost shrieked the hag. "I asked you to speak a word for my boys—for the boy that now has you in his grip—and you would not—But," she added, after a little pause, "I can't hate you, as I did the villain that's just done for. If you're let go, will you swear never to say a word to man or mortal of what you have seen to-night?"—"No," said Mr M—— firmly—"Kill me, if you must; but if I live, I shall do my duty, and endeavour to bring you both to justice."

"Hoh, you will?" said the woman, and repeated her horrid laugh—"but say your prayers thin, if you think they'll do you any good, afore you die." She paused again a little space—her eyes glistened as if some joyful thought had struck her, and she whispered to her son.

"What brought you here, wid a pistol in your hand?" she said again, addressing Mr M——.

"May God forgive me," he replied, "a wicked purpose; but I trust that sin, great as it was in intention, may not be imputed to me!"

"I don't think you liked the Curnel much, more than ourselves, Mr M——. Maybe if we hadn't been in the way just now, you'd have saved us the trouble? What brought you here, I say, at this time, wid a pistol in your hand?"

"Not to assassinate a man in cold blood," replied Mr M——. "A crime so foul as that I have not to answer for."

"Maybe you will though," said the woman, "and save other people from being suspected. Lay hoults on him, Dinuis, and take him off. I charge him wid having shot the Cur-nel, and you'll back what I say—You seen him, didn't you?"—and again came forth the devilish laugh.

In a moment the unfortunate Mr M—— saw the dreadful situation in which he was placed—his brain spun round, and he grew sick, with the fear not of death, but of infamy.—"Spare me, spare me!" he cried out in agony.

"No," replied the woman, in a tone which seemed like the echo of his own "No" to her proposal a minute before—the wretch mocked him even then.

It would protract my tale too much to tell minutely all that followed. A host of circumstances were brought forward against Mr M——. He was proved to have followed the Colonel to a lonely place under strong irritation; to have taken his pistols with him, of which one was discharged, and the woman Lynch and her son swore positively to having come upon him, as the murder was done. All this was coherent, while his story was improbable, and unsupported. True, he had the Colonel's letter, which he said had provoked him to follow him with pistols; but the magistrates, who examined it, could see nothing in it but a proposal for an elopement, and not at all justificatory of the proceeding which it was said to have induced. True, the character of the woman Lynch and her son was bad as bad could be, and it was very possible to suppose them capable of the murder which Mr M—— alleged they had committed; but there was no particle of evidence against them, save the assertion of the accused, who had the strongest possible interest in speaking falsely. The weapon, too, with which he alleged the murder had been committed, could not be found, although the most diligent search had been made in and around Lynch's cabin. Mr M—— was committed, by the magistrates, for trial. Who shall paint his misery, or that of the wretched Emily? Death, a felon's death—infamy, horrible infamy—hung over her father's head, and no ray of comfort pierced through this dreadful storm of unspeakable calamity. For a time, something like insanity took possession of the unfortunate prisoner; but at last the consolation of religion visited him, and Emily became his ministering angel, and he wept, and was calm, and tasted something like peace even in the midst of misery and tears.

Time rolled on—property lives, though men, who call it theirs, die; and it became necessary to arrange for the disposition of Colonel B——'s effects. The heir-at-law was his nephew, who had but a few weeks before been on a visit with him, and he now returned, petrified with horror at what had happened, and utterly incredulous as to the guilt of Mr M——. He visited him in prison, and listened to his statement, which was given in the language, and with the deportment, of a man who had done with this world, and only testified the truth, for the truth's sake. The prisoner's daughter was with him, for humanity did not refuse that blessing to his gloomy cell; and if one may speak of female loveliness in such a situation, even there, the touching dignity of her extreme sorrow, and the pious duty of filial love in which she was constantly engaged, gave a depth of beauty almost angelic to her peerless face and form.

Tears stood in the young gentleman's eyes, as he mounted his horse to quit the prison-gate. "Aye, your honour," said the servant, as he held the stirrup, and spoke with the familiarity which their respective ages made not unnatural between master and servant, "'twas a sorrowful sight you seen, I'll warrant me—a kind gentleman they always said he was,—and the poor young crathur—sure it's hard, an' heavy, an' arely her misfortunes have come upon her."

"Aye," replied his master, with a sigh, "aye—Do you know these people that are the witnesses against him, Peter?"

"Know them? to be sure I do, your honour—but I b'lieve the devil knows them better nor any one else, an' has his hoults over thim strong enough."

"Do you know the spot where my uncle was shot?"

"I do, your honour, well. I seen it the day before yisterday, and the mark of the blood on the ground, God bless us, an' be about us!"

"I wish you would bring me to the place."

"Whin, your honour?"

"This evening, after we ride home."

"The cross of Christ be about us! Sure, sir, it is not to go there after dark you want?"

"No; there will be moonlight. It was about this day month the murder was committed—and by moonlight. I wish to see it under similar circumstances."

"An you're not afeerd, sir?"

"Afraid, fool! No; of what should I be afraid?"

"Why, your honour, to say nothin' of evil sperrits, for maybe you that has been at college doesn't belevee in them like us poor people—but it's just convenient to the Lynches' cabin, an' where they are I'm thinkin' there's little good."

"Never mind, take courage, and bring me to the place. I have a particular reason for wishing to go there."

Now, in sober truth, young Frederick B—— had no reason at all, but he had a strong impression upon his mind, derived from he knew not what—a presentiment, if philosophy would allow of such a thing—that by going, he would discover something of importance; and upon this impression, or presentiment, he acted.

At moonrise he arrived with his servant at the entrance of the gorge, through which the stream passes into the glen. Their horses were left in the care of one of the cottagers, and they proceeded on foot up the pathway which, exactly a month previously, had been trodden about the same hour by Colonel B—— and Mr M——. The present night, too, was calm and clear as that night had been, and all was silence, save the rushing of the eager stream.

The servant, although somewhat confident from the presence of his master, who had been "at College," yet felt some fear withal, and as they came within sight of the rock where the murder was committed, which they did while yet a very considerable distance from it, he involuntarily stopped, and looked round with an anxious gaze as far as his eyes could reach.

"What is the matter, Peter?" said his master,

"Nothin', sir—only I thought I seen—Look, sir, ~~don't~~ you think you see somethin' movin' down the side o' the hill, toart [towards] the rock?"

"Yes," said his master, looking in the direction pointed out, "I do see what I take to be two persons walking that way. I see them now more plainly—it is a man and a woman. What ails you, man?—does one man and an old woman frighten you?"

"It's the Widdy Lynch and her son," whispered the man; "an' the devil's not far off, in some shape or other, I'll be bail."

"Hush, Peter—let us observe their motions—see, they are getting down under the shadow of that rock. Good Heaven! they have vanished!"

"No, your honour," said Peter, smiling to find that for once he knew better than his master who had been at college—"they're only gone close to the rock, and are quite hid in the shade—the bames o' the moon is all on the other side—they're gone there to hatch some divilment, I'll warrant me."

"Could we get to the other side of the rock without being perceived by them, Peter?"

"Not if you go straight forward, sir—for they'd see us immadiately; but if you go up the side of the hill a bit, and keep up till we get beyant the rock, thin we can come down upon the far side of it."

"Let us do so, then. I should wish, if possible, to hear their consultation."

The plan was put into execution, and in half an hour they found themselves approaching the rock on the opposite side from that on which they had before seen it.

"Think you they are still there?" said Frederick B——.

"I do, sir," replied the servant; "I kep my eye on the place, an' barrin' they wint within the last two minits, they're still in the same spot."

"How shall we get close upon them?"

"You can climb up upon the rock, an' get over their heads," replied the servant, whose spirit of enterprise had now overcome his fear.

"Good—that will be the best way."

"This is the way to do it, your honour," said Peter, pulling off his boots, in which his example was followed by his master; and they went forward, silent and warily, as the fowler creeps to take his aim. They readily climbed the rock, and lying flat upon the top, with their heads almost reaching over the verge on the darkened side, they easily overheard the whispered conversation of the pair beneath.

"I wonder you're not afeerd, mother," said the man, "to come down to this place, of all places in the world, to persuade me to swear more, whin I tell you I'd rather kill another man than swear. Let them take your own oath, but don't ax me to go in to a coort-house agin."

"Swear!" said the woman—"why, what's swarin'? or what's in a coort-house, or a judge's wig, to frighten ye? Is that the courage you larnt in foreign parts, to be afraid to spake, you that did the raal business so cleverly? Musha, but it was a steady hand that sent the bullet into the middle of his forehead—what is there in your tongue, that it can't be as steady as your hand?"

"Well, mother, don't say more about it now—I'll see afore the trial comes on, an' make up my mind to do it; but I wish you'd let me off. Where's the pistol? I want to lend it to Kelly in the mornin'."

"In the hole in the top of the rock overhead," said the woman—"Pull out the stone first, that I put in after it to prevent it getting wet."

The man placed his two hands upon the rock above his head, and made a spring to get upon it, when he found himself in the grasp of Frederick B—. He was paralysed with sudden fear, and made little or no resistance to being secured. The woman gave a loud shriek, and then resigned herself to her fate. "Aye," she muttered—"Aye, and now my time is come; and sure I might have known it—didn't I dhrame last night that I made the ould man that's in jail a present of a black coffin, and he threw it back to me, an' said it would do for myself?"

Three years afterwards, Emily M— was promoted much nearer the top of the alphabet, and, as Emily B—, appeared the lovely and happy wife of him whose fortunate chance it had been to rescue her father from the peril that impended over him. The old gentleman still kept his beautiful cottage, and old Marguerite still lived to take care of it. The skeletons of the Widow Lynch and her son hang in the surgeon's room of the county infirmary, whither their bodies had been sent to be anatomized.

So ends my tale.

AN ECLOGUE.

CHRISTOPHER—DUKE—THE SUB.

Translated by Timothy Tickler.

In the Blue Chamber, far from vulgar eyes,
Where Tappytourie mountain dew supplies,
(That dew Olympus-still'd, of precious worth!)
Sat Christopher—whose name is from the North,— Concocting in his great and mighty mind
His coming Number—to astound mankind.
Alone he sat; his gossips and his gout
Had vanish'd—conquer'd in a drinking-bout;
Sir Morgan, Hogg, and Tickler the benign,
Floor'd, had confess'd the power of North—and wine.

Bang went the door, when lo! at once appear'd
Before the man so reverend, and revered,
The conquering Hero,—he whose arm of might Heroes have felt,—and senates feel with fright;
And with him came Sir Sub—that upstart wight—
Whose brazen brow the fairest locks environ,
Strange contrast to his master's face of iron!

Say what their errand: Maga's fostering care
And patronizing smile of Christopher
Each vied to have: and though the ducal frown
Could make the Sub not call his soul his own,
Yet he his master's rival now was seen,—
Such is the power of Blackwood's Magazine!

North nodded. Trembling like a brace of rats
At the dread sound of terrier dogs—or cats,
They heard a voice that bid them first rehearse
Their several actions in alternate verse,
That Maga and their country thus might see
The greater which,—and whose the meed should be.

The sly one, North! He burn'd to kick them out,
Had not politeness, and the fear of gout,
Forbade,—while both assenting thus began,
The Hero first; and thus the descendant ran.

DUKE.

I am the man who pull'd Napoleon down.
I am the man whose genius gain'd renown
For eloquence, which forced and tore away
The orders of Lord Bishops—and Lord Grey.

The palm of Mars and Mercury I wear—
I—the illustrious Duke, Prince, Premier!

SUB.

I, erst a Scribe, and most renown'd M.P.
Must now sing small, since times are changed with me.
Fickle the winds! but I can shift my sail,
Varying my canvass to the varying gale.
Easy of access, candid, open, free—
A man of sterling worth—behold in me.

DUKE.

The name and fashion of those boots are mine,
Call'd Wellingtons: my nose is aquiline—
Like Jupiter's own bird's; and then my jaws
Are lantern-shaped; thus, then, I have shewn cause
Why I should wear the laurel with applause.

SUB.

Is not my face quite handsome?—locks of fire!
Silken my words, and silken my attire,
In which Sir Thomas Lawrence painted me!
Good Mr North, the laurel's mine, you see.

DUKE.

Full many a tug and tough set-to were mine
Before the friend to Free Trade would resign,
Who clung to office, and defied my fighting:
I ousted him by cunningly inditing
Epistles to this sumph—in letter-writing.

SUB.

What lovelier sight, than when our friends are seen
Crowding the Treasury benches—all serene!
To see Joe Hume, poor arithmetic soul!
A-blundering up the tottle of the whole,
And vainly trailing his bewilder'd feet
Through the dark labyrinths of Downing Street.

DUKE.

Madness I call'd it once—to think that I Could e'er aspire to where I sit so high.
Like the mad boy, who would his father dun
To let him drive the chariot of the sun—
So the state coach I too resolved to try—
My Prince is Phœbus—Phaëton am I.

SUB.

Behold my new police—all clad in blue,
Scouring the town, they meet my gladden'd view.
Priapus-like, the dread of every rogue,
No blockhead I—though he was but a log.
I have the honour now to represent
The Jew Manasseh—in our Parliament.

Such was the song: when, lo! an awful snore
From sleeping North, loud as a cannon's roar,
Inspired them with such terror, that they rush
Forth to Edina's streets, with many a bounce and push.

DAN'S FIRST PARLIAMENTARY CAMPAIGN

DAN, who in Ireland led the way,
At head of mob debaters,
Presumed upon an equal sway
'Mongst British legislators.

But bullying phrase, and bellowing lungs,
That won such fame in Erin,
Proved, among England's polish'd tongues,
An awkward interfering.

As when a long-ear'd quadruped,
Perchance with horses straying,
Emits the music of his head,
And fancies that he's neighing,

Dan tried a speech, a joke, a sneer,
With Kerry brogue adorned ;
While some could force themselves to cheer
What all of high mind scorned.

"This theatre will never do,"
Says Dan, "my pranks to play on ;
I have a fitter place in view—
A noble stage plebeian."

• So off he march'd on bounding toe,
(St Giles's guards attending,)
To where Carlile, and Hunt, and Co.
Were constitution-mending.

Soon as Clare's oracle appear'd,
At head of his dear craters,
The pious conclave rose, and cheer'd
This prince of Irish praters.

Huzza ! huzza ! the day's our own—
Down palace, peer, and steeple ;
Tithes, taxes, charters, all o'erthrown,
No Sovereign but the People !

Here Dan was quite at home, for why ?
'Twas famous agitation ;
So up he got immediately,
And made a grand oration !

Say, what shall be the hero's meed
For eloquence so charming ?
Carlile, perhaps, may mend his creed,
All fears of Hell disarming.

Hunt may perpetual stuff supply
To blacken Dan's old leather ;
And Cobbett praise him to the sky
For three whole weeks together.

But when this champion shall repair,
(The Session duly ended,)
To boast among his friends at Clare
How he their rights defended—

All done by him in Parliament,
With all his vaunting notions,
A single sentence shall present—
He bother'd them with Motions !

Cork, 7 June, 1830

SENEX.

PARTIES.

THE Pitt Clubs have had no annual meeting, and this is construed by their enemies into proof that they are sinking into dissolution. It is not for us to assert the contrary; the reasons they have given for their conduct seem greatly deficient in validity, and we can scarcely concede that such bodies have real existence when they do not assemble. We wish it were not our duty to say that they have been some time defunct in regard to original object and due operation.

If Mr Pitt had been as much favoured by fortune as he was by nature, it would have been very superfluous, at this moment, to assert his fame as a statesman of the highest order—as the greatest Minister England ever possessed. But, alas! the adverse fate was his, from which genius of the first class seems only exempted in the exception. Living in times of war, his reputation, to the erring gaze of the world, depended, in a great measure, on the war's success, and, consequently, on the ability and conduct of foreign coadjutors; from this the failure threw its disgrace on him, which was produced by incapacity or treachery he could not prevent. His mighty powers formed the alliances, created the means, lighted up the enthusiasm of his country, smote his domestic foes—in a word, achieved, as far as his accountability extended, the most magnificent triumph; but he reaped from it only the consequences of defeat, through the defeat of others, for which he was not in reality responsible.

Though the battle was lost abroad, it was still won in its essential objects; but, unfortunately, this was not a matter to be noticed by the mass of mankind. The foreign disasters forced themselves, in exaggerated detail, on the sight of all; but the glorious and momentous victories at home were only defensive ones—they merely preserved what had before existed; therefore they were disregarded, save as things of cost and sacrifice.

The war compelled this great Minister to make his general policy subservient to it, and restricted him to the path of unpopularity and obloquy. It imposed on him the repulsive duty of multiplying the public burdens, invading pecuniary profits, compelling sacrifices of all descriptions, and feeding the fury of party and faction. To give the utmost effect to this, he had an Opposition arrayed against him, powerful in talent, spirit, popular delusion, and discontent, means of every kind, and profligate contempt of the rules of honourable warfare beyond example.

It has, therefore, naturally happened that Mr Pitt's reputation has suffered great injustice. He, however, left sufficient behind him to enable the historian to shew the magnitude of his powers, and give to his fame its deserved brilliancy.

The Minister whose name towered above those of such contemporaries as he possessed in Parliament, and filled Europe as that of the unconquerable opponent of such men as ruled France—who, in spite of almost every conceivable impediment and misfortune, triumphantly defended his country against such foreign confederacies as assailed her, smote such an Opposition as he had to contend with, crushed such a spirit as then possessed the nation, provided the resources for such a war, and surmounted such mighty and unprecedented difficulties as at every step encountered him—could not have been other than one of transcendent powers. That Mr Pitt was a master in foreign policy, is abundantly proved by his labours, and the influence he possessed abroad; his pre-eminence as a financier is generally acknowledged; in respect of manufactures and trade, it was the common remark of the deputations of men of business who conferred with him, that he was better acquainted with their respective trades than themselves; and that he equally excelled in general domestic policy, is established by his measures and the lead which he took on every question. As an orator we have only to look at those whom he surpassed as colleagues, or overthrew as opponents. Mr Canning stated not long before his death, that he was, as a debater, worth any ten who were then in the House of Commons. None but a man of the very highest political genius could have been thus eminent in all the departments of the science of government.

Can such a man be found amidst all who ever filled office, or shone in Parliament? Compared with his father, Fox, Burke, or Canning, he stands, in creative and executive ability, variety of powers, and all the more solid and rare characteristics of the statesman, the proud superior. Men may be named among them, on whom the title of great has been bestowed more bountifully; but not one who was tested with such terrible severity, or who raised in a life of tempests and battle such gigantic memorials of his greatness.

His reputation is, indeed, rapidly rising to the lofty pre-eminence which belongs to it: neglected by his friends, it is receiving the testimony of his former enemies and traducers. The Whig, who not many years ago publicly wished the words to be engraven on his tomb—"Here lies the enemy of William Pitt,"—now quotes him as an authority, and avows, that he agrees in general principle with those who call themselves his followers. The reformer declares he is treading the steps of Pitt. The man of free trade asserts he is carrying into effect Pitt's intentions;—and the general innovator defends himself on the ground that he is only doing what Pitt attempted or wished to do. Tory, Whig, and Liberal—all parties shelter themselves under his name, and actually or in effect call themselves his disciples. It is not necessary for us to vindicate him from the charges contained in this, or to use it in illustration of the turpitude of party; it is equally unnecessary for us to enlarge on the conclusive evidence it affords in favour of his transcendent powers.

Unpardonable should we be, were we to speak no farther in his praise. Mr Pitt's patriotism equalled his talents. He was an Englishman, the minister of his native land, and his enthusiastic affection for England, and her institutions, glowed in every speech, and governed every action. His interest saw hers alone; his ambition could only gratify itself by labouring for her greatness; for her he provoked every aspersion, braved every peril, and sacrificed every thing. His integrity equalled his patriotism. It would be small praise to say, he was incapable of the revolting apostasy and treason, the grovelling hypocrisy, intrigue, and corruption, which now so greatly abound; the pride alone of a less haughty man would have been sufficient to protect him from the iniquity and degradation. But his honesty on every point was so pure and self-evident, that calumny never dared to attempt to sully it. Tempted, provoked, and coerced,—placed in such circumstances, that disregard of principle would often have been fair retaliation, and in its effects a virtue; nothing could make him swerve from the stern and chivalrous spirit of Old English honour. No leading public man can be found in English history, whose life as a whole equalled his in demonstrations of undeviating, exalted patriotism; and whose patriotism equalled his in unconquerable disdain of all but the most righteous means.

Eternal reverence to the memory of William Pitt!—and it will be given, by that England for which he lived and died.

The Pitt Clubs were formed to support the general principles and system by which he was governed; and in motive they were worthy of him and his country. Unlike the Whig and some other associations, they were intended to uphold, not party without reference to creed, but creed without reference to party; they had for their object to maintain every thing which was sacred and precious to the empire. Such institutions would be invaluable if they could be preserved in spirit and intention from degeneracy; but experience seems to shew that this is any thing rather than possible.

If even they exclude the heads of party, the ruling men in them can scarcely be other than subject to such heads; and in consequence party is enabled either to make them its tools, or to neutralize them. The Brunswick Clubs of Ireland were formed to withstand a single change, and they were free from connexion with both the Ministry and Opposition. Nevertheless, when the Ministry introduced the change, they were practically dissolved: England without such bodies was convulsed to its centre, and on the verge of revolution, while Ireland with them was comparatively tranquil and motionless. Government paralysed them, and made them negatively to a large extent its supporters, by its influence with their leaders.

The Pitt Clubs included various party heads, and this soon ruined them for purposes of public benefit. The secession of Mr Canning from them, through hostility to the toast of Protestant ascendancy, formed one of those instances of suspicious inconsistency, of which too many are to be found in his history. The determined anti-reformer had less right to call himself Pitt's disciple, than the determined anti-Catholic; and it was wholly indefensible in him to abandon them on what was only the exception to the rule. On a single article, and it a questionable one, of a general creed, he introduced into them the destructive spirit of division, and deprived them of a powerful portion of Pitt's followers. His efforts to overturn them, because he could not make them his instruments, aided certain of his colleagues greatly in making them theirs.

Several years ago, the principles and system of Pitt, more especially such parts of them as he rather created than adopted, were abandoned by the government. We need not cite proofs to establish what is matter of general confession. The Whigs made it their boast that they were decidedly opposed to them, and no one suspects that apostasy in them produced the harmony between their creed and that of the Ministry; on the contrary, the latter always acknowledged that the harmony flowed from its own change of creed. When this was done, what was the conduct of the Pitt Clubs? Did they, in conformity with the solemn obligations on which they were founded, divide themselves from party, and make a stand for the Pitt principles and system? No, they servilely supported government in overthrowing what they were formed to defend. They successfully resisted Mr. Canning, because they had more powerful official men to lead them in it; but here their resistance ended: the influence which led them to this, also reversed them in object. They sunk into mere anti-Catholic ones; and it was sufficiently ludicrous to see bodies which bore the name of Pitt, opposing the Catholic Question, and sanctioning the war against the general policy, bank notes, an efficient sinking-fund, and every thing with which such name was more immediately identified.

These Clubs, in truth, degenerated into the tools of the Tory Ministers, and became powerless in any other character. The carrying of the Catholic Question took from them all well-defined peculiarity of principle: at the last meeting of the London one, the speeches exhibited only vague generalities, and since it took place the speakers have acted on different sides in Parliament. Such bodies are much worse than worthless, if they take a Ministry, instead of principle, for their guide: they mislead public sentiment, stifle public spirit, and operate as engines of despotism on all occasions, save when their existence has no real operation.

At the present crisis, it is the imperative duty of the Pitt Clubs, either to return to their original objects, to take their stand on principle and institution, in perfect independence of party and individuals, or to dissolve themselves. Parties, after having been broken up, are once more entering into organization and warfare, under circumstances which would render a continuance of their past conduct in the highest degree injurious. The distinctions of name and person have been, in regard to creed, confounded, and in a large degree reversed; and those who may blindly act on them alone will be pretty sure to act the part of public enemies. In the contest which has commenced between the Whigs and the Wellington Party, it is unhappily a question, not only how far they differ on public interests, but which is the most worthy of public confidence: and it is a farther question, whether either can be supported by patriotic men, save occasionally, conditionally, and with a view to lead and purify.

The history of those who compose the Wellington Party exhibits the most astonishing specimen of self-destruction on record. Individuals, and even bodies, putting insanity out of sight, only attack their own existence from troubles and misfortunes;

but they plunged into the crime from sheer excess of prosperity and happiness. They had beaten the Whigs into impotence, the country was theirs, and they were omnipotent: such was the case when they voluntarily cast from them their weapons, name, numbers, in a word, every thing on which their possession of power depended. It was entirely from choice that what was called the liberal part of the Liverpool Ministry changed its creed, and arrayed itself against the other part and the great body of the Tories. The Wellington Ministry, on its formation, disregarded the instructive lesson supplied by the Canning and Goderich ones; and separated itself from both the old Tories and their creed: the means were pressed on it of giving the Tories even more than their former triumphant supremacy, but it deliberately rejected them, and embraced ruin. It ruined not only itself, but the whole Tory party.

The old Tories, whom it in reality expelled from power, and reduced to a minority, imitated it in folly. Powerful in character, creed, public esteem, and the weakness of both the Ministry and Whigs, they might have constituted themselves the effective Opposition, and regained what they had lost. It was a duty imposed on them by their professions of faith, to array themselves against the Ministry on general measures; and they could have done it with argument, fact, many potent interests, and public feeling, in their favour. While the Whigs had no ground to stand on as an Opposition, they had the very best that could be imagined. They could, as one, have restricted Ministers to the worthless weapons to which, in general, an Opposition is restricted. All they required was able leaders, union, and a proper system of operations—matters far from being above their reach. Deficient, however, as they were in leading talent, they made no effort to obtain it; and they could not brook the idea of making any members of their own body their leaders. As to union, each differed more or less from his fellows; they agreed on nothing save the defunct Catholic question. Their system of operations was displayed in this;—a portion of them soon rallied to the Ministry, and the rest backed out of their professions to become the followers of the Whigs. With a very small number of honourable exceptions, they have, during the present session, studiously framed their speeches to meet Whig views, and been silent when they could not calculate on Whig assistance. No important question could be taken up by them as a distinct party; no distressed part of the community could obtain their advocacy, if it would embroil them with both the other parties; they could say and do nothing as Tories. They have thus lost public confidence, and destroyed themselves in the public eye, as a body holding a separate creed. Every man of them, we imagine, will soon be divided between the Wellington party and the Whigs.

The two latter are, in truth, the only ones in the field; the country, in reality, has none but them as candidates for its favour; and that it thoroughly despises both is manifest to all men. The reports of a change of Ministry which have been so general, have been received with contemptuous indifference in every quarter; no one has regretted the fall of the Wellington cabinet, or rejoiced at the prospect of a Whig one. All the essentials for interesting the community in such a change have been wanting: the contest is not one of measures, or personal worth, it is merely to determine whether the benefits of power and place shall be enjoyed by one set of families or another; it is one for private gain between two parties, which are about equally odious in creed and character.

The Wellington party has, in principles, sunk even below the Whigs. On all the essentials which formerly rendered it triumphant against them in public favour, it has either gone over to them, or placed them in the right; in the few matters on which it differs from them, it is opposed to public feeling. On free trade and the currency they are agreed; the ultras of the one party go quite as far as those of the other; the extreme opinions put forth by Mr Heries and Mr Courtenay, have not been surpassed by those of any Whig or Liberal.

This party, after surrendering every thing to the Catholics, resists concession to the Jews. The latter, as a body, are, we believe, rather hostile than friendly to the change, and it was therefore excessively absurd in the Whigs to attempt to force it on them. Putting this aside, the removal of the Catholic disabilities destroyed all ground for continuing the Jewish ones. The reasons urged by the party form the most exquisite burlesque on argument imaginable; a few thousands of men, who are conspicuous above all others for never parting with their money without a valuable consideration, abstinence from politics, destitution of political objects, and loyalty, would, if their exclusion were removed, obtain dangerous influence in the Cabinet and Legislature! An English Jew cannot feel like an Englishman, but an Irish Catholic must, as a matter of course! Could any thing be more ludicrously impotent than such doctrines in the mouths of the very men who removed exclusion from the Catholics? The country defended this exclusion on the most solid and practical grounds; it knew the gigantic power of the Catholics, and it believed that the granting of their claims would have destructive consequences. But it thinks the Jews are powerless, and it has no evidence to convict them of evil intentions; therefore its feelings are in their favour, rather than otherwise.

With regard to Parliamentary Reform, the Wellington party has annihilated every valid plea on which it could be resisted. It has completely changed the question, in both character and circumstances. That which was an unnecessary innovation, opposed by the better part of the community, has been rendered by it a needful remedy, which the community at large desires. It would be idle to deny that public feeling is in favour of reform—we mean such as would be cautious, gradual, and practical; and it would be equally idle to attempt to prove that it is in error. From the turn which this question has taken, its effects on the character of both the House of Commons and the Cabinet, and the feelings which it generates among the lower orders, the public well calls aloud for its “settlement.”

In matters relating to the Church, this party has placed itself below the Whigs in public opinion. Every sincere churchman regards it with indignation and suspicion; he sees in it the men who divorced the Church from the State, swept away her bulwarks, and corrupted her clergy into their instruments for accomplishing the unhallowed work. The past compels him to suspect them of every thing for the future; little as he can trust in the Whigs, he can trust still less in their opponents.

On other matters of domestic policy, and on foreign policy, this party professes to agree with the Whigs in general principle; if it differ from them, it is only in unimportant points of application. It here lies under the stigma of being only their follower and instrument.

Its newspaper instruments boast of what they call its liberal opinions, in contradistinction to the principles of the high or ultra Tories. What are these liberal opinions? When we look at its exclusion of the Jews, opposition to all Parliamentary Reform, prosecutions of the Press, forcing a king on Greece, in contempt of the will of the people, &c. &c., we find bigotry and ultraism, such as were never exhibited by the Tories. Here is blind adherence to names when nature is changed—to forms, when reasons and circumstances are reversed—to the letter, when the spirit is gone; and this constitutes bigotry and ultraism. The high Tories always took their stand on fact and argument, they avoided the extremes which form its distinctions, and they are more or less opposed to it on these extremes.

In the flourishing and triumphant days of Toryism, this party consisted of men who ranked far above the Whigs in every branch of personal character; the case is now reversed in regard to both leader and follower. The terrible fall which the party has on every point sustained, is not, so far as concerns itself, a theme for lamentation. We cannot see the unavoidable misfortune—the error prompted by pure motives—the loss occasioned by fidelity to virtue, or any of the things requisite for rendering it worthy of compassion and sorrow. On the contrary, we behold every motive and act which could make it a matter of just and deserved punishment.

The fall of the Wellington Party has been the exaltation of the Whigs. The latter—such are the miracles which now abound—without making any change in themselves, have been made the first party in both creed and character. A few years ago, this ranked amidst the things which appeared utterly impossible. The Catholic Question, Reform, the domestic changes they called for, and their opinions of foreign policy, seemed to render their extrication from the slough of public distrust and enmity perfectly hopeless; nothing was apparently more irremovable than the brand they bore as superficial theorists—wild disturbers, whose schemes were calculated to involve both the empire and the world in confusion and calamity. The mill-stones which held their necks in the mire have been cut away; their name has been cleansed from stain and suspicion; and this has been done by the Tories. The latter have not only freed them from unpopular questions and suspected principles, but they have given them the exclusive possession of honourable consistency; they have made them the only party which can be depended on for steady fidelity to faith and pledge.

In point of talent, the Whigs are far superior to the Wellington Party; no Ministry in modern times has possessed so little of it as the present one; and the followers have as small a share as the leaders.

Whether the Whigs—we include in the name all the parties comprehended in the Opposition—are on the eve of being called to office, is a matter which will probably be determined before this Article will see the light. But either as a Ministry or an Opposition, their conduct, we conjecture, will direct the course of public affairs; and they must adopt a radical change of conduct, or they will neither stand as the one, nor succeed as the other.

What made them so unpopular and powerless, so long as the Tory body differed from them? What caused many of their more honest supporters to confess, that they were better out of office than in it? It was not the want of talent, because they generally possessed much more of it than their opponents; they greatly excelled in parliamentary oratory; their press displayed far more ability, boldness, and zeal, than the Tory one; but still, with these immense advantages, the country despised and hated them. The causes are not involved in mystery, and if they be again put into operation, they will produce the same effects.

In the first place, they followed extreme abstract principle, without regarding other considerations. They advocated Catholic Emancipation on abstract right and liberty, although it is manifest that these are dependent on, and therefore ought to be subordinate to, the Constitution. They called for reform on abstract right, although it is clearly a matter of public utility. They attacked the whole trading and monetary system of the empire on abstract opinion, although it was evident to all that a change would produce general confiscation and misery. On similar ground they warred against almost all laws and institutions. They were so far from allowing weight to circumstances, that they insisted their doctrines ought to be adopted, no matter what evil and loss might be the consequence. These doctrines were, in general, mere disputed and fallacious opinions; yet they placed them in opposition to the public weal, and made their application, even through the sacrifice of the latter, the great object of government.

This was their conduct touching foreign policy as well as domestic. Abstract liberty, whether real or counterfeit, was to be supported, in utter contempt of national interest and reputation. Every foreign revolution or rebellion, no matter what its real objects might be, or what consequences it was calculated to produce in the state where it took place, or to the world at large, was to be countenanced by this country, though the heaviest losses, and even war, might follow. They thus made foreign policy a thing, not to protect and promote the foreign interests of the empire, to maintain general tranquillity, and to improve the condition of men and nations, with cautious reference to circumstances and obligations, but to sacrifice British interests, generate war, and fill the world with convulsion and anarchy.

• In the second place, the Whigs not only acted thus, but brought their creed to bear regularly against public interests and feelings; they made their war against the Ministry, one against the leading divisions of the empire, both severally and in the aggregate. The Sovereign and his Court were continually assailed by them on no better ground than the character which kings and courts are reputed to bear in the abstract; and while this drew on them the animosity of both, the country was not blind to its revolutionary tendency. Not satisfied with indirectly attacking the Church by their support of the Catholic claims, they carried on direct hostilities against her on every point, and compelled her to be their enemy for self-preservation. It was not enough for them that their trading, currency, and reform doctrines struck at the possessions of the aristocracy; but they vilified it in every way, and, of course, gained its hatred. They displayed similar conduct towards most of the great interests. In their advocacy of the Catholic claims, &c. they not only opposed the feelings of the community, but cast on it every calumny and insult. On every contested point between this country and foreign ones, they fought with the latter, and exhibited the blind fury of hired partisans. An anti-English spirit, flinty, morose, and malignant, pervaded their whole conduct, which assailed every thing dear to the Englishman, and from which he recoiled in disgust and disdain.

Abroad, their patronage of liberty was coupled with relentless hostility towards almost all established government. In addition to espousing the cause of disaffection and rebellion, they continually declaimed against friendly monarchs as despots. On the one hand, this covered them with the animosity of every ally, and almost every foreign power; and on the other, it produced the conviction in the nation, that as Ministers, they could not do other than inflict all imaginable injuries on its foreign interests. It served as evidence that a Whig Ministry would be distrusted and detested by foreign governments, and would give to England both the character and the treatment of a common disturber.

By all this the Whigs gave every advantage to their opponents: they forced them into the right, and seized on the wrong themselves, in every matter. They conferred on the Tories the reputation of being the only men of business—the only cautious, practical, and wise statesmen. The Crown, the Church, the Aristocracy, various of the great trading interests, and the body of the community, were made by them almost the slaves of the Tory Ministers. All the latter required for preserving their invincibility, were the cheap merit of consistency, and opposition to Whiggism; with these they could do, or leave undone, as they thought good, in perfect security from the loss of power. In no time of distress and dissatisfaction was a Whig Ministry thought of; the Whigs had wholly incapacitated themselves for identifying themselves in such times with public feeling.

We repeat, that the same conduct will again produce the same fruits. In every party contest, the country is pretty sure to support the right. Those who are the most prudent, practical, and upright in personal character, who are the most disinterested and patriotic in creed, and who are the most closely identified with its feelings and interests, will have its favour, and be invincible.

At present, both the great parties are in harmony with each other, and in opposition to the country, on the points which more immediately affect public interests. The country entertains about equal dislike for both; but the advantage is on the side of the Whigs. The latter, in addition to this advantage, have the choice of ground and weapons.

As a Ministry, if the Whigs make no change of system, they will speedily be ruined; it will be utterly impossible for them to maintain themselves in office. The present system must prohibit the empire from knowing prosperity, and keep it generally in great suffering. So long as it may be adhered to, it must receive extension, and, by such extension, the suffering must receive continual augmentation. If a Ministry be bound by its policy to keep the community in distress—if it be restricted from removing the sources of loss and want, and compelled to multiply them, it is impossible for it to stand for a moment, save through the support of an Opposition.

If the Whigs enter office, and make no change, how will they be circumstanced? The country is filled with misery and discontent; and, instead of being able to remove, they will be compelled to increase them. Their puerilities touching retrenchment and the reduction of taxes will avail them nothing, because these are incapable of yielding any sensible relief. Not a single leading public evil can they attempt to remove; all their measures must be unpopular ones, and calculated to array against them the most powerful interests. And they will have to encounter a potent opposition, which will have the advantage of argument, and be supported by the country at large. A large part of the present ministers will back out of their creed, and their supporters will be relieved from silence. In such a state of things, it would be utterly impossible for the Whig Ministry to endure, saying nothing of other matters.

The formation of such a Ministry, to act on the present system, would at once give to party warfare the proper character; it would make such warfare turn on the real nature of principles and measures. The Whigs in late years have rested their hopes of office on supporting government; but if the present Ministers lose it, their hopes of regaining it must stand on general opposition. The currency, the free trade laws, the relief and defence of the landed and other interests, would form the topics of contention; the Opposition would take its ground on public interest and feeling, and it would be irresistible.

As an Opposition, if the Whigs act as they have done, they will only uphold the Ministry and destroy themselves. Nothing, in truth, could be more ridiculous and vain than for a body of men who profess to agree with the Ministry in essentials, and especially in those on which the country differs from it, to stand forward as its regular opponents.

Here is the Jewish Question, on which we have already given our opinion in the abstract. If the Jews, on the whole, be rather hostile than friendly to the measure—and such we believe is the fact—it is highly improper to press it. A change is attempted at the cost of the Church, in favour of which no public necessity or benefit can be pleaded, and which is distasteful to the only people whom it can serve. The Church must naturally infer, that its injury, and not the advantage of the Jews, is the real object of the Whigs; and it must throw its political weight into the scale against them.

Speaking with reference to party interests only, nothing could be more preposterous than the aggressive war which the Whigs wage against the Church. She must, and will, be supported by the aristocracy and the body of the country; and they must provoke the political hostility of both if they provoke hers. It is hopeless for any party to triumph by heading the Dissenters against her in offensive hostilities, and it ought to be so. A Ministry should be a conservative body; and should never consist of men who would mutilate and undermine national institutions, fan the flame of religious strife, and aid such strife in producing the worst consequences.

By attacking the Church, the Whigs will do that for the Wellington Party, which its own efforts can never do; they will coerce the Church and country into the support of this party against them.

Here are Lord Milton and other Whigs assailing the corn laws. Let the body of Whigs support them in it, and they will make the aristocracy and landed interest their enemies from necessity; whatever dislike the latter may feel towards the Wellington Party, they must still support it; however they may wish for a change of ministry, they must still do their utmost to prevent the existence of a Whig one.

In the Greek business, the country at large takes no interest. This business, in all its changes of form, never varies its character for folly and iniquity. It began in plundering Turkey, and it is ending in plundering Greece. It was originally a wild crusade to give to the Greeks freedom and independence; and it is now a savage conquest over them, to deprive them of the most sacred national rights, and hawk them about for a sovereign as something even below slaves. Here is a pretended independent nation, which is not suffered to have a voice in the defining of its own territory or the choice of its own monarch! In happy consistency with the whole, is the bungling portion which concerns Prince Leopold. The three great powers, without troubling themselves even to assert that they have a right to do it, and in utter scorn of the opinion of the people, fix the territories of Greece and offer its throne to a foreigner. The foreigner, who has not the smallest claim, instantly assumes all the airs of ownership, and insists, that with the throne, they shall supply him with a treasury and a portion of the dominions of Turkey. Because they will only suffer him to grasp the money, and refuse him permission to draw his own boundaries, he rejects the gift they offer, and sends them a-begging through Europe for a king for Greece.

On this business, the Whigs might take strong ground. They might ask, why, if the Greeks be competent to form an independent nation, they have not been suffered to manage their own affairs. They might protest against the right of the three powers to assign limits to their territory, and impose on them a form of government and a ruler. And they might make a stand against imposing on Britain the liability to pay the debts of Greece. They even might denounce the policy of forming a number of souls into an independent state, who are incapable of conquering their own territory, selecting their form of government and king, providing themselves with revenue, managing their general affairs, defending themselves—in a word, of discharging the duties and obligations of independence. Instead of doing this, the Whigs are identifying themselves with all the folly and wrong, and labouring to give the matter the worst issue possible touching public interests.

What is the public feeling in respect of Portugal? It is that the people have a right to choose their own form of government and sovereign, and that it is the duty of England to attend to her own interests without mixing herself up in their broils. Year after year the interests of this country are neglected and sacrificed in relation to Portugal; and for what? Is it to plunge that nation into war and anarchy, or to enable the Brazilian emperor to deprive it of all national rights? Or is it to gratify pique and revenge in a personal war against the king? Nothing could be more foolish than the conduct of the Whigs on this subject. Granting that the Portuguese sovereign is what he is represented to be, it is still clear to all men, that in what he has done, he has had, not only the country's consent, but its assistance. His acts, in so far as England can take cognizance of them, are the acts of Portugal—they form no ground of quarrel; yet to be revenged on him the Whigs call for the sacrifice of public interests, and even the violation of national law and rights. The country does not participate in their folly; and it naturally asks itself whether a Whig Ministry would not light up general war by endeavouring to dethrone the King of Portugal.

Conduct like this must compel the country to support the Wellington Party against them.

In regard to affairs generally, if the Whigs as an Opposition only differ from the Ministry on petty points, in which the country takes little interest—if the difference reach no farther than trifling details of retrenchment, impracticable reductions of taxes, and minor points of foreign policy; and if in it they trample on public advantage, sacrifice practical good to abstract creed, and thwart, impede, and oppose merely for party gain; they will cover themselves with the contempt of the country. And if on important matters they support the Ministry—if when great masses of the community petition Parliament for relief from injury and suffering, they join in refusing it—if when the community at large calls for enquiry and remedy under distress, they combine with the Ministry to disobey the call—if they assist in forcing on the country perilous changes and innovations against its wishes—if they aid in refusing to enquire into the operation of laws which are alleged to be destructive, to remove evils and to redress wrongs—if they do this, they will cover themselves with the country's hatred. Such conduct will ruin them, and make the Wellington party omnipotent.

There is only one path which can possibly lead the Whigs to success; if they take it, their triumph must be equally certain and glorious.

An Opposition, to tread this path, must, in foreign policy, advocate the settlement of the Greek and Portuguese questions, on such grounds as public law and British interests prescribe. It must separate itself from romance, abstract visions, and foreign interests; and labour to promote the weal of this empire by rational, practical means, and in an English spirit. When Ministers, in obedience to the existing system, offer to surrender British monopolies to foreigners, or to give advantages to the latter, it must firmly withstand them; when they neglect to use the power and means which this country possesses for obtaining monopolies and advantages against its competitors, it must denounce their conduct.

The West India colonies are in great discontent and suffering. It must advocate such a settlement of the slave question as will meet their sanction, and such sober practical measures as will give them better prices for their produce.

The Canadas are in danger of being grievously injured by the concession of their West India trade to the United States. It must strongly oppose such concession.

The Colonial fisheries are distressed and declining. It must state their condition, detail the benefits they are capable of yielding, and call for bounties, and other means of enabling them to contend successfully with their competitors, and to flourish.

It must oppose the monopoly of the East India Company, as being one enjoyed, not by this country against foreign nations, but by a few individuals to the prejudice of the community at large. And it must call for measures to encourage in the East Indies the production of various commodities which this country now buys of foreigners.

Great changes have been made in the commercial and monetary systems of the empire, and the time, at any rate, has arrived when rigorous enquiry should be made into the fruits. The public feeling, as well as the public weal, imperiously demands such enquiry. Have these changes succeeded, or met with decided failure? Has the empire flourished, or declined, under them? The Opposition, instead of taking for granted that the dogmas on which they have been made are true, must ascertain how far their truth or falsehood has been established by experiment; it must cast mere opinion to the winds, and call for demonstration.

Agriculture is in great suffering; and, disregarding abstract creed, it must enquire impartially into the causes. It must, looking at every article of produce, ascertain how far the present laws yield that protection to the agriculturists which is essential for preserving them from loss and suffering, and advocate sound measures for giving them prosperity.

The shipping, and many other interests, are distressed; and it must act towards them in the same manner. It must not be the partisan, but, on national grounds, it must receive facts, scrutinize causes, and support the approved means for removing evils and creating prosperity.

Various counties are suffering severely from excess of labourers and pauperism. It must endeavour to apply a remedy, not by mutilating and making experiments on the Poor Laws, but by the rational means of removing the excess. The influx of Irish labourers does great injury to the body of the working classes and the payers of poor-rates; it must endeavour to prevent it, by providing such labourers with employment on their waste lands at home, causing them to emigrate to the colonies, and compelling Ireland to maintain her own poor. A vast part of the labouring orders are enduring great misery from inadequate wages; it must investigate the sources of such wages, and call for the proper remedies.

With regard to the currency, it must examine its working, and collect facts to discover whether the charges against bank-notes, and the praises bestowed on gold, be true or erroneous. It must insist on comprehensive enquiry, and the adoption of the measures which the result of such enquiry may prescribe.

In church matters, this Opposition must make itself the friend and protector of the Church as well as of the Dissenters. It must, in alliance with her heads, assist her in accomplishing such necessary reforms, as will relieve her from odium, render her general clergy more efficient, and increase her popularity and stability. When she is slandered, it must vindicate her; when she is unjustly attacked, it must defend her. It must cultivate peace between her and the Dissenters, keep both as much as possible from party politics, and restrict both from attempting vicious encroachments.

It must on all occasions labour to protect and promote the interests of religion and public morals.

Were an Opposition to act in this manner, it would, on most important points, range itself against the Ministry on unassailable national grounds; the support of the country would render it irresistible, and, as a Ministry, the success of its measures would give it the confidence and popularity requisite for enabling it to crush every enemy.

We are not saying what the Whigs will do, or what they ought to do.

Our object is merely to shew the state of parties, and to point out what will flow from the course they may decide on. That they will cast from them the golden opportunity for retrieving their character, and obtaining power, is pretty certain; if they even be not compelled to do so, their past madness almost demonstrates that they will do it from choice.

But whatever course the Whigs may take, the country can scarcely fail of benefiting largely from their acting as a regular Opposition. If they do not take the right one themselves, they will in time drive the Ministry into it. Let the war be fairly commenced, and one of the belligerents must make its stand on public interest and feeling. Its weakness on some points will compel it to court public support by sacrifices on others; its interest will lead it to place itself under the direction of the country.

In this state of things, it is evidently the duty of all patriotic men to disregard names, to look at creed and conduct alone, and to make their support depend solely on merit. Instead of being again degraded and trampled on as the instruments of party, let them, in conjunction with the country, control and direct it.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,

My aunt Adelgitha Penelope Smith was a most worthy old lady ; and her memory will long be held in respect, in consequence of her various good properties ; but more especially for the inflexible resolution with which she defended herself against the attacks of a legion of lovers, and, at length, departed this life, leaving many grounds of consolation to her relatives. Yet, during her valuable life, she lived not for herself alone. She was kind to the poor, and supported a school for their children, which was holden daily in a small building, in the roof of which dwelt an aged favourite, whose habits and temper, in his latter days, rendered him an unfit companion for her boudoir, wherein he had whilom spent much of his time. The animal, thus banished from society, became morose and ascetic, which we should not have wondered at, had we been aware that he had taken to scribbling, a propensity which commonly leads the victim thereunto to believe himself a very important animal, whatever other people may think or say to the contrary. So—there he seems to have sat, “alone in his glory,” profiting by the instruction of the schoolmaster, and hugging himself, according to the manner of his kind, in the belief that he was inditing what would astonish the world.

It was my lot to discover his papers, which have been sadly nibbled by the mice ; and I forward you two or three of the most perfect sheets, thinking that they may be found to contain matter quite as important as the “Reminiscences” of certain bipeds which have lately been given to the public.

I am, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

J. SMITH.

Christopher North, Esq.

THE REMINISCENCES OF AN OLD MONKEY.

For the last few days I have felt myself extremely uncomfortable. My appetite has failed me, and I have been troubled with unpleasant dreams and strange fancies, both by day and night. “Why is this ?” I ask myself, “what can the matter be ? I cannot surely be in love in my old age ?” Oh, no ! The years of such pleasing folly have long since past, and all the gaieties and frolicsome pranks of my youth are but as a dream. I recall them to memory alternately with a smile and a sigh ; and, as I sit and mumble my nuts in solitude with my few remaining teeth, and view the grey hairs which cover my emaciated and shrivelled frame, I find it difficult to imagine that I am the same monkey that was once the life and soul of every party. And as for love—even if my years did not exempt me from the torments of the tender passion, who could I be in love with ? I have often felt a conviction that I am the only survivor of my race ; and love cannot exist without hope !

Of this latter truth I was long since convinced, by an adventure which befell me in my voyage from India to Europe. The ship in which I was a passenger, or rather a prisoner, stopped to take in a supply of water, and was, as I then thought, very fortunately, becalmed. The face of the country was altogether too tempting to be withstood, and I made my escape to the shore, where I roved and revelled for many hours in all the luxury of newly recovered liberty. But, when evening drew near, I felt a painful sense of loneliness, and was beginning to wish myself again on shipboard, when my eyes were ravished by the sight of one of the most beautiful creatures I had ever beheld. She was sitting upon the bank of a small rivulet, with her elegant tail gracefully spread in a circle upon the ground, close around her, so as to appear as though she was seated upon a cushion of rich black and white fur. I approached as carefully as possible; but when within a few yards, she looked round, and uttering a cry of alarm, started up and ran off to the adjacent woods. Had I pursued immediately, doubtless I should have overtaken her; but I was paralysed. As she rose and fled, her tail streamed behind like that of a comet. Many a tail have I seen since, but never one like that. A lover's description of his mistress, however, as I have since had frequent occasion to observe, is seldom interesting to any one else. I shall therefore only say, that she was the handsomest of the ringtailed species, of whose very existence I was not previously aware.

A passion, which I then believed would terminate only with my life, instantly took possession of me. I ran after her, and in wild and tender accents, besought her to take pity upon a poor solitary being, far from home, and in a strange land. But all remained silent, save the coarse howling of some unknown animals which dwelt in that country; and I passed a sleepless night in a tree, anxiously watching for the morning, that I might be enabled to seek the mistress of my affections, and offer her my vows. Ere the sun rose, I began the search; yet it was noonday ere we met. Her shyness at first was excessive; but at length I persuaded her to sit quietly and listen to my story, at which she felt much interested, though it was evident that she doubted my word when I told her that I had crossed the sea. She then informed me that she likewise had lost sight of her own tribe and kindred, which had been alarmed and scattered by strange noises along the shore, which I suspect were from the guns of the ship.

So there we were, alone in that wilderness! And when two young monkeys are left alone together in a wood, what can be expected? There was something singular about the countenance of my dear Cinera,* which I could not help occasionally wishing were more in character with those of my own tribe; but then there was a gentleness in her manners, and a lightness and elegance in her every movement, which were perfectly bewitching, and which were doubtless greatly enhanced by the splendid black and white ringtail, the recollection of which even now sometimes haunts my pillow.

We had spent some hours together, and I flattered myself that all was going on favourably for me. We were again at the side of the rivulet, seated, side by side, beneath a low spreading tree that overhung the water; and she had, at my request, assumed the same attitude as when I first saw her; and I was gazing passionately upon her, while her eyes were modestly cast upon the ground. If ever I felt the tender passion, it was at that moment! But I was soon to be cured, and in a very different way from what I had anticipated. The very recollection makes my blood run cold! I was sitting, as before described, lost to every earthly thing, save the beautiful Cinera, when suddenly I felt a sharp twitch across my two forepaws, by which they were perfectly benumbed; and, looking round, I beheld a monstrous animal with a huge grinning mouth, and blue ribbed cheeks,† standing over me with a stick, with which he was about to repeat his blow. Resistance was out of the question against such a baboon, and, therefore, I immediately sprang aside, and made my escape, leaving Cinera to do the same. For some time I dared not venture to look round; but finding I was not pursued, I at length halted to draw breath, and then, casting my eyes towards the fatal spot, I beheld the hideous creature squatting by the side of Cinera, and sharing with her a pile of fruit which I had toiled hard to collect, and which I had presented to her as a pledge of the sincerity of my affection. What was to be done? My whole frame trembled with agony. I thought of taking a stone, and creeping slyly up the tree and letting it fall upon the monster's head; but my paws hung powerless by my side, and refused to perform their office.

* "Prosimas cineren, caudâ cinctâ annulis alternatim albis et nigris." The most elegant of the maucauco species, and of a mild and harmless nature.

† "Simia Sphinx." Linn.

Yet a spell seemed to be upon me, and I could not tear myself from the spot. So I stood aloof and gazed, and a gleam of hope even then came upon me. He will soon have devoured the fruit, thought I; and as for his being a rival in the beautiful ring-tail's affections with a well-formed and comely monkey like me, that is quite out of the question.

I was right respecting his appetite; for the gormandizing wretch would have crunched fifty times the quantity between his tremendous jaws; but no opportunity was afforded me of judging whether he really had sufficient vanity to talk of love. At that period my eyes were particularly good; so that, though I was more than three hundred yards distant, I plainly perceived a hideous, leering, liquorish expression in his countenance, as he looked towards Cinera, and drew his right arm, from the elbow down to the paw, across his frightful grinning mouth. "By my native groves!" cried I, "this is too much!" and such was my agitation, that I plainly heard my heart thump against my ribs.

At this moment, however, there arose a strange outcry in the woods, which excited the attention of all parties. Cinera jumped upon her hind legs, and uttered a respondent shriek, at which the outcry was repeated, and suddenly a large party of ringtails, who were doubtless her friends and relatives, rushed forward into the open ground. The baboon looked sulkily round, and began his retreat by slowly and awkwardly lounging, and pretending occasionally to jump, along the banks of the rivulet, which, by a circuitous course, came to the spot where I lay concealed. The lovely ringtail—now for ever lost to me—was instantly surrounded by her own tribe; and there was such a confused chattering among them, that I in vain endeavoured to ascertain whether they were congratulating or scolding the amiable truant. Amid the group, which had now grown very numerous, I plainly discerned her, as she stood alone in a sort of ring which they had formed round her; and she appeared to be addressing the multitude. With intense feelings of anxiety, I observed that she pointed in the direction which I took when scampering away from the baboon. Hope and strange ambitious dreams instantly arose within me. I perceived that she was a female of high rank among them, and judged that I was the subject of her discourse. "Dear creature!" said I to myself, "she is no doubt endeavouring to describe my perfections, and asking her parents' consent to our happy union. It is evident that her race are much behind my own nation in the noble art of climbing; but I will take pity upon their ignorance, and our young family shall be brought up according to the customs of Persia. In the meanwhile, I will, by long accounts of my travels, and the display of my agility, astonish the natives, and, as a matter of course, I shall become their leader."

Such was my last soliloquy in that country; and it was scarcely terminated, when the whole body of ringtails uttered a simultaneous yell, and advanced towards the place of my retreat. Their grimaces were too evidently hostile for me to wait the result: therefore, when they were within about a hundred yards, I rose up and fled, and, in an instant, all were in pursuit of me. I made for the sea-shore, where I had left the ship on the preceding day, and where she still fortunately lay at anchor. My speed was such that I gained ground considerably of all the ringtails, whose yells were far behind when I arrived within half a mile of the water side; and then, and not till then, I took courage to look back. Never shall I forget the horror which then took possession of me! Not twenty yards in my rear was that detestable ribbed-nose baboon who had driven me from happiness. He had joined, unknown to me, in the chase, and at every bound, notwithstanding his apparent clumsiness, gained upon me; and what made him still more horrible was the brandishing of that fearful stick, the painful effects of which I had already experienced. On he came, and nearer and yet nearer I heard the bounding of his hind legs, and the whirring of that awful weapon! Still I strained every nerve, and the ground appeared to fly from under me; but all my exertion seemed vain—the monster was now so close that I expected every bound would bring him on my tail. I heard him draw his breath, and fancied that the hot and impure air, which issued from his mouth, warmed the nape of my neck. Fear added wings to my flight—I saw nothing—I knew nothing—I cared for nothing;—death itself was nothing, so that I might escape from that inconceivable horror! To all that happened afterwards I was insensible. I made one tremendous bound—it seemed as though I had leaped beyond the limits of earth, and was careering it amid the clouds—then came a noise as of thunder, and anon a yell of agony more piercing than the cry of ten thousand cats, and then all was darkness—sudden and unusual darkness;—for my eyes were open, and my limbs continued in full activity, yet without performing their duty; for the ground was gone from beneath me, and the light of day had closed upon me. I had jumped into the sea!

The noises which I had heard in my descent were the firing of a gun, and the consequent cry of my wounded pursuer. One of the ship's boats happened to be at the usual place of landing at the moment; and by the exertions of the crew, I was snatched from a watery grave, after I had rescued myself, by my agility and that desperate leap, from the great blue-nosed baboon.

The revulsion which had taken place in my feelings was extraordinary; for immediately I found myself safe on shipboard, I would not have given a rotten nut for my hitherto beloved Cinera. She became as nothing to me; nay, the recollection of her, for some time after this adventure, was absolutely disgusting; so that I really think, had she at that period been delivered up to me, I should have contrived to throw her overboard. Reflection has, since that time, led me to do justice to her good qualities; for, after all, she did but submit to the guidance of her parents and friends, and is most likely long since married to some one in her own sphere of life. I question much, indeed, whether one bred up in the evident barbarity of the ring-tails would ever have made a fit companion for me. But—let that pass.

I shall only add, that my love was completely dispelled when hope vanished; and that, from my own experience, I am convinced that a stick, properly applied, and a good ducking, would do more towards curing young monkeys, who fancy they are dying for love, than any other remedy with which I am acquainted.

My own occasional lowness of spirits at the present period, however, proceeds, I am convinced, from very different causes. Alone as I am, in a country far distant from the place of my birth and early associations, I cannot avoid recollecting that such things were; and a sigh will sometimes escape me when I reflect that the remainder of my days must be spent among beings so artificial as the human race. I am disgusted with their vain boastings. To hear them talk, one would really imagine that they were all perfection; and yet they are indebted to the beasts of the field and the birds of the air, and even to poor miserable worms, for their outward skins, their own being of such a wretched texture as to be nearly useless; and, strange as it may seem to animals who have been clad by nature, these borrowed coverings are a chief source of pride to the creatures called men and women. The greater part of their lives is spent in putting them off and on, and endeavouring to procure a greater variety, in which to strut about and endeavour to imitate the monkey tribe. But their imitations are perfectly ridiculous, and never can approach the graceful and natural agility of our tribes, which they, notwithstanding, affect to consider as beneath them!

It would be an endless task to recount all the follies of their various attempts at concealing their natural deformity. The males, having no tail of their own, decorate themselves with one made from the wool of sheep; and so ignorant are they of the real and native elegance of this appendage, that they split it into two pieces, which hang uselessly dangling behind them! The variety of these mock upper skins worn by the females is yet infinitely greater; a circumstance the more remarkable, because that sex have far less occasion for concealing their persons. Indeed, I have seen some of them who need not fear a comparison with the comeliest of our own tribes. They have far more natural vivacity than the males, are much more kind and amiable in disposition, and, particularly when young, evince a partiality for the monkey race in general, which has frequently been a source of amusement to me. Their sham skins are usually of various colours, but generally so arranged as to indicate that they wish to look like birds, while their mates endeavour, as much as possible, to appear like us.

* * * * *

It was my misfortune, in early life, to fall into the hands of this species of animals, of whose existence no one, in the extensive districts belonging to our tribes, was previously aware; and it has been my lot, with some few brief intervals, to remain among them ever since. I am now grown old and grey in captivity; but I shall not indulge in the natural garrulity of old age to such an extent as to write all the events of my eventful life, notwithstanding that hope sometimes whispers flatteringly in mine ear, that many monkeys will peruse these reminiscences with interest and gratification, if not with advantage.

It is acknowledged by all, that the earth has undergone strange and divers revolutions, not only as it regards its organic formation, and the changes constantly in progress by the agency of rivers, floods, seas, and subterranean fires, but in the power held by different animals over extensive tracts upon its surface. Long before man was known, our tribes possessed a wide and undisputed sway over regions now disfigured in a strange manner by what are called houses, little dirty hillocks with holes in them, from whence smoke issues, as if in petty imitation of a volcano. Men dwell in these, and have so increased in number for the last few centuries, that it really becomes a serious question how their encroachments are to be put a stop to, so as to preserve upon the face of the earth a sufficient space for the aboriginal inhabitants. Sometimes a feeling of despair comes over me when I think on the present state of things, and I am haunted with the idea, almost amounting to conviction, that I am doomed to be the last monkey. But it may not be so! The reign of man, like that of the lions, tigers, and elephants, must have an end: and then our tribes may again be in the ascendant. Why they should not now be so I cannot conceive, unless it be from a want of union among ourselves; for such is the cowardice of the human race, that even I, old and decrepid as I am, have put half a dozen to flight by merely shewing my teeth, and could clear the whole house where I am now writing in five minutes, were it not that I find their services convenient in this strange country, where there are few trees, and scarcely any fruit worth gathering. So I employ them to bring me food from better climates, and, upon the whole, have little reason to complain of their neglect. But it was not always thus. I have undergone many hardships, particularly after my first arrival in this country, which they call Great Britain, although it is but a small island, and a mere speck when compared with other nations. But the inhabitants possess a great deal of influence among their kind, owing, it is said, principally to certain of them called sailors. And I am inclined to believe the fact, partly because I have had opportunities of witnessing the bravery of that class of men, and received many attentions from them during my voyage here; but, principally, because the generality of them have a real tail, (which, however, grows out of their head!) and are very expert in the noble science of climbing.

I am aware that many things which I may state will probably startle monkeys of a future age; but I consider myself as performing a duty for the benefit of future generations. Future generations did I say? What, and if there should be no more! Again that dreadful apprehension comes over me! Cold and chill, and shudderingly, it creeps throughout my whole system—it shakes me to the centre—and again my blood returns throbbing, boiling, and rushing through my veins, my brain feels scorched, and in vain I seek to quench in tears those torments which inwardly consume me, as I think on my bitter doom of desolation. And am I indeed to be the last monkey? No; I will not admit the idea, notwithstanding the fruitless research which I have prosecuted for years to discover one of my own kind. Still, methinks, some portion of our race must exist in the enjoyment of liberty and independence, basking in the rays of the genuine monkey sun, (for here they have one which scarcely emits any warmth,) or gambolling in the delicious shade of fruit-bearing forests. But the picture is too painful for me to follow up. It recalls to me the charms of my dearest Keeba, my first love, and the graceful activity of Monicha, my second, and the amiable playfulness of Simiana, my third, and the delicately refined taste of Cereopithecus, my fourth, whose heart I won one morning by a present of two moths, and a beetle of unusual dimensions; and my fifth—alas! here memory fails me—I cannot exactly recollect who was my fifth—But it is no matter; for perhaps, after all, it scarcely becomes the gravity of age and grey hairs to dilate on such subjects.

Let me be serious, and write of more important concerns and events, so that my manuscript may prove a treasure of instruction and amusement to the fortunate monkey into whose hands it may fall, and my name and memory be cherished in after ages. First, then, of my name. I am known in this climate by that of Jocko, an appellation given to me by the human race, who thereby evinced their deplorable ignorance, since every well-informed monkey knows that Pongo* and Jocko are the names of animals very different from us, and, as I have ascertained by comparison, bearing a much greater affinity to man, and consequently, every way inferior to us in the scale of nature. Indeed the only striking similarity between man and our tribes appears to be the reciprocal taste for imitating each other; a foolish propensity, to which, in my younger days, I was much addicted, and which, to confess my folly, was the cause of my captivity. It happened in this wise. We were sitting, a whole troop of us, in calm and rational chat, under the shelter of a noble banyan-tree, which threw its hundred stems and thousand roots into the earth, and its million branches, curving in beauty, into the upper air.

There were the splendid and gaudy-coloured birds, pluming themselves in tranquillity, and there were we, sitting in picturesque groups, amid the verdant foliage, with our wives, our sweethearts, and our little ones; sometimes cracking a joke, and sometimes cracking a nut, or regaling upon the various dainties with which our pouches were stored. Suddenly an alarm was given by our sentinels of the approach of strangers. We were instantly upon the alert, and, to our astonishment, perceived about half a score animals of different and extraordinary colours advancing upon their hind legs, some with split tails, and some with the little single tail growing out of their head, as before described. Their heads were almost all different in form; one was small and flat, another large and round, like a huge gourd; a third, long and high, with a tuft of feathers at the top; and a fourth, with the sides squeezed together, and curved like a crescent moon reversed. All, however, were unnatural, and we gazed upon them, for some time, with various feelings, according to our different temperaments. For my own part, I must say that I did not share in the alarm visible in many countenances around me; a strong feeling of curiosity swallowed up every other emotion, and I kept my eye intently fixed upon the intruders, who, for some time, appeared to be totally unconscious of our vicinity.

At length some of our females, in spite of strict orders to the contrary, found it impossible to keep their tongues quiet any longer, and began a jabbering, which drew the attention of the strange creatures upon us. It was now useless to hesitate, so we all immediately joined in the cry of our tribe, and warned the intruders not to approach nearer, upon their peril, or they must abide the consequences.

The animals, however, persisted, in spite of all our vociferations, to which they only replied by a strange sort of cackling, which I have since found is called laughing, and, discordant as it is, is held by them in high estimation, as a peculiar privilege and perfection of their species.

* The greater and smaller species of Orang-outang.

When they had come under the shade of our banyan, we gave them notice to quit, in a manner which it was impossible to misunderstand, namely, by pelting them with sticks and stones, which we had previously collected, and other convenient missiles. For some time, notwithstanding, they kept their ground, and continued the cackling as before, varied occasionally by a sharp noise made by clapping their forepaws together. One among them attempted to climb into the tree; but his clumsiness was perfectly ridiculous, and amused us exceedingly. So much indeed was I delighted, that I jumped and squeaked, and nearly fell off the branch on which I sat. Never, that I recollect, was I in higher spirits. I considered the animals below us, in every respect beneath me; and in mere wantonness, took deliberate aim at the one with a half-moon head, whom I hit with part of a cocoa nutshell in the cheek, whereat he appeared to be much exasperated, and immediately seized what I then fancied was a stick, from one of his companions, and pointed it towards me. The manner in which he did this was, as I thought, exceedingly preposterous; for he held it as if to make me believe that it formed part of his own nose. I was much astonished, however, when a great noise, as of thunder, issued out of the end, with a cloud of dust, and my wife, who was close by my side, began to scream, and tumbled out of the tree. I attributed the fall to her own clumsiness, as she was an awkward monkey; and, to say the truth, we had not lived happily together for some time, for she was considerably larger than myself, and had given me a severe beating only the day before. When I saw her lying on the ground, and perfectly quiet, I knew she must be dead, being satisfied that nothing less would have quieted her; and I felt my mind greatly relieved, and began to look round among our troop for another mate.

In the meanwhile, the new-comers below began pulling my dead old wife about in a strange manner, turning her round and round, and jabbering to each other. At first I fancied they were going to eat her; but, at length, they laid her down, and I was glad to perceive that they had not had the sense to take the fruit which was in her pouch, and which I resolved to make my own immediately on their departure; for, it is one thing to lose one's wife, and another to be deprived of her property.

The strange creatures now clustered together, and began to eat and drink, after an extraordinary fashion, out of the shells of cocoa nuts and large gourds. Their mode of drinking out of the latter particularly interested us; and, when they went away, we were somewhat surprised to observe that they left several behind them standing on the ground.

Perhaps my spirits were somewhat elevated in consequence of my wife's fall. Be that as it may, I was one of the first to descend and examine the hollow gourds left by the strangers; and I was accompanied by several young females of our tribe, who had witnessed Glumdalla's accident, and therefore knew that I was at liberty to attend them. The things were half filled with what seemed to be water; so following our natural imitative propensity, we either lifted them in our forepaws, or dipped in our heads and began to drink, as the strange animals had done. In a very short space of time, I felt myself unusually vigorous and active: it seemed to me as though I was larger and stronger than any of our troop; and my courage was such, that I almost wished my old wife alive again, that I might return the drubbings she had given me. My companions likewise appeared to have undergone a change. The females seemed handsomer, and the males uglier than usual; but all were merry and clamorous; and, indeed, it appeared as though we were trying which should make the most noise, and most frequently get possession of the gourds to imitate the strangers.

I have a very confused recollection of the manner in which that eventful scene terminated. There was some quarrelling, I remember, among us, and we fought; but I have no idea what it was about. The last thing that I can call to mind appears like a dream; and I should ever have believed it nothing more, but for the deplorable consequences, by which the whole tenor of my life has been changed. It seemed as though the strange and great animals suddenly came upon us; but their manner was altogether different from that which they had practised on their first visit. Instead of moving slowly as before, they now flew about, like birds, in every direction; and I was astonished to see them overtake and lay hold of several of the most active among us. At length one approached me, and stretched out his long forepaw. Resistance against such a monster was not to be thought of. I therefore ran towards a stem of the banyan, which I unaccountably missed; but in a very short time I laid hold of another, which I thought to climb with the speed of lightning; when, to my great amazement, the whole tree had suddenly grown to such a height that its branches were above the clouds, which I plainly perceived rolling between me and them. Overcome by the dread of my pursuer, and this appalling change in the face of nature, my limbs refused to perform their office—I fell, exhausted, to the ground, and all remains a blank on the tablet of memory, from that moment till I awoke, ill and feverish, and surrounded by the human species.

It seems that the liquid which they had left in the calabashes (as they call them) was of an intoxicating nature, and had deprived us of the use of our faculties. I had got drunk. What “drunk” means, together with many other terms and things unknown among us, shall be explained in a glossary, which I shall annex to this manuscript, for the benefit of all inquisitive monkeys.

The cruelty of thus depriving us of our senses, for the sake of afterwards taking us prisoners, must appear to the reader as most execrable. But, to do justice to the human race, they do not consider the former any punishment; on the contrary, it is an infliction which they constantly practise on their dearest friends, and nothing seems to afford them greater pleasure. They meet together frequently in large bodies for this very purpose; and at the commencement of their proceedings, I have sometimes been quite startled at their very close resemblance to us, as they sit and grin and nod at each other; but, after a while, they become awkward and stupid, and are not fit to be compared with the meanest of our tribes. The only motive that I guess for this strange practice is, that they thereby get rid, for a time, of a very troublesome thing which they call “reason,” about which they are eternally chattering, and pretending that it is something superior to our instinct.

What the precise nature of this boasted “reason” is, I have never been able satisfactorily to decide. It is, however, somewhat remarkable, that whenever a man has lost what little falls to his share, in one of these drinking bouts, he always imagines that he is possessed of much more than any one else, and believes himself the only animal fit to rule over his tribe. One can hardly conceive any thing more ridiculous. If they had any quality at all comparable with instinct, it would be impossible for them to fall twice into such a stupid error; for they really make themselves quite ill by this foolish custom; and I have heard that some even hasten their death, and make their lives miserable thereby. Yet, while they are at it, they every now and then interrupt the general course of conversation, and cry out “Health!” But enough of this folly!

THE COUNTRY IN WINTER.

At one time it was a proof of the truth of any thing, however improbable it might appear, that it was in print. Allegory itself became real the moment it came forth in types, and a mere supposition in manuscript issued with the dignity of history from the press. Now indeed the case is greatly altered. I very seldom believe above one half of what I hear, and refuse my credence entirely to any thing I read. By persisting in this resolution, I avoid numberless mistakes. I follow my own judgment, without being misled by the prejudices of others; and now the accounts of Bloomfield's piety and Rowland's Kalydor, Sumner's learning and Warren's blacking, are viewed with the same respect as the voracious chronicles of Gulliver and Munchausen. In former times imagination was the mark of the poet, as well as his privilege; but now, prosers and bards, writers of essays and writers of epics, are equally devoted to fiction and romance. Descriptions even of scenery, which any one may see for himself, are not free from this besetting sin; cascades spout up in the page which were never visible in the landscape, and rivers glide in silvery meanders through winding sentences in print, which never were heard of in the neighbourhood where the scene is laid. The country has been the most fruitful theme of fanciful declamation from Horace's days till now—woods have been clothed in everlasting verdure by authors whose ideas of a forest are formed from the dusty trees of some suburban villa—fields, whether in May or December, have been loaded with perennial flowers, and the country, in all climates, ~~and~~ at all times, has flourished, according to our novelists and romancers, in perpetual charms. No sooner has Mrs Radcliffe described the smiling vales and clear skies of Italy, than the sublime Mr Joseph Fox gives us the airs of Lapland, breathing with equal softness over the laurel groves of that delicious region; daisies burst forth on the summits of the Andes, to reward the labours of Mr Francis Lathom, and nightingales sing in every hedge of the flower-encumbered fields of Siberia, to bless the listening ear of Anne of Swansea. Strange effect of a residence in Grub-street! The cries of London, which fall harshly on the outward ear, are changed, by some unaccountable power, into the melody of birds and the gush of waterfalls; the breezes of Arabia whisper in dulcet music through the un-mended pane, and every sound and sight in that lofty chamber is transformed in a moment into something rural and picturesque. Who, in reading an account of the fragrant meads and dewy uplands in which every volume is certain to abound, would imagine that he was in danger, at every step, of spraining his ankle in some half-hidden rut, of being stung by unnumbered nettles, pricked by a thousand thorns, and, finally, of being run through the body by the long sharp horns of some outrageous cow, or trodden to death by the hoofs of some prodigious bull? Yet to all these accidents, and a hundred others, he is liable in the very scenes which look so harmless and inviting in description. And babbling rills are scarcely less liable to objection, though so warmly and unanimously applauded by bards and Cockneys. The Romans, to be sure, managed to add some more pleasing circumstances to their meads and rivers than our northern fancies have hitherto devised. Every stream that murmured gently down the valley, or ran sparkling through the plain, was the habitation of some nymph clothed in ethereal beauty. Every secluded nook formed by the windings of the river, was hallowed to their imaginations as the resting-place of the Guardian Naiad;—every deep recess where the osier bent over the stream, or the willow cast its shade upon the waters, was the bower where she retired to shade herself at noon; and the wanderer along the banks heard the whispers of her voice in every ripple of the current, or caught the flashing whiteness of her naked limbs in every crest of foam that glistened for an instant against the rock. But surely in our days the case is miserably altered. Naiad—mortal or ethereal—who should fix her pellucid home in one of our northern streams, or float down its stone-encumbered channel, would be found drowned some morning on the bank of her own river, with her lovely body bruised and disfigured by bumping against the roots of trees, her eyes knocked out by the stakes of a fishing-net, and her nose entirely bitten off by the previous winter's frost. And yet people persist, beneath such a climate as ours, in giving the same praises to gentle waters and springing fountains which were applicable enough to the Peneus or Blandusia, but have certainly no connexion with the rumbling, roaring, dashing torrents we hear of, carrying away bridges, and drowning men, women, and children; while hay, corn, and furniture, pigs, chests of drawers, and crockery-ware, float on its destructive billows in undistinguishable confusion. There is something to me utterly detestable in the character of a river. When it seems smooth and quiet, it is only acting the hypocrite, and gains our confidence and esteem by an appearance of peaceableness and good order, that it may overwhelm us the more easily whenever it gets the power. In summer, it seems to be labouring under disabilities; the faint gurgle in its throat, which gets dry from so constantly crying out for water, moves us with compassion, and we can surely dread no danger from one so humbled and exhausted. But behold! the moment his prayer is granted, and his restrictions withdrawn, off rushes the Jesuitical scoundrel in every direction, emptying the farm-yard, entering and destroying the peaceful cottage, spreading fear and desolation all over the country, and even sapping the foundation of the grey turreted church, which has been the pride and admiration of the village for centuries before. All social intercourse is cut off; the banks are totally destroyed; and who is to reduce this violent and lawless agitator, now grown strong and formidable, within his ancient and legitimate bounds?

At all seasons of the year the country is dull and uninteresting, but about the dreary month of December, to every one but a regular sportsman, it becomes altogether intolerable. To him time passes pleasantly enough. He begins his labours early in the morning, walks, wades, climbs, and stumbles, till drizzle and darkness close in the day, after all which wearisome and laborious exertion he finds he has slaughtered sundry head of game, besides shooting his favourite Ponto, and slightly wounding the gamekeeper. He then gets home to dinner, relates the wonders of his aim, and in the third bottle, and fourteenth edition of how he shot the pheasant, he suddenly stops short in his story, loses his memory and his seat together, and awakens next morning on the outside of his bed, with his shoes still on his feet, and a flavour in his mouth, with regard to which the tenth commandment is in no danger of being broken. The day's exploits of a boisterous red-faced Nimrod bear a great resemblance to those of brother Ramrod. Instead of disabling a gamekeeper, he only dislocates his collar in performing an involuntary somerset over a hedge; but if he escapes this danger, his fatigue, conversation, and finale, are pretty nearly the same.

Last winter—who does not remember it, with all its concomitants of snow and storms?—solitude and the country oppressed me, till the nightmare, which regularly carried me over precipices and pits, or shook me into a blazing furnace, was a sort of relief from the dreamless ennui of my waking thoughts. Various plans occurred to me to get quit of the horrors of my situation. Marriage, strangulation, and a razor, all presented themselves in turn, but I found I had not sufficient firmness of nerve to avail myself of any of these expedients. The Slough of Despond spread its world of waters in front of my door, the window was afflicted with a sweating sickness of rain and hail in all its panes. Night came on before I was well aware that daylight had commenced; and crows cawing, rain splashing, and wind howling, formed a most agreeable concert, to which I sat and listened in loneliness, wondering all the time what the devil tempted me to remain a single week in the country after June. Away, away! the coach and I upon the pinions of the wind—and Bath, with its unnumbered lamps, glowing like a single file of stars in the high blue firmament of Landedown, presented itself to my longing eyes. Ten minutes after I had left my seat upon the box, I found myself as comfortable as if winter had been banished to the Pole, and the word Rus expunged from the Dictionary of Nature.

Is there a happier hour in the recollection of a human being than that in which, after a cold seat on the outside of the mail, with the wind whistling round the enormous hat of the coachman, jutting past the promontory of his shoulder, and doubling the cape so as to come with full force on your unprotected visage, you at last arrive in the coffee-room, with fires blazing, gas shining, clean sanded floors, and a couple of grilled fowls smoking in a quiet box for your own peculiar entertainment, flanked with a huge hirlas of Meux's own, and succeeded by toasted cheese, and an ad libitum of cogniac and water? Moments such as these never depart from the memory. Old men of eighty years of age remember (after their sainted wives are quietly forgotten) the hot suppers which enchanted them after cold and travelling sixty years before. The eye of one of these, which is dimly fixed on the white head of his youngest granddaughter, and scarcely distinguishes the flaxen ringlets on which his palsied hand is laid, sees quite distinctly the beef-steaks which cheered him that dreadfully cold night in November when he returned from London in the year 1769. With preternatural vision he beholds the foam of the tankard, and recollects even the individual features of the fowl, the breast melting in loveliness and gravy, the parson's nose lying half hid beneath the odoriferous ocean, and the mushrooms scattered over its surface, as the Isles of Greece repose on the bosom of the blue Ægean. All these memories come vividly back upon his heart; and, in the gradual failing of nature—in the decay of his fancy, and blunting of his feelings—the suppers of his youth are the only ties which still bind him to his fellows. Yes! till the last pulse of pain in my gouty toe, before it follows my other foot into the grave—till Memory comes to the last page of her day-book, and Death writes Finis to all the accounts of life—shall I remember, with a pensive and melancholy satisfaction, the petite soupers of the Castle and Ball! Thomas's brown wig and the bald pate of Bob shall be equally dear to my heart; and whisky punch shall be to me a blank in the creation ere I forget one smile of the loveliest bar-maid and best maker of toddy in the King's wide dominions. On one occasion, and one only, I established myself at a boarding-house; but great and manifold are the dangers and discomforts of that situation. For the first two days I sat at dinner next to a young lady, who paid me the most marvellous attentions. Smiles followed my commonest remarks; and, such is the force of good-nature, I almost began to fancy, in spite of a squint, and an unusual prolongation of the nasal feature, that she was interesting and pretty. A friend of mine, who had received a call to repentance just before marrying a lady of great piety and fortune, was very desirous of effecting a similar conversion upon me; and, on my dining with him, he reasoned very deeply on the ugliness of vice and the beauty of virtue, magnifying at the same time the charms of temperance, till, in the middle of a sentence about matrimony and hell, his eyes grew glazed, his mouth opened to a superhuman width, and, about the same moment, a confusion came on my own thoughts, for which I have never been able to account. I recollect, however, that I left him with tears running down his cheeks, muttering something which sounded very like a song. On arriving at my temporary domicile, I hurried as rapidly and unostentatiously as possible up stairs, but unfortunately encountered some one in my progress—rank, name, and denomination to me unknown. Oblivion rests on what I said on that occasion, and all my efforts to remember only involve me in greater uncertainty and forgetfulness. Next morning, what deep silence brooded over the breakfast table—what awful dignity gloomed upon every brow!—alas! even my smiling friend smiled and was attentive to me no more. She, it appeared, had been my fair interlocutor in my hurried ascent to my couch; and from what I gathered from the hints of the disconsolate damsel herself, and the hostess's guarded enquiries, I began to discover that I.

had been somewhat too polite and complimentary, and even raved a great deal about post-horses and Gretna Green. I was now asked by a fat old lady, who turned out to be my Dulcinea's aunt, whether I was serious in my proposals, and if so, (which she could not permit herself to doubt,) what I was disposed to settle on her amiable, injured, too susceptible, but unportioned niece. I professed a total ignorance of the whole transaction, hinted that I was liable to fits of madness, in corroboration of which, I gnashed my teeth, and looked as horrible as I could, and next day removed into the delights and freedom of an inn. It is a melancholy circumstance, that in a Christian land there should be places in which it is impossible to walk up stairs without a candle after a quiet dinner with a friend, without a manifest risk of stumbling into a marriage. Luckily, in a hotel there is no such danger as this. Boots and the head waiter, who convey any incapacitated gentleman to his room, rarely translate his compliments and praises into a declaration of attachment; so that, after an agreeable night of cigars and conversation, I can comfortably lay myself down to sleep, in the assurance of waking next morning to the enjoyment of celibacy and soda-water.

On first arriving in a town, I know nothing so detestable as letters of introduction; but luckily, though it is impossible to refuse them from your friends, there is not the least necessity for presenting them. I have at this moment, I suppose, some scores of unknown acquaintances at the bottom of my trunk, whose fate I often pity in having no opportunity of securing the friendship of an individual so wonderfully recommended. A man ought always to form his own friends, and assuredly there is no such field for a crop of them as the coffee-room of an inn. There you may speak for half an hour to your neighbour on any subject you please: if you find him a violent whig, a liberal, a profane swearer, or a hypocrite, or any thing of that sort, treat him in future with the silent contempt he deserves. But if you discover him to be one of the right kind, how easy it is to convert the distance of unintroduced acquaintance into the cordiality of old and well-cemented friendship.

If you once ~~dine~~ ^{dine} together in the same box, before you have demolished the last limb of the turkey, and sipped the last glass of the Madeira, his face is as familiar to you as your glove,—and at the end of the evening, amidst the wreck of devilled bones, and the remnants of what once was “fruit and flower,” opposite to you in a dim, mystic indistinctness, awful, and yet wonderfully beloved, you see sitting the chosen friend of your soul, whose name (which you never heard) you wonder you have forgotten, whose friends, home, parentage, and education, are to you mere objects of conjecture,—but who, in the absence of all collateral ties, as you swallow the last bumper to his health, is “dear as the ruddy drops which warm your heart.”

Such friendships as these are generally lasting. You take a personal pride in finding you have not been deceived in your choice, and he is endeared to you by being a friend entirely of your own acquisition. Far different this from the feelings you entertain towards the friend of your friend. In this case his kindness appears to you to be scarcely voluntary, and you fancy it is less bestowed on you, quasi yourself, than as the representative of the person who introduced you. You are assured that any one with the same recommendation, would be received with the same attention; and even the smiles of the ladies, though in the first instance falling on yourself, you fear may have been intended to “cannon” on your friend. You enact the miserable part of the hat stuck on a pole, to which as much deference is paid as to the distant individual who hung it there; but, in spite of all the kindness and hospitality of those around you, you can't help feeling all the time that if Gessler is deposed, the hat will sink from its high estate, and become a very ordinary, and by no means a favourite, beaver. To a man, who, like myself, trusts to his own taste in the selection of his friends, Bath is an inexhaustible store shop, where he may find them of all sorts and sizes, almost ready made. An universal philanthropy seems spread over all its inhabitants, and every county in England, Scotland, and the Emerald Isle, seems to send a deputation of the most warm-hearted and accessible of its sons and daughters to the city of King Bladud. The ladies are winning beyond any ill-favoured Benedict's belief. The high cheek-bones of Aberdeenawa, the delicate brogue of Munster, and the pure red and white of Lancashire or Surrey, are all there—equally profuse of their smiles and kindness, and equally ready to form a friendship to be ended only with their lives. Alas! that it is impossible to retain for any length of time the vantage ground of non-acquaintance! Few faces can stand the test of intimacy. Some tooth absent without leave is discovered to the watchful observer in the negligence of the laugh, or some trait of temper contracts the marble brow, where to the unacquainted beholder good-humour “or solemn contemplation love to dwell.” And besides this advantage, unless you converse with the object of your admiration, you run no risk of having that admiration diminished by an exhibition of her colloquial defects. At night, in the pauses of conversation among the beaux esprits of the Divan, you can whiff your cigar, and raise a lovely dream of the pure and delicate maiden you admired in the morning in the circus. No rude reality comes in the semblance of a silly question to destroy the magic of those rosy lips, no vacant stare dims the celestial loveliness of those deep blue eyes; but there she smiles upon you through the thin haze issuing from your gently breathing Havannah, clothed in all earthly beauty, like a goddess of the days of old, revealing herself to some favoured worshipper through the shadowing drapery of her ambrosial cloud. But short-lived and transitory is this blissful state of ignorance and admiration. By a variety of meetings, you cannot tell where,—by seeing her smile so often that at last you fancy she smiles on you,—by sitting in the same box at the play, and bowing to her cousin, with whom she is generally to be found, you are surprised to discover, in spite of your efforts to remain “afike unknowing and unknown,” that you have met, and smiled, and counsined yourself into an acquaintance. Farewell after that, to the long protracted and unheeded gaze,—farewell to the turn of admiration after you are past,—farewell to dream, and reverie and romance! Sad reality steps in, and overturns your “noble theories,”—and the being that you painted as the inhabitant of some fairy bower, the creature who had been the object of your far-off wonder and veneration,—“Too fair to worship, too divine to love,” you are forced to confess resides on the second floor of a boarding-house in Pulteney Street, is solicitous about the colour of a ribbon, and above all things else in the world is anxious to get married.

But, alas! even in a town, Time's progress scarcely deserves the name of flight. No contrivances can protract breakfast beyond twelve o'clock. A newspaper—puffs, advertisements, and all—is but a brief enjoyment to those whom the schoolmaster and the march of intellect have taught to read without stopping very often to spell. For my own part, I was grateful to the Russian Campaign; the very names of the heroes on either side were a tower of strength, and prolonged the perusal by at least twenty minutes. But after a while I felt tempted to skip over those prodigious combinations of consonants, and was contented to believe in the capture and demolition of unnameable towns by gallant and unprounceable generals. The Herald, talented and well-edited paper as it is, comes by degrees to a conclusion; street and square, bustling and beautiful though they be, grow silent and deserted; the pump-room, where every fiddlestick seems less imbued with rosin than Rossini, closes its charmed doors, or exchanges the group of beauty, and the swell of music, for the tottering steps of superannuated invalids. Day after day you miss some glass of fashion, or some mould of form, from her accustomed walk. “Star after star decays,”—gaiety comes imperceptibly to a close,—concerts are less frequent, and the silver voice of Manners only at intervals, few and far between, wraps your senses in Elysium; and in fact, (for there is no denying it,) Bath itself becomes as dull and vapid as a pseudo-religious poem. Amidst the most fearful forebodings of the amount of your bill, you determine on migration; you mourn over the changeableness of pleasure, as you extricate your name from the ill-omened side of the ledger of the classic Tully, inferior, perhaps, to his Roman prototype in eloquence, but immeasurably above even that vain-glorious orator in his puffs; and finally (how can the most obdurate heart remain unmelted?)—amid the tears of inconsolable waiters—amid the groans of overburdened Boots, you mount once more the vehicle which conveyed you from your rural home, and return to muse till the succeeding winter on all that you saw and heard; on the walk by the side of the canal, —on the whisper, in the octagon a the rooms,—on the bracelet retained in memory of your visit to the Sydney Gardens,—on the time when that bracelet is faithfully to be returned. —“Hush, hush, my dark spirit.” I shall certainly get every room in my cottage painted, and have three or four apartments built during the autumn,—a drawing-room, two bedrooms, a nursery. “There’s a braw time comin’.”

AN OKONIAN.

BALANCE OF THE FOOD AND NUMBERS OF ANIMATED NATURE.*

THIS Dissertation is the substance of two Lectures delivered before the Philosophical and Literary Society of Leeds, by that eminent person who has lately made such a distinguished figure in Parliament. Some years before Mr Sadler appeared in the House, we lauded his great abilities, as they were displayed in several speeches delivered at public meetings in Leeds, and we predicted in this work that he would, some time or other, play a conspicuous part in political life. Who is Mr Sadler? was the cry of many on his being returned for Newark. People who take an interest in public affairs ought to keep their eyes and their ears open to what is saying and doing by men of talents in our great and considerable towns and cities. But gentlemen in Parliament, it would seem, pride themselves on their ignorance of all that regards gentlemen out of Parliament, and read no speeches but their own, which, certainly, praise and thanks be to the reporters, are sometimes not without merit. Mr Sadler was no obscure person in the north of England before M.P. was added to his name; and, independently of his high reputation as a speaker on the occasions alluded to, he was extensively known to be possessed, not only of great knowledge of the facts and laws of commerce, but to be a proficient in philosophy and literature. The Literary and Philosophical Society of Leeds, like those of other large towns in England, contains men of no mean talents and acquirements; and of it Mr Sadler was certainly by far the most able, eloquent, and learned member. Thousands knew his powers, and expected their splendid and triumphant display in Parliament. But his success there as an orator and a statesman exceeded their highest hopes; for though he is in the prime of life, it was supposed that, without a long probation, no man could ever take his place there in the first order. But Mr Sadler did so at once; and, in spite of the sneers of the seers who predicted, after his brilliant maiden speech, that he would be single-speech Sadler, he went on “from good to better, daily self-surpassed,” and discomfited and dumbfounded all the wittings. It was then said, —as the last resource of the dull and shallow,—that he was declamatory—and rhetorical—and even poetical;—and verily he is so—on fit occasions; but they who have tried to grapple with him, in the House or out of it, have found that in argument he can take good hold, and knows a chip or two in wrestling—as, for example, that amiable and intelligent member, Mr Wilmot Horton, who, on the Emigration Question, suddenly challenged Mr Sadler to try a bout, and though the member for Newark was taken by surprise, and without preparation, such another fair back-fall as he gave his challenger never resounded through St Stephen’s. It is all well for those to accuse a speaker of declamation, who themselves cannot utter six consecutive sentences without the most alarming and portentous stuttering; prosers shew their piety in lauding the gods for that they have not been made poetical, and are naturally as afraid of a figure of speech as of a ghost; a summer-up of the tattle of the whole, finding no rhetoric in Cocker, despises it even in a Caning; and none are so incapable of judging of the argumentative as the disputatious:—But the men of true power or genius, and who can themselves, as occasion requires, deal in declamation, rhetoric, poetry, reasoning, like Plunkett or Brougham, have admitted that Mr Sadler is—as the world goes—a master in all those arts, and that on great subjects which he has studied, and on which he rises prepared, AN ORATOR.

But our business is not now with this distinguished man as a member of Parliament—he comes before the public as the author of one of the most ingenious, able, and learned works, on perhaps the most difficult and important part of Political Economy, that has been given to the world since Political Economy deserved the name of a mixed Science. In an early number we shall give an ample statement of his refutation of the Malthusian doctrine; and also an account of that doctrine which he would substitute in its place. The work was a good deal abused before it was published, by some ingenious persons, who, since its publication, have been mum; nor, as far as we have seen, have any of the Malthusians yet made upon it any formidable attack. An answer to it, consisting of a couple of columns, appeared in that most excellent weekly paper, the Spectator; but though evidently written by an able man and conversant with the science, it was truly a lame and most manac affair. The writer was much puzzled and perplexed with Mr Sadler's long tables of figures—and well he might—for they contain calculations that seem to furnish the most appalling refutations of many of the statements on which Mr Malthus sought to base his doctrine. If Mr Sadler is to be answered at all, it will not be in a couple of columns, but it must be in a book. The Spectator is strong in its Political Economy, as indeed it is in almost every thing else; and we read, if not without entire conviction, certainly with pleasure and profit, that very ingenious plan of Emigration which formed an appendix to one of its numbers a few months ago. Let the writer of that appendix give us another in refutation of Mr Sadler, and we pledge ourselves that it shall not go without an adverse, but, at the same time, a friendly notice, as long perhaps as itself. The Spectator is a fair and honourable opponent, though he would lose no character by ceasing to sneer at such a man as Mr Sadler; but other papers there are, some without power, some without principle, and some without either who keep dogging Mr Sadler's heels after the uncertain fashion of curs, who sometimes on the street push their snoring noses against the calves of the tiegos' legs, whether in blind search of a master, or in blinder hydrophobia, who can say?—though none can deny that they deserve their kicking. How sardonically laughs the public—pensive no more—at the mongrels who imagine themselves Cynics, simply because they can bark! They have entered into a league, offensive and defensive, to sneer down a certain public character—say Mr Sadler—and, on the third Saturday, they are stifled in their own slaver. Derision must be made of sterner stuff than an article even in the Times to “sneer down”—that we believe is the usual slang word of all slanderous scribblers—any man of the most ordinary intellectual stature; for it is astonishing to see the successful stand made even by a weak honest man against the strongest knave. But when the Sneered-at is great in intellectual and moral power, and the Sneider wholly worthless, the growl of the peevish starveling becomes a croak, and the croak a hiss, and the hiss a gasp that speaks of suicide by strangulation. So it often is—and in no other case more conspicuously than in Mr Sadler's—with some of the guides, forsooth, of Public Opinion! But the admirable old Public, God bless her!—nay, say not old—the admirable young, bold, bright, and buxom Public—just like Miss in her teens running off to Gretna Green with her own chosen suitor, out of a score of sailors, and soldiers, and civilians—selects such a man, for example, as the member of Newark, places her colours in his cap, and on his return from routing all his foes, flings her arms round his neck, and absolutely smothers him with kisses. The rejected slanderers sneak into corners and bite their thumbs—the nails whereof have already been nibbled to the quick in a habit unconsciously acquired by thirst and hunger.

Of Mr Sadler's great work hereafter—at present we shall confine our attention to this most beautiful Dissertation, written in disproof of that superfecundity, by Malthus equally asserted of all the inferior orders of animated existences as of the human race. Its argument is, indeed, as Mr Sadler says, a corollary of the great argument urged against the Malthusian theory, if not an essential part of it. For that theory comprehends all the living orders of creation, from man down to his brother worm. We are necessarily so familiar every hour of the day with the proportion observable between the numbers and necessities of living beings, and the means of subsistence prepared for them, that our minds are apt either to lose those feelings of admiration with which it must otherwise be regarded, or to be overwhelmed and lost in a vague astonishment. To bring and keep before our minds the contemplation of the minute and complicated means by which that supply is accomplished by Providence, is the aim of this admirable Dissertation; and we do not hesitate to say that it is a noble addition to those rich stores of learning and wisdom which in our country have been so poured and heaped up into Natural Theology, that scepticism sinks and dies beneath the weight of the accumulated proofs and evidences of the perfect goodness of God.

The more knowledge has accumulated, the more sacredly plain, says Mr Sadler, has this branch of the divine economy become, and all doubts vanished of the sufficiency of the means of subsistence which nature furnishes for all her offspring. But the dogma broached by Mr Malthus, and which Mr Sadler does not hesitate to call an "indelible disgrace to the age," does indeed darken dimly the decrees of Providence. According to him, there is a constant tendency in all animated life to increase beyond the nourishment prepared for it; according to him, nature has scattered the seeds of life abroad with the most profuse and liberal hand, but has been comparatively sparing in the room and nourishment necessary to rear them! And the deficiency thus represented by him as established by all the analogies of nature, is pronounced by him to have been the source of the severest and most degrading evils which the human race has suffered. Has the Author of nature indeed made this grievous miscalculation, Mr Sadler asks, in reference to the food and numbers of his offspring—or, in other words, a calculation that takes universal insufficiency as its basis? No; and forthwith he sets himself to rebut that strange hypothesis, by means of the very analogies by which it professes to be supported, and by an appeal not only to animated, but to inanimate creation. Each of these, he undertakes to shew, has the strictest mutual relations—in all their complicated adaptations, involving calculations the most minute as well as stupendous,—nothing superfluous, nothing deficient,—but open to our eyes when freed from their film by the light of philosophy and religion, without one single flaw.

The Dissertation is composed throughout in an animated and eloquent style, and breathes a fine and chastened enthusiasm. Perhaps there may be some occasional repetitions and redundancies, chiefly, we suspect, arising from the circumstance of its being two discourses blended into one;—and to the same cause probably may be attributed, here and there, some little confusion in the arrangement. But the main current of the argument, though sometimes rather broken, is always strong and clear; its course, though circuitous, is always seen tending towards one direction; and it has no resemblance to a canal, but always to a river having its source among the sacred mountains. Heaven preserve us! how arid are the writings of the economists! Reading their works is like toiling across a flat desert ankle-deep in sand,—no well,—no oasis,—all dry dust, and not a single tree. No wonder so many travellers sink and are seen no more; and that they are now shy of joining even the caravan under McCulloch. But Mr Sadler conducts us to the temple of Truth through meads of asphodel, and through forests of fruit-bearing trees. Even they who stop on the journey, and turn back,—if such there be,—can do so only from indolence and inactivity; for they can suffer nothing either from hunger or thirst, or dust in their eyes; and though they may have halted too soon, cannot deny that they enjoyed their pilgrimage. But the student and the lover of nature will delight to travel on with such a guide as Mr Sadler to the end of the journey, and only not lament that it is over, because made happy by the beautiful and glorious prospect that spreads around the pitching of their tent.

We cannot doubt, that if this Dissertation were enriched with a greater number of illustrations of its argument, it would be most successful as a separate publication in a small pocket volume. Mr Sadler is well read in natural history,—especially in zoology; and there is not any part of his argument that would not only admit, but that does not perhaps require, many more illustrations from that branch of knowledge. Meanwhile, we shall do all that in us lies to publish widely its merits; and we cannot do so by any other means so effectually as by an analysis and abridgement of it, accompanied by copious extracts. We are as fond as most people of hearing ourselves speak, but we trust that we can also listen; and we know that our readers will prefer Mr Sadler's words to ours on a subject which he has so profoundly and extensively studied, and of which our account of his Dissertation will shew that he is a perfect master.

Mr Sadler begins with the immensities of creation; and asks what is there to sanction the daring idea of any thing there being left disproportionate, or in the slightest degree unimaginable, erroneous? In one majestic paragraph he gives a sweeping view of the mechanism of the skies, as revealed by "the hierophant of this mysterious temple of nature, our immortal Newton;" and after saying well, that if the magnitudes, motions, and distances of the heavenly bodies are all reciprocally regulated, which it is the legitimate office of geometric science to shew, then the same science leads us to the inevitable conclusion, that every atom of matter, as well as every moment of time, is necessarily included in the divine computation. How beautiful the following sentence, and how profound its significance!—"The grain of sand, therefore, falling from the widow's hour-glass, and the instant of time it expresses in its descent, do not merely furnish an illustration, but they form essential parts, of that magnitude, motion, and duration, which constitute the harmony and perpetuate the existence of the universe."

He then selects some impressive proofs of the same universal adaptations of animal life in all its forms to the elements which it peoples, and again to the changes those elements undergo in consequence of varying climates and seasons, from geology and physical geography, speaking, indeed, like a philosopher. All those adaptations, what would they avail, but for another series of wonders—those supplies of food, without which life could not continue in a single instance, and which, to support animated nature throughout our earth, must vary with the elements, the situations, the climates, and the seasons, and consequently be adapted to them all! To provide these supplies involves a comprehension of design which none can understand, save He who accomplishes it. But there it is for ever at work, and who shall dare to say, except a Malthusian, that as vast a demand is not made upon Infinite intelligence and benevolence in the conservation as in the creation of the world? And who but a Malthusian would dare to say that beneath that demand that intelligence and benevolence faint and are frustrated? But let us now hear Mr Sadler—not in an abridgement, but in his own flowing and glowing words.

"Let us here, then, pause for a moment, and, without again dwelling on the connexion between the minutest existence in creation with its immense masses, or the wonderful adaptations of every climate, element, season, and situation, to the condition and necessities of animal creation, or the intimate relation which its several parts bear to each other and to the whole, let us enlarge our minds, as far as we can do so, to the consideration of the incalculable, and all but infinite, number, for every individual of which this provision has to be made. Placed at the summit of these, man, concerning whose multiplication so many fears are now afloat, is, compared with most of them, a solitary, with any of them, a sterile being; and yet a thousand millions of his species traverse the earth. Leaving out of our view those larger animals, whose number he generally determines, and looking down through the inferior tribes of creation, in whatever element, how do they multiply! The chain of existence, which at once connects and sustains all animated beings, is seen descending from rank to rank, and still diminishing, till at length it eludes the sight; when the eye, assisted by that science which taught it to penetrate far into boundless space, again pierces deep into an opposite infinity, and traces its catenations, lengthening far below the supposed limits of possibility, till at last vision utterly fails, and thought looks down as from a fearful brink, and beholds the lessening threads of life still sinking into a dark and immeasurable depth, only fathomed by the eye of Omniscience. The links of this chain, sustained by the hand of its eternal Artificer, who can enumerate? As they diminish in magnitude they multiply in number, still augmenting the miracle, till they become at once innumerable and invisible. Compared with these, what are the numbers of the leaves of the forests, or the sands of the ocean? In ten thousand forms they fill the air we breathe; they cover the earth on which we tread; they saturate the waters of the stream; they tinge the waves of the ocean; they flash like lightning upon its shores. A single leaf, as St Pierre has said, and without an hyperbole, is itself a continent, and a drop an ocean to myriads of animated beings, infinitely diversified, and many of them, if we may believe our best naturalists, invested with a beauty which Nature rarely lavishes upon her larger offspring; at all events, with an organization as perfectly adapted to their condition as that of the mammoth or the leviathan. 'Rerum natura nusquam magis quam in minimis tota est.'

"Vain then are all human comparisons—vain the power of numbers to describe the flood of vitality which inundates our universe; as vain were it to attempt to explain by what process it is sustained: but, though we were not able, even in a single instance, to trace the means of preserving life, so as to extend it by analogy to the whole, still the fact that it is sustained in being and well being; that it is reproduced and continued; is a full and everlasting disproof of the daring notion of the superfecundity of animal existences. Driven, therefore, to no absurd or impious notions respecting the operations of the Deity, while contemplating these his astonishing works, which demand the exercise of his boundless perfections, we exclaim, in the language of a poet of antiquity, 'O God! how wonderful are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all! The earth is full of thy riches!'

But are there some, or many, who, firmly believing in the Deity, and confessing that His power is boundless, and His wisdom infinite, are yet astounded by the immensity of the numbers of animated nature, and their prolific powers, and ask, "For multitudes like those can God spread a table in the wilderness?" As respects his supreme creation, man, whose prolificness Mr Malthus pronounces so vastly to exceed the means of subsistence which his Maker has prepared for him, do they still more emphatically exclaim, "But can he give bread also? or provide flesh for his people?" If we reason from analogy, and if the laws of matter have such a perfect adaptation to their end—to wit, that of continuing unchanged its present conformations—which science has shewn—then ought we to conclude that the laws relative to life, which are evidently established to preserve and perpetuate it in all its modes, are calculated to effect this object with great precision. But farther, if it can be shewn that it is in the contemplation of the Deity to balance the numbers and food of his offspring, and that he has plainly manifested that intention, then without impiety must we believe that the food and numbers are balanced. The proof of the intention is a moral demonstration of the highest order that the intention has been fulfilled. Mr Sadler thus philosophically expresses his argument:—

"First. Nature has calculated with the utmost precision, and unalterably settled, the different degrees, as well as periods, of prolificness in all things living; obviously varying both, with reference to the means of sustentation. The presumption, I might say certainty, therefore is, that the laws of reproduction do not tend to excessive increase, but are precisely regulated by those means.

"Second. During the process of reproduction, and through the early stages of existence, Nature guards with peculiar art, and defends with the utmost care, 'the germs of existence,' as they are denominated in the theory I am opposing. The presumption, therefore, is increased that those 'germs' are, in no just sense of the term, superfluous.

"Third. It is the plain purpose of Nature, indicated by an infinite variety of means, which are in perpetual operation, to sustain her animated offspring when matured. The presumption is, that she is not defeated in that her intention, and consequently, that the numbers preserved are not superfluous.

"Fourth. Not only are those necessities of subsistence, and the means and instruments by which they are obtained, bestowed on all living beings, but, at the same time, facilities of escape or defence are conferred upon each, which preserve that existence as far as is compatible with those plain intentions of Nature, which will be hereafter adverted to. The purpose of Nature is, therefore, preservation; numbers then, in her estimation, are not superfluous.

"Fifth. The very means of subsistence, especially those consisting of prey, when duly considered, are in themselves the proof that numbers and food are, and must necessarily remain, perpetually balanced and adjusted to each other; numbers, therefore, compared with food, cannot be superfluous.

"Lastly. The whole of animate creation, through all its tribes, especially when far removed from human interference, abundantly demonstrates that life and food are in due proportions; or, in other words, that existence is connected with enjoyment: that universal misery is not thrown into the scale of being by that hand that created both numbers and food, and sustains the balance in an everlasting equipoise. Numbers and food are, therefore, balanced."

To prove these positions is the object of this Dissertation; and we shall accompany the author through his proofs.

First. That law of nature which varies the prolificness of different species of animals so extremely, and still, at the same time, preserves that prolificness in the same species in so near and surprising an uniformity, is of itself a satisfactory proof of the first position. Relax or reverse that law, and suppose for a moment the larger animals to be endowed with the fecundity of the smaller ones, and what would be the consequence? Then indeed would the principle of population be a truth of the plainest and most tremendous character. The universe would be dispeopled in a day!

Further, in most of the terrestrial animals, the period and term of gestation is fixed, and the degree of prolificness constantly determined by physical causes, over which they have not the least control. But observe what happens with birds. Undisturbed in the business of reproduction, they conform, through all their tribes, to the laws of nature. But the ovarious state of their future offspring exposing the measure of their reproduction to accident and depredation, God has given them a mysterious power of supplying such losses before incubation. Nay, destroy their nests with their broods, and by the same physical faculty they can repair their loss, and even repeat, at later periods of the season, the same process.

They are gifted, says Mr Sadler, finally, with a sort of "natural arithmetic," which informs them of their right number, and are compelled by a powerful impulse, perfectly distinct from the originating one, to adhere to it, in spite of all interruptions. Can any one bring himself to believe, for a single moment, that that number is not the right number—that is, right in reference to the means and measure of subsistence, without which it would be wrong indeed? "Behold then the fowls of the air—they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns"—yet the universal Parent "feedeth them." Sparingly—asks Mr Sadler—partially—uncertainly? No; but by anticipated provision, infallibly certain, and abundantly sufficient—so that they "sing among the branches."

Second. But how does nature deal with the germs of existence? Are they redundant? And doth she suffer them to perish? No. Look at the extraordinary tenderness and constant protection she displays in regard of the parent existence during the period of gestation. She then invests life itself with additional security—then the little wren is bold as the eagle, the doe fearless as the lioness. We love Mr Sadler as a true ornithologist. To his ear the lark sings of the goodness of God at the gates of heaven—to his eye the lark illustrates the same attribute in the dewy braird "wakening by the daisies' side."

"The process of incubation takes place in the case of birds, who would otherwise, under such circumstances, be incapable of flight, and, consequently, be both themselves and their offspring exposed to certain destruction; while, as it respects those powerful and majestic animals which, at such times, are fully capable of defending themselves and their offspring, Nature seems to confide to them that duty, which few that value existence will rashly interrupt. But it is to her care of the more weak and defenceless tribes that I would especially advert. The security which such seek from those enemies, and those only to which they or their offspring are exposed, is singularly varied in its means, yet all point at the same end. Situations inaccessible to attack are selected, or artificial guards are interposed; or places of concealment are chosen, or, where there are none, dexterously formed. To advert again to the feathered tribes, as that class of beings which, among those little liable to our interference, is the most obvious to our notice. When the work of reproduction obliges them to become stationary for a considerable period, what infinite address do they exhibit in accomplishing their purposes, particularly that of security! Some of these choose the loftiest trees of the solitary wood; and, lest the tops of these, where there is commonly the greatest luxuriance of foliage, should not sufficiently secure their nests by concealment, they generally build on the most tapering branches, the thinness of which affords additional safety. Others, which seem to affect human society, build on the pinnacles, or beneath the battlements of our loftiest edifices, always, however, out of the reach of general molestation. Some choose the shelves of inaccessible precipices, or the crevices of rocks that hang beetling over the ocean; others peck their retreat into the centre of trees, which they know well how to select for that purpose; others, more obvious to common notice and constant interruption, nevertheless accomplish their ends with scarcely less certainty and security, though by very opposite means: they have to fix their nests in situations perfectly accessible and near to view; but, by a countervailing provision of nature, they so assimilate them in colour and appearance to the boughs in which they build, or the mossy bank in which they are imbedded, as to render the security from such artful concealment as complete, probably, as that from apparent inaccessibility. I am tempted to notice the admirable fitness, in shape and size, the exquisite beauty, and the marked and striking variety, in these transient receptacles of infant life,—the extreme rapidity of their construction, with the one single instrument employed (the beak), increasing the wonder,—but I refrain, as not strictly bearing on my subject. I shall therefore proceed to remark, that the still minuter and infinitely more numerous oviparous beings are not less instructed how to deposit the seeds of their future progeny; whether they inject their eggs deep into some solid substance, by means of instruments adapted for that special purpose, which excite the admiration of the minutest observers of nature, or fix them, by some glutinous fluid with which they are provided, where they will be least exposed to observation or injury, or securely deposit them, in a variety of other ways familiar to the naturalist, till the moment they are vivified by influences, and sustained by means, totally distinct from the parental principle."

But look next at those numerous tribes of beings in which the efficient preservative of early existence, parental affection, is totally wanting. Has Nature deserted those "orphans of creation?" No—for them the atmosphere itself performs the work of a mother's love. It broods over them—

"Dovelike, hangs brooding o'er the vast abyss,
And makes it pregnant."

The unprotected beings all venture into life at the exact season, amidst a profusion of sustenance adapted to their use, and provided for them by another world of existence, the vegetable kingdom, subject to laws as complex as those that govern the animal one, and plainly subservient to it. Here each grub meets its abundant supply, "till it wings its way to reiterate in turn the miracle of its own birth."

"But all this ample provision, all this jealous circumspection, all these concealments and defences which Nature has thrown around initial existence, if I may so express myself, do not still satisfy her. She is bent on her work of preservation. After all her solitudes, the period of infancy, with regard to the animal tribes, is still the period of peculiar danger. Finally, therefore, she shortens that period by a rapidity of growth to which there is nothing corresponding in human beings; bringing them, as it were, so a sudden and almost miraculous maturity, and thus lessening the danger of that state by diminishing its duration. I say, almost miraculous, upon any common principles; which any of us may speedily verify, if we weigh, from time to time, the growth of an unfledged bird, for instance, which has just burst from its shell, with the entire weight of what it receives."

Third. And how acts Nature towards her offspring, after having conducted them to maturity? Do we not see, throughout air, earth, and water, the plain intention of the Deity to sustain all his creatures? Mr Sadler exclaims, in an elevated strain that reminds us of Milton, "Let us take a momentary view of the Eternal Pan in providing for the people of his boundless pasture." All the elements—he goes on to say—the various seasons, the different climates, the whole vegetable and animal kingdoms, all alike, by known and perpetually operating laws, furnish their quota to the great storehouse of existence, in which the miracle is equal, that the supply neither fails nor exceeds, and all is so adjusted that, in this infinite variety, there is no confusion! In this eternal plenty there is no superfluity! How interesting to observe how carefully she provides for the weakest of her tribes,—on them, like an indulgent mother, bestowing her tenderest cares! By diversifying the instinctive appetites of the different species of the larger animals, she prevents the monopoly of the means of existence by the ferocious and the strong; in the "refectory of Nature"—so unlike that "table" at which Matthus affirms there are no seats for millions on millions, who come there in hunger and in thirst, and certainly not uninvited—the separate species have all "their separate seats and their distinct messes," which, though perfectly agreeable to themselves, the rest refuse to occupy or touch, and thereby the harmony and plenty which, among such various and unnumbered guests, would otherwise be constantly destroyed, is as perpetually preserved. Then, as the food of several of these tribes varies with the change of season, and sometimes of climate and situation, so, too, are their appetites and tastes adjusted to these vicissitudes. Again, the food of whole classes of animals almost totally disappears during the more rigorous seasons of the year.

Is there then a superfluity of numbers? Does nature abandon her offspring then? Go to the ant—and learn to see God. What naturalist knows the process by which that creature preserves, for its winter sustenance, grain in the bosom of the earth, without sprouting or being spoiled? Many other similar instincts belong to other animals—and do they belong to a system created by a Being who has not provided adequate nourishment for the mouths he has made? Other creatures are laid asleep in "long inedia" during the winter's severity, and awaken amid the provender of spring. Just on the same principle, says Mr Sadler, whose expressions are always beautifully accordant with the spirit of his subject—showing the man of genius in every page—as Nature disposes of us and almost all animated nature, when she diurnally withdraws from us that light so necessary to our active existence; and as respects infinitely greater numbers, she limits the period of life to the propitious season, sometimes, indeed, to the shining hours of a single day. But of all the demonstrations of the intention of Nature to provide, under varying emergencies, for all her creatures, what so striking as—Migration!

"I shall confine myself to another order of beings, the same so often referred to—the birds—as most obvious to our notice. What does this inexplicable faculty imply, as it regards these? First, it implies, literally speaking, a spirit of prophecy. At the very period when their food abounds (for it is essential to the purpose that the flight should be undertaken while they are in full vigour) they foresee the coming of the unpropitious season. Nor is this indicated by the change of the atmosphere solely: it has happened that, where the season has not corresponded with its usual period, still the latter has been punctually adhered to, when thousands of them have perished, as the savans of France have more than once recorded of the most exact of the migratory tribes, the swallow. Secondly, they have a mysterious, but a certain, knowledge of physical geography, and know most accurately where the regions lie to which they proceed, which the greater part of them have never previously beheld, but where, nevertheless, they are assured of the provision that awaits them. They assemble, therefore, and, departing at the appointed moment, they pass over an extent of land, or an expanse of waters, where, if they had guides, there can be no objects of direction; a distance in which sight can avail them nothing, however acute; where night overtakes them in their career,—yet still they persevere in the right direction; and, by a muscular exertion, scarcely less wonderful than all these miracles, and for which nothing can adequately account, and with a certainty without any parallel in human affairs, they accomplish their astonishing purpose. I know not whether it can increase our wonder to be reminded that all this is effected without either experience, instruction, or example; for the same thing would occur, and has so done, in regard to a brood that has been artificially hatched, and let loose just after their unseen kindred had commenced their career.

“But let us observe how this migratory instinct is regulated, as it respects those who are subject to its influence, with a view to their sustentation: so that the balance of life and food seems to be preserved throughout all the habitable world. When Nature gives the mysterious intimation that her bounties are about to be withdrawn from one region, she infallibly invites the wandering subjects of her care to another; and her expected guests arrive at the precise moment when, by a long and diligent process, she has spread her table for them. But it is to be remarked, that, as these withdraw, others succeed, for whom a different entertainment is prepared; so that her table is always full. It is thus that, from the first time, ‘the stork in the heavens hath known her appointed times, and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, have observed the time of their coming.’”

But then comes Death—and how is it that the whole earth is not sickened as with the stench of a sepulchre? “Why, nature,” says Mr Sadler, “has provided numerous and diversified classes of animal undertakers,” who remove all that would otherwise taint the heavens with pollution. How soon do all the relics of mortality disappear! In that season, when parts of those troops which nature commissions for this special service, are absent, she remedies or circumscribes the nuisance by the antiseptic qualities of the atmosphere. She thus preserves it for those of her tribes who are “the scavengers of creation.” These creatures, having not to contend with their prey, are, generally speaking, the smallest and feeblest part of animated beings—but in numbers what to them are the sands of the sea! But that that number, whatever it may be, overbalances its food, would, says our author, be to imagine that, seeing the necessity, and attempting to provide for it, Nature had made so false a calculation, so bungling an attempt, as to increase the nuisance by the very means she has taken to abate it!

Fourth. The means and instruments by which food is obtained, are such as indicate the certainty of its supply. The provision is rendered certain by the strength, swiftness, sagacity, ingenuity, cunning, of animals—in one word, by their instincts. On this subject Mr Sadler feels it would be needless to dilate, and therefore passes from it to the illustration and proof of the Fifth position—that the very means of subsistence, especially those consisting of prey, are, when duly considered, proof in themselves that numbers and food are, and must for ever remain, accurately balanced. Those tribes of animals, the food of which is apparently of a vegetable nature solely, are far less numerous than is commonly supposed; and that they do not exceed their means of subsistence in a state of nature, the almost untouched, certainly unexhausted, resources of the vegetable kingdom manifest. But how stands the case with those more numerous tribes of beings whose food consists principally of living substances, and which may all, therefore, be denominated animals of prey? It is Mr Sadler's design, now, to shew that the law of nature, which makes one order of animals the food of another, affords in itself a full disproof of the assertion, that there is in all animated life a tendency to increase beyond the means of subsistence that is prepared for it, and that it yields, on the contrary, a satisfactory demonstration, that numbers and food are, and must remain, duly balanced. It is a notable axiom with the Malthusians, that there is a constant tendency in all animated life to increase beyond the nourishment prepared for it, which, as it respects animals, is repressed by their becoming the prey of each other. Observe how, in this proposition, it is asserted in one breath.

that the number of animals is excessive in relation to their food, and that their food is excessive in relation to their number! To make the argument tenable, it should have been shewn that certain species of carnivorous animals were over-prolific in reference to others—an attempt which could only be made by an Atheist—while to maintain that they are all over-prolific, is a contradiction in terms. How Mr Sadler cuts with a two-edged sword, finely tempered!

“But the ambiguity of the terms, ‘preying upon one another,’ or rather the fallacy they imply, has been already explained; Nature does not, in point of fact, deliver up her universal offspring to promiscuous slaughter, for the purpose of their sustentation. Such an idea is as incorrect and absurd, when generally applied to the animal creation, as it would be if asserted of the human race. It is as false in philosophy as it is in fact; it is just as though we should say, that because men feed upon geese, geese feed upon men. Invested in all its ambiguity, the expression, ‘that animals feeding upon each other’ is consistent with the idea of an excess of numbers, in reference to food, is, as already remarked, absurd; but when we reduce the indefinite allusion to the precise fact, the absurdity is still more palpable, and indeed enlarges into an impossibility. The order of nature is, that the superior feed on the inferior tribes, from the summit to the footstool of animal creation. If, then, through all the carnivorous tribes, A preys upon B, B upon C, C upon D, and so on from the alpha to the omega of vital nature, what is it that the notion I am opposing holds with respect to every class of them, (saving the first, of which more anon,) but that they are at one and the same time too numerous and too few?

“On the contrary, a very slight consideration of the subject will suffice to convince us, that if there be any redundancy, it must be in the means of subsistence, not in the numbers and prolificness of those which require it; otherwise, invested, as the superior orders are, with powers necessary for obtaining their food, consisting as that food does of the inferior ones, those powers would be so sharpened by their unsatisfied and increasing necessities, that the latter would soon be hunted out of existence; and so would it be with all the inferior tribes, till the whole would be extinguished. The very fact of numerous races of animals, whose food is prey, existing in due proportions, or indeed continuing to exist at all, is, when closely considered, proof positive that their prolificness throughout all these tribes is most accurately proportioned, and that it is not in excess in reference to their food. As to the latter supposition, it is at once disposed of by recollecting, that if their prolificness were universally diminished down to one-tenth or one-hundredth part of what it is at present, the diminution would equally apply to their food, and consequently their individual shares of it, whatever they may be, would remain precisely the same. The idea that some particular class only of these animals is too fecund, has never yet been broached; it is one which might shock us with its novelty, though it conveys a far lighter charge against Nature than that the whole are so: but the supposition would be as obviously fallacious. This, in a single instance, would be fatal to other tribes, if not eventually to the whole chain of animated existences, as will be noticed hereafter. The immediate relation, in which many of the carnivorous tribes stand, is three-fold; having respect to themselves, to those above, and to those beneath them in the scale of existence, and probably extending throughout the whole of animated nature.

“Considering, therefore, the immense numbers thus mutually dependent, the intricacy of the Divine calculation becomes the more apparent, and the hardness of suspecting its absolute or comparative correctness throughout, the more daring. To supply these through all their orders and degrees, from the greatest and most powerful, down to the most insignificant and minute, with their appointed ‘food, and in due season,’ and consistently with that universal benevolence which is the predominant character of the whole scheme of Nature, is what none but God could perform, and what, if he attempts to do at all, he does perfectly. Here, then, is partly unfolded the reason why, in tracing existence down its lengthening gradations, we find, as they become more small and feeble, they are the more prolific and numerous, and multiply in more rapid successions: so rapid, indeed, and in numbers so vast, as to baffle calculation. Still, in no stage of life is there the least evidence that Nature scatters the germs of existence with a more liberal hand than she does the means of their support. The demonstration is one that can alone be obvious to our senses; no geometry can measure, no arithmetic compute, these proportions, which must be exact in the minutest calculation, in order to become balanced in the great and final result. But if the elements of the calculation were, in the slightest supposable degree, incorrect; possessing as they do such powers, what would be the magnitude of the error in their ultimate effects?—Speedy and universal confusion."

Hitherto, Mr Sadler has shewn with perfect clearness that the principle of superfecundity in relation to animals, is unphilosophical and untrue; but not contented with having given a direct negative to that supposition, he goes on to prove that nature visibly regulates with the utmost care all her calculations, so as to preserve a perpetual balance of food and number. He had spoken of the different tribes of carnivorous animals as subsisting upon prey themselves, but becoming in their turn the prey of others, and thus keeping up the balance of their food and numbers, through all their various ranks; and that the fecundity of all such is regulated accordingly. But what of those animals, which prey upon others beyond all the rest, but living are themselves the prey of none?

Placed at the head of existence in their several elements, they inspire that terror which they never feel, excepting, perhaps, when he appears, whose viceregerents they are, and in whose absence they preserve for him his edible domain, and who, armed with all his advantages, still, perhaps, they little dread, when, though but rarely indeed, they come in contact. Such, in the feathered tribes, is the eagle; the lion among the quadrupeds; and, for want perhaps of more perfectly knowing another element, we may fix upon the shark among the fishes. These and their compeers, were there any truth in the position I am opposing, would, at all events, multiply incredibly. The first of them, the eagle, affecting a cold atmosphere, perches on inaccessible heights, or inhabits the vast 'Cimmerian deserts of the North;' where his food, principally the fowl, multiplies around him in such incredible numbers, that their flight, when they successively remove, darkens the skies. Scarcely approachable, and rarely molested, what prevents the bird of Jove from multiplying, thus unchecked, without limit? Again; what is the check which prevents the enormous increase of the most powerful and voracious of the finny tribes; or, who rouses 'the Numidian lion in his lair,' except with a little army collected for that purpose; and which is the beast that devours him? Unchecked, therefore, how fearfully ought he to multiply, according to the modern notion, which invests all things living with this superfecundity! So thought Monsieur Buffon, and therefore talks of whole armies of lions roaming the plains of Africa together. But they exist only in his interesting pages. Nature determines differently. The lion is a scarce beast, even in his native haunts, as Sparrman has observed; and Pliny, who, perhaps, confounded him with the tiger, tells us, that it was rare in his days; and it continues rare still. What is it, then, that checks and regulates the increase of these? Not their preying upon one another, for that is not the case; as the poet sings, not the want of food, the demon of the modern system; for of that they have a command; but that power whom we have observed regulating all others;—Nature—God! And by the same means, namely, by strictly limiting their fecundity, as he has done that of all other beings, and in each, with an equally exact reference to their station in the scale of existence. In these, therefore, as only subject to half the otherwise universal operation of the law of Nature, as before observed, and being, consequently, not preyed upon themselves, he has diminished the measure of increase, and constituted them the most sterile of beings, save man, whose place they pre-occupy. Aristotle said of such, long ago, ἐν γὰρ ψυχῶν ἑλιγστοκα πάντα; and a greater than he, Bacon, says of the lioness, that 'she ordinarily bringeth forth but one.' A later observer, Colonel Keating, perhaps has corrected this, according to more accurate experience; he says, that a lioness may have three whelps, but that two always die. Respecting the eagle, the first cited author, Aristotle, gives us from Musæus, that she produces three: two live and one is reared. A later authority, and who ought to be a more accurate one, as having far better opportunities of becoming so on this point, Olaus Magnus, says, that 'the greatest eagle of all, the gir falcon, very ferocious and strong, never breeds more than one young one.' The same observation might be transferred to another element with equal truth, as far as we know of the piscatory tribes. The large fishes of prey, such as whales, sharks, rays, poises, &c., are viviparous, and, compared with the extraordinary fecundity of the lesser fishes, are more strikingly sterile than the animals previously adduced. But, to confine myself to one instance in this element, as in the others. 'The whale,' says Busching, generally brings forth one at a birth; and sometimes, though but seldom, two young ones.' The cod produces millions. Is there any one so blind as not to see the reason of this? Were this fertility reversed, all animated nature, with which the ocean swarms, must expire, and the polluted waters fill the world with stench and corruption."

'Wolves slay not wolves, nor tigers tigers torn;'

But by tracing the subject farther, we find numbers of an inferior order, who are still of the same character, subsisting by prey themselves, and little liable to become the prey of others. They, too, are, comparatively with those on which they feed, sterile. Were it otherwise, they would spread devastation around them. From the summit to the base, then, of the animal creation, we find those beings few and sterile compared with others on which they feed; their appearance in a state of nature is therefore comparatively strange, and their devastations limited. And thus, the vast proportion of animated nature is left in a state of undisturbed enjoyment, as well as unfailing plenty. But Mr Sadler does not stop here—for his mind overflows with thoughts—and he is armed at all points against his adversaries. Why, it may be asked, should those animals of prey, which are placed as it were at the head of their respective tribes, and consequently themselves not the prey of others, sterile as they confessedly are, multiply at all, or, in other words, exist? The answer to this absurd query, unfolds a view which Mr Sadler thinks has never been yet presented, and which he proceeds to give as having a special relation to the subject under consideration. That it has never yet been presented, we cannot think; on the contrary, it has been presented a hundred times; but never better than by Mr Sadler.

"It has been an old remark, and one which, it is to be hoped, will never become obsolete, that the whole of nature, especially of animated nature, seems linked together in a mutual and necessary dependence. I shall refer this idea at present to one only of its elements, the ocean, as it incidentally illustrates a part of my subject already adverted to, namely, the inconceivable numerosity of animal existences; taking the illustration from that intelligent and scientific voyager, Mr Scoresby. In his remarks on the hydrography of the polar seas, he says, that conceiving the discoloration, which is there so remarkably prevalent, to proceed from animal matter, he substantiated the fact by submitting the water to a powerful microscopic examination, and detected medusæ and animalcules in numbers, which, as applied to the extent of the waters so impregnated, we may talk about, but which we can comprehend as little as we can infinity. To complete the enumeration of one of the larger of these genera, existing in a couple of square miles, according to a calculation he made, would have required the labour of 80,000 persons from the creation to the present hour. As to the smaller, he says, that on computation there must have been in a single drop, and that by no means the most deeply tinged, 26,150. 'These animals,' he observes, 'are not without their evident economy; on their existence possibly depend the being and preservation of the whole race of mysticete, and some other species of cetaceous animals. For the minute medusæ apparently afford nourishment to the sepia, actinia, cancri, helices, and other genera of mollusca and aptera, so abundant in the Greenland sea; while these latter constitute the food of several of the whale tribe inhabiting the same region: thus producing a dependent chain of animal life—one particular link being destroyed, the whole must necessarily perish.' By other observations, it appears that some of these, too, are migratory, supplying their almost total want of locomotion by sinking into those sub-currents, or rising into the superior ones, which have the effect of blending the waters of the equator and the pole, so as to produce a more equable temperature than could otherwise exist in either, and in these changes, no doubt, still performing their office of virtualling the recesses of the watery world. These, still more than the insects of the Scandinavian regions, are therefore innumerable, and supply those vast and incessant shoals which Nature perpetually pours upon all our shores, not one in one million of which is taken; as do those clouds of wild fowl, that, when mature, are dispersed throughout the earth: both, therefore, constituting the inaccessible north, if I may so express myself—the virtualling-office of the world, in which Nature does not permit herself to be interrupted in her beneficent operations.

"Not to affect any scientific arrangement, which might not be sufficiently familiar to answer the purpose of illustration, let us suppose, that among these inconceivably numerous animalcules of different orders, the inferior and most minute support the superior, which still enlarge in size, till they become the food of the sprat, the sprat of the herring, the herring of the cod, and the cod of the shark; and take the shark as a fish of prey, on which no other feeds, as I previously did the eagle and the lion from the other elements. I do not, I repeat, represent such to be the food of these different species respectively; but I do say, that if we could trace the economy of piscatory sustentation more exactly, the minute facts which it would exhibit would fully confirm the truth which the idea, as I am now presenting it, imperfectly illustrates. Now, it is abundantly evident, that, in such an arrangement, the shark could not continue to exist without the sprat, (to descend at present no lower in the chain of existence,) but it is equally true, though perhaps not at first sight quite so plain, that the sprat could not exist without the shark. And this is the fact which, as I conceive, has not hitherto been noticed.

"Let us pursue, then, this most important consideration: one which, in attempting to comprehend the balance of the numbers and food of living beings, ought never to be out of recollection; but which seems hardly ever to have been in it, as it regards those who pronounce so confidently on the superfecundity of animal creation. Alluding to an undisturbed state of nature, to which I refer the argument in the first instance; the least alteration in the measure of that fecundity, which varies so greatly in different species, and which some conceive to be at best a blind and erring calculation throughout, —I say the least alteration, whether of diminution or increase, would have been equally fatal to all connected and independent existences. In contemplating reproduction in single instances, we may perhaps imagine that these variations are trivial in their effects; but the arithmetician will soon recall us, from such ideas, to our senses, and shew us what would be the inevitable consequences of altering the generative power in the roll of ages, or often, indeed, in a single generation. Imagine, then, a miscalculation respecting the fecundity of the shark, and that it should be in excess. Those acquainted with the powers of progressive numbers, need not be told how speedily this excess would accumulate into unsustainable shoals, and that this ferocious fish would first sweep the ocean of its food, and then expire itself. Supposing still, for illustration, that food to be the cod; then the disappearance of the cod, no longer preying on the herring, the herring, in vastly increased numbers, multiplying as before, would, in its turn, destroy the sprat, and itself consequently disappear for want of further sustentation. All this is sufficiently plain; and what at first sight appears to be otherwise, begins to be equally so; namely, that, secondly, an error of deficiency in any of the animals of prey would be equally fatal with one of excess. Thus, if the shark should, on the contrary, multiply in too slow a ratio in reference to the increase of the cod, the undue accumulation of the latter would press upon their food, which we represent as the herring; these would be destroyed, and then the sprat, left to multiply from such increased numbers, would exhaust the food destined for its support, and expire, after it had thus transmitted devastation through every lessening link of marine existence.

"In again observing that this illustration does not express the precise economy of the piscatory tribes, which is certainly far more complex, (involving, in all probability, almost an infinity of interchanging modes of existence,) I must intimate to those who are prone to disregard, if not deny, what they cannot fully trace and understand, that this complexity forms an essential feature of my entire argument. To perform one grand uniform result by a variety of means almost infinite, surely indicates more of intention and wisdom, and is less liable to the charge of accident and mistake, than if it seemed to be produced by one simple, independent cause. If, then, this chain of connected being is multiplied into ten thousand catenations, and so connected in its involutions as to enclose the whole of animated life, it cannot surely evince less calculation and skill in the artificer, than if it consisted of a few links. The more numerous, therefore, the means by which the universal scheme of Nature is upheld, the more exquisitely exact, instead of careless, must evidently be the calculations respecting each. If, then, the five gradations into which I have divided my exemplification were multiplied into five thousand, as probably they ought to be, it follows, that it is as many times more necessary that the calculations respecting each should be minutely correct.

"In saying, therefore, that the measure of fecundity, in the several orders of animals dependent on each other, is neither erroneous in deficiency nor excess, but precisely accurate, I deliver the argument into the grasp of the computist, to use Dr Johnson's expression, from which I feel certain no human sophistry can rescue it. The first principles of arithmetic, as well as the evidence of our senses, equally prove that numbers and food are balanced."

Having thus stated some of the reasons why animals of prey, eminently sterile through all their tribes, exist at all, Mr Sadler well remarks, how true nature keeps to her rule through every part of her wide domain. In the newly-discovered islands of the Pacific, there are no large edible quadrupeds; hence, there are no animals of prey to regulate their numbers. In the vast and fertile continent of America, till Columbus, not three centuries ago, landed his small number of horned cattle, and his eight sows, there were none of these animals, nor even sheep; the number of quadrupeds were few, and those principally of the minor tribes; and hence, the beasts of prey seemed to conform exactly to that state of things, there being only one or two of any note, the jaguar and the cougar, which are far less formidable than the ferocious animals of the Old World. But the fishes in the rivers, and on the coasts of that continent, are numerous; and hence, the seal and the cayman abounded. In like manner, the feathered tribes were in immense multitudes; so, therefore, were the serpents. And thus it is, he beautifully adds, that the circle of nature, however enlarged or contracted, must be perfect and complete in itself to be perpetuated; a circle which, to use the illustration of our greatest poet, has been circumscribed by the golden compasses of the Eternal, and which he has filled with his wonders, and satiated with his mercies.

We have seen how numerous tribes of beings "prey upon each other," and the sense in which that expression may be rationally used—nor is there any thing shocking to reason in that ordinance, but, on the contrary, that branch of the economy of nature is as replete with benevolence as any of the rest of the laws of creation. Mr Sadler beautifully shews, that the successive renewal of life throughout the whole of creation swarming with existences, by the intervention of death, is, as it respects all but the first and original race of beings, an ordinance of benevolence, and unless the laws of nature were suspended or reversed, to those likewise; continuing, indeed, the blessing of existence while it can be enjoyed, and when no longer desirable, transferring it to successive myriads of participants, thereby preventing at once a monopoly of the pleasures, as well as a perpetuity of the increasing miseries, of existence. For only suppose animals not immortal—and what reason have we to think that the removal of those which become the prey of others, is more distressing than that of such as die what is called a natural death, which is a rare case among them, and happily so; as in this instance it would be one of lingering disease, and increasing weakness, terminated often by the most dreadful form of animal suffering—actual famine?

"In the meantime the principle of self-preservation, implanted in them by Nature, may perhaps inspire them with a fear, or rather caution, respecting their enemies; but it may be doubted whether this approaches to constant or painful apprehension; nay, whether it amounts to any thing like the occasional disquietude which human beings feel in respect to their last enemy, whose final triumph they know to be certain, and cannot but anticipate, and which often forms the bitterest ingredient in the cup of human suffering. From this feeling the inferior animals are entirely exempt. Up to the very appearance of danger their fears are not excited, and then its duration is, generally speaking, too short to admit of distinct perceptions of suffering. Instead, therefore, of having life embittered by strong apprehensions, or pursued by relentless diseases, to the last it seems to them a scene of pleasure, as the poet sings of one of the loveliest victims of the master animal of prey:

Pleased to the last he crops his flowery food,
And licks the hand just raised to shed his blood.

But, if habitual caution among many of the tribes of life is, however, excited by the circumstance of their being the objects of prey, it calls into action those facilities of escape and means of defence with which all are endowed, the successful exercise of which inspires that sense of conscious security, which, no doubt, administers to their happiness, as it does, under different circumstances, to our own.

"Moreover, familiarized as we are to slaughter, we are, perhaps, ready to transfer our ideas of this mode of sustentation far too largely to the animal creation. I am inclined to think that we mistake in imagining our world to be a kind of immense slaughter-house. Beyond a certain proportion this evidently is not the case; and that proportion, in all probability, will seem smaller, compared with the whole, the more closely we consider the subject. The expression of an author I have all along in my recollection, that of animals 'preying upon each other,' is capable of a very erroneous interpretation, and, as respects the subject under consideration, leads it to a very false conclusion. Scarcely any species of animal preys upon its own kind; from such a mode of subsistence nearly all rigidly abstain.

"Pursuing this idea as we ought, we shall find that it will almost entirely divest that part of the system of Nature under our consideration, of its apparent terrors. Look where we please, whether to the tribes of earth, air, or ocean, those creatures of prey, which are the objects of dread to those on which they feed, are, compared with the latter, in point of prolificness, sterile; and in point of numbers, few: they are then, to such, rare and solitary beings, and the amount of their depredations is accordingly limited. I mean not to confine this observation to the ferocious monarchs of the various tribes, with whom this is obviously the case, and has been often noticed; but down through all the descending links of carnivorous animals, it holds as strikingly true. The shark is as rare a monster to the cod, as the cod is to the herring; the depredations of both, then, must be limited indeed, compared with the numbers of the entire class. For example, much as game is destroyed in this country, still, probably for a single hawk, there are a thousand partridges; and for a single partridge, ten million ants. Different classes of beings may, indeed, prey upon the same tribe; but still, all the former united, will always be found little numerous, compared with the latter. Thus, though the spider commit devastations upon the same species as the swallow, the numbers of both these are as nothing, compared with those of the flies. Indeed, the minuter, and, as it appears to us, the most defenceless beings, seem to form a sort of life-assurance company amongst themselves, moving together in multitudes, and consequently, the individual risk from weakness and exposure is reduced to almost nothing. The shoals in which the smaller fry of the waters always move, and the clouds in which insects congregate, may illustrate what I mean; not that these associations may not have other purposes, and each individual distinct means of defence, or rather escape, some of which should be particularized, had we opportunity.

"On the whole, then, it is not beyond the scope of possibilities, nor can I think it very unlikely, that those devastations in nature, over which we profess to mourn so much, are, in comparison with the immense numbers exposed to them, the reverse of numerous, possibly indeed not so common as those premature deaths, from whatever cause, to which our own species is so subject, but from which theirs are almost wholly exempt.

"If the preceding views be just, it is probable that most animals in a state of nature survive through the period of their health and enjoyment, and that their decline then is almost as instantaneous, as we have noticed was their growth; when, to spare them the most cruel of deaths that must otherwise await them all, (that of solitary suffering, terminated by famine,) a numerous class of animals before alluded to, distributed through every element, are commissioned to put an end to their sufferings; whose prey they become. Nature, therefore, in this, as in all other of her operations, acts upon a principle of kindness, and rescues such from a far more acute degree of suffering, than that from which a kind master frees a faithful quadruped, its period of enjoyment over, by a sudden and easy dismissal. Nay, we observe this instinctive propensity to terminate sufferings, when the animals of prey are absent, and consequently the impulse of appetite can have nothing to do with the act; thus notwithstanding the short-sighted speculations of ignorant man, perhaps the deer which joins in concluding the miseries of a comrade he cannot relieve, acts upon a law, impressed by Nature, grounded on substantial kindness."

But what if it be said that the chain of existence so visibly perfect and complete, where Nature is undisturbed in her operations, is as evidently broken, wherever she is greatly interrupted, and that when those animals of prey to which Mr Sadler has been diverting our attention as the preservers of the balance of food and numbers, are driven away, or destroyed, still the rest of creation continues to exist?

"My answer to this final objection brings me to the last and far most important reason of their creation, and continued existence upon our earth; and this has an essential relation to that state of things which the Deity doubtless contemplated when he created our world, and especially to that being whom he condescended to place at the head of it: without whom the universe would have been incomplete, and, with all its infinite myriads of inhabitants, still destitute of a single creature who could recognise the universal Parent,—the temple of Nature void of a single worshipper of its indwelling and presiding Deity,—and that everlasting anthem of praise, with which it resounds, hushed in eternal silence!—

that mysterious being, whom the Eternal has placed, as it were, midway between immensity and nothing; who, though a creature to God, is a god to his creatures, and whom the King of the Universe has crowned with glory, and arrayed with his own vesture of immortality! And to whom, in the language of an ancient poet, he 'has given dominion over the works of his hands, and put all things in subjection under his feet:' or, to express myself in the words of a later writer, and one, perhaps, less objectionable to modern philosophy, 'Principio ipse mundus Deorum hominumque causa factus est: quæque in eo sunt omnia, ea parata ad fructum hominum et inventa sunt.' Thus is it that all creation, with its unnumbered forms and exquisite adaptations, has a prime and final reference to man.

"And yet, astonishing as the assertion seems, and almost exceeding belief, if we were not perpetually hearing it repeated; touching this one creature, at once the sole genus and species of his kind, whose increase is the most strictly guarded of all others, and who is indeed the most sterile being in existence,—to sustain whom, not only the vegetable kingdom offers its inexhaustible resources, but to whom the whole animal creation, in every element, is surrendered for that special purpose,—it is pronounced that even his food and his numbers are not duly balanced; but, on the contrary, in such grievous disproportion has Nature established the principles of their increase, that, without unnatural or cruel expedients to rectify her errors, present misery must ensue, and in 'a thousand years' (which, with his Creator, is but as one day) the discrepancy would involve him in universal distress, and threaten his final annihilation."

Mr Sadler then proceeds to the proof that numbers and food are balanced, as it respects the last and most perfect work of the Creator—Man—not proving his assertions here from a series of arithmetical calculations, involving all the registers of human existence to which the public has access—that he does in his great work to which this Dissertation is an appendix—but discussing it on those more obvious and popular grounds which, however the argument is constructed, must ever form one of its most important branches. Why then, in reference to the human race, do mere animals of prey exist at all in a state of nature? As regulators of the numbers, and consequently as preservers, of animal creation, till man himself appears—or, in other words, just as long as their office is necessary to him, and no longer, till, as the master animal of prey, he assumes the dominion which they were appointed to preserve for him.

"The history of man presents him to us, in the first stages of society in every country of the world, as comparatively few; and, as dispersed over vast tracts, solitary: his numbers progressively increase, till at length we find him multiplied into mighty nations. At first he reclaims, from the dominion of the wild beasts, but a small part only of the earth, which he gradually extends as his necessities require; making war upon them as he advances, either dispossessing or destroying them, till, at length, they utterly perish from the country, which he fully occupies. Now, if these were necessary in a state of nature to preserve the whole of animal life, by balancing its numbers and proportions, (which I trust has been fully shewn,) then is the utility of these objects of dislike and dread manifest, especially to man: they have actually preserved for him that profuse provision which Nature ordained for his use, till he appears and enjoys it. This, I think, is a true, and by no means a new, view of this important branch of the subject.

"Any material destruction of these ferocious animals, in anticipation, and before mankind were sufficient in numbers to take their place, were it very practicable, we may conclude (if the foregoing reasonings are just) would be injurious; and would be fruitful of calamity rather than of benefit to the remaining tribes of animal life, unless Nature, ever fruitful in resources, should restore the balance in some other way, not very comprehensible to us at present. Practical exemplifications of this fact, it is obviously almost impossible to give: one very interesting instance, however, just rises to my recollection. In the Carolinas, very slenderly peopled even at present, and where the necessities of the inhabitants have not compelled them to have recourse to the supplies which the waters afford, which, though so nutritious and healthful a food, is nevertheless always among the last to which mankind, in general, willingly resort; the cayman, (the American crocodile,) once numerous, has been almost entirely destroyed: hence, says Chateaubriand, the rivers are often infested with the multitudes of fishes which ascend from the ocean, and perish. Here the removal of the check without its substitution, (evidently a breach of the economy of Nature,) is productive of multiplied misery.

"But the steps of the Divine economy, in reference to the larger animals of prey, are, indeed, peculiarly manifest. Their destruction almost always bears a due proportion to the multiplication of mankind: hence the most formidable of them have long since ceased to exist in Europe; and the wolf, which still continues to infest some of its more solitary tracts, will disappear as man advances, as it did long ago from this well-peopled island. Lions thus are no longer found in many parts of the world—in Greece, for instance; and, should population press onward in the eastern and southern quarters of our globe, and spread those useful agricultural pursuits with which it is inseparably connected, the lion will no longer exist, and will be remembered only in tradition, or known to us, as the mammoth, by some unpurished remains of his majestic form.

"The animals of prey, therefore, exist only as preservers of animated creation, for the use of man, and disappear when himself approaches. They are, without a figure of speech, the locum tenentes of him who is the master animal of prey throughout the world. The co-existence, then, of these and man, would be incompatible with the scheme of Nature, and would, indeed, destroy, instead of preserving, the balance of food and numbers throughout the edible creation. Mark, therefore, how Nature has interposed insuperable obstacles and barriers against their co-existence, which she knows would be mutually destructive. She has kindled, between these and mankind, the fiercest animosity: other animals may fear man; these join hatred and defiance to fear; they are to each other irreconcilable rivals; when they meet, they either fly or contend to the very death; and no compromise has existed, or ever will exist, by which they shall conjointly prey upon creation. Nor is she satisfied even with this precaution; she has removed all possible temptation from human beings to evade or reverse this important law. The flesh of these animals, as Lord Bacon has observed, whether of beasts or birds, is not edible to man; it is, to use an emphatical word, carrion; man, therefore, has no inducement to favour their increase as forming part of his food; while, on the other hand, all his ingenuity and all his patience cannot tame such to his purposes in other respects; they are, consequently, not only highly dangerous, but utterly worthless, to him. Look at the difference made for this special purpose betwixt an animal of prey and an herbivorous one; compare the elephant and the ox, for instance, with the lion and the tiger;—the first amongst the mightiest masses of vital power in the creation, are readily reduced to the docility of a child, and the patience of a slave, in the service of man: but where is the second Bacchus, that shall attempt to couple the latter, and yoke them to his car? Buffon, if I rightly recollect, has a fine passage on the docility of the useful animals, compared with the voracious one:—a sentiment happily fully as familiar to the mind of the peasant, as it is to that of the philosopher."

With regard to Man, all the operations of nature are conducive to his support. All those numerous causes which contribute to the sustentation of the animal tribes, are again put into requisition on his behalf; and they are multiplied beyond all calculation, while each is rendered infinitely more efficient, so intent does Nature seem to be on her great work of sustaining man. But hear Mr Sadler, in a passage of great power and beauty:

"Here, however, is the place to observe, that the ample provision Nature has made for all creatures, is bestowed upon one indispensable condition; but it is one that contributes to their pleasure, as well as promotes and secures their health: it is exertion. To this Catholic law of Nature man is submitted, and in a severer degree, as we may think when superficially viewing the subject, than all the other tribes of life. But to the stricter operation of this law, he owes the exercise of those powers, mental as well as bodily, by which he rises so greatly superior to them all. It is this which is the means of elevating him through the wide gradations of his own existence, from barbarism to the highest state of civilisation. Moreover, the peculiar nature of that exertion which is required of him, in order to his sustentation, is the cause of that appropriation of the bounties of Nature which is peculiar to his race, and which necessarily lays the foundation of those social and civil institutions which conduce so much to his prosperity. This appropriation, however, which was evidently, in the contemplation of the Creator, as necessary to his existence, involves those striking inequalities in the distribution of the bounties of Nature, which have ever existed in human society, especially in its more civilized stages; and these, again, the Creator has anticipated, implanting deep in the human breast those sacred impulses which prompt the fortunate to distribute of their superfluity to the destitute; thereby awaking mutual feelings which heighten into pleasures, and more than compensate for the distresses in which they originate. It is thus that, watered by mingling tears of sympathy and sorrow, the heavenly plant of Divine charity is seen rising in all its fragrance and beauty, and bearing its perennial fruits, which are for the healing of the nations. But this feeling is peculiar to man, and is evidently given him to remedy the tendencies of that appropriation to which animal creation is a stranger. Political economists, however, contemplate a system, which shall, in great measure, dispense with this distinguishing virtue of human nature, and which, if realized, would therefore rob humanity of its noblest attribute,—that in which it most resembles the Creator,—and leave it only the selfish instincts of the brutes that perish."

But how stands the proof that Nature is more liberal of her means of support, and more careful to accomplish her purpose in behalf of man, than of all the rest of creation? Why, respecting other orders of animated beings,—severally considered, one only of the kingdoms of nature, either the vegetable or the animal, and that only in strictly limited parts, is generally afforded to their sustentation; respecting man, each is offered, and offered almost without limitation, for the same purpose. If, says Mr Sadler, particular tribes are confined to their own elements in their supply of food, each of these elements yields him its tribute of support, and some of them in unlimited quantities. If different climates and seasons are required to produce the means of subsistence to separate divisions of the family of nature, all the climates, and every season, furnishes his board with their various and successive stores. If astonishing instincts are impressed upon various animals, in order to obtain their necessary supplies, touching man, the godlike attribute of reason, as far surpassing instinct as mental perception does bodily sensation, instructs him to bend all nature to his purposes, and to provide, under all emergencies, for his present and continued sustentation.

The views which Mr Sadler so eloquently opens up on this part of his subject, must set the mind of every thoughtful reader astir, and suggest a thousand reflections on the grandeur of the design of man's earthly condition; and perhaps we may be pardoned for making a remark or two. The primary physical wants of the human being are food, clothing, shelter, and defence. To supply these, he has cleared and cultivated the earth—he has invented his various arts, and built houses and cities. At first, we see him like the other animals, labouring under the wants which their common nature produces—under sufferings to which they are alike exposed, actuated by passions which boil in their blood,—Hunger, Thirst, the inclemency of the skies, the fear and anger of self-preservation in the midst of powerful and inflammable enemies. Hunger and Thirst cultivate the earth. Fear builds castles and embattles cities. The animal is clothed by nature against cold and storm, and shelters himself in his den. Man builds his habitation, and weaves his clothing. With horns, or teeth, or claws, the strong and deadly weapons with which nature has furnished them, the animal kinds wage their war; he forges swords and spears, and constructs implements of destruction that will send death almost as far as his eye can mark his foe, and sweep down thousands together. The animal that goes in quest of his food, that pursues or flies from his enemy, has feet, or wings, or fins; but man bids the horse, the camel, the elephant, bear him, and yokes them to his chariot. If the strong animal would cross the river, he swims. Man spans it with a bridge. But the most powerful of them all stands on the beach and gazes on the ocean. Man constructs a ship, and encircles the globe. Other creatures must traverse the element nature has assigned, with means she has furnished. He chooses his element, and makes his means. Can the fish traverse the waters? So can he. Can the bird fly the air? So can he. Can the camel speed over the desert? He shall bear man as his rider.

But to see what he owes to inventive art, we should compare man, not with inferior creatures, but with himself, looking over the face of human society, as history or observation shews it. We shall find him almost sharing the life of brutes, or removed from them by innumerable differences, and incalculable degrees. In one place we see him harbouring in caves, naked, living, we might almost say, on prey, seeking from chance his wretched sustenance, food which he eats just as he finds it. This extreme degradation is rare; perhaps nowhere are all these circumstances of destitution found together—but still they are found, fearfully admonishing us of our nature. Man has as yet done nothing for himself—his own hands have done nothing for him—he lives like a beggar on the alms of nature. Turn to another land, and you see the face of the earth covered with the works of his hand—his habitation, wide-spreading, stately cities—his clothing and the ornaments of his person culled and fashioned from the three kingdoms of nature. For his food, the face of the earth bears him tribute; and the seasons and changes of heaven concur with his own art in ministering to his board.

This is the difference which man has made in his own condition by the use of his intellectual powers, awakened and goaded on by the necessities of his physical constitution. He stands naked in the midst of nature, but armed with powers which will make him her sovereign lord. Want, Pain, and Death, howling in the forest, urge him on, and he rouses up the powers of his invincible mind to the contention with physical evil. It is not his hand alone that delivers him from this lot of affliction; but it is his mind working in that powerful organ. His first food is from nature's bounty; his next is from his own art. He sees that the seeds she casts into the ground spring up with another season. He casts them in, and waits for the season. He then, at her guidance, chooses the soil and prepares it; and thus his first step towards the conquest of nature, is to observe her own silent and mysterious operations.

The early history of the great primary arts of life, their origin, and the first steps of their progress, lie buried in the darkness of antiquity; but thus much we may understand, that man found himself in the midst of a world teeming with natural productions, and full of the operation of natural powers offering him benefit, or menacing him with destruction. The various knowledge, the endlessly multiplied arts, by which he fills his life with the supplies of its great necessities, and with all its great resources of security and power, or with which he adorns it, are all merely the regulated application of powers of nature acting at his discretion upon her own substances and productions. But the various knowledge, the endlessly multiplied observation, the experience and reasonings of man added to man, of generation following generation, which were required to bring to a moderate state of advancement the great primary arts subservient to physical life,—the arts of providing food, habitation, clothing, and defence, to man, we are utterly unable to conceive. We are born to the knowledge, which was collected at first by the labours of many generations. How slowly with continual accessions of knowledge were those arts reared up which still remain to us! How many arts which had laboriously been brought to perfection, have been displaced by superior invention, and fallen into oblivion? Fenced in as we are by the works of our predecessors, we see but a small part of the power of man contending with the difficulties of his lot. But what a wonderful scene would be opened up before our eyes, with what intense interest should we look on, if we could indeed behold man armed only with his own implanted powers, and going forth to conquer the creation! If we could see him beginning by subduing evils, and supplying painful wants; going on to turn those evils and wants into the means of enjoyment—and at length, in the wantonness and pride of his power, filling his existence with luxuries! If we could see him from his first step, in the untamed though fruitful wilderness, advancing to subdue the soil, to tame and multiply the herds,—from bending the branches into a bower, to fell the forest and quarry the rock,—seizing into his own hands the element of fire, directing its action on substances got from the bowels of the earth,—fashioning wood, and stone, and metal, to the will of his thought,—searching the nature of plants to spin their fibres, or with their virtues to heal his disease;—if we could see him raise his first cities, launch his first ship, calling the winds and waters to be his servants, and to do his work,—changing the face of the earth,—forming lakes and rivers,—joining seas, or stretching the continent itself into the dominion of the sea;—if we could do all this in imagination, then should we understand something of what man's intellect has done for his physical life, and what the necessities of his physical life have done in forcing into action all the powers of his intelligence.

But there are still higher considerations arising from the influence of man's physical necessities on the destiny of the species. It is this subjugation of natural evil, and this created dominion of art, that prepares the earth to be the scene of his social existence. His hard conquest was not the end of his toil. He has conquered the kingdom in which he was to dwell in his state. That full unfolding of his moral powers to which he is called, was only possible in those states of society which are thus brought into being by his conflict with all his physical faculties against all the stubborn powers of the material universe; for out of the same conquest Wealth is created. In this progress, and by means thus brought into action, the orders and classes of society are divided; Property itself, the allotment of the earth, takes place, because it is the bosom of the earth that yields food. That great foundation of the stability of communities is thus connected with the same necessity; and in the same progress, and out of the same causes, arise the first great Laws by which society is held together in order. Thus that whole wonderful development of the Moral Nature of man, in all those various forms which fill up the history of the race, in part arises out of, and is always intimately blended with, the labours to which he has been aroused by those first great necessities of his physical nature. But had the tendency to increase his numbers been out of all proportion to the means provided by nature and infinitely multipliable by art, for the subsistence of human beings, how could this magnificent march have moved on?

Hence we may understand on what ground the ancient nations revered so highly, and even deified the authors of the primary arts of life. They considered not the supply of the animal wants merely; but they contemplated that mighty change in the condition of mankind to which these arts have given origin. It is on this ground that they had raised the character of human life, that Virgil assigns them their place in the dwellings of bliss, among devoted patriots and holy priests, among those whom song or prophecy had inspired, among those benefactors of men whose names were to live for ever in their memory, giving his own most beautiful expression to the common sentiment of mankind.

"Hic manus ob patriam pugnando vulnera passi,

Quique sacerdotes casti, dum vita manebat,

Quique pii vates, et Phœbo digna locuti,
Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes,
Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo;
Omnibus his niveâ cinguntur tempora vittâ."

True, that in savage life men starve. But is that any proof that nature has cursed the race with a fatal tendency to multiply beyond the means of subsistence? None whatever. Attend for a little to this point. Of the real power of the bodily appetites for food, and the sway they may attain over the moral nature of the mind, we, who are protected by our place among the arrangements of civil society from greatly suffering under it, can, indeed, form no adequate conception. Let us not now speak of those dreadful enormities which, in the midst of dismal famine, are recorded to have been perpetrated by civilized men, when the whole moral soul, with all its strongest affections and instinctive abhorrences, has sunk prostrate under the force of that animal suffering. But the power of which we speak, as attained by this animal feeling, subsists habitually among whole tribes and nations. It is that power which it acquires over the mind of the savage, who is frequently exposed to suffer its severity, and who hunts for himself the food with which he is to appease it. Compare the mind of the human being as you are accustomed to behold him, knowing the return of this sensation only as a grateful incitement to take the ready nourishment which is spread for his repast, with that of his fellow-man, bearing through the lonely woods the gnawing pang that goads him to his prey. Hunger is in his heart; hunger bears along his unfatiguing feet; hunger lies in the strength of his arm; hunger watches in his eye; hunger listens in his ear; as he couches down in his covert, silently waiting the approach of his expected spoil, this is the sole thought that fills his aching mind—"I shall satisfy my hunger!" When his deadly aim has brought his victim to the ground, this is the thought that springs up as he rushes to seize it, "I have got food for my hungry soul!" What must be the usurpation of animal nature here over the whole man! It is not merely the simple pain, as if it were the forlornness of a human creature bearing about his famishing existence in helplessness and despair—though that, too, is indeed a true picture of some states of our race;—but here he is not a suffering and sinking wretch—he is a strong hunter, and puts forth his strength fiercely under the urgency of this pain. All his might in the chase, all pride of speed, and strength, and skill—all thoughts of long and hard endurance—all images of perils past—all remembrances and all foresight—are gathered on that one strong and keen desire—are bound down to the sense of that one bitter animal want. These feelings recurring day by day in the sole toil of his life, bring upon his soul a vehemence and power of desire in this object, of which we can have no conception, till he becomes subjected to hunger as a mighty animal passion—a passion such as it rages in those fierce animal kinds which it drives with such ferocity on their prey. He knows hunger as the wolf knows it—he goes forth with his burning heart, like the tiger to lap blood. But turn to man in another condition to which he has been brought by the very agency of his physical on his intellectual and moral being! How far removed is he now from that daily contention with such evils as these! How much does he feel himself assured against them by belonging to the great confederacy of social life! How much is it veiled from his eyes by the many artificial circumstances in which the satisfaction of the want is involved. The work in which he labours the whole day —on which his eyes are fixed and his hands toil—is something altogether unconnected with his own wants—connected with distant wants and purposes of a thousand other men in which he has no participation. And as far as it is a work of skill, he has to fix his mind on objects and purposes so totally removed from himself, that they all tend still more to sever his thoughts from his own necessities; and thus it is that civilization raises his moral character, when it protects almost every human being in a country from that subjection to this passion, to which even noble tribes are bound down in the wildernesses of nature.

Yet it is the most melancholy part of all the speculation that is suggested by the condition of men, to observe what a wide gloom is cast over their souls by this severe necessity, which is nevertheless the great and constant course of the improvement of their condition. It is not suffering alone—for that they may be injured to bear,—but the darkness of the understanding, and the darkness of the heart, which comes on under the oppression of toil, that is miserable to see. Our fellow-men, born with the same spirits as ourselves, seem yet denied the common privileges of that spirit. They seem to bring faculties into the world that cannot be unfolded, and powers of affection and desire, which, not their fault, but the lot of their birth, will pervert and degrade. There is an humiliation laid upon our nature in the doom which seems thus to rest upon a great portion of our species, which, while it requires our most considerate compassion for those who are thus depressed, compels us to humble ourselves under the sense of our own participation in the nature from which it flows. Therefore, in estimating the worth, the virtue of our fellow men, whom Providence has placed in a lot that yields to them the means, and little more than the means, of supporting life in themselves and those born of them, let us never forget how intimate is the necessary union between the wants of the body and the thoughts of the soul. Let us remember, that over a great proportion of all humanity, the soul is in a struggle for its independence and power with the necessities of that nature in which it is enveloped. It has to support itself against sickening, or irritating, or maddening thoughts, inspired by weariness, lassitude, want, or the fear of want. It is chained down to the earth by the influence of one great and constant occupation—that of providing the means of its mortal existence. When it shews itself shook and agitated, or overcome in the struggle, what ought to be the thoughts and feelings in the considerate soul of wisdom for poor humanity? When, on the other hand, we see nature preserving itself pure, bold, and happy amidst the perpetual threatenings or assaults of those evils from which it cannot fly, and, though oppressed by its own weary wants, forgetting them all in that love which ministers to the wants of others—when we see the brow wrinkled and drenched by incessant toil, the body, in the power of its prime, bowed down to the dust, and the whole frame in which the immortal spirit abides marked, but not dishonoured, by its slavery to fate;—and when, in the midst of all this ceaseless depression and oppression, from which man must never hope to escape on earth, we see him still seeking and still finding joy, delight, and happiness in the finer affections and loves and desires of his spiritual being, giving to the lips of those he loves the scanty morsel earned by his own hungry and thirsty toil, purchasing by sweat, sickness, and fever, Education and Instruction and Religion to the young creatures who delight the soul of him who is starving for their sakes, resting with gratitude on that day, whose return is ever like a fresh fountain to his exhausted and weary heart, and preserving a profound and high sense of his own immortality among all the earth-born toils and troubles that would in vain chain him down to the dust,—when we see all this, and think of all this, we feel indeed how rich may be the poorest of the poor, and learn to respect the moral being of man in its triumphs over the power of his physical nature. But we do not learn to doubt or deny the wisdom of the Creator. We do not learn from all these struggles, and all these defeats, and all these victories, and all these triumphs, that God sent us his creatures into this life to starve, for that the air, the earth, and the waters have not wherewith to feed the mouths that gape for food through all the elements! Nor do we learn that want is a crime, and poverty a sin—and that they who would toil, but cannot, and they who can toil, but have no work set before them, are intruders at Nature's table, and must be driven by those who are able to pay for their seats to famine, starvation, and death—almost denied a burial!

But to return to Mr Sadler from the episode into which we have been led away from the main action of his argument. He goes on to expatiate, not only on the command given to man over "edible nature," but along with it the wonderful faculty of increasing the productiveness of any part thereof which may be most suitable or agreeable to him.

"Take a single example, and let that be the most important one;—wheat. Dioscorus Siculus informs us, this is indigenous in Sicily, his native country. There is still said to be in that island a species of wild wheat, but which is, perhaps, compared with the cultivated, what wild oats (with which most of us are familiar) are, compared with our present samples of that grain—barren and unproductive; but let this wheat be duly cultivated in a soil prepared by human industry, and we are informed by Pliny it has been known to yield from 300 to 400 grains for 1; and Herodotus assures us, on his own authority as an eye-witness, that from 200 to 300 was the regular return in Babylonia. Perhaps these ancients may be doubted; not, however, by those who are acquainted with the creative powers of human industry. Du Hamel informs us that he has seen barley produce 4800 fold; and, to return to the former plant, wheat, a scientific countryman of our own, Miller—a name well known in the annals of culture—performed an experiment in the botanical garden of Cambridge, of which he was curator, by which a single grain of red wheat returned 22,109 ears, and 566,800 grains. Had he carried his division of the root one step further, which, he says, other experiments convinced him was fully practicable, he should have obtained ten times the quantity from the same single grain; namely, between five and six million-fold increase. This is recorded in the Transactions of the Royal Society for 1768, and verified by Dr Watson."

He then speaks of the faculty man has above all other animals of sustaining life, with the least inconvenience, in the widest range of climate, and of that provision of nature by which such faculty is rendered of avail, namely, that those productions, whether vegetable or animal, on which he chiefly depends for subsistence, are endued with a capability of enduring a similar change. Thus, for example, Von Buch found the business of pasturage advantageously pursued, and even grain healthy and prolific, and succeeding admirably, some degrees within the arctic circle, on the verge of the 70th degree of northern latitude. As the climate varies, so does the necessity of clothing; nature, says he, still wears his livery wherever he moves. In the hot climates, silk and cotton are presented to him; in the temperate ones, these yield to the finer wools; which, as the latitude northern, become thicker and more plentiful, till, in the frozen regions, fur, much the warmest of all coverings, is produced in abundance.

"Should it be attempted to evade the force of this argument, by attributing all these changes to the operation of physical causes, what shall be said of a more irresistible proof of the same cheering truth—the plain intention of Nature, to support in comfort human beings in every climate, namely, that when she can vary the different tribes of creation no further, without destroying their character, then, for his sake, she creates new ones, so obviously adapted to his local necessities, that he could not continue to exist without them? Take two examples, and two only; one from each of those parts of the globe which are justly conceived to be the least friendly to human life, and consequently the most needing such extraordinary aids; the first, from the torrid zone, and let the camel be the instance. This singular animal, in the first place, has, of course, to be adapted to the peculiarities of the climate, in order to its own existence; and this is strikingly the case. In a region where there is little vegetation, and less moisture, Nature has constructed its muscular frame on the most spare and economical principles; on such, therefore, as demand the smallest supplies: hence, it requires little food, which, to make the most of, it ruminates; it must consume that food hard and dry: it has, consequently, great muscular force in the jaw,

Above all, it is probably beyond any other quadruped in creation patient of continued thirst; a quality which, in such a region, seems to reverse the very nature of things; and yet, without this one singular provision, all the rest would have been of no avail, in so parched and weary a land as it has to inhabit. Other anatomical adaptations might be pointed out, but I shall merely mention its hoof; this is lined with a lump of flesh, which would, in great measure, prevent its utility in the hard and mountainous district of Europe; but which is plainly adapted to the dry, sandy, and level soil it has to traverse. But all these peculiarities, so necessary to its own being, subserve that of man. The flesh is acceptable; the milk nutritious; while the patience and gentleness with which Nature has endued it, have rendered it the obedient slave of the human species. In short, to use the words of an author not generally accused of enthusiasm, Volney, 'So great is the importance of the camel to the desert, that were it deprived of that useful animal, it must infallibly lose every inhabitant.'

"Look next at the frigid zone, in its more remote recesses, where Nature seems to be so sparing in all that is necessary to life, and so profuse in what is deemed hostile to it; where the cattle, accounted essential to our comfort, if not to our existence, could not, generally speaking, either live or be fed through the long and rigorous winter which is there experienced, and which, if they could be preserved during that period, would not answer the necessary purposes to which we apply them. Is, then, the Laplander deserted by Providence? On the contrary, it has presented, exclusively, to him one of the noblest animals in existence; and in its formation, has so economised the scanty means of nature, as to unite at once the valuable properties of almost every other—and all adapted, specially, to the peculiar station it has to occupy. I need not say I allude to the rein-deer, a quadruped which comprises every thing he wants, either for life, convenience, or luxury. Its milk rivals that of the cow; its flesh that of our deer; its fleetness and docility those of the horse; and he that placed him there, so contrived that part of the frame which I have alluded to in the other instance, that the hoof of this wonderful and interesting animal should, contrary to its own genius elsewhere, spread out, and become, literally speaking, a snow-shoe; so that it can convey its owner over that mantle of snow which covers, for so long a portion of the year, rocks and valleys, woods and plains, lakes and streams,—with an incredible swiftness, where no horse could travel at all, if he could even live. Without sustenance, the gift, however, would be of no avail: this is anticipated and supplied. In that rigorous climate, so adverse to vegetation through the greatest part of the year, a moss is, nevertheless, produced in profusion, hardly found in other climates, where it would be of little use; this the animal finds beneath the snow by a peculiar instinct, and by this it is amply sustained. This is a single evidence that the Supreme cares even for the humblest of human beings, the Laplander; and I could no more bring myself to believe that it is not to His plain intention that he is indebted for his sustenance, or that such sustenance was insufficient, than I could, that the noble animal on which his existence depends, is the product of an animated film fed upon moss, which never rested in its improving efforts, till it supplied itself with snow shoes.

"In a word, all the laws of the vegetable, as well as the nature of animal, existence, are plainly subservient to the solace and sustentation of human beings; and, in pursuing the proof of this to whatever limits, we should not be in the predicament of some who think that miracles end where knowledge begins; but, on the contrary, we should find that, as our knowledge increased, the miracle of the Divine wisdom and benevolence would enlarge, till the feeding of an ancient Seer in the wilderness of Carmel by ravens, would seem to make a far less demand upon the prescience and the power of the Deity, than the constant and mysterious operation of that endless chain of causes and effects, receiving its primary impulse from the same power, by which every single being, rational or irrational, is sustained and fed. We have, indeed, obscured our intellects, and benumbed our feelings, by making use of words that, strictly speaking, as we too frequently employ them, have no meaning. We talk of causes and effects, as words of course, quite plain in their signification to the slenderest capacity. As expressing facts deduced from our observation of the laws of Nature, this phraseology may be allowable; but when we have observed two or more facts in a certain, constant connexion with each other, and have remarked the order of their priority, we are as far as ever from furnishing, either to the judgment or the imagination, any light as to the reason of such connexion. The motions of a grain of sand conform to certain laws which we have observed upon, and to this conformity we give a name,—attraction; but we know as little about the nature of this attraction as the unprotected child hurt by the fall it has occasioned. What are, therefore, denominated causes, are nothing more than determinations of the Deity; which, as founded in infinite wisdom, may be uniform and unchangeable in their nature. If, therefore, I put into the earth a seed, 'it may chance be of wheat or some other grain,' and trace the miracle of vegetation from its commencement to its completion, when I observe it has extracted from the earth matter hundreds of times its own weight, and of a nature totally dissimilar to the elements from whence it springs, and for purposes essentially different, I may notice, throughout, a number of connected effects, but I discern no cause beyond the will of the Deity. In like manner, if I regard the purposes for which this crop of grain is evidently designed, namely, for food, and when, becoming such, it is, by quite as inexplicable a process, partly converted into an animal substance, and becomes a portion of myself, I again discern effects, but no causes, beyond the will of the Deity. It is thus, therefore, that I have treated the subject under consideration throughout. In establishing the balance between life and its sustentation, I have pointed at the plain indications of the Supreme will; that will once ascertained, it is as plain as the indissoluble connexion between what are called causes and effects, that the balance of food and numbers is eternally established."

Mr Sadler, in a former part of his Dissertation, has spoken, as we have seen, of certain facts regarding migratory animals, which have reference to themselves, but he now alludes to others which refer plainly to the welfare of our species. Nature thus affords a timely supply of sustentation to human beings, especially in the first stages of society, when their numbers are few, and the earth but partially cultivated. Many edible quadrupeds, as Chateaubriand says, have the periods of their migration as exactly calculated, as that of birds, and like them, evidently accommodated to the utility and necessities of men. Then, if we look to the sea—from the prolific North, what innumerable shoals are sent forth and directed, by some mysterious impulse, to all the shores! Only think of the pigeon species in North America! The amount of a single flight of them steering towards the North, in order to supply that less fruitful region with abundance, was calculated by Alexander Wilson, the celebrated Scottish ornithologist, to amount to 2,230,272,000, or at least a brace of pigeons each to every man, woman, and child in the world! Our insular position, Mr Sadler observes, prevents us from witnessing the migration of quadrupeds; and as to the fishes and the fowls, which obey the same benevolent law, the unexampled richness of our internal resources enables us to overlook the addition to our food which the air and the ocean offer to our acceptance, unless with a view to vary our luxuriant repasts. But place us, he adds, in the inhospitable regions of nature, and how should we then regard the subject? This amazing provision would appear as a perpetual repetition of the ancient miracle of the wilderness; and none who were not divested of reason, as well as feeling, would fail to recognise, in the timely supply, that hand so visibly stretched forth in behalf of his offspring.

But there is another important purpose to be answered by the migratory principle. Mr Sadler ventures to suggest that Nature, in imposing it on so many and most important orders of animal beings, purposed to disperse them over the habitable globe, as so many seeds of future increase, wherever man should be found to avail himself of the boon. The cow probably was, in its untamed state, migratory; the deer certainly is; and when we add the great number of birds that are—all useful to man—Mr Sadler's suggestion seems right. Indeed, of all the migratory tribes, he observes, those, and those only, are capable of being domesticated and retained, that are serviceable for human sustenance.

"In closing these thoughts on the nature and objects of the migratory principle in animal creation, I would pause to ask, who can trace, even in a single instance, those dependent and connected laws of nature by which these supplies are afforded to man? Who can trace the different stages of their progressive preparation, or measure, even in thought, the vastness of the repast which is ever pouring forth in its full maturity? Deep in the unfathomable ocean, or concealed in the wild and wooded wastes of the inaccessible north, the mighty process is, while we are thus feebly essaying to speak concerning it, proceeding unobserved, in a never-ending succession of renewals and completions. Meantime, these innumerable flights are almost untouched, and the inexhaustible bounties of the ocean barely tasted; and no wonder; for the mother Earth herself, nowhere fully cultivated, lies in many of her most fertile regions totally neglected. Man, nevertheless, age after age, has become more and more fastidious in the choice of his food, and more profuse in its use; till, in this period of culpable luxury, the cry of prospective famine is raised—a cry, of which all the elements re-echo the falsehood, and which rises to the throne of the Eternal as an insult on all those perfections through which he condescends to the very senses of mankind."

Near the end of the Dissertation, Mr Sadler, after having proved all his positions, and established the balance of the food and numbers of animated nature, alludes finely to a system of reasoning pursued by the wisest of the heathen philosophers, which he thinks specially applicable to the present subject. Thus they inferred immortality from the intense desire for it implanted in the human soul, because, as far as they had scanned nature, they saw no desire without its appropriate gratification. Look again at the senses. For which of them has not the Deity provided an adequate and appropriate gratification? If, says he, very beautifully, when the sense of sight is awakened, it opens to a flood of "bright effluence of bright essence increate," perfectly sufficient for its purpose, namely, to drink in the surrounding works of the Deity,—can we, can any man believe that that eye must wax dim, and become dark for ever, because another and a neighbouring sense, on which all the rest depend, which equally longs for gratification, and is equally capable of being gratified, has no supply of its wants and desires, but is doomed to suffering, privation, and destruction? No! The mouth, the teeth, the stomach of man are guarantees that God has provided him with subsistence—these are "patents for food," that the Deity himself has granted; proofs, indeed, that numbers and food are balanced.

The Dissertation closes with a noble passage—than which indeed we know few passages nobler in modern English prose. Mr Sadler has been pointing to the actual condition and existence of animated beings, in full proof that their numbers and food are balanced. Nothing can be clearer, he truly says, than that animal happiness is totally irreconcilable with an insufficiency of food. If there be the alleged tendency in all animated life to increase beyond the "nourishment provided for it"—if nature has scattered existence with profusion, but has been sparing in its sustentation, then must there be universal misery through every tribe of the animal creation. But he appeals to human experience if this be the case.

"To advert to that part of animated nature, of which man takes little or no heed, and which is generally removed beyond the limits of his interference: I ask, are they seen multiplying around us in unsustainable numbers? After having represented nature as an arena of universal carnage, where her offspring are

'Never ending, still beginning,
Fighting still, and still destroying;—

are these warring germs of existence, though still feeding upon each other, starving? Does nature, I ask, exhibit these scenes of unceasing strife and confusion, where slaughter is the sole and evident business of life; to which want and famine are to be superadded, to rectify the constant tendency to redundancy? Do the insects sport awhile in the air, and, before their natural date of being, drop by exhausted myriads, and strew the ground with expiring animation? Do the birds pour their faltering and unfinished songs, and, adorned with the mockery of beauty and gaiety, drop from the branches, and flutter, and die at our feet? Do the fishes, increasing so as to spread the devastation through the other element, become torpid and expire by millions, till the pure medium to which they appertain is polluted with their floating carcasses? Or, if these queries be dismissed through the door of absurdity, by saying that the constant tendency of all these tribes of beings to have too little food, is accompanied by a constant tendency to an excess of it; which is precisely the argument founded on mutual destruction, as the case is put by those who maintain the superfecundity of all animated nature; to stop at once this loophole of retreat, let us ask whether those animals, on which none others prey, are, in their native haunts, seen in this constant state of inanition and death, which would be the inevitable consequence of their increasing beyond the balance of their food. Is the eagle of the north seen thus pining away; with that eye which lit its fires at the meridian blaze faded; with those pinions with which he once scaled the heavens, drooping; and the mighty talons with which he was wont to strike and destroy, powerless and relaxed;—dying for want of food? Or is the majestic monarch of the animal creation, the lion, found in his native seats, thus subdued and quailed by want, till, weak and cowardly, he becomes the ready prey of every careless obtruder: or otherwise has he to raven on his species in default of other food, till his haunts are strewn with the carcasses of his own kind? I repeat the question, is the scene of nature one of general suffering, agony, and death? No:—such a condition, as it respects the universal number of existences, is as a single exception to the vast plurality of cases; as it regards that single exception, the moment of actual suffering is probably short, in comparison with the allotted term of enjoyment; nor can even that individual instance be traced to an insufficiency in the general provision of Nature for all animated beings.

"Turn we then from the view of this phantasma, formed by distorted principles and distempered feelings, to the contemplation of nature, in the sober lights of philosophy and truth. Let her secluded haunts be open to the inspection, I care not of whom, so that he have an eye to see, and a heart to feel, the happiness of her animated progeny. Without sending such a one with Humboldt to the southern regions, swarming with universal animation; or with Acerbi to the north, which, notwithstanding our notions of it as a dreary solitude, is probably, both on earth and ocean, at least as luxuriant of life, let him penetrate into the wilder scenery with which this country even yet abounds, or lose himself in the seclusion of some of those afforested demesnes which still exhibit nature in her loveliest, because most unconstrained attitudes, and which recall to our ideas that paradise which the poet of England has taught imagination to restore. There, on the wane of some summer's day, and before the animal tribes have retired to their timely repose, let him lay himself down upon 'the sloping cowslip-covered bank,' and, shaded by a canopy of flowering and luxuriant foliage, look and listen. He will find, according to a celebrated observer of nature, all the animal tribes, down to the insects, wallowing in luxury; or, as Paley says of them, 'so happy as not to know what to do with themselves.' Close to his eye, to which the clearness of the air and the nearness of the objects give a sort of mi-microscopic acuteness, he sees innumerable insects, many of which, if he is not a practised entomologist, are minute and brilliant strangers; and if he is, are constantly putting his knowledge to a severe test; all full of life and enjoyment, leaping about with incredible agility, climbing up the spiry grass, or disporting on the flowers with which it is embroidered; amongst these the bee is plying its busy harvest, and filling up every interval of labour with its song; a conspicuous example, perhaps, of the happy business of every inferior wing. If he chance to look to the roots of his verdant pillow, still he sees nature swarming with animation; innumerable terrene insects strike his notice, many of them, perhaps, resting during the sultry hours, but whose labours he would have witnessed had he been there at the dewy dawn instead of the close of the day, in innumerable shining threads suspended from every point of grass, and investing the whole surface of the meads with a film of inconceivable fineness and lustre. Whichever way he looks, there is not a plant or a flower without its appropriate population. Further from him he sees throngs still more innumerable,

And fill the air, or float the dimpling stream;’

all expressing, as far as motion and appearance without language can express it, the utmost measure of enjoyment. Nor are even sounds wanting to signify the reign of universal pleasure. Far more unequivocal than the busy noise arising from the crowded haunts of human beings, is that continuous murmur of unnumbered wings, and the ceaseless hum, with which their universal occupation is plied, which soothes and falls upon the ear in one continued and unbroken unison, save when the exulting songs of the painted birds, responding in innocent rivalry, add melody to this pleasing and perpetual note of harmonious nature. In the shallows of the clear stream which flows babbling at his foot, he sees multitudes of existences which flit along like living shadows full of activity and pleasure: while dimpling its surface, or gathering in clouds above it, another order of beings, that of insects of different tribes and various degrees of brilliancy, are disporting; forming a world of their own, replete with equal plenty and joyousness. The wild animals, meantime, occasionally scud past him, intent upon their pastime, from which his intrusion on their haunts startles them; some of the nobler ones, whose stately forms excite his admiration, gaze at him at a distance, and pass on. Through an opening vista of the wooded solitude, he sees a whole herd of these moving as by one impulse; every motion as buoyant as though they were almost aerial. And far beyond the bounds of the surrounding domain, a still more magnificent prospect spreads before him. The surface of the earth, to the distant horizon, is tessellated with enclosures, and glows with many coloured crops. Here the pastures are clothed with flocks; there the valleys are covered over with corn; the little hills rejoice on every side; they shout for joy, they also sing! Human habitations are sprinkled over the prospect, like gems on the mantle of nature; and here and there they cluster into a town; while the temples of Divine worship, ‘which point with taper spire to heaven,’ are seen, rising as far as the eye can stretch, and crown the happy prospect with the proof, that mankind are neither insensate nor ungrateful; that they know who it is that ‘gives them rain and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness.’ He gazes till the tints of day fade, and the glorious prospect recedes from his sight. The busy tribes of life are hushed in repose, one solitary and unrivalled songster only keeps up the vigil in the temple of nature, but in what strains does she ‘charm the listening shades, and teach the night his praise!’ He looks up and beholds the eternal stars successively rekindling their fires, and resuming their courses; and the moon walking forth in her brightness. All the near and transitory scenes of nature thus cut off, the soul calls home its scattered thoughts, and centres them in loftier meditations concerning that mysterious being, whose works it had just been contemplating, and who now appears more intimately and awfully present. He rises, and retires to his wonted place: in a frame of solemn devotion which recognises the Deity alone, and him only in his one sacred attribute of unbounded and everlasting goodness.”

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A REJECTED Contributor is the bitterest of all enemies—but likewise the most impotent. To be rejected seems worse than to be cut up—and yet reason says that to be buried in the Balaam-Box is not so bad as to be scarified by the Knout. Observe—We never insult our Contributors, gentle or simple, as many editors do—but simply send the stupid ones asleep among the sunphs. Why then all that spleen—bile—and gall spluttered on Maga by unsuccessful suitors? Though she,—capricious coquette,—repels, rejects, shuns, or declines their amorous advances, yet never never does she, like some vain beauties we could name, blab to the public ear the secret of their discountenanced loves. Why then should they themselves betray it, by sneakingly seeking to disparage her peerless charms? A single syllable muttered against Maga lets the cat out of the bag—and all the world exclaims, “Oh, ho!” Thenceforth the whey-faced whiner is known wherever he goes, to be a rejected article—other Magas look on him with suspicious eyes, conjecturing that there must be something amiss—and he dies at last of the yellow or black jaundice. Such conduct, to say the least of it, is very ungrateful. Were Maga to encourage the advances of elderly gentlemen, by softly treading upon their toes, laying her silken hand of long, white, slender, pink-nailed fingers on their arm, and with her warm, red, balmy mouth, almost touching their ear, asking in a silvery whisper “If it did not thunder”—shrinking to their side all the while, with her frame all on the tremor like a sensitive plant quivering to the touch, then indeed would it be highly culpable in her, the coquette, to say—in reply to the question when popped—“No—no—sir—you must excuse me—no—no—no!” And were she to add to the cruelty of refusal, the shame of exposure, publishing a monthly list of all the wretches who for her sake must wear the willow—then indeed might the rejected articles, unsatisfied with sympathy, call aloud for punishment. But how far different is her conduct! Never does she consign a suitor to the Balaam-Box without a tear! She sighs to see the tin-lid heaving to the “hotch” of the poor Contributor below! She shudders when “ awhile the living hill

Heaves with convulsive throes, and all is still.”

But farther. Though rejected twenty times, if you be a man or woman of talents or genius, persevere; and who knows but that on the twenty-first attempt, “Your joy is like a deep affright,” to find yourself figuring before the whole world in a leading article? Some people are so huffy! An Editor must in with their article instanter—that very month—though perhaps the parcel arrives on the twentieth—the very day our excellent friend, Captain Bain, has gone blazing away out of the mouth of the Frith with the James Watt rejoicing in a ten thousand impression of a double number. Had his article been the only article in the whole wide world, it might perhaps have had some small chance of insertion—some time or other—before he died; but when you consider, that, on the very day his article arrived—and not only on that day, but every day before or since—scores of articles, over and above his article, had come flying from “a’ the airts the win’ can blaw”—an absolute shower of whitey-brown—you must see at once that there was no more chance of his article in particular being snapt up by Maga, than of any one particular fly being snapt up by one trout when all the Tweed was alive with green-tails. Yet the idiot—if he will allow us to call him so—after searching in vain all through our July number for his article—even among the Deaths and Marriages, and in among the Appendix of Bills—scrawls his rage by return of post—screeching for his article—the restoration of his article—totally unaware—O the blind minds of men!—that his article had, on the very day of its arrival in Modern Athens, received Christian Burial, along with many other unfortunates who had been swept off by the same epidemic, and interred deep down below the power of Hare or Knox, under the Balaam-Box, that Patent SAFE.

Such contributors continue clamorous for years. Some of them go mad—others get silly; but though they never tax the elements with unkindness, they never cease abusing Old Christopher North, who keeps his temper to a miracle—lets them weary the Post-office with letters “unanswered, disappointed, unreceived,”—and merely once a-month wishes them and their articles all at the devil.

Now we put it to all such impatient and irritable contributors, if it be not most unreasonable to lose their tempers at that rate, and to take offence when and where no offence is intended, but, on the other hand, the utmost amenity and mild manners? Time and tide wait for no man, and chance rules the world. Are we alone to be denied the privilege of submission to these powers? What though their articles “rot in cold obstruction” for a time, times, and half a time? Think of the thousand and one causes that may have, without much or any blame on our part, condemned them to a temporary or an eternal oblivion! How often are jewels mis-laid? “We hunt half a day for a forgotten dream,” nor recover it at last, though all the laws of association have been brought into play. So must it often be with articles. Most mysteriously do they slip aside, and disappear into crannies in the “great globe itself,” wherein, no doubt, they will be found by future ages, and the unrolled papyri deciphered for the benefit of generations yet unborn. Many fly up to the moon, and the Man there publishes them in his Magazine. Human life is proverbially short, and is it to be expected or wished by any contributor professing the Christian creed that We, upwards of seventy, should, instead of preparing ourselves for another world, waste the few fleeting hours yet left to us in hunting, night and day, even in “impossible places,” for lost articles? Besides, we are not only always very old, but also often very sick; and our gout alone, to say nothing of almost periodical attacks of cholera morbus, ought, with all men of common humanity, to be sustained as a valid excuse for the irrecoverable loss of an occasional article. Then are we to be debarred the ordinary amusements of this weary world? May we not, like the rest of our brethren of mankind, make a tour of the Lakes, or the Highlands, or Switzerland, or the Tyrol? And during our absence, must not hundreds of articles lie dormant? The man lives not to whom we would trust the keys. We hate descending into particulars—but we owe it to our much injured selves to remind all such captious and querulous contributors that, for months past, we have been on the move from No. 17, Prince’s Street to 45, George Street—and that in that long-protracted bustle a thousand things have been necessarily forgotten for a time, or lost to all eternity. The Balaam-Box itself made a narrow escape. A strong-backed villain, obviously in the pay of one of the Southron Magazines, clutched it out of the hurley, and off with it on his shoulders down Leith Walk, before a west wind that was then filling the sails of a London-bound Berwick smack. Providentially We were hobbling from our lunch at Picardy’s, and met the mid-day highway robber full in the face. We should have known the Balaam-Box among ten thousand trunks. One tip of the crutch laid the bearer in the kennel—and Sir David Gam and Tappitoury who had been eyeing us from a window, were instantly on the spot, and proud were they to bear the treasure to the Sanctum Sanctorum. If, after considering these things, and a thousand collateral circumstances, the contributors to whom we allude still regard us with angry feelings, we have only to say,

“Away to heaven, respective Lenity,
And fire-eyed Fury be my conduct now!”

And here we are reminded of one especial blockhead, who transmitted to us a good many months ago, through a distinguished friend, some elegant and graceful verses by a lady. We had designed them a place of honour, but our arrangements prevented their appearance at the time we wished; and perhaps we should have stated to the fair writer the reason of the inevitable delay. We now request her to accept our humble apology, and the assurance of our high esteem. The person who demanded the verses back, and who occupies, we believe, some humble and obscure place under government, informed us, in his ill-spelt letter, with much severity and little grammar, that the itch was the Scottish plague. That is a Cockney notion. Cutaneous diseases are more or less prevalent in all countries, and we believe especially in poor ones—such as the Highlands of Scotland, where the people live chiefly on oatmeal. But the Highlanders—though poor—are hospitable—generous—and brave; and their hands, though haply sometimes rather rough in the cuticle, can well handle the claymore and the bayoneted musket. Beyond all the nations of the earth, in manners they are—even the poorest of the poor—gentlemen; and that would be painfully felt by this wretched creature, were he ever to stoop his head as low beneath the door-lintel of a Highland hut, as he stoops it every day before the master who gives him bread. A slight eruption on the skin—rare now in any part of Scotland, for English cleanliness has of late years become domesticated here—is a mere trifle compared with a leprosy of the liver—the incurable disease in which he pines; and oatmeal, earned by honest labour, even although, but for the gracious antidote of Glenlivet, it may sometimes induce the itch, is preferable food to turtle-soup purchased by the proceeds of a shameless sinecure; nor is the worst scurvy that can afflict the body so calamitous as the scurvy that eats into the soul. The one is a misfortune, which religion enables a good man to bear—the other is a vice, which any little religion the sufferer may possess serves but to shew more odious, and which an evil conscience renders altogether unendurable. Hinc illæ lachrymæ!

But now that we are established in our new Sanctum, we shall speedily bring up all our arrears. The clerk of the Balaam-Box shall be kept more assiduously to his duty—and our Contributors may depend, ere long, on a general jail-delivery of all our Escrutoires. Much misconception prevails in the public mind respecting the character of the contents of the Balaam-Box. Many brilliant articles are hidden in that gloom—but like comets their tails are too long, and would, if admitted into the heaven of Maga, sweep out the stars. But a comet judiciously curtailed may occasionally illumine the horizon—nay, we have known a planet there brighter than any fixed star—than either Castor or Pollux;—and the Georgium Sidus has sometimes “paled its ineffectual light” beside a wandering luminary under the name of Balaam. As for our Escrutoires—they possess treasures beyond the Treasures of the Deep, so beautifully sung by The Hemans—and we purpose, before another moon wanes, to descend in a diving-bell into their abysses, and to rifle the mermaid’s caves of all their pearls—therewith to adorn the brow of Maga, to the joy of all Contributors.

We have been waited away on the wings of poetry from the querulous disturbers of our peace. But some contributors there are, of a far other character and complexion indeed—and them to reject Christopher could almost weep. Nay—he rejects them not. Their pretty poems—their elegant prose-essays—their graceful epistles—and their touching tales—he peruses with pleasure and with pride. Their sex protects them—and he puts them gently into the Escrutoire called the Dovercot, where they soon murmur themselves asleep. Now and then he selects a sonnet, or an elegy, or a tale,—and in Maga, it meets the eyes, perhaps, of the fair enthusiast, who breathed it when a virgin, and who now blushes, while she reads, to look down on a couple of chubby boys pulling one another’s noses in frantic quarrel about some seedcake, at the knee of her a six-year’s wedded wife, still lovely, though her waist be not so slim as we once knew it by about three quarters of a yard.

There are a prodigious number of clever people at present alive and kicking—and, judging from our own list, we should suppose, that in Great Britain and Ireland, contributors must amount to a million. There is a contributor in about every fourth family. In one domestic circle he is papa—a stout gentleman about forty, with red cheeks, and a brown wig; in another, grand-papa, a fine military-looking old fellow, six feet high, with hair white as snow—nay, an article is now penes me, the handwriting of which could only have been put upon paper by the “oldest inhabitant,” rejoicing in the third consecutive little Tommy, all lineally descended from himself, the great Tom of Lincoln. In another family again, the happy mother of ten children is, we are sorry to say it, the unhappy mother of twenty articles. In this house, a pale delicate girl—an only daughter—who can scarcely walk in the wind without being wafted away to heaven like a feather—is inditing a tender epistle to Odohertry; in that, three red-armed sisters, well to do in the world—with constitutions strong as horses—and each on the death of her father, the tallow-chandler, entitled to a fortune of fifteen hundred pounds, are all hard at work with their respective articles,—one at the pathetic, another at the picturesque, and the eldest and most formidable at the sublime. Now, not to indulge farther in imaginary pictures, drawn from the contributing population of these realms, we appeal to the candour of that population—nay, we fling ourselves upon it—and ask the Million to reflect for a few moments with themselves, in society or solitude, on the condition of an Editor in this life. For our single selves, we lay our hands upon our hearts, and before heaven, declare, that it would not be in our power to overtake and satisfy even our fair friends—our female contributors alone—were we the Editor, publisher, and proprietor, of twenty periodicals, instead of Editor of merely one. Add to them the male monsters, with swingeing articles twenty pages long, and the multitudes of children, who, in this precocious age, have absolutely all their little articles ready ere they are twelve years old, and the most stony-hearted will concede, that Christopher North is to be compassionated as much as admired, and that he is far less an object of envy than the vain world, blinded by the blaze of his glory, has for so many years so foolishly supposed;—He is often sick of life.

You might think that it never could be our interest to quarrel with clever contributors. But if you think so, we assure you that you are mistaken, and that clever contributors have brought many a periodical to an untimely grave. Pray, what is the meaning of the word clever? Try it by examples: a clever horse is a horse of good action—who can trot easily twelve miles an hour—clear a four-foot fence—and who never refuses his oats. At present, as horses go, he may be worth about five-and-thirty pounds. He carries you to cover—but surely you do not hunt him? Clever as he is, if you do that, he is blown on the first burst, and, during a run of twenty minutes, has been regularly tailing it, till at the death, while the Duke, and Elcho, and Reddie, and Stein, are all in, you are not only out, but appear to the rustics of another county to be a regular Bagman. Just so with your clever contributor. He can perform a paragraph at a fair pace—a short article on the corn laws, perhaps, or the Methuen Treaty; but when the work to be done requires not only bone but blood, say a review of Moore's Byron, or Monk's Bentley, or Wellington's Waterloo, then your clever contributor breaks down, and you wish him back in his original dray. In the affairs of common life, we have no great objection to a clever contributor; but from this Magazine "Procul! o procul, este, profani!"—for about some seven years ago, such was the rush upon us of clever contributors, that our sale, for two months stationary, began on the third absolutely to retrograde. We immediately unharnessed about a dozen clever contributors, turned them out of the team, and away went Maga, up hill and down dale, along the royal road of philosophy, literature, and human life, like a young one, with all the other eighty mouthlies dragged in triumph at her chariot-wheels!

But to be less figurative. It is one thing to be even extremely clever in the circle in which you move, and another thing to be rather clever in Blackwood. An old or elderly maid or virgin, who has cultivated her conversational talents at tea-tables through the long space of fifty revolving years, and been handed about in manuscript, up and down various brilliant coteries—while her chin, "bearded like the pard," is sunk on her midnight pillow, is visited, we shall suppose, in a dream, by Christopher North. He calms her agitation, and assures her that she has no need to shriek. All that he wants is an article. The phantom melts away from her longing arms—and turning herself in bed, lo! by the rosy dawn, George Buchanan, with a beard considerably longer than her own, lying chin by chin, with Deborah on the self-same bolster. Aye, many are the virgins—young—old—and middle-aged, who sleep with Blackwood in their bosom. "Rapt, inspired," the tea-table oracle mounts her tripod, and in obedience to her Magnus Apollo, Christopher North, indites an article. Remember that she is, without one single exception—and for half a century has been—the cleverest—out of all sight, the cleverest person of her sex in all her native city,—a city, by the last census, taken ten years ago—containing upwards of two hundred thousand souls. Such an article! O, Lord Byron's Heaven and Earth, and Mr Moore's Loves of the Angels, what an article! Is it a declaration of love, and a proposal of marriage? A scheme for paying off the National Debt? or a treatise on gooseberry wine? Now she seems to be all fire and fury on Don Juan, and now the fair writer tumbles head over ears like a supralapsarian into the Row Heresy. By Montgomery's Satan, the old lady has forgotten either her own sex or ours, and is personating Christopher North! And hark! how clamorous for instant insertion! Her article cannot wait a single day—and proofs must be sent to the old Princess Rusty Fusty, by the very first Glasgow post.

It is known throughout all the literary circles of the West, that Miss Deborah is to exhibit in the next number of Blackwood her opening article. What a brandishing of paper-folders on the First of the Month! Lo and behold, "Christopher in his Sporting Jacket!" "Can this indeed be our Debby's opening article?" is the general pur. "But you know she is so clever—she can hit off all our styles to a tea. It must be Debby's—it is Debby's—Debby's in every line. Oh, rare Debby! There's no so clever a woman in all Edinburgh!"

To be serious—nay savage. There are not at this hour more than six women alive entitled to send articles to Ebony:—Mrs Hemans, Mrs Norton, Miss Bowles, Miss Mitford, Miss Jewsbury—Let us consider—who the deuce is the sixth? Oh! yes, yes—but not to hurt the feelings of so many thousands, she, for the present, shall be "strictly Anonymous." She herself knows whom we have in our loving eye, and would fain have in our loving arms—in a fine fit of Platonics.

"These six are women, therefore may be woo'd;

These six are women, therefore may be won!"—

Nay, they are all already wooed and won by us; and largely do they contribute to our delight. "Aye, aye, Mr North," quoth our beloved Shepherd to us tother day, "that's what ye mean by being a Scragenarian." With these charming exceptions, we beseech the Sex to besiege other Editors. We love to concentrate rather than diffuse our affections; at our time of life it would be unseemly to be seen running after young ladies, however literary; and the cardinal virtue of an Editor is FIDELITY TO THE FAIR CHOSEN FEW.

Yet let us not be misunderstood by the thousands on thousands of lovely ladies that in these days throughout these realms cultivate letters. Never in any other age stood so high the character of woman. Culture gives the sex now not mere accomplishments alone,—but their hearts are fertile of noble feelings, and their minds of noble thoughts. Never shone female literature,—if that expression may be allowed—with such pure and strong lustre. A few stars are conspicuous in the firmament above all the rest; but how many sweet stars are there, unambitious of our gaze, though they irresistibly attract it on cloudless nights, and the heart of the shepherd is glad on the mountain! Some of these gentle luminaries delight to shine on us. We know their names—single or in constellation. Nor, among them all at their brightest, are we ever at a loss to single out that particular Star, which, rising over the green hills of Fife, steeply its reflection in our magnificent Firth, and often, as we are taking our night-walk on the Calton, or Arthur's Seat, seems to possess in its own glory both Heaven and Sea.

"When Heaven and Earth do make one imagery,"

With regard to male contributors, again, we cannot be equally complimentary and equally sincere. Young Scotchmen are all too philosophical—most young Englishmen too little so,—but on the whole we wish the Southron sun to be in the ascendant. In vile and odious nationality the Scotch speak of "slender clerks" beyond the Tweed. Yet are they not "sprung of earth's first blood, have titles manifold?" Still, their articles are too often but "the produce of the common day." Too often their authors want "the vision and the faculty divine,"—and were we to compose two consecutive numbers of their lucubrations, the third would be our last. Edinburgh never gave us one first-rate contributor—the Knights of Ambrose excepted—London has given too few,—but some she has given us of strongest and steadiest power,—and as we plough the mare magnum with them on board, we can trust to our crew, and lie in storm on a lee-shore, without fear of being stranded,—for then our ship will swing round by her sheet-anchor into the wind's eye, and hold at defiance all the blasts of Heaven.

But to merely clever ladies and gentlemen in general, be this our advice:—Be satisfied with being the Cocks and Hens of your own companies—your own coteries. Do not write for—because you never can write in—Blackwood. Clap your wings and crow—drop your wings and cluckle—put your nebs below your wings and go to roost. But do not tell lies. Do not hint by sideling looks, and dubious words, and "spare my blushes,"—nor yet assert, with brazen cheeks, and solemn oaths, and "split my timbers," that you write in Blackwood. You may live for a year or two on the credit of that belief among your townsfolk, and be stared at as a contributor. But the day of shame assuredly comes to all impostors. Then you are seen hopping about the outskirts of your native village like a naked magpie, who had stripped her or himself of her or his not unpretty plumage, to fit closer to the skin that of the Cock of the North, and who thenceforth haunts obscure places, featherless and forlorn, emitting at intervals a feeble scraunch, and excluded from augury of death or marriage.

The truth is, that it requires ten—aye, twenty times the talent to write a first-rate article for a first-rate periodical, say Maga—that it requires to write a first-rate book. It is the easiest thing in the world to write a second or third-rate book—and to write a first-rate one cannot be very difficult, when one looks into the faces of some sumpshs who have performed that achievement. You have only to lay hold of some great, big, huge, hulking subject—a nation for example—and to write its history,—or rather to take its own history which it has been writing away at ever since its fingers could hold the pen, and to lick the cub into some sort of shape, till he bears some sort of resemblance to a Christian, or at least a human volume. In short, you have only to collect your materials, which any body can do for love or money, who knows about libraries; and chapter after chapter—story after story—that is, flat after flat, arises of its own accord—and lo! the House that Jack built—or Sir James Mackintosh's History of England, in two volumes, for Dr Lardner's excellent Cyclopædia! But a first-rate article for Maga is another affair. To produce it your genius must be bright and balmy, fair and fertile as the blue skies and green fields of the spring morn. An article must be an emanation from heaven—or a production from earth—a star or a flower—a shower of sunbeams or a shower of blossoms.

Many an excellent book has been written by sumpshs and sumpshesses, but never an excellent article. Nay, we suspect that no separate volume of merit was ever yet written—or if that be too sweeping an assertion, written in our life and times—by either gentleman or lady in whose idiosyncrasy there was not something decidedly sumpshish. Some slight sumpshiness seems to be implied in the simple conception of a separate book, how much more in the continued execution! Gibbon himself, sitting year after year in that summer-house at Lausanne, insensible to all events but those involved in the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, which had declined and fallen many centuries before he was born, has always seemed to our imagination the beau-ideal of a sumpsh, only to be equalled, perhaps, by Adam Smith in a back parlour in the "lang-toun o' Kirkaldy," revelling all day in the Wealth of Nations, and in the evening, (a true anecdote,) in vain scheming to baffle or elude the vigilance of his Argus-eyed housekeeper, grimly a-watch of the sugar-bowl on the pictured tea-tray, on which the economist, as he paced to and fro, cast many a wistful look, and ever and anon strove to pounce his paw; but all in vain, so sleepless the she-dragon presiding at his board. Gibbon could not have written a leading article for Maga; witness his Dissertation on Warburton's Dissertation on the Sixth Book of the Æneid, where two pedants—powerful, indeed, but still sumphs—are well met; and as for Smith, the only article he ever did write for the Old Edinburgh Review, would, in a later age, have been worthy of the New,—not the Blue and Yellow which we have always admired, and yet admire,—but the Baillie's Guse, as the enormous Quack was called, which, after waddling and hissing for months, “hot and heavy,” about the pools in the suburbs, finally became farcical as the afterpiece of Simpson and Co.; and, fat as she appeared outwardly, died at last of consumption, or, more correctly speaking, of starvation, a bunch of fetid feathers, the fear of the fuilzie-men, and shocking to all scavengers.

This we do know, that, generally speaking, the most mediocre of our contributors have been authors of quartos. That hint, we hope, will not be lost. Folios are now out of fashion—so in that quarter we have nothing to fear. Crown-octavos are more promising—and your duodecimo is our delight. Within its narrow boards an author must be energetic and concise—and observe that a thin duodecimo—always the best—is about the length of a good leading article. Heaven and earth! how many such are contained in Maga! Hundreds! which, if published separately, would have established a hundred reputations—but which all emanated, perhaps, from one mind, unexhausted as the heavens every night teeming with a succession of new stars, as Mother Earth revolves on her axis, losing and gaining sight of the crescent Moon, or of the nocturnal Queen—a perfect circle, where Beauty and Peace dwell together for evermore!

Passing from these our remarks, on clever people and sumphs, in which we have shewn a disposition to spare neither sex nor age, to contributors of true talent or genius,—(both alike rare;—for it is one of the gross blunders of the Cockneys, that true talent is a common commodity;—whereas, there is not an ounce of it in all Cockneydom,)—may we, with or without offence, be permitted to say to some of them, that they must not imitate Us, or rather must not attempt to imitate Us—for the short and the long of it is, that We are inimitable. We cheerfully admit, that it is natural to strive to imitate the excellence we admire. In virtue, it is not only natural but right, and indeed to do so, is one of the first injunctions of religion. Let all mankind, therefore, imitate our virtues; but let all mankind beware, as they hope to become contributors here or hereafter, how they imitate our wit and our humour, our fancy and our imagination, our talent and our genius—original and peculiar all—and by the fiat of plastic nature existing nowhere but in that inner shrine—the Sanctum Sanctorum of the soul of Christopher North. Yet think not that we are perfect; all we mean to say is, that we are glorious in our imperfections, and that no other man of woman born shall ever be lord and master of Maga. A truce, therefore, to all Editorial airs—ye best and brightest of our Contributors—for Christopher will bear no brother near the throne on which Maga sits ever-blooming by his side—though on their own seats level with that throne, but some small space remote, shall sit in state his Principalities and Powers, and do homage to none on earth but their own gracious Sultaun.

We are not afraid to communicate to the whole periodical world, the secret of our strength. It consists in every Sampson among us wearing his own hair—and never a wig. If nature has given him a red shock—he scorns to dye it black, or blue, or purple; if his poll recall to your memory the tune and words of “the flaxen-headed ploughboy who whistled o’er the lea,” or hers, “the lassie wi’ the lint-white locks,” no oil Macassar bedims the lustre of their native yellow; proud is this Apollo of his sunny locks, and that Mars of his sable curls—while yon contributor exults in a head of hair all adrip like that of Neptune when suddenly thrusting up his head from the placid sea. Thus each contributor walks in power—prince of his own province—Christopher North being Regent—and Maga Queen.

Above all our other injunctions—Contributors after our own heart! Obey

this one, "LET ALONE THE NOCTES AMBROSIANÆ!" What strange delusion is this still reigning on earth, that they are written by mortal pen! True, that Mr Nathan Gurney takes down these "celestial colloquies divine" in short-hand, which he afterwards extends into the length and number of the arms of Briareus. But though we afterwards string the pearls, they all drop from the Golconda of the Shepherd's inexhaustible fancy, from the Peru of Tickler's teeming imagination, from the "dark unfathomed caves" of the ocean of the English Opium-Eater's genius, where "many a gem of purest ray serene" shines far down below the storms that blacken, and the surfs that whiten the bosom of the billows—from the MIND OF NORTH, which—but here modesty drops the veil over our fine features, and we are mute.

We have often confessed that certain defects inherent in humanity cling to us, and that not even We have yet shewn the world one Number of a perfect Magazine. Yet, we doubt much if the world would know a Number of a perfect Magazine if she saw it. It would require an almost infinite series of those phenomena to convince her of the existence of that phenomenon. We defy a Phoenix to make himself an object of popular belief. The difficulty—if not the impossibility—of producing a Number of a perfect Magazine, lies in the width of the range of human nature and human art. To be perfect, it must needs contain twenty folio volumes—the concentrated essence of twenty thousand. There are, we believe, in Great Britain and Ireland, about a hundred monthly and weekly Periodicals—in France and Germany, about a hundred—or two hundred—of which, a perfect Number—still maintaining its own superior originality, variety, power, and splendour—would have to skim the cream. Our contributors forget our dimensions, and think us without all bounds. A score at least seem to suppose we are the Gardener's Magazine, and forgetting that we are, though the first of men, neither Adam nor Mr London, overwhelm us with treatises on the culture of fruit-trees—and the innumerable devices contrived by the ingenuity of science for heating hot-houses at the smallest expense of coal and glass. As many more conjecture us to contain within our body corporate our ingenious friends Messrs Ainsworth and Cheek, and inundate the Sanctum with most interesting accounts of gigantic fossil remains, and singular incrustations of sea shells on logs of wood dug out of the most inland mosses, contributions manifestly intended for their excellent Journal of Natural History and Science. There does not seem, in our eyes at least—any thing very chemical about Maga, nor much similitude either in name or nature between Christopher North and Mr Brande. Yet six sketches of original crucibles were sent to us yesterday—accompanied by much manuscript for explanatory letter-press, which it was earnestly requested might, by the aid of Lizars, be laid before the chemical world in our next Number. The most of mankind take us for the Family Magazine, and we have now in our possession a gross of articles at the very least, intended apparently for that amiable and ingenious lady, Mrs S. C. Hall. "Christopher in his Sporting Jacket" has brought us into a fine scrape—especially now that the Annals of Sporting and Fancy Gazette is no more. Maga is believed to be the Sporting Magazine, and our name Nimrod. Now, is not this all very hard and very perplexing? We wish to poach on no Editor's manor; for the game on our own is inexhaustible. What then must be done with all those articles? We are afraid to burn them, lest we set the city on fire—to fling them into the sea would, if they sank, cause the waters to overflow the land—and if they floated—the navigation between Edinburgh and London would be impeded, and rendered dangerous in the extreme for small craft. We trust that the good sense of mankind will render any farther deprecations unnecessary.

To conclude, and before saying Farewell—let us return our thanks to all who, publicly or privately, give us their advice. No character in this wicked world like your advice-monger. Despised and hated wherever he is known—whenever detected in one quarter, and ungratefully driven off the ground, he begins scattering his pearls before swine in another, who beat them all down into the mire with their cloven feet. But we are not swine—like most other Editors—but sheep; and on the pastoral braes nibble up the "orient pearl" with which these kind physicians of our souls have for our behoof strewn the ground. Some senseless sinners have been trying lately to sow poison-gobs among the genial dews that freshen our repasts on the mountain brow. But genius has a saving instinct—a sacred sense that shews her the taint upon the herbage—distinguishes the weed in which death or sickness lies from the flower of health and life—and obeying it, she walks by day and lies down by night safe, beneath the all-seeing eye, in the holy pastures.

It has ever been our pure delight to see all Periodicals prosper. The powerful we have often bearded in their pride; the feeble we have often aided in their humility, like that gentle knight who is seen pricking o'er the plain in the first line of the Fairy Queen. In homelier phrase, we have sometimes dirtied our shoes by hauling poor wretches out of the mire and mud, when in imminent danger of suffocation. Thankless we knew they would be, but of the vile, humanity is glad to escape the gratitude. In very rare instances, indeed, have we knocked on the head the worthless with our crutch, even when seen striving to struggle out of the slough of Despond, farther on into the filth of Sin. We have generally suffered them to die the natural death of worms. Some crawling and creeping things have been of late periodically sliming our path—and curling up their knotted worminess as if they would bite. We must, by and by, use the besom.

The silly are often insolent; and asses instinctively bray against Christopher North. The sight of his crutch sets their ears on end—but what would their posteriors say to the knout? But "the lion preys not upon carcasses." O'Bronte, true son of his sire, disdains to crunch a cur. The eagle heeds not the pecking of the ungrateful and angry little wren, that he soars with on his back up to heaven, blinking at the sun. The elephant, who was teased by a tailor, merely sent through his trunk a water-spout on the vulgar fraction. The Scotch thistle stings not the dirty paws of the idle urchin, that on tip-toe strives, with feeble fingers, to strip the national flower of its spiky coronal. It leaves the imp's punishment to the nettles.—You cannot like the Noctes Ambrosianæ? How should ye? The clown prefers beer to Burgundy—and a horn of muddy ale to a long-shanked rummer of the still or sparkling champagne.

Though Sir James Scarlett never reads a newspaper, except when he is going to prosecute the Editor, we read many; and we wish all their Editors long life in Heaven's unobstructed air and sunshine. The Press of England (we say nothing now of that of Scotland, for it may be suspected of national partialities and prejudices in our favour, nor of our warm-hearted Irish brethren, generous alike in peace and war) has, on the whole, from the commencement of her career, done justice to Maga. We are naturally independent of each other; but Fair-Play is a jewel, and Truth a diamond. Party-spirit is not perhaps a pure spirit, but it is strong; and, as this wicked world wags, it works to the general good of the state. Some newspaper Editors conscientiously cut us up—and as we cross blades, we respect the skill and valour of such antagonists. Others stand towards us in the attitude of an armed neutrality, at some crises the best preservative of peace. A few paltry peltroons we should scorn to bruin with our scabbard. Others again—too numerous to enumerate—numbers without number numberless—fight in the same cause with Maga, and uplift their banners "with all their dread emblazonry," at the sound of the same trumpet. Those metropolitan powers, Standard, Sun, Post, and Herald, all admit her might;—and her old allies, the Brighton Gazette, the Leeds Intelligencer, the Manchester Courier, the Sheffield Courant, the Cambridge Chronicle, and the York Herald, lead the bold provincial forces, that guard the main body with their formidable wings. If one trembling coward there be who forsook his master—Christopher leaning pensively, and more in sorrow than in anger, on his crutch, mentally exclaims—that neither talent nor genius (honour he must not say, for honour in its essence is incorruptible, and in natural antipathy scorns all alliance with what is base) can protect their possessor from self-degradation, when his necessities, rather than his will perhaps, have consented that they shall league themselves with the relics and dregs of tergiversation and apostasy.—Farewell.

PART I.

THE GREAT MORAY FLOODS.*

THE World, during the Age immediately preceding the Flood, must have been extremely delightful—and we never think of it, without sighing to have been an antediluvian. True, that mankind had waxed very wicked; but just so much more need was there for Christopher North. We verily believe, that had we flourished at that era, somewhere about the root of Mount Ararat, that catastrophe might have been averted by this Magazine. It is scarcely supposable that people could have got so sinful—men, women, and children alike—had we been alive to administer the knout. The most audacious Whigs, whose crimes, it is well known, were the causes of that calamity, as they have been of every other under which the kingdoms of the earth have since groaned, would have quailed beneath our Crutch; and the Tories, true to the principles of their First Founder, Adam, continued in the ascendant. Had Maga then been, there would have been no occasion for the Ark. The great geological general question had never agitated the world—Neptunians and Vulcanists had been unknown—Werner might have been a cheese-monger, and Hutton a tailor, and the Royal Society of Edinburgh, to a man and a monkey, Phrenologists.

True it is, and of verity, that we were too late in coming into the world by some thousand years. But better late than never; and to minds like ours, the delay now acts as an additional inducement to more gigantic exertions for the benefit of our species. Nay, in our humbler moods, we are disposed to believe, that, on the whole, it may be better for mankind that we flourish, as we now do, after the Flood. For, after all, the most eagle-eyed are but short-sighted creatures; and who can tell, that, had we been contemporary with Noah, we might not have carried the Noctes Ambrosianæ too far, and perished with Tappie-tourie in the Deluge?

However, be that as it may, it is needless now to speculate on the subject. The world is again wicked enough for our purpose; our sale, like the Power of the Throne in the time of Dunning, has increased, is increasing, and, as the Whigs doubtless think, ought to be diminished. It more than keeps pace with the wickedness of the age—that wickedness, indeed, increasing in an arithmetical, and Maga in a geometrical ratio—so that there are hopes of the world still, in spite of French silks and Catholic Emancipation, the apostacy of Peel and the despotism of Wellington, the stoppage of the University of London, and the temporary obstruction thrown at Canton in the face of the Tea-trade.

* An Account of the Great Floods of August, 1829, in the Province of Moray, and adjoining Districts. By Sir Thomas Lauder Dick. Adam Black, Edinburgh. Longman, London. Forsyth and Greig, Elgin.

Yet, speaking of the Flood, we may be permitted to say, that all the descriptions of it in Poetry, in Prose, and in Painting, which we have perused, have always seemed to us calculated to throw an air of ridicule over an otherwise impressive catastrophe. All the stuff, in Greek and Latin, about Deucalion, is miserably poor. What can be more absurd than the image of an elderly gentleman peopling the world by flinging stones over his shoulder? Senseless as such conduct was, that of Barry Cornwall, in as far as the Flood of Thessaly was concerned, was infinitely more so, that ingenious gentleman having appeared in his Poem, like a gentleman stirring her tea-cup with a silver spoon to ascertain if it held the due number of lumps of sugar. Pousin's Picture of the Deluge shews us, if we remember rightly, a pond such as might have been rented at thirty shillings per annum by Mr Wordsworth's old leech-gatherer, with a few figures undergoing the process preparatory to resuscitation by the Humane Society, a branch of which, it is made obvious, is established in the neighbourhood, by the judicious introduction of an able-bodied and intrepid young fellow, who, stimulated by the hope of the money and the medal awarded by the Committee to him who has been mainly instrumental in saving a fellow Christian from an early grave, is lugging to the bank a couple as like half-drowned rats as any couple you could mention of the Members of the present Cabinet. Martin again has done the Deluge on a larger, if not on a grander scale. His genius none disputes—notwithstanding his intimacy with Atherstone; but he has spoiled the whole, by perching on a cliff, all by himself, the author of the Fall of Nineveh, who is staring like an owl on the world of waters, with a face sufficiently absurd to raise a titter even on the Last Day. This practice, so rife among Painters, of introducing portraits of their eminent friends into scenes of the deepest tragedy, cannot be too severely reprehended; and we earnestly beseech Mr Martin to brush Mr Atherstone off his seat in the Deluge, and clap him, with his chronometer, into the Ark.

The truth is, that the Deluge—that is, the Universal Deluge—is not a fit subject for either Poetry, or Painting—and, a fortiori—still less for Statuary, Dancing, or Music. Nothing can be better than the statement of the event—short—simple and strong—in that good old book—the Bible. Let it satisfy us—undiluted. There it stuns the soul that welters wild as the Flood that drowned a sinful world. There it is felt by the heart, in the imagination conscience-stricken, to have poured down death on crime from the windows of wrathful heaven. But when Painters prepare their pallets, and Poets their pens, to get up the Deluge for exhibition or publication, how paltry and pitiful appear a few mountain tops peering, a-crawl with insects, above a few acres of wet, while the great globe is submerged with all its inhabitants, and goes spinning round the sun, all a-gurgle with one death-groan that makes the angels weep!

Henceforth, then, let Painters, and Poets, and Prose-writers, abjure the Universal Deluge, and be contented to deal with seas, and lakes, and rivers. Let them give us shipwrecks or dashed to pieces, like the spray, on iron-ribbed coasts. Let them shew us an arm even of the sea, stretched out angrily beneath the thunder and lightning, till navies are tossed into the sky. Does not the earth roar far and wide with rivers cataracted among the mountains, and solemn and stately in their majestic flows as sea-like they exult, after a thousand-league course, in approaching and mingling with the sea? Glens, plains, forests, cities, all belong to these rivers, now spanned with bridges, magnificent as rain-bows, once rills scarce seen by the vulture's or eagle's eye, and with a still small voice audible in the wilderness but to the dwellers in the ant-hills!

To our imagination, and, gentle reader, if you put one finger on your organ of ideality, and another on your organ of wonder, also to yours, Rivers have greatly the advantage over Seas. True, that Tides are noble movements. Then, we feel with awe that the mysterious Neptune is expiring and inspiring, with breath as regular as our own; that his lungs work as well in water as ours in air; and that through all his frame, the ebb and the flow tell how the purple circulates from his heart. But without Rivers, pray what would become of the Sea? He would die of thirst in his own salt. Those gracious feeders, having by nature and also a sort of instinctive—almost filial love,—for though they appear to be born of the mountains, yet may the loftiest lineage of them all be traced, through many a strange eventful history, to the bosom of the great Deep,—those gracious feeders, we say, hurry each like an Euphrasia, or Grecian daughter, to present, in the hour of need, to their hoary sire their milky breasts. How quakes the Ancient's bosom, as, with all his huge, thick-lipped mouths, greedily he imbibes the restorative delight of Dew purified through ten thousand filtering machines, and haply all along its journey from the mountains of the moon,—save when it glided subterranean or through a night of woods—smitten into radiance

"Of the old sea some reverential fear,"

"By touch ethereal of heaven's fiery rod!"

The sea is but one. A glorious unit indeed is he—and therefore Shakspeare called him "multitudinous." But in spite of all his multitudinousness, his greatest admirers must confess that he is not unfrequently so monotonous, that 'tis not easy even to look at him without falling asleep. Live for a month on the sea-shore, and you will be stupid for life. Shells are beautiful, but, with your leave, not so beautiful as flowers. Shells are but the cottages of fishes—or, if you prefer it, their cradles. Nature often tinges them with the Tyrian die; but they are all dead, although when you put some of them to your ear, you hear, as if far, far away within the wreathed cavern, the singing of some sea-sprite belonging to an incommunicable world. But flowers—why flowers are alive!—as alive as yourself upon your marriage-morn! They are all in love with each other, and with the earth and the heavens, and with men and angels, and where grow they so innumerosly bright as by the fresh flowings of rills, and rivulets, and rivers, whose banks, like the milky way, are all inlaid with vegetable stars? Then, we defy a river to be monotonous, if he have but fall enough to turn the tiniest mill-wheel—and we say so with an indistinct remembrance of the Cam himself, who is about as dull as a Senior Wrangler. But the charms of the Cam cannot be properly appreciated without comparing him with a canal! Then he seems "To murmur in the living brooks

A music sweeter than his own,"

and we feel the wide difference between him—monotonous no more—and the New Cut.

But let us not pursue the parallel, lest we get personal; but be contented with a few words more in praise of running streams, and let us panygerize them in SPATES. Then the rill—pretty pigmy no longer—springs up in an hour to stream's estate. Like a stripling who has been unexpectedly left a fortune by an old uncle, he gives his home, in a hollow of the broomy braes, the slip, and away off, in full cry and gallop, to "poos his fortune" in the world, down in the "laigh kintra." Many a tumble he gets over waterfalls, and often do you hear him shouting before he gets out of the wood. He sings although it be Sunday, and hurries past the kirk during the time of divine service, yet not without joining for a moment in the psalm. As the young lassies are returning from kirk to cottage, he behaves rudely to them, while, high-kilted, they are crossing the fords; and ere their giggle-blended shrieks subside, continues his career, as Dr Jamieson says, in his spirited ballad on the Water-kelpie, "loud necherin in a lauch." And now he is all a-foam in his fury, like a chestnut horse. The sheep and lambs stare at him in astonishment; and Mr Wordsworth's Old Ram, who is so poetically described in the Excursion as admiring his horns and beard, face and figure, in one of the clear pools of the Brathay, the Pride of Windermere, were he now on a visit to Scotland, would die of disappointed self-love, a heart-broken Narcissus. On he goes—the rill-rivulet—"neither to haud nor to bin"—a most uproarious Hobbletchey. He is just at that time of life—say about seventeen—when the passions are at their worst or their best—'tis hard to say which—at their newest, certainly, and perhaps at their strongest, and when they listen to no voice but their own, which then seems to fill heaven and earth with music. But what noise is this? Thunder? No—a Corra-Linn, or a Stonehyres of a waterfall. Lo! yonder a great river sweeping along the strath. The rill-fivulet, with one shiver and shudder—for now 'tis too late to turn back, and onwards he is driven by his own weight, which is only another name for his own destiny—leaps with a sudden plunge into the red-roaring Spate, and in an instant loses his name and nature, and disappears for ever. Just so is it with the young human prodigal, lost in the Swollen River of Life thundering over the world's precipices.

We must not anticipate any of the many admirable things about Rivers in Spate, with which it will be at once our duty and our delight to adorn the body of this article, but content ourselves for the present, with remarking, in an enlightened spirit of nationality, how immeasurably superior are our rivers in Scotland to those in England. The truth is, that the scenery of this the northern part of the Island, is almost as much finer than that of the southern, as the character of its inhabitants is finer than that of those people unfortunately born on the other side of the Tweed. England, with the exception of Sir Isaac Newton, and some score or so of first-rate mathematicians and astronomers, has produced few men of eminence in physical science, whereas Scotland has produced such numbers, that were we to write down all their names, the illustrious list would be as long as a Petition to Parliament. In Mental philosophy again, if you except Bacon, Locke, and about a dozen others, England would have some difficulty, we suspect, in pointing to a single great name; while Scotland could easily put her finger on a shoal of writers who have all swam in the depths of metaphysics. In Poetry, setting aside Shakspeare, Spenser, Milton, Wordsworth and others, England is poor indeed; while Scotland, it is acknowledged by her bitterest enemies, can shew a Poet in every year of her history, each month indeed down to the present continuing to add a star to the constellation. All the great orators, statesmen, and warriors of Britain, with a few exceptions, have, in like manner, been Scotchmen. These facts would of themselves, be quite sufficient to establish our immense superiority over our brethren in the South, even were we not entitled to point, as we now humbly do, to the superior delicacy, grace, elegance, and refinement of our manners, to say nothing of the unapproachable, and indeed perfect purity of our morals. All this being the case, it would be absurd, nay impious, to suppose for a single instant, that the soil, and consequently the scenery, where this superior race flourish, could be otherwise than superior to the soil, and consequently the scenery, where the inferior race, as it were, comparatively speaking, merely vegetate. Accordingly, the superiority is manifest to the dimmest eye and the meanest capacity. England, on the whole, is a flat country—and Scotland, on the whole, quite the reverse; and as we mean at present to confine ourselves to rivers, we have already said more than enough to prove the impossibility, in the very nature of things, of England competing with Scotland, in rivers, with the smallest chance of success. There, for instance, is the Thames, as it is called, a very respectable river in its way, and at London more than respectable, imposing; but it is a river of very humble origin. We forget the number of locks between Oxford and Windsor; but the fall from source to sea is nothing to that of the Spey or the Dee, and a hundred other rivers in Scotland of high birth. The north of England, to be sure, is tolerably mountainous, which it owes entirely to its vicinity to Scotland; but then, the streams—rivers there are none—have very short courses, and before they can gather great bulk, are drowned in lakes. On issuing from them, which some do in good condition for a race, in about some half-dozen or dozen miles, they are worse off than ever, and are lost in the sea. Floods, therefore, in the flat districts of England; are too diffusive to be forcible, and seldom carry off any objects capable of offering a stouter resistance than haycocks; while, in the hilly or mountainous districts, their style is too concise, and after much rumbling among stones, you hear no more of them, and are mortified to find that they have not swept away so much as an old washerwoman.

True, that in newspapers one occasionally reads of what, in England, are called Floods. A whole county is inundated—heaven knows how—during the night—six inches deep. The waters continue to rise in a most fearful manner, till the inhabitants, in some places, are absolutely up to the knees; and drains bursting, Lincolnshire gets dangerous to stage-coaches. Punts are seen paddling about; and pigs, according to a popular superstition, are cutting their own throats in all directions. Providentially, the waters subside so many inches, in a day or two, that the moles are seen returning from the heights—and the Boston Heavy again looms in the distance, licensed to carry twenty outside. Shreds and patches more numerous than the week before, tuft the bottoms of hedgerows; and in the ditches there is a livelier croaking of frogs. But, with these exceptions, and that of wayside children raking mud into small heaps with their toes, nothing tells of the Deluge that, were you to believe the newspapers, not only interrupted the Post, drowned the Herald, and lowered the Standard, but darkened the Sun, and disturbed the Globe.

We fervently hope—nay, devoutly trust, that we have not been giving any offence, by these rambling remarks on rivers and what not, to our southern subscribers. Though England be thus inferior to Scotland, she is superior to all the rest of the world. The rest of the world is to her as she is to us. While, therefore, it is her duty, and her interest—and, therefore, ought to be her pleasure and her pride—to look up to us, it is no less incumbent on her to look down on the rest of the world. Nay, we cheerfully acknowledge that we have seen some Scottish as despicable, every whit, as any English floods. Nothing can be more contemptible than an Edinburgh flood. We have three bridges, and are building a fourth, without one river. A flood, in the New Town, consists of eaves-dropping and gutter-running, which merely carries a few dead cats down to the Water of Leith. In the Auld Town, again, a flood floats upon its raging surface merely a few baubles. We perceive in the newspapers, that there is one raging this moment in the Cowgate. "The Cowgate," we quote the words of an able contemporary, "from Dickson's close to St Mary's Wynd, presents the appearance of a rapid river. The street is completely covered to the top of the curb-stones, and some low houses are flooded. At the Trinity Hospital, and in Paul's Work, the water is so deep that a boat might float; and in the north back of the Canongate, the street is in many places impassable. Where the great drain passes along the side of the street, which leads to the Abbey-Hill, the water is very deep from the narrowness of the drain damming up the water, and proving, if proof had been wanting, that an enlargement of the drain in its whole course, is absolutely necessary."

From this magnificent picture, of Auld Reekie in a flood, turn for a moment to the Grampians. You are all alone—quite by yourself—no object seems alive in existence—for the eagle is mute—the antlers of the red-deer, though near, invisible—not one small moorland bird is astir among the brackens—no ground bee is at work on the sullen heather—and the aspect of the earth is grim as that of heaven. Hark! From what air moans the thunder:—"Tis like an earthquake. Now, it grows. Yonder cloud, a minute ago, deep-blue, is now black as pitch. All the mountains seem to have gathered themselves together under it—and see—see how it flashes with fire! Ay, that is thunder—one peal split into a hundred—a cannonade worthy the battle of the gods and giants, when the Sons of Terra strove to storm the gates of Uranus. Would that Dan Virgil were here—or Lord Byron! O Dr Blair! Dr Blair! why didst thou object to the close of that glorious description—"DENSISSIMUS IMBER?" Jupiter Pluvius has smitten the Grampians with a rod of lightning, and in a moment they are all tumbling with cataracts. Now every great glen has its own glorious river—some red as blood, some white as snow, and some yet blue in their portentous beauty as that one thin slip of sky, that, as we are looking, is sucked into the clouds. Each rill, each torrent, each river, has its own peculiar voice, and methinks we distinguish one music from another, as we dream ourselves away into the heart of that choral anthem. Woe to the "wee bourracks o' houses," bigged on the holm-lands! Bridges! that have felt the ice-flaws of a thousand winters rebounding from your abutments, as from cliff to cliff you spanned the racing thunder, this night will be your last! Your key-stones shall be loosened, and your arches, as at the springing of a mine, heaved up into the air by the resistless waters. There is no shrieking of kelpies. That was but a passionless superstition. But there is shrieking—of widows and of orphans—and of love strong as death, stifled and strangled in the flood that all night long is sweeping corpses and carcasses to the sea.

But it is high time to shut our ears and our eyes to this description. It is getting painfully pathetic; and we had intended, and do still intend, that this shall be an amusing article. To secure its being so, we turn to Sir Thomas Lauder Dick without further preface. Sir Thomas is a man of taste and feeling—nay, of genius and science—and is well known, or at least deserves to be so, both in the scientific and literary world, by various works of very great merit. His paper, in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, on the Parallel Roads in Glenroy, is most ingenious and satisfactory; and his two romances, "Lochandu," and the "Wolf of Badenech," are full of excellent character, incident, and description. But neither the one nor the other is to us nearly so interesting as the volume which we now introduce to the public. It is worth a gross of fashionable novels, and twenty Tours. Sir Thomas tells a pathetic, or a humorous story admirably, and many such are scattered over these 400 pages. He looks at nature with a painter's and a poet's eye, and describes her well both with pen and pencil. His heart, too, is as warm as his imagination; and as the scenes of suffering he brings before us were real, he awakens all our most tender and generous sympathies, by the earnestness and sincerity of his own; so that his book, we doubt not, will inspire many of his readers to contribute by their charity to the relief of the distress brought on many hundred poor people by the floods that swept away their "little all," and left them nothing but endurance and resignation. But we are in danger of falling again into the pathetic—the sin, indeed, which most easily besets us, but which, in this case, may, we trust, be forgiven for sake of our subscription. Reader! gentle and generous! perhaps, after reading our article, you will unclasp with your slight fair fingers that pretty silk purse (not made out of a sow's ear,) and set apart a coin—mayhap a sovereign—or be it but a crown—sweet sister of charity—for behoof of some aged crone now sitting blind in her shieling, or some bright-eyed lassie singing in the sunshine at the door, built now on some knoll safe from the river that, last autumn, made the one a widow, and the other an orphan.

Many of our readers, we dare say, read accounts in the newspapers of Great Floods during August last year in the Province of Moray. But newspaper accounts of calamities are generally considered apocryphal, except they record the bite of a mad dog—each strange tale of hydrophobia being held devoutly true by the Reading Public. Sir Thomas Lauder Dick has spared no pains in collecting all the most interesting circumstances of that unexampled Flood, many of them bordering so closely upon the marvellous, that he acknowledges he might have felt some difficulty in reporting them, had they not, in every instance, been well vouched. The extent of ground carried off or destroyed in particular places, the various items of miscellaneous damage, and the sums of money at which the various losses are estimated, are stated from returns made after the survey by able and responsible men, whose valuations were exclusive of all such injuries as might affect mere taste, or any thing not usually measured by money. The sums specified, Sir Thomas says, are rather under than above the truth. For no surveyor could expect to gain favour in the eyes of his employer by exaggerating his misfortunes; and no proprietor would consider it his interest to promulgate an extravagant account of the deterioration of his estate; while, on the other hand, very potent reasons may exist for country gentlemen putting the best possible face on the state of their affairs. As the limited nature of his work necessarily compelled him to pass over all the lesser, though more numerous items of destruction, nothing approaching to any just estimate of the grand total can possibly be formed. But when we consider that the injuries done to the estates of Lord Seaforth are estimated at thirty thousand pounds,—to those of Mr Macpherson Grant at eight thousand,—to those of Mr Cumming Gordon at five thousand,—to those of Sir Thomas Dick at twelve hundred, (we think,) and to the estates of many other gentlemen in like proportion; to which is to be added all the loss of crops and standings—along so many straths—the sum-total of the loss must indeed have been enormous.

The deluge of rain that produced the flood of the 3d and 4th of August, 1829, fell chiefly on the Monadh-leadh mountains, rising between the south-eastern parts of Lochness, and Kingussie in Badenoch, and on that part of the Grampian range forming the somewhat independent group of the Cairngorms. The heat in the province of Moray, during the months of May, June, and July, had been unusually great; and in the earlier part of that period, the drought so excessive, as to kill many of the recently planted shrubs and trees. As the season advanced, the fluctuations of the barometer became very remarkable; but they were not followed by the usual alternations of weather. It often followed that the results were precisely the reverse of its prognostications, and observers of the instrument began to lose all confidence in it. These apparent derangements arose, Sir Thomas Dick remarks, from electrical changes in the atmosphere. The Aurora Borealis appeared with uncommon brilliancy about the beginning of July, and was frequently seen afterwards, being generally accompanied by windy and unsteady weather, the continued drought having been sometimes interrupted during the previous months by sudden falls of rain partaking of the character of waterspouts. One of these occurred on Sunday the 12th of July, at Keanloch-huichart, a little Highland hamlet at the head of the lake of that name, in the parish of Contin, in Ross-shire. A man, who had taken shelter under a bridge, suddenly beheld a moving mountain of soil, stones, and trees coming down the deep course of the stream. He had just time to leave his stance before it reached the bridge, overthrew it in a moment, and devastated the plain bordering the lake. All the grown-up people of the hamlet were at church, but the children, who were playing at home, were miraculously preserved by escaping to a hillock before the river reached the spot. The people coming from church were, by the fall of the bridges, caught between two impassable torrents, and had barely time to save their lives by crowding to an elevated spot, where they remained till the waters subsided. The whole fury of the flood rushed directly against their devoted houses; and these, and every thing they contained, were at once annihilated, as well as their crops, together with the very soil they grew on; and after the dé-bâcle had passed away, the course of the river ran through the ruined hearths of this so recently happy a community. This waterspout did not extend beyond two miles on each side of the village, which led, continues Sir Thomas, these simple people to consider their calamity as a visitation of Providence for their landlord's vote in Parliament in favour of Catholic Emancipation.

Sir Thomas has a very plausible theory to account for the great floods of the 3d and 4th of August. The previous prevalence of westerly winds had produced a gradual accumulation of vapour somewhere to the north of our island, and the column being suddenly impelled by a strong north-easterly blast, it was driven towards the south-west, its right flank almost sweeping the Caithness and Sunderland coasts, until, rushing up and across the Moray Frith, it was attracted by the lofty mountains of the Monadh-leadh range, and discharged its torrents into the Nairn, the Findhorn, the Spey, the Lossie, the Deveron, the Don, and the Dee, and their various tributaries. Certain it is, that these and other rivers were all more or less affected by the flood exactly in proportion as they were more or less connected with those mountains. That part of the Spey which is above the line marked by Sir Thomas was hardly swollen at all; while below Kingussie, it and all its tributaries were elevated to an unexampled height. Some persons could not believe, looking at the floods, that they could have been produced by merely twenty-four hours' rain. But sure, such rains were never seen; for Mr Murdoch, gardener to the Duke of Gordon, at Huntly Lodge, ascertained that $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches of rain fell between five o'clock of the morning of the 3d, and five o'clock of the morning of the 4th of August; that is to say, that, taking the average of the years from 1821 to 1828 inclusive, about one-sixth part of our annual allowance of rain fell within those twenty-four hours! This, too, was at a great distance from the mountains—so that among them the rain must have been like one of the floods, which was described by one of the sufferers, from its fury, as “just perfectly ridiculous.”

On the 27th of July, there was what Sir Thomas calls “an appendix flood.” Each of the four principal rivers, the Nairn, the Findhorn, the Spey, and the Dee, had an appendix flood. But these appendices did not, like those of Dr Parr to his Spital sermon—to his sermon on education—and to the character of Fox by Philopatri Varvicencis, transcend in magnitude the very original performances to which they severally were appended. The Nairn seems to have been more ambitious in his appendix than any of his brethren. The Findhorn had so completely exhausted the subject in his first discourse, that he had but little new matter to bring forward on the 27th. The Spey had so triumphantly removed all obstacles in his great appearance on the 4th, that on the 27th it was comparatively plain sailing; and as for the Dee, there was little left for him to do, but to sweep away the bridge and harbour of Aberdeen, which would have been not only very wicked, but foolish, and little better than cutting his own throat. We shall therefore have small and seldom occasion to refer to the appendices, and shall confine ourselves to the main current of the great body of the discourses.

The united line of the rivers, whose devastations Sir Thomas undertakes to describe, cannot be less in extent than from 500 to 600 miles. Having visited the greater part of the flooded districts in person, he writes about them very much from his own observation, aided by the ample oral and written information obtained from persons of intelligence; and often he brings forward the witnesses to tell in their own words their own story. The narrative, therefore, is often enlivened by dramatic scenes, equal in interest to the best in Sir Walter's novels.

Let us begin with the river NAIRN, and dismiss him in not many words. He is, in his upper story, of a fine bold Highland character, and runs through a straight line of country, of somewhat more than 30 miles in extent, but of much longer course in its sinuosities; and he drains off the waters from a small part of the Monadh-leadh group. He rushed from his mountains, with his tail, on the morning of the 4th, and being armed with stones and gravel, committed sad havoc on many farms, especially on that of the Mainn of Aberarder. Seven hands were able to reap, in one day, all that remained there of a crop, for which L.150 of rent was payable. He then swept away the fulling-mill of Faillie, with all its heavy machinery, down to Cantray, nine miles below, whence it was with much labour brought back to its Highland home; but the Nairn, in the flood of the 27th, bore it away on a second expedition, and landed it at Kilravoch, after a voyage of eleven miles. Our friend then amused himself with sweeping away two bridges on the parliamentary line of road, one at Dunmaglass, and the other of two arches over the burn of Aultranagh. He then fell foul of the mill of Clara, which he utterly demolished. But it was rebuilt with all possible expedition, so as to be ready for him on the 27th, when he again came down in great fury, and swept it off, we suppose, to the sea. On the estate of Cantray, the villain did damage to the tune of L.1200—inundating the garden of the mansion-house, ruining utterly the houses of the gardener and miller, and sweeping away about fifteen acres of valuable land. He then attacked the bridge of Holm, and so shook the handsome arch of 55 feet span, that on the 27th he had but to give it a shove with his shoulder, and down it went like a sack. Here the Nairn must have been much amused by a little incident. Having risen high on a dry-stonewall, dividing the Holm and Kilravoch estates, he had no sooner touched the foundation, than the sods on the top of it became, as it were, alive with mice, all forcing their way out, to escape as fast as they could from the inundation that threatened their citadel. The old castle of Kilravoch seemed to stand in a sea, but the Nairn could make no impression on its walls, so, out of spite, he carried off above two acres of a thriving wood of deciduous trees. A little farther down, he carried away about one-third of the fifty arable acres belonging to the farm of Rosefield, or destroyed them beyond all power of redemption, by deposits of gravel and stones. The crops and grass were utterly ruined—a number of extensive works annihilated—the lime-beds of manure swept away, together with the whole corn of last year; and the whole farm, now in a state of chaos, lies at the mercy of every partial rise of the river. The crop ruined on the estate of Kilravoch, is estimated at L.500, and the actual damage done to the property, has been calculated by the factor at L.2400. Lord Cawdor's loss of soil, and other injury done to his estate along this part of the Nairn, may be set down at L.2000, and that of Mr Macintosh of Geddes, at L.1200. The inundation here spread far over the rich plain on the right bank, flooding some of the farm-houses that were 500 yards from the usual margin of the river, and ruining the crops to an extent that defies calculation.

All this was pretty well, and ought, we think, to have satisfied the Nairn. But after quitting the above extensive arable plain, he got into another, and attacked Fir-hall. The offices were substantially built, on the summit of a bank about 30 feet high, and at the distance of about 30 horizontal yards from the edge of the river. The Nairn attacked the base of this bank with great strength and science, and cut it entirely back, until he had undermined the buildings. Then down came the thrashing-mill and the gable of a lofty barn. Not satisfied with this signal display of skilful prowess, he swept away great part of a very thriving plantation of well-grown timber-trees from behind the offices. Arrived at the burgh of Nairn, he immediately attacked the washing-green, and made off with a couple of acres. The three arches of the bridge of Nairn, aggregate breadth 120 feet, stood fast; but one of two stone bulwarks below the bridge, appertaining to the pier-works, eleven feet high, and very strong, was levelled and scattered. The flood of the 27th did far greater damage, for the piers on the right bank of the harbour gave way, and one arch of the bridge, 30 feet span, was ruined, and the whole fabric shaken. It was very remarkable that a fishing-hut, about 12 feet long, standing on a beach in the middle of the river, constructed of four posts, with beams stretched between them at top and bottom, and covered, roof and all, with outside planks, stood unmoved in the midst of the waters of both floods uninjured, except that it swayed a little from the perpendicular; while the bridge, the pier, a vessel that had bulged, nay, the very rocks, were all yielding to the furious force of the deluge. No building of stone and lime could have stood in the same place; and its preservation, Sir Thomas rightly says, is worthy of record, as a valuable fact, to prove how much power posts and planks will resist in such a situation. It stands, says he, as a useful instructor to the burghers of Nairn, for the restoration of their harbour, the damage done to which is calculated at L.2500. And here we conclude our abstract of the achievements of the Nairn. His hands were not died in human blood. On the evening of the 3d of August, a schooner-rigged vessel was lost in attempting to run into Nairn harbour before the wind, and the crew perished; but the river had no hand in that catastrophe, and it is but fair play to give the devil his due.

The FINDHORN is in all respects a superior being to the Nairn; nor will any one who has seen Relugas—the residence of our worthy author—wonder at the enthusiasm with which he writes about this noble river. The Findhorn is born in a marish on the summit of a mountain in the midst of the Monadh-leath group—and pursues a rejoicing course of about ninety miles through a district of country of not less than sixty,—and of all the rivers of Scotland, there i not one perhaps that possesses so exquisitely varied a character. Many a long day and short night have we lain and lingered among his banks and braes—in many of his pellucid pools have we dived and darted “like a wild goose at play”—and not few are the silver-shiners, fish and trout, that we have seduced by fly-fascination from the stream to the sand-bank, while all the scenery round seemed beautified by the presence of the splendid spectacle. Tourists go blindfolded, hoodwinked, fancy-fettered, soul-swindled through the Highlands, with some wretched guide-book in their hand,* playing at cross purposes with the glens, and hide-and-seek with the woods, and blind-man’s buff with the mountains. Let them use their seven senses, and finding its source, take some river for their guide, and walk in music to the sea. Why, the Findhorn will shew them more of the spirit of Highland scenery, in three days, than they will ever see “all their life-long, in their present leading-strings along roads civil and military; the Spey too is a pleasant and instructive fellow-traveller, and the Dee a positive Poet, who embues the dullest wight with some of his own imagination.

But let us view the Findhorn in flood. After leaving its bleak parent hill, it runs through a deep ravine in the primitive rocks, whence it enters a beautiful pastoral glen and valley, bounded by steep and high mountains, with occasional rocky faces, but generally covered with a rich and valuable herbage. In those regions the flood was without parallel, and did all the harm it was possible for water to do—sweeping away, for example, the great wool-house of Laggan, and the whole shearing of wool of heaven knows how many thousand sheep. Lower down he sadly injured the estates of Dalmigarie, Killochie, and Balnespeik—scattering the corn and potatoes of many poor families—and by cutting off parts of fields diminishing greatly the value of entire farms. The little burn of Aultan-eachgra, which here joins the Findhorn, filled up and ruined the dams and watercourses of its carding and meal-mills, injured the houses and machinery, and left all in a state of silent, melancholy, and motionless ruin. Near its junction, the side of a wooded hill 100 feet high, slid down at once and covered the great public road with débris and with large trees, many of them in the growing position. The Findhorn now meeting with some opposition from the old bridge of Corryburgh, commonly called the bridge of Freeburn, consisting of three large arches, heaved them all up into the air, like the lid of a chest, and leaving nothing but the ruins of the two land-abutments, rolled on to other triumphs. The beautiful valley, or plain, below Freeburn, in olden time, no doubt, a lake, resumed that character. The river changed its course in several places, scarifying many acres, and carrying some away from the farm of Invereig. The eight-mile long, and everywhere extremely narrow glen, called the Streens, felt the fury of the flood—the spouts of rain having converted every dry scar on the mountain-faces into a torrent, which soon cut it into a ravine, and covered acres with huge stones and heaps of gravel, to the depth of many feet. In some places, where the hillside was formerly quite entire, it was torn open, and fragments of detached rocks, eight or ten tons in weight, were thrown down into the glen. Coming to Lord Cawdor’s property, the flood carried away the garden of the house of Cuilliachan, and the crop on twenty acres of land—injuring more or less the whole farm. Indeed, all the small farms hereabouts were nearly ruined by the annihilation of half their arable lands. Easter Tchirfogrein, “the place hid from the sun,” stood 100 horizontal yards from, and twelve feet above, the usual surface of the river. The two brothers, who farmed it, seeing the house surrounded three feet deep, carried their sister and bed-ridden old mother to the side of a hill, from which they soon saw their dwelling-house and other dwellings disappear in the flood. Next morning, one end of a cowhouse alone remained—the whole crop was gone—so were six acres of arable land, and all the rest was ruined by deep deposits of sand and gravel. The poor tenants removed to the farm of Knochandhu. The house stood about twenty yards from the edge of a haugh, 100 feet high above the Findhorn. But the “appendix flood,” of the 27th, finding the base of this lofty bank already scarified, attacked, undermined, and tumbled it down in enormous masses, with a noise like volleys of artillery—so that the house, though not hurled over, had to be deserted, standing as it now did, on the edge of a red, raw, perpendicular precipice a hundred feet high. Lord Cawdor’s loss is estimated at L.6000—and many poor people were reduced to utter want and ruin. The Findhorn then attacked the old military bridge at Dulsie, which consists of one bold and lofty arch of 46 feet, spanning the yawning chasm. The Findhorn attacked him in close column, with all his forces—having risen en masse forty feet above his usual level. But though invaded to within three feet of his key-stone, the old veteran stood fast, and repulsed the enemy,—or rather suffered him to make his escape along the foundations of his piers. The Findhorn was here reinforced by the Drumlochan Burn, in its ordinary state hardly sufficient to keep a saw-mill going, but now a column of water ten feet deep by forty in breadth. Its very branches were mighty—and carried away two bridges of twenty feet span. The Findhorn, swollen with so many furious auxiliaries, now resolved to sweep away the magnificent bridge of Ferness. It was built of solid granite by the Parliamentary Commissioners, consisting of three arches of thirty-six, fifty-five, and thirty feet span, and founded on the solid rock. But Sir Thomas’s fine description of this attack must be given unabridged:—

* No allusion here to that very useful volume “The Scottish Tourist,” manifestly compiled by an intelligent editor, and published by the respectable firm of Stirling and Kenney, Edinburgh; Whittaker and Co., and James Duncan, London; nor to “The Picture of Scotland,” by that ingenious and amusing writer, Robert Chambers, published by our good friends, the Messrs Taits, Princes Street, Edinburgh.

pected that there was a bridge there at all. Grouped with some cottages and some other trees, at a point about 150 yards above the bridge, grew one of the most beautiful ashes I ever beheld. It had a tall triple stem, supporting a perfect grove of foliage. The largest of its three divisions was 12½ feet in circumference, the next 7½ feet, and the smallest about 7 feet. This noble tree was covered to a considerable height by the water; but the gardener had no apprehension for its safety, when all at once it fell with a fearful crash, breaking a number of its branches by the very force and weight with which they struck the surface of the water, and throwing up the agitated element to a great height. Down it went out of sight, with an enormous bank of gravel, torn away and retained by the long and multiplied reticulations of its roots. As it got rid of a part of this dead weight, and rapidly approached the bridge, its branches rose for a moment, with great majesty, some 40 or 50 feet above the water, and fell backwards, in such a manner as to bring the root forward. In an instant it was sucked into the vortex of the centre arch. The branches and smaller limbs were ground to pieces with a noise like thunder, mingled with that of the explosions of gunpowder. For three or four minutes it stuck, ‘groaning and bellowing’ as if from torture, and then appeared darting below the lower side of the bridge, shorn of its mighty honours. When the river subsided, the bridge of Ferness, to the astonishment of every one, emerged from the flood, with no other damage than the loss of a part of its southern wing-wall and road-way, estimated at about L.100. But the preservation of the arches and the body of the bridge, must ever occasion it to be regarded as a miracle of masonry.”

The flood now reached the Regulas property—and here ripped up an old tragic secret:—

“At one place, immediately above where the public road now runs, it was carried past Cumin’s Cairn, rising on the verge of a steeply inclined bank of 70 or 80 feet high. This heap of stones was raised over the body of a man of the name of Cumin, who, having hanged himself in his barn in the beginning of the 18th century, that is to say, about 100 years before the time I now speak of, was buried on the march, according to the custom observed with suicides. The moment the ditch was opened down the face of the bank, it collected the water of every shower of rain; and, being thereby converted into a temporary cataract, a gully of immense magnitude was cut in the alluvial matter in the course of a year or two. The bottom of this soon formed itself into an inclined plane, of above 100 yards in length, after which the water ceased to have any effect on it. This sufficiently illustrates the law governing all streams in their operations on the face of the earth, which have all a tendency, by deepening one place and filling up another, to reduce their channels to inclined planes. After a flood, which brought down a good deal of the loose material on the sides of the gully, a boy, tending cattle, observed something like long red hair streaming in the breeze, near the top of the broken bank. On climbing up to investigate the matter, what was his horror and dread when he discovered that the hair was attached to a ghastly human head! He fled home in terror, and the people crowded out to see the wonder. There they found the corpse of Cumin, so entire, that if any one could have known him alive, he must have perfectly recognised his features. The head protruded horizontally from the bank, and the excudation from the body had tinged the sand beneath it of a black colour, to a considerable depth. The cause of the preservation of the body was manifestly the dry ferruginous sand it was buried in. The rope was found about his neck, and attached to the fatal beam. During the night following the discovery of the body, the man's descendants carried all off, and buried them in the churchyard of Edenkilloe."

The Findhorn, though, during the flood, well entitled to the cognomen of "The Bridge-Destroyer," was yet, like Wellington at Burgos, often repulsed. He rose thirty-one feet against the bridge of Daldich, a fine bold arch of eighty-two feet span, and forty-four from parapet to ordinary water-level, springing from the rock—but after a whole day and night's cannonade, he was fain to sheer off from that impregnable position. He now approached the Haugh of Randolph—vulgarly called Rannoch. And although the opening at Randolph's Bridge extends as the rocks rise upwards, till the width is perhaps not less than seventy or eighty feet above, yet from the sudden turn the river takes as it enters this passage, the stream was so checked in its progress, that the flood actually rose over the very top of the rocks, forty-six feet above the usual height, and inundated the level part of Rannoch-haugh that lies over them, to the depth of four feet, making a total perpendicular rise at this point of no less than fifty feet!

Leaving the "Bridge-Destroyer" in his full-swollen pride and wrath at Randolph's Bridge, let us accompany Sir Thomas while, according to the arrangement proposed in his preliminary chapter, he describes the ravages of the river Divie, which falls into the Findhorn immediately below the house of Relugas. The Divie has its origin in the hills dividing the district of Braemoray from that of Strathspey, and is formed by the combination of many small streams. Its scenery, for a stretch of six or seven miles below the spot where it leaps into the glen in a wild waterfall, to its junction with the Findhorn, is exquisitely beautiful. Mr Cumming Bruce's estate of Dimplail stretches nearly to its upper extremity five or six miles above the fall—and he had a range of small farms all along its course, the haugh lands of which were entirely swept away by the flood. It carried away a beautiful bridge of one arch which had been there for nearly a century. It broke quite over the parapet; yet still the arch stood till about a quarter of an hour afterwards, when some very large trees came down with the stream, stuck within it for a time, and the pressure accumulating above, it was carried off en masse, and actually hurried for some distance down the river, before it went to pieces and sunk.

The Dorback which joins the Divie, comes from the wild lake of Lochindorbe, remarkable for the extensive ruins of its insulated castle, and has many tributary burns. One of its branches destroyed a bridge on the Grantown road, and another tore down the bridge of Dava, swept away the garden of the inn, and the whole crop and soil attached to it. The Dorback itself was far from being idle on this great occasion. He utterly annihilated the whole of the low lands of Lord Moray's estate of Braemoray, and converted the green slopes of the hills into naked precipices. The damage done on Mr Cumming Bruce's part of the Dorback is of the same character and comparative extent. At the Ess, or waterfall of the Dorback, where the river runs through a ravine thirty feet wide, the flood was twenty feet high—a towering altitude for a rivulet which, in ordinary seasons, you may wade—at a hundred fords—knee-deep. Lower down, the deluge of rain performed a curious achievement. It so soaked and saturated about an acre of wood on the face of a bank, 100 feet high, that the whole mass, with slopes and terraces covered with birch and alder-trees, gave way at once, threw itself headlong down, and bounded across the Dorback, blocking up the waters in that tremendous flood.

“ William Macdonald, the farmer of Easter Tillyglens, witnessed this phenomenon. He told me that it fell ‘ wi’ a sort o’ a dumb sound,’ which, though somewhat of a contradiction in terms, will yet convey the true meaning better than any more correct expression. Astonished and confounded, Macdonald remained gazing. The bottom of the valley is here some 200 yards or more wide, and the flood nearly filled it. The stoppage was not so great, therefore, as altogether to arrest the progress of the stream. But this sudden obstacle created an accumulation of water behind it, which went on increasing for nearly an hour, till, becoming too powerful to be longer resisted, the enormous dam began to yield, and was swept off at once, and hurled onwards like a floating island. But this was not all; for while Macdonald was standing, lost in wonderment, to behold his farm thus sailing off to the ocean by acres at a time, better than half an acre more of it rent itself away from its native hill, and descended at once, with a whole grove of trees on it, to the river, where it rested most accurately on its natural base. The flood immediately assailed this, and carried off the greater part of it piecemeal. Part of it yet remains, however, with the trees growing on it, in the upright position, after having travelled through a horizontal distance of 60 or 70 yards, with a perpendicular descent of not less than 60 feet.”

The Dorback then destroyed the beautiful meal-mill and carding-mill of Dunphail. The whole family, consisting of the miller, a most meritorious and ingenious, and what is far better, religious young man, William Sutherland—a boy his brother—the assistant miller—a lad, and a servant girl, found themselves surrounded by the flood. As they were engaged in family worship, down came the river suddenly upon them, pouring into the house both by the doors and windows. But here we must quote the miller’s own impressive account of the affair :

“ ‘ I ran,’ said the miller, ‘ to the bed where my little brother lay; and, snatching him up, I carried him out to the meal-mill, the floor of which was elevated and dry, and I kindled a fire on the bricks to keep him and the lass warm. By this time, the cattle were up to the bellies in water in the byre; and I ran to throw straw bundles under them and the pigs, to raise them, to prevent their being drowned. I had hardly returned to the house, when the south gable, which had the current beating against it, fell inwards on the other room, and I was instantly obliged to knock out that window in the north gable, to let the water escape, otherwise we must have perished where we were. About five o’clock, I observed my neighbours John Grant and his wife standing on the bank in front. The distance between us was not thirty yards, yet I could not make them hear for the fearsome roar of the water, which was now quite tremendous. Large trees were constantly coming down and striking against the carding-mill. The look up the water was awful. It seemed as if a sea was coming down upon us, with terrible waves, tossing themselves into the air, much higher than the houses. I saw Grant’s wife go up the bank, and she returned some time afterwards with four men. We watched them consulting together, and our hopes rose high; but when we saw them leave the place without making any attempt to save us, we thought that all hope for us in this world was gone. Willingly would I have given all I had, or might expect to possess, to have planted but the soles of my feet, and those of my companions, on yon bit green sod, then still untouched by the waters. Every moment we expected the crazed walls of the house to yield, and to bury us in their ruins, or that we and it together should be swept away. We began to prepare ourselves for the fate that seemed to await us. I thank Almighty God that supported me in that hour of trial. I felt calm and collected, and my assistant was no less so. My little brother, too, said he was na feared; but the woman and the lad were frantic, and did nothing but shriek and wring their hands.

“ ‘ While we were in this situation, we suddenly saw about sixty people coming down the bank, and our hopes revived. The four men had gone to raise the country, and they now appeared with ropes.

All our attention was fixed on their motions. They drove a post into the ground, and threw the end of a thick rope across to me. This we fixed to a strong beam, and jammed it within the front window, whilst they on the bank made fast the other end of it to the post. A smaller rope was thrown over. This I fastened round the boy's waist, and he was dragged through the water to the bank, supporting himself all the way on the larger rope, that was stretched between the window and the post. The lass lost her hold, and was taken out half drowned; but, thank Providence! we were all saved. By six o'clock in the evening, the water had so fallen, that I made my way in to give provender to the beasts. I then found that the whole Dorback had come over from the west side of the valley, and cut a new course close at the back of the mills. All the mill-leads were cut entirely away. A deep ravine was dug out between the houses and the bank—their foundations were undermined in that direction—the machinery destroyed—the gables next the river carried away—and all, even the very ground, so ruined, that it is quite impossible ever to have mills here again."

So much for the exploits of the Dorback before he joined the Divie; and now a few words more of the Divie before he joins the Findhorn—and then a few pages, perhaps more, of the "Bridge-Destroyer," before he joins the Sea.

We grieve to say, that the Divie shewed himself by his conduct to his excellent benefactor and benefactress, Mr and Mrs Cumming Bruce, a monster of ingratitude. The new house of Dunphail, then partly inhabited, and on the eve of being finished at the time of the floods, is one of the happiest efforts of Mr Playfair's classical taste. It stands on a wide lawn, 50 feet from the verge of a bank in front, at the base of which there is an old channel, where there was little water except in floods, and 600 feet from the proper and ordinary course of the river that runs along the steep and wooded bank bounding the valley to the west. The intermediate space was occupied by a broad, green, and partially wooded island of some acres in extent. On the evening of the 3d, the Divie rose so as to carry away two handsome wooden bridges, and, an embankment at the upper end of the island having given way, a mighty torrent poured towards the house. Mr Cumming Bruce prevailed on his wife and daughter to leave Dunphail, for the house of a friend. Before doing so, about six in the evening, their anxiety had been extremely excited for the fate of a favourite old pony, then at pasture in the island. Though the house of Dunphail itself was about to be in jeopardy, their feeling hearts felt for old Dobbin.

"As the spot had never been flooded in the memory of man, no one thought of removing him until it was too late. When the embankment gave way, and the patches of green gradually diminished, Dobbin, now in his twenty-seventh year, and in shape something like a 74 gun-ship cut down to a frigate, was seen galloping about in great alarm, as the wreck of roots and trees floated past him, and as the last spot of grass disappeared, he was given up for lost. At this moment he made a desperate effort to cross the stream under the house,—was turned head over heels by its force—rose again, with his head up the river—made boldly up against it, but was again borne down and turned over—every one believed him gone, when, rising once more, and setting down the waste of water, he crossed both torrents, and landed safely on the opposite bank."

Mr Cumming Bruce returned to Dunphail at ten o'clock, and then the river had undermined the bank the house stood on to within four paces of the foundation of the kitchen tower, and at eleven, there were only three yards then left to count on. At two o'clock on Tuesday morning, it came 12 feet within the height of the bank, flowing 16 or 18 feet immediately below, where, in general, the old water-course was dry, and the bank fell within one yard of the foundation of the east-tower. Mr Cumming Bruce then ordered every one to quit the building, and he and his people took their station at some distance, to witness the fate of the beautiful structure. But at four o'clock the river began to subside, and the house was saved.

"The ruin and devastation of the place was dreadful. The shrubbery all along the river side, with its little hill and moss-house, had vanished; two stone and three wooden bridges were carried off; the beautiful fringe of wood on both sides of the river, with the ground it grew on, were washed to the ocean, together with all those sweet and pastoral projections of the fields, which gave so peaceful and fertile a character to the valley; whilst the once green island, robbed of its groups of trees, and furrowed by a dozen channels, was covered with large stones, gravel, and torn up roots. The rock in the old channel had been rendered unavailing by the great quantity of gravel brought down, which raised the water over it, so that it acted against the superincumbent mass of mortary gravel that was incapable of resisting it; and thus the house was left in the midst of ruin—like a precious gem, the lustre and effect of which have been destroyed by its setting being injured, and the stone itself left in jeopardy. ‘Dreadful, indeed,’ says Mrs Cumming Bruce, feelingly, in a billet written in reply to our enquiries, ‘is the devastation that a few hours have wrought. But we must be thankful that all around us are safe. God’s will be done. I daresay we were all too proud of the beauty of our valley, —a beauty which we had not given, and could not take away, but which has vanished in an instant before His sweeping arm.’”

This is the spirit in which all losses in this life should be met; and though from the eyes of her who felt and feels thus, the “beauty of our valley” be indeed gone, yet it shall endure for ever before her imagination, thus kindled always by a light from heaven.

But we now accompany the worthy Baronet to his own “Relugas,” where the Divie acted nearly as wicked a part as at Dunphail. Yet, after all, we believe in our conscience that he could not help it. The man who, when hurried headlong by the force of one single, or twenty united swollen passions, would seek, after spreading irremediable misery far and wide, to palliate his wickedness by the plea that he was no longer a voluntary agent, is suitably answered by an immediate order for his execution. But a river is at the mercy of the marshes of earth and the clouds of heaven, and cannot successfully fight against his Will-o’-wisps and his Stars. We have sometimes seen a stream vainly resisting earth, air, and sky to flood him, and trying to make his escape into bays and nooks—but it would not do—he soon became red, and then raving—and as well as drumly—and knocking his head against rocks and bridges, rushed howling like a maniac to the sea. On the 3d and 4th of August, the Divie was indeed an object rather of pity than of anger—of poetical wonder and awe, than of moral blame and condemnation. Sir Thomas, who suffered so sadly from his insanity, compassionately saw his conduct in this light, and for sake of his many virtues, regards him with entire forgiveness.

The chief part of the pleasure grounds of Relugas, occupies a peninsula bounded to the east by the Divie, and to the west by the Findhorn. The house stands on a terrace facing the west, in which direction the lawn stretches towards the Findhorn. The south front looks over the garden, extending up the glen of the Divie, and immediately above a wooded bank, which slopes from the garden into an island called the Mill Island, formed by the water led off from the Divie as a mill-stream. This mill-stream ran peacefully along the base of that superbly wooded bank, where trees of all kinds grew to the height of eighty feet, and produced an impenetrable shade. The side of the Mill Island, next the Divie itself, was defended by a spine of wooded rocks, rising abruptly, and terminating at the upper end in a picturesque castellated mass called the Otter’s Rock. On the Mill Island itself the greatest care was lavished, the peaceful mill-stream, the lawny grass glades, the winding walks, and the rocky ridges, having all been adorned with all that was most rare, till it was converted into a spot of delightful retirement. At the back of the house, a picturesque conical wooded hill, called the Doune, rises to the eastward. The Divie coming from the south, after skirting the whole length of the Mill Island, strikes against the southern base of the Doune, and then turns off to the eastward at a right angle, immediately above which point the stables and other offices stand, 40 feet perpendicular, and 158 feet horizontal from the water’s edge, forming two sides of a square corresponding to the angle of the river. After leaving the offices, the Divie sweeps for a circuit of half a mile round the south, east, and north bases of the Doune, between lofty and rocky banks, luxuriantly wooded with stately timber, and along the mingled lawns and wooded banks that slope towards its stream from the north front of the house, it pursues its course westward to join the Find-horn, which it does at no great distance from Randolph Bridge—the point, our readers may remember, at which we forsook for a while—to return to him by and by, “The Bridge-Destroyer.”

Such was—and is—though much beauty for the present has disappeared—Relugas. On the evening of Monday the 3d, being roused while at dinner by alarming accounts of the rivers, the family took their way through the garden to their favourite Mill Island. Sir Thomas, anxious for the safety of a little rustic Doric temple, partly constructed of masonry, and partly of unpeeled spruce trees, that occupied an isolated rock above a broken cascade crossed by picturesque bridges, said to the gardener, “John, I fear our temple may be in some danger if this goes on.” —“Ou, sir, it’s awa else,” (already,) was John’s reply—and looking up—says Sir Thomas, “The Divie appalled us!”

“It resembled the outlet to some great inland sea, that had suddenly broken from its bounds. It was already 8 or 10 feet higher than any one had ever seen it, and setting directly down against the sloping terrace under the offices, where we were standing, it washed up over the shrubs and strawberry-beds, with a strange and alarming flux and reflux, dashing out over the ground 10 or 15 yards at a time,—covering the knees of some of the party, standing, as they thought, far beyond its reach,—and, retreating with a suction, which it required great exertion to resist. The whirlpool produced by the turn of the river, was in some places elevated 10 or 12 feet above other parts of it. The flood filled the whole space from the rocks of the right bank on the east, to the base of the wooded slope, forming the western boundary of the Mill Island, thus covering the whole of that beautiful spot, except where two rocky wooded knolls, and the Otter’s Rock beyond them, appeared from its eastern side. The temple was indeed gone, as well as its bridges, and four other rustic bridges in the island. Already its tall ornamental trees had begun to yield, one by one, to the pressure and undermining of the water, and to the shocks they received from the beams of the Dunphail wooden bridges. The noise was a distinct combination of two kinds of sound; one, an uniformly continued roar, the other like rapidly repeated discharges of many cannons at once. The first of these proceeded from the violence of the water; the other, which was heard through it, and, as it were, muffled by it, came from the enormous stones which the stream was hurling over its uneven bed of rock. Above all this was heard the fiendlike shriek of the wind, yelling, as if the demon of desolation had been riding upon its blast. The leaves of the trees were stripped off and whirled into the air, and their thick boughs and stems were bending and cracking beneath the tempest, and groaning like terrified creatures, impatient to escape from the coils of the watery serpent.”

How fared the beautiful and beloved Mill Island? All its magnificent trees were falling like grass beneath the mower’s scythe. Numerous as they were, says the Baronet, feelingly, they were all individually well-known friends. Each as it fell gave one enormous plash on the surface—then a plunge—then the root appeared above water for a moment—then again all was submerged—then uprose the stem, disbranched and peeled—and finally they either hurled round in the cauldron, or darted like arrows down the river.

How stood the bridge over the Divie to the north of the house? Here, the river, bounding out from the rocky glen behind the Doune, was fearful. The arch is 24 feet high, and its span from rock to rock, 60 feet. The flood filled more than two thirds of its height—yet all night the bridge stood fast—though the wide body of water which covered the Mill Island, and wrought such devastation there, had all to pass through that narrow chasm. All the servants who lived in the offices had sat up the whole night in dread of the building being carried away. Morning then came—and Sir Thomas thus describes the scene:

“I hurried out. But, prepared as my mind had been for a scene of devastation, how much did the reality exceed my worst anticipations! The Divie had apparently subsided, it is true, but it was more because it had widened and disencumbered its course, than from any actual diminution of its waters. The whole Mill Island was cleared completely of shrubs, trees, and soil, except the hard summit toward the Otter’s Rock; and, instead of the space being filled with that wilderness of sweets into which the eye found difficulty in penetrating, one vast and powerful red coloured river, dividing itself into two branches against the other rocks, flowed in large streams around it, without one single obstacle to its action; with less turmoil than before indeed, but with the terrible majesty of a mighty conqueror sweeping sternly over the carnage of his recent victory. And well might the enemy triumph!—For, besides the loss of the Mill Island, which I had looked for, the beautiful hanging bank, covered with majestic forest and ornamental trees, of all kinds, and of growth so fresh and vigorous, had vanished like the scenery of a dream, and, in its place, was the garden hedge, running for between 200 and 300 yards, along the brink of a red alluvial perpendicular precipice 50 feet high, with the broad remorseless flood, rolling at its base, eating into its foundation, and, every successive minute, bringing down masses of many cubic yards. And then, from time to time, some tall and graceful tree, on the brink of the fractured portions of the bank at either end, would slowly and magnificently bend its head, and launch into the foaming waves below. The whole scene had an air of unreality about it that bewildered the senses. It was like some of those wild melodramatic exhibitions, where nature's operations are out-heroded by the mechanist of a theatre, and where mountains are thrown down by artificial storms."

The ruin here described was very much owing to the confinement of the Divie for a great way above the waterfall, and its bursting at once from the gorge below it, called Macrae's Loup, into the wider theatre of its havoc. The height of the flood at Macrae's Loup was no less than 40 feet above the ordinary level! The river from that spot towards the house and offices used to present one of the richest scenes imaginable. But when the water had ebbed away, nothing was to be seen but a dark ravine of sand and gravel, covered with huge rounded lumps of stone. The officers were within a yard of the crumbling precipice of earth! Though they stand—if we rightly understand the Baronet—158 feet horizontal from what used to be the water's edge! The quantity of gravel and stone, indeed, brought down by the Divie was far greater than by any other river. It used to be remarkable for the depth of its pools; but the flood completely obliterated them, and for many weeks afterwards a dog might have walked down its whole course from Eden-killie Church to the Findhorn, without having occasion to swim one yard! The Swimming Pool at Relugas, was 16 feet deep. It has now 20 feet deep of gravel laid into it, and is converted into a shallow, the bottom of which is 4 feet higher than the former surface of the water!

A branch of the pleasure walks leads down the left bank of the Divie, as you enter the Relugas property from the Dunphail march, for more than two miles, to the point of its junction with the Findhorn. Sir Thomas having had lessons read to him by former floods, had conducted the line at an elevation thought by all to be above all danger.

"The rocks and recesses of the wooded banks, and the little grassy slopes, were covered in a wild way with many thousand shrubs, of all kinds, especially with laurels, rhododendrons, azaleas, lilacs, and a profusion of roses, which were thriving vigorously, and beginning to bear blossoms, whilst the rocks were covered with the different saxifrages, hung with all sorts of creepers, and enamelled with a variety of garden flowers, all growing artlessly, as if sown by the hand of Nature. The path was therefore considered to be not unworthy of the exquisite scenery through which it led. But the flood of the 3d and 4th of August left not one fragment of it remaining, from one end to the other. Not a tree, or shrub, or flower, or piece of soil, nay, or of moss or lichen, is to be seen beneath that boldly and sublimely sketched line of flood, that appears on either side, and from end to end of these rocks, like the awful handwriting of God on the wall."

The point of junction between the Divie and the Findhorn was terminated by a picturesque rock covered with trees, and rendered accessible by a rustic bridge. The waves, at this meeting of the waters, were terrific, tossing themselves 20 feet into the air, and throwing up the drift trees, and other bodies, to a great height. The bridge and the trees on the rock were swept away, and not even a blade of grass or a tuft of moss left.

"The damage done at Relugas by the flood, is perhaps not more, in actual value, than L.1200; yet, when the rocky defences all along this very small property are considered, even this sum is great. But the beauties of nature cannot be estimated in money; and although Relugas has yet enough left to captivate strangers, and to make them wonder how there could have been any thing to regret; yet ten thousand points of locality are lost, on which hung many long-cherished associations with the memory of those who can never return to sanctify the new scenes resulting from the late catastrophe. The flood of the 27th did no injury here. Principal Baird, being on his way to Relugas from Forres, on that day, called to the postboy to stop as he was crossing the Divie bridge, that he might enjoy the view of the scenery. 'Na, na, sir!' roared the lad, smacking his whip, 'these are ower kittle times to be stopping on brigs!'"

We now return from the Dorback and the Divie to the Findhorn, whom we left at Randolph's Bridge:—

"The next spot I visited on the morning of the 4th, was the Findhorn, at Randolph's Bridge. I have already mentioned, that the flood rose to the height of fifty feet there. I found it in its greatest grandeur,* flooding over the whole haugh of Rannoch, carrying large trees, with their roots and branches, triumphantly around it, and washing so far up the road leading down to it, as very nearly to run into a course which I have often been wondered at for calling an ancient channel of the river. The turmoil of the surges was so tremendous, that the primitive rocks shook, as the Divie bridge had done the previous evening. Nothing can convey an idea of the violence and velocity of the water that shot away from the whirling sea above the cliffs. It was scarcely possible to follow with the eye the trees and wreck that floated like straws on its surface. The force was as much more than that of a raging ocean, as gunpowder ignited within the confined tube of a cannon is more terribly powerful than the same material when suffered to explode on the open ground. I was particularly struck here with an example of the fact, that trees exposed to occasional struggles with torrents, instinctively prepare themselves to resist them. I observed one tall ash, growing a little way above Randolph's Bridge, covered to at least four-fifths of its height. It was broken over at last, but, having been taught by experience to resist the action of water, it was not rent away, whilst all those which had never been visited by floods before, were torn up like weeds. Before I left this spot, I saw one of the under gardeners wade into the water as it had begun to ebb on the haugh, and, with his umbrella, drive ashore and capture a fine salmon, at an elevation of fifty feet above the ordinary level of the Findhorn."

We next behold him carrying off, at Logie, two acres of very fine full-grown timber, soil and all. The mill here, standing seventy-two horizontal feet from the brink of the rock over the river, and fifteen perpendicular feet above the level of its mid-channel, had a narrow escape. It was flooded three feet deep in its upper story; but was saved from destruction by a row of large ash-trees firmly rooted between it and the river. From Lord Moray's Haugh of Logie, some of the largest oaks in Scotland were rent away, and seven acres of very valuable land carried off. Sir William Cumming lost a quarter of an acre of magnificent trees from a beautiful spot near the Roane, and a wooded island, 160 yards long, by 20 broad, was swept entirely away from Ranflat Haugh. Cothall mills, too, farther down, belonging to Sir William, were totally annihilated. They consisted of an extensive group of buildings, three stories high, containing flour, meal, and barley mills, with all manner of appurtenances. Not a vestige remains; and the whole force of the river now runs through the spot where they stood. Sir Thomas himself saw one of the freestone lintels, three feet and a half long, by one foot one way, and nine inches the other, lying two miles below the site of the mills! Sir William Cumming's magnificent drive, which ran under the bluff Craig of Coulternose, superbly finished, and beautifully planted with ornamental trees and shrubs, was completely destroyed, and sixteen acres of land were cut off entirely from his farm of Mundole.—Think for a moment of the power hercabouts of the Findhorn. The medium width of the channel at the Limestone Craig of Coulternose, is 185 feet. The mean depth of a number of soundings, taken across the river, at its ordinary state, is about three feet four inches, above which the flood rose fourteen feet eight inches, making the total depth eighteen feet—so that a transverse section of the column of water passing through must have had a superficial face of 3330 square feet moving with force and velocity perfectly inconceivable. It is proposed to build the new bridge here—to supply the place of Randolph Bridge, which was swept away, and that the span shall be 160 feet, which will form the grandest feature of one of the finest possible landscapes.

Hitherto we have seen the flood raging chiefly against plains, woods, rocks, and bridges—but now the Findhorn threatened and endangered human life, and his progress is contemplated with a far deeper—with a tragic interest. Terrific was the discharge of water, wreck, and stones that burst from the pass at the Craig of Coulternose, over the extensive plain of Forbes, spreading devastation abroad on that rich and beautifully hedgerowed country. On Monday the 3d of August, Dr Brands of Forbes, a gentleman, as it appears, of rare intrepidity, was professionally called to the western side of the river, which he forded on horseback. Before he had crossed the second branch of the stream, he saw the flood come thundering down—his horse was caught by it—he was compelled to swim, and he had not long touched dry land, ere the river had risen six feet. After dinner at Moy, he accompanied Mr Suter, the worthy dweller there, to several cottages, advising the inmates to leave them without delay, and come to Moy—a kind advice, which was taken by all except the family of one Kerr, who, trusting to their great distance from the river, somewhat obstinately refused to move. The house of Moy, by ten at night, was filled with men, women, and children, flying from the flood. “There’s twa families yonder wholly surrounded,” cried a voice, “and as for poor Sandy Smith! Poor *Funn*s! Naebody can ever houp till see him or his family again.” This Sandy Smith was an active boatman, commonly called Whins, or, in the provincial pronunciation, *Funn*s, from his residence on a piece of furzy pasture, at no great distance from the river. A far distant gleam of light came from his window. “I have often heard of a ray of hope,” said Mr Suter, “but this is the first time I ever experienced it in a literal sense.” What too was to become of the Kerrs at Stripeside! Here we must record in our pages an incident most honourable to the humanity and courage of Mr Suter;

“But farther consideration for them was extinguished for a time, by the loud screams that proceeded from the gardener’s wife and children near the offices at Moy. They hastened thither, and found the flood rushing strongly about the house. It was not yet too deep to wade, but the river was making rapid advances, whilst the people were debating what was best to be done. ‘I will go myself and save them!’ cried Mr Suter. ‘God forbid that ye could risk yourself alone, sir!’ said an elderly woman standing by; ‘I’ll gang wi’ ye.’—‘Come along then, madam,’ said he, offering his arm to the old lady, whom he now recognised to be Widow Ross, his washerwoman, who had only a short time before escaped with her children, from her house at Stripeside, with the loss of every thing she had in this world. ‘Come along! we shall try it at all events.’ They entered the water, and, after three or four paces, it became deep. They had to pass through a gate, where the current was strong. ‘No fear, widow!’ said Mr Suter, ‘lean more on my arm.’ By this time they were up to the middle in water. ‘Haud mair to that side, sir,’ cried the widow, ‘there’s a deep well here, and we may fa’ intil’t.’ They reached the cottage door. ‘What’s the meaning of this delay?’ demanded Mr Suter. ‘Come, young fellow,’ said he, addressing himself to the gardener’s youngest son, and bending his body to receive him, ‘leap upon my back.’ The little urchin joyfully obeyed, and, in ten minutes, the whole family were saved.”

The stormful blackness of the night made it impossible to assist either the Kerrs or *Funn*s, but Mr Suter said, “Let candles be placed in all the windows of the house, that poor Whins, if yet in existence, may know that he is not forgotten amidst the horrors of this awful night. But, alas! his light no longer burns!” At daybreak Dr Brands hurried down to the offices, and ascended the tower to look out from the top. The prospect was awful—all the extensive plain of Forbes being one wide-weltering flood, down to the expanding Frith and German Ocean. The houses of Stripeside were still standing; and he saw too the far-off dwelling of poor *Funn*s, its roof rising like a speck above the flood, that had evidently made a breach in one of its ends. Mr Suter, about seven in the morning, went to his own offices, and there he found one of his servants, Alexander Kerr, son of the old people in jeopardy in Stripeside, weeping in agony for the inevitable destruction of his parents. As Mr Suter was trying to comfort him, the whole gable end of old Kerr's dwelling gave way, and fell into the raging current. Dr Brands, who was looking intently the while through a telescope, observed a hand thrust through the thatch of the house—it worked busily, as if in despair of life—a head soon appeared—and then the whole body of old Kerr, who began drawing out his wife and niece. They all crawled along the roof, towards the northern chimney. As soon as they had left the roof it fell into the flood—Old Kerr letting himself drop from the thatch of the roof they had reached, let himself drop from the eaves on a small speck of ground higher than the rest, close to the foundation of the back wall of the building, which was next to the spectators. The brave Dr Brands set off on horseback—and the lad Alexander also in another direction—to endeavour to find a boat. But after many narrow escapes from danger, intrepidly encountered, the Doctor was forced, without having attained his object, to return to Moy. At this time poor Funnis, and his family, were thus situated,—

“ They were huddled together on a spot of ground a few feet square, some 40 or 50 yards below their inundated dwelling. He was sometimes standing and sometimes sitting on a small cask, and, as the beholders fancied, watching with intense anxiety the progress of the flood, and trembling for every large tree that it brought sweeping past them. His wife, covered with a blanket, sat shivering on a bit of log, one child in her lap, and a girl of about 17, and a boy of about 12 years of age, leaning against her side. A bottle and a glass on the ground, near the man, gave the spectators, as it had doubtless given him, some degree of comfort. Above a score of sheep were standing around, or wading or swimming in the shallows. Three cows and a small horse, picking at a broken rick of straw that seemed to be half afloat were also grouped with the family.”

“ The young man who went in the direction of Kincorth, found that Mrs Grant had already ordered out a pair of horses to convey the boat to the spot where it was committed to the waves; and it was immediately manned by Donald Munro, overseer to Mr Loudon at Earnhill, William Smith, salmon-fisher, and Tom Fraser, floater, who nobly volunteered to proceed, in the first place, to the rescue of the family of a man named John Smith, who were in the most perilous situation imaginable, in the island opposite to Earnhill. The gentlemen on the tower watched the motions of this boat with the liveliest interest. They saw it tugging up till an intervening wood hid it from their view. Again it was seen beyond, making, as it were, for Rodney's cottage, as they hoped with the intention of reaching Stripeside. But in an instant it dashed into the main stream, and disappeared behind the wood with a velocity so fearful that they concluded its destruction certain. But in a moment it again showed itself, and the brave fellows were seen plying their oars across the submerged island of Earnhill, making for John Smith's cottage, the thatch, and a small part of the side walls of which only were visible above the water; so that, by means of the telescope, the gentlemen saw the poor inmates actually dragged out of the windows, from under the water, having been obliged to duck within ere they could effect their escape. The boat then swept down the stream towards a place called the Lakes, where John Smith, his wife, and her mother, were safely landed.

the rest of his life. He was now at the prow, now at the stern, now in the water to the neck, and again he was tugging hard at the oar: in short, he seemed to be the chief instrument of deliverance.

"Having pulled up as far as they could in the still water, they approached the desperate current formerly noticed as having swept away the two elms, and fearlessly dashed into its tumultuous waves. For a moment the spectators were in the most anxious doubt as to the result; for, though none could pull a stronger oar, yet the boat, in crossing a distance equal to its own length, was swept down 200 yards. Ten yards more would have dashed them to atoms on the lower stone wall. But they were now in comparatively quiet water; and availing themselves of this, they pulled up again to the park, in the space between two currents, and passed, with a little less difficulty, though in the same manner, the second and third streams, and at length reached the houses. The spectators gave them three hearty cheers. By this time the Kerrs had been left scarcely three feet of ground to stand on, under the back wall of the houses. A pleasing sight it was to see the boat touch that tiny strand, and the despairing family taken on board. After they were safely stowed, Yellow-Waistcoat was observed wading, and sounding his way with a pole, till he reached the west end of the building, where he pounced upon an enormous hog, which he lugged down to the boat, and threw it in as easily as if it had been a rabbit. 'My indignation was stirred up against the Kerrs,' said Mr Suter, 'thinking that, at such a time, they could have thought of risking Munro's life for such a purpose. But I was afterwards pleased to learn, that it was to preserve "poor Widow Ross's moo, which was a' that was noo left till her.'"

"How anxiously did the spectators watch every motion of the little boat that was now so crowded as very much to impede the rowers! They crossed the two first streams, and finally drew up for the last and dreadful trial. There the frail bark was again whirled down; and, notwithstanding all their exertions, the stern just touched the wall. The prow, however, was in stiller water; one desperate pull; she sprang forward in safety, and a few more strokes of the oar landed the poor people amongst 50 or 60 of their assembled friends. Then was there a meeting between parents and son! What gratulations! What greetings and embraces! What grappling of hearts and molarure of eyes ensued! All crowded round them to obtain one squeeze of their hands.

"Hoot toot, nonsense!" cried the weather-beaten Rodney, dashing his rough hand across his eyes, 'What's this o't? Toots! I canna stand this mair than you, bairns. Od I maun just greet it out.'"

Old Kerr's account of himself and family during the danger is interesting, and droll and comical enough too;—but we must look after Funn's. Again, Yellow-Waistcoat and his gallant fellows plied their oars, on the work of deliverance. And first they rescued from death, in a lonely cottage among the alders, a little way above the blown-up bridge, three helpless old women, one of them for years bedrid. They were found sitting on chairs, placed in a wooden roofed bed, nearly dead with cold, and could not have existed many hours longer. Yellow-Waistcoat and Sergeant Grant lifted them out of the window, and ere long Mr Suter was restoring them to life by Glenlivet. He did not forget to hand a caulker to their deliverers, and offered Sergeant Grant a second dram. "Na, I thank ye, sir," said the Sergeant, eyeing it askance, and retreating beyond the influence of its temptation; "I like it ower weel; and if I tak it I may forget mysell, an', God kens, we need to hae a' our wits about us the day. But an we get a' the poor folk safe, I'se no say but I'se get fou." Well said, noble fellow—let the Temperance Society preach from that text!

The boat was again manned, John Smith, who had himself been rescued from the Earnhill Island, being one of the crew, and Yellow-Waistcoat at his post. In attempting to row across to the Moy embankment for a larger boat lying there, they were swamped; but being carried into smooth water, by wading shoulder to shoulder, and shoulder deep, they reached the large boat and soon righted the small one. From the top of a wall, they tried to drag the large boat through a gateway, but it swamped and went down. Wading with only their heads above water, they again reached the small boat, which they had tied to a pillar of the gate, and, rowing along the road, disappeared behind a plantation. The small boat soon swamped, and the brave crew saved themselves by providentially catching and clinging to a haycock that happened to be floating past at the moment! They were carried along with it till it stuck in some young alder-trees, where each of them grasped a bough, and the haycock sailed away, leaving them, where those on shore could just see them at times endeavouring to support themselves among the weak and brittle branches.

"Send for a boat!" was the first sentence that came from them. "What has become of your own?" shouted some one in return. "A boat! a boat!—send for a bo-o-out," was the only response. Some thoughtless creature among the crowd belated out, "Why don't you use your own bo-o-out?" There was a degree of mimicry in the tone of his voice that excited a momentary smile; but the next instant a hoarse murmur of disapprobation went round, and the abashed caitiff slunk away behind backs, to shun the general indignation he had excited. For two hours these brave men hung there, and a thousand schemes were proposed for their rescue, and all successively rejected. Towards five o'clock, Dr Brands and Sergeant Grant had already got ropes, and were preparing to make the hazardous attempt of swimming to their aid, when, to the astonishment and joy of all assembled, they beheld Yellow-Waistcoat baling out the water from the boat with his straw-hat, and soon afterwards they were seen pulling along the road, and making for the bridge of Moy. On their way thither, they were the means of saving Betty Findlay, the celebrated biscuit-baker, who, in endeavouring to wade across the bridge, was swept off her feet, and was floating down, supported by the buoyancy of her outspread drapery, when they fortunately caught and rescued her.

"The circumstances attending the recovery of the boat, are fully equal to most of those conveniently marvellous coincidences so servicable to novelists. William Smith, being unable to hold on longer by the boughs, let himself gently down into the water, with the hope of finding bottom. 'I feel the boat!' shouted he to his companions; and, strange as it may seem, the small boat, which had last swamped with them, had actually drifted to the root of the very tree whither fortune had carried them! But this was not all. Some salmon-nets and ropes had also, by the strangest accident, been lodged there. One of these Smith contrived to pull up with his foot, and making a noose, and slipping it on his great toe, he descended once more, and managed to fix the rope round the stern of the boat. Having passed the rope over a high branch of a tree, he threw the end of it to his companions. 'Now, haul upon that, my lads!' cried he, with great glee, and, joining with them in chorus, they, with much trouble, succeeded in righting the boat. The oars being fixed to the side with iron pins, were all safe. Mr Suter ordered the men up to the house for warmth and refreshment."

Again the boat was manned and launched on the flood—for the Broom of Moy. Dr Brands was one of the gallant crew. The first house they made for was that occupied by a family of the name of Cumins, consisting of a poor invalid old man, father-in-law to Funns, his wife, nearly as infirm, their daughter an elderly woman, and her son, a boy. At first the silence seemed to denote death. But there the whole family were, roosted like fowls on the beams of the roof. They were all half-dead with cold; and the old man's mind being too much enfeebled to withstand the horrors, was now utterly deranged. The next house of the hamlet the boat went to was that of the Widow Speediman, an old bed-ridden woman, with whom resided her niece, Isabella Morrison, an elderly person. What follows is worth reading,—and William Shakspeare's fiction never surpassed Isabella Morrison's truth:—

"One of the walls of this house was gone, and the roof was only kept up by resting on a wooden boarded bed. Here those in the boat beheld a most harrowing spectacle. Up to the neck in water, sat the niece, scarcely sensible, and supporting what was now the dead body of her aunt, with the livid and distorted countenance of the old woman raised up before her. The story will be best told in her own words, though at the risk of some prolixity.

"'It was about eight o'clock, an' my aunty in her bed, fan I says till her, "Aunty, the waters are cumin' aboot's;" an' I had hardly spoken fan thy wur at my back. "Gang to my kist," says she to me, "and tak oot some things that are to be pit aboot me fan I'm dead." I had hardly tukken oot the claes fan the kist was floated bodalie through the hoos. "Gie me a haud o' your hand, Bell," says my aunty, "an' I'll try an' help ye into the bed." "Ye're nae fit to help me," says I, "I'll tak a haud o' the stoop o' the bed." And see I gat in. I think we war strugglin' i' the bed for about twa hours; and the water floatit up the caufbed, and she lyin' on't. Syne I tried to keep her up, an' I took a hand o' her shift to try to keep her life in. But the waters war ay growin'. At last I got her up wi' ae haun to my breest, and held a haud o' the post o' the bed with the ither. An' there wuz ae jaw o' the water that cam' up to my breest, an' anither jaw cam' an' fuppit my aunty oot o' my airins. "Oh! Bell, I'm gane!" says she; and the waters just chokit her. It wuz a dreadful sight to see her! That wuz the fight and struggle she had for life! Willin' wuz she to save that! An' her haun, your honour! hoo she fought wi' that haun! It wad hae drawn tears o' pity frae a heathen! An' then I had a dreadful spekalation for my ain life, an' I canna tell the conseederable moments I was doon in the water, an' my aunty abeen me. The strength o' the waters at last brak the bed, an' I got to the tap o't; an' a dreadful jaw knockit my head to the bed-post; an' I wuz for some time oot o' my senses. It was surely the death-grip I had o' the post; an' surely it wuz the Lord that waukened me, for the dead sleep had cum'd on me, an' I wud hae faun, and been droont in the waters! After I cam' to mysell a wee, I felt something at my fit, an' I says to mysell, This is my aunty's head that the waters hae torn aff! I felt wi' my haun, an tuk haud o't wi' fear an' trumlin'; an' thankful was I fan I faund it to be naething but a droont hen! Aweel, I climbed up, an' got a haud o' the cupple, an' my fit on the tap o' the wa', and susteened mysell that way frae maybe about half-past ten that night till three next afterneen. I suppose it wuz 12 o'clock o' the day before I saw my aunty again, after we had gane doon thegither, an' the dreadful ocean aboot huz, just like a roarin' sea. She was left on a bank o' sand, leanin' on her side, and her mouth was sou o' san'. Fouk wondered I didna dee o' cauld an' hunger; but balth could an' hunger ware unkent by me, wi' the terrification I wuz in wi' the roarin' o' the waters aboot me, Lord save me!*

"The corpse of the poor old woman Speedlman was put into a cart, together with her niece Bell, whose state of exhaustion was so great, that it was difficult to tell which was the living, and which the dead, body."

The boat next rescued three old women, one of whom died, in Elgin hospital, of dropsy, brought on by cold and wet. Then a family of the name of Monro were relieved, but the horrors of that dreadful day affected Mrs Monro's mental, as well as bodily health.

It was now about six o'clock in the evening, and Funns and family had for four-and-twenty hours been in peril. During all these rescues they had been seen far over in the midst of the inundation, clustered like flies on their little speck of land. The boat of the deliverers had gone to the rescue of those within easiest reach, or had been forced to obey the flood. Funns had never been for a moment forgotten, and it was now his turn to be saved. Through the wide inundation that surrounded the tiny spot where that family stood, five tremendously tumultuous streams raged furiously with elevated waves. The moment the boat dashed into the first of these, it was whirled down for a great way; but having once got through it, the bold crew pulled up in the quiet water beyond to prepare for the next, and in doing so, Sergeant Grant stood in the prow, with a long rope, the end of which was fixed to the boat, and whenever he thought he had footing, he jumped out, and dragged them up, and thus, finally, they reached Funns, and after many dangers, all the family were brought to Moy-House. The youngest daughter fainted on being brought near the fire; and on the wise suggestion of Dr Brands, as sensible as brave, to restore the animal temperature she was put into Mrs Suter's bed, already occupied by "five bairns;" and warm wine, and warm broth, and a good night's sleep perfectly restored her to strength.

Reader, weep for the poor Cumins's. You have seen that poor, frail, and both bodily and mentally infirm couple rescued from death in their cottage in the Broom of Moy. In the appendix flood of the 27th, they were again nearly drowned in their bed in a cottage near the burn of Rauls-mill—but were saved. Here is a picture of human nature:—

"A lady, who felt a charitable interest in those poor people, visited them at the Broom of Moy, after the subsidence of the flood. She found the old man lying on a damp bed, under a defenceless roof, exposed to wind and rain. His moans were unceasing, save when his wandering mind led him to talk wildly of drowning, and of the water being at his feet. His wife, scarcely less imbecile, sat rocking herself to and fro on a low seat, called a Sunkie, before a fire, which she in vain tried to make burn, complaining to herself of a hurt in one of her legs, received at the time the flood filled the house, when the daughter, by an almost miraculous exertion of strength, raised her parents and her son up to the place whence they were rescued. Unconscious whence the blessing came, the poor creatures eagerly drank the wine the lady had brought them; and when, a little afterwards, she looked for the bottle, that she might give a glass to their daughter, she found that, with the selfishness dotage sometimes brings with it, the old woman had contrived to hide it in a corner of her bed. Their daughter, who is quite deaf, was employed in digging various articles out of the sand. Her hand had been severely cut by an adze, while in the act of dragging up her parents from danger. 'It will be o' nae use,' said she, refusing to have it bound up, 'for I maun ay be dabling.' It was the lady I allude to who made them comfortable in the cottage, where they were disturbed by the flood of the 27th. But the succession of miseries to which they have been exposed, have not been without their good result, since they have but widened that field for benevolent exertion, in which a truly angelic mind delights to occupy itself."

* This poor woman has since become a perfect cripple from rheumatism.

We have not room to accompany Sir Thomas in his account of all the incidents of the flood on the plain of Forres, on the right bank of the Findhorn, to the seaport. These details are nearly as interesting as those we have now abridged. The devastations of the burn of Forres were identified with those of the Findhorn. But higher up, it did much damage to Altyre, the beautiful seat of Sir William Cumming. The house was surrounded, and the greatest alarm excited. The splendid groups of rare evergreens, and other shrubs of magnificent growth, that decorate the lawn, were sorely ravaged. The havoc on the dressed banks, and among the extensive walks and shrubberies, was ruinous; and in the lower, or kitchen-garden, the current carried off the gardener on one of his melon frames, to take an aquatic excursion among his gooseberrybushes and cauliflowers. But no lives were lost—nor yet put into jeopardy—and nature will, in a few seasons, restore Altyre to all its original beauty.

The SPEY holds, says Sir Thomas, the third place among Scottish rivers. But we say, how may the examining masters decide to whom the gold medal shall be assigned, when the candidates that flow for honours are the Tweed, the Clyde, the Spey, the Tay, and the Dee? Is it to be given to the greatest volume of water? In that case, perhaps, they might measure the performances or essays of competitors, and by a mere arithmetical process decide the prize. But how impossible a right decision becomes, when they have to compare the depth of the impression, the purity of the sheet, the breadth of the margin, and the variety, beauty, splendour, and magnificence of the binding! Therefore, we say, let them all be bracketted, and declared, without any invidious degrees, the First Floods of their year. Strathspey! Music and dance are in that glorious spondee—and who has not heard of that many-footed metre, the Reel o' Tullochgorum? The Spey in spate seems, indeed, the serpent that stopped the march of the Roman legions. Swim the Spey in spate! No—not a whale could perform that feat from pole to pole. A Triton among the minnows there would wish himself a Leviathan among the cods of the ocean-stream. He would find himself in worse straits there than those of Davis, and would be feeble as a frog. A herd of wild elephants would be hurried down its flood like so many auld wives' bauchles—and mammoths and mastodontons like so many Highland bonnets. On the 4th of August, you might have heard his thunder in a balloon high up in heaven as the topmost peak of Chimborazo. No cloud dared to bang above him on that day; but all the sky was black with fear as with night; and nothing but a lurid glimmer through the "water-bleared horizon," denoted that there was a sun. No wonder his main battle was terrific, when all his tributaries joined in—wild tribes and grim—from the cliffs and cataracts, and all in one close column, headed by General Conster-nation, bore downwards to the sea.

"Their floods were a thousand, their thunders were one."

There, floated and tossed the blood-red banners of the vassal chieftains of King Spey—the Feshie, the Dalraddy, the Druie, the Dorback, the Dulan, the Duthel, the Craggan, the Tilchen, the Aven, the Conglass, the Livat, the Tomore, the Knockando, the Dullen, the Fiddich—famous all among the Grampian peerage, and celebrated in the songs of Echo since the birth of time. In the words of Professor Wilson,

“ A regal flood, that, born amid the hills, Sweeps on unseen through many a darksome glen,

Till join'd by all his tributary rills,

From loch, from tarn, from marish, and from fen,

He leaves his empire with a kingly glee,
And fiercely bids recoil the billows of the

About Belville, on the Invereshie estate, the Spey flooded the meadows, five miles long and one broad. All the while the heavens were in deluge, the north-east wind blew great guns,—frequent were the flashes of lightning, but there was no thunder. The Feshie—fordable two days before to the lambs, separated from their mother in heedless play—rolled down rocks, while trees floated in it like feathers. A house full of people was flooded four feet high, when, in defiance of the tremendous rush of water, a few such Highlanders as fought at Quatre-bras and Waterloo, entered, as Highlanders are wont to do in trying circumstances, shoulder to shoulder, and rescued them all, one by one, from peril proved to be imminent by the sudden disappearance of a large saw-mill. The romantic old bridge at Invereshie, though flooded three feet above the keystone, stood fast, while huge masses of micaceous rock below were rent away, and buried a hundred yards off under heaps of gravel. The Feshie then smote some strong stone bulwarks into shivers,—overflowed and destroyed the whole low grounds of Dalnavert,—excavated for itself a new channel in less time than it would have cost all the pioneers of a large army of us men,—and left an island between it and the Spey of two hundred acres. Here the Dalraddy behaved most generously to one Mrs Cumming. After the flood had subsided, she found, on Tuesday afternoon, at the back of the house, all lying in a heap, a handsome dish of trout, a pike, a hare, a partridge, a dish of potatoes, and a dish of turnips, all deposited there by the Dalraddy, except a turkey, which, alas! was one of her own favourite flock. Sir Thomas describes an amusing conversation he held hereabouts, some time after the flood, with one Widow Cameron:

“ The Abernethy road runs across the edge of this sweep of the flat. I was struck by the failure of one of its conduit bridges, and seeing the remains of river-wreck on the edge of the moor, and being incredulous that the inundation could have spread so far, I turned aside to the house of Widow Cameron, who gave me the history of her disasters. ‘ Ou, sir,’ said she, ‘ ye see, Spey was just in one sea a’ the way frae Tullochgorum yonder, on the tither side o’ the strath, to thay muiry hillocks out by there, ayont the King’s road forenent us; and, or e’er we kent whar we war, the water was a’ in aboot huz, and up four or five feet in our houses; an’ it destroyed a’ our meal, and floated aff oor peat-stacks—see till some o’ the peats lying oot on yon hillock-side yonder, twa hunder yaids frae whar we’re stannin’. I was feared oot o’ my judgment for my bairns, and sae I but to be oot o’ this wi’ them.’—‘ And how did you escape?’ demanded I with the greatest anxiety. ‘ Ou, troth, just upon a brander;’ replied Mrs Cameron. ‘ A brander!’ exclaimed I with astonishment, arising from my ignorance that the word was applied to any thing else than a Scotch gridiron, and thinking that the riding to the moon on a broom, or the sailing in a sieve to Norway, were nothing to this; ‘ A brander! what do you mean by a brander?’—‘ Ou, just a bit float,’ replied the widow; ‘ a bit raft I made o’ thay bit palins and bits o’ moss-fir that war lyin’ aboot.’—‘ What! and your children too?’ exclaimed I. ‘ Ou, what else!’ replied she, amused at my surprise; ‘ what could I hae done wi’ them else? nae horse could hae come near huz. It was deep enough to droon twa horses.’—‘ And how did you feather yourself over?’ enquired I. ‘ Troth, sir, I hae nae feathers,’ replied Mrs Cameron, very simply; ‘ I’m no a dewk to soom. But, ye see, I sat on my hunkers on the middle o’ the brander, wi’ my bairns a’ aboot me, in a knot; and the wind, that was blawin’ strong eneugh frae the north, just teuk us safe oot to the land.’—‘ And how did your neighbours get out?’ asked I. ‘ Ou, fat way had they get oot, but a’ thegither upon branders;’ replied Mrs Cameron.—Let the reader fancy to himself this fleet of branders, with their crews of women and children, floating gallantly vent en poupe, towards the land, and he will have before his mind's eye a scene fully as remarkable as any which this eventful flood produced."

The Nethey did wonders. Barns and cow-houses sank before it—of dwelling-houses and bridges it made no bones—embankments it shoved aside, and trees it tore up, and brandished their roots in the sky. It is the great medium of transport to the Spey, of the timber from the magnificent pine forests that cover that district. To facilitate this, a cut was made, a good many years ago, at great expense, through the moss of Cluihaig. The banks are from 10 to 15 feet deep, and six or eight strata of roots of trees are to be seen on its sides, in the natural position, all the growth of successive ages. The trunks of some lie horizontally embedded in the moss; others have evidently been burnt to the surface. In one part of the bank, the lowest stratum is of birch roots, about two feet above the gravel the moss rests on, then some three successive strata of fir roots, 18 inches apart; then another stratum of birch roots, and above that, one or two more of fir; and, lastly, there are firs now rooted and growing on the surface, but small and stunted, called darracks. In the evening of the 3d of August, the Nethey burst its bulwarks, demolished this work, and returned to its former and natural channel. One word of the Dorback that joins the Nethey at Dell.

"Alexander Fraser, the fox-hunter, at the Drum of Dorback, a place, in an out-of-the-way corner, far up its stream, had his house situated some 12 feet above the level of the water. 'I thought nothing,' said he, when telling the story himself, 'of the height o' the water on the Monday night, until about the gloamin', when down she cam', in a few minutes' space, fearfully upon us. First she struck the gable o' the byre, and it went. Syne the gable o' the firehouse partly fell, an' the water began to come in on us at sic a rate, that I made haste to get oot the wife and the sax bairns, the auldest o' them nae mair than twal year auld. Wi' some ado I carried them to the bare braeside. I then steekit the door o' the hoose, to haud oot as muckle o' the water as possible, and made a hole through the back o't, to lat oot what was in.' Syne, wi' the help o' some neebours, I got oot a muckle kist o' drawers, and twa cloth kists. By this time the furniture was going fast, and we tied a strong rope to a new bed, but we had hardly done that, when the water cam' and carried off bed and house and a'thegither. Syne the barn, fu' o' corn, and a' kind o' farming tools and gear, gaed aff too. For lang, the wife and bairns clang to the bank, seein' a' thing t' en awa', cauld and weat as wund and water could mak them, ill wullin' to leave it till the last. But, when the last houp, the hoose, was gane, I got them carried aff to a neebour's barn. It was a' we could do to get to the bank after the hoose was gane, standin' as it did on a wee bit plain by the waterside. But that, and my garden, field, and corn-yard, are a' gane to the sea, and the place is noo a bare claddoch, without a vestige o' any thing that might gar ye believe it had ever been the bield o' any human creature."

But to return to the Nethey. At some distance below the Dell of Abernethy, lay the Iron Mill Croft, which, nearly a century ago, received that name from the mills erected there by a branch of the York Buildings Company, who had purchased for L.7000 a portion of the forest of Abernethy, and carried on their operations on a magnificent scale. They employed 120 working horses at their saw-mills and iron-mills, with all implements and apparatus of the most expensive sorts. They used to display their vanity by bonfires, tar-barrels, and hogsheads of brandy to the country people. They had a commissary for provisions and forage, and finally went off deep in debt to the proprietors and the country. A few large cast-iron pillars and iron beams were, up to the 4th of August 1829, all that told where that Troy once stood. But the Nethey, inspired with a sudden antiquarian zeal, laid open to day the buried secrets of the Iron Mill Croft, and divulged the origin of its name.

"Such was the state of things, when the flood of the 3d and 4th of August scooped out a new and very broad channel for the river, right through the arable croft, and a part of the alder grove, excavating it to the depth of six or eight feet. Under this, and in the middle of its new channel, to the astonishment of every one who has seen it, appear the lying beams or frame-work of a gangway across the water. A platform on the left of the sketch, which is nicely jointed and morticed together, seems to have been the foundation of the mill-house. There seem to have been upright posts in some of the beams, probably to support a platform above; the sluices for conveying water to the works, and for the escape of flow-water, appear to have been between these upright posts. The whole timber is perfectly fresh, and the mortice ends of the beams are all carefully numbered with the axe. The haugh above, must have formed a reservoir for supplying the machinery with water. On the brow of the high right bank of the Nethey, the flood has exposed a bed of charcoal 18 inches thick, probably deposited there for the use of the smelting works. A fine spring of water, issuing from the left bank of the river, immediately opposite to the site of the Iron-mill, is known to this day by the name of Crowley's Well, from a certain John Crowley, one of the workmen who constructed it, and that with much trouble and care in its formation and embellishment, as has been made more apparent by the operation of the flood. This has brought into view a wooden spout, laid along the base of the bank, some two feet below the surface, with an inclination downwards towards the well, thereby collecting all the springs within its range to one point. There is a flagstone, laid endwise in front, with a bore of two inches diameter, through which the water flows; and, not many years ago, an iron spout, inserted in this bore, allowed vessels to be filled with ease, without disturbing the well. The lower haugh is said to have been wholly occupied by the Company's gardens and houses. People say that a considerable quantity of silver-plate was found in a cellar there, together with several other heavy articles of value, which they could not carry away with them, in the hasty moonlight retreat they were forced to make.

"The excavations of the river Nethey, on the Iron Mill Croft, are extremely interesting to the geologist. We have here the history of the operations of a river for exactly a century. At this time, 100 years ago, the English company were pounding iron-ore with their ponderous hammers, moved by active machinery, in the bed of the river Nethey. These actors move off the stage, bonfires, tar-barrels, and all, and the river, in some of its floods, soon obliterates all traces of them or of their works, by filling up its bed with rounded masses of stone, mingled with gravel, and so, by shutting itself out of one channel, compelling its stream to seek another, considerably to the westward. But floods succeed floods; and the quieter portions of each successive inundation spread over the ground, where, by degrees, they deposit a deep and fertile soil, forming a rich haugh of land, the surface of which is six or eight feet above the level of the ground the works stood on. The greater part of this beautiful flat is subjected to tillage, whilst the seeds of some neighbouring alder trees find their way into a portion of it, and spring up into a grove. The trees grow till they become tall and majestic; and agricultural labour goes on, till the Iron-mill is as much forgotten as the face and figure of John Crowley who worked in it; when comes the flood of the 3d and 4th of August last, tears off the shroud that covered it, and brings all back again to light save the busy human beings who once animated the scene."

The inhabitants at Bridge of Nethey had a narrow escape. The river, that here meandered on its course, suddenly shot into one broad, straight line of destruction, on both sides annihilating the haughs. Gardens and cottages sank before it, and the ground and gravel being scooped out to an immense depth, all communication was cut off with the west end of the bridge. It was covered with people, whom the novelty and grandeur of the sight seems to have stupefied to the sense of danger, as the immense roaring river continued to bring down large trees, and to toss them up perpendicularly, when all at once the enormous mass of timber buildings, composing the saw-mill of Straanbeg, about 500 yards above, moved bodily off, steadily and magnificently, like a three-decker leaving dock. Destruction seemed inevitable to all palsy-stricken in fear, when all at once it struck upon a bulwark, went to pieces with a crash, and spreading itself abroad over the surface of the waters, it rushed down the Spey in one sea of wreck! The grey granite bridge, of solidity that promised endurance for ages, lost its western arch, was shook to its centre, and gravelled up above its spring—not even the sites of several saw-mills remained—and to clear the channel of the immense quantity of large stones left in it, must be the work of years. Captain Macdonald of Coulmakyle, whose house is situated in the angle between the right bank of the Nethey and the right bank of the Spey, said, that the flood around "put him in mind of Spithead in a gale, and that he was satisfied he could have sailed a fifty-gun ship from the Boat of Bellfurth to the Boat of Gartin, a distance of seven or eight miles!"

The Dulan's exploits were pretty much on a par with those of the Nethey. Let one suffice. It attacked the bridge of Carr, of a single arch of 65 feet span, and such was the force of the immense body of water, that, according to the relation of an eye-witness, the moment the support of the undermined southern abutment gave way, it made the arch spring fifteen feet into the air!

The old military bridge of Spey, below Grantown, rose with a steep ascent from the low left to the high right bank, and had its roadway and northern wing walls heightened, which occasioned such a concentration of the power of the stream, that the least of the three arches gave way, all except about three feet, which supported the spandral and parapet walls on the lower side. Here is an amusing picture:—

"On Wednesday, the 5th of August, Mr Peter Forbes, farmer at Urlarmore, on the south side of Livat, dispatched his servant, Donald Cameron, a tall, handsome, athletic man, about twenty-five years of age, to carry a message to Mrs Forbes, then at Aitnoch, near the banks of the Findhorn. On arriving at the Bridge of Spey, and seeing its state, he quietly mounted the extremely narrow parapet. The river was still raging in all the fury of flood, and loud were the cries and expostulations of the spectators. Disregarding these, however, but without saying one word, Donald coolly and steadily walked onwards, with an air of perfect complacency, till he came to that part where there was a gap in the masonry of forty feet, save in the single parapet alone. The increased cries of the beholders were luckily drowned by the roaring of the surges. Donald staid but one moment to cast his plaid more tightly about him, and again continued his dangerous path to the farther end of the parapet, where, leaping lightly down, he pursued his way without once looking over his shoulder for applause, or showing the slightest symptom of being conscious that he had achieved any thing extraordinary. A certain shop-keeper in Grantown, too, nicknamed Dear Peter, pressed by the urgency of some favourable chance of sale, did also essay the adventure of the perilous parapet. But, having a large pack on his back, he took the good mercantile precaution of doubling his security, by planting four legs instead of two under him. Squatted on hands and knees, Peter pursued his path, whilst his pack kept vibrating to and fro, like the pendulum of a clock, his features being, all the while, twisted in an opposite direction to that of his load. The spectators, notwithstanding their anxiety for their Dear Peter, were convulsed with laughter, till their shouts, mingled with the thunders of the Spey, had nearly made him lose his balance. But, with all his terror, he stuck to his pack, resolving, that if he did go, he should carry his goods with him. At last, however, he succeeded in carrying all safe to the opposite side, amidst the cheers of the multitude."

It pleases us to see that our old friend the Aven was not behind-hand with the best of them in his exploits. What the general character of these exploits were, may be conjectured from one circumstance alone—that he utterly destroyed about 600 acres of the best soil in all the Strath. We beg Sir Thomas to have the goodness to decide a bet—for a rump and dozen—between the Ettrick Shepherd and us about the origin of the Aven. We maintain, that the loch out of which he flows is a very small one, perhaps a mile or two in circumference; and the Shepherd swears he walked along its banks great part of a summer day without seeing the end of it. According to him, Loch Aven is between thirty and forty miles long, with many islands, and its bayed banks overshadowed with forests. Had he confined his assertion to a note to one of the fine ballads in the Queen's Wake, we should have said nothing, as poets have the privilege of lying in their written inspiration to the full length of any imaginable tether. But James swears to this longitude in private—at the Round Table of the Noctes—and, with violent gesticulations, maintains his Mediterranean. Sir Thomas paints a fine picture of the scene:—

"The River Aven, tributary to the Spey at Ballindalloch on the right bank, has its source in the very bosom of the Cairngorum Mountains,—a circumstance that sufficiently accounts for the very wide ravine it committed during the flood. Its lonely crystal lake is surrounded by frightful precipices, rising on all sides, sheer up, almost to the very ridges of those towering heaps which are now admitted to be higher than any land in Great Britain,

Nothing in our island can approach so near to the wilder and more savage parts of Swiss scenery. Cairngorm and Beinn-bhainne rise almost perpendicularly from its western and northern edges; and the vast foundations of Benmacdui and Beinn-main overhang its southern extremity, in frightful masses, that seem as if poised for immediate projection into the valley; so that, for several of the winter months, the sun never shines on the surface of the lake. These are the sources of the pure and transparent Aven, the glaciers which hang in their ample bosoms furnishing exhaustless supplies to its stream, by means of the cataracts they continually pour down into it. All traces of man are lost amid the grandeur of these regions. No tree or shrub is to be seen; and no living creature, save when the eagle soars from the verge of the cliff athwart the vacant ether, awakening the echoes with his scream, or when the ptarmigan flutters its low flight across the mountain brow, or perhaps when some straggling deer from the Forest of Mar,

'That from the hunter's aim hath ta'en a hurt,
May come to languish.'

But this the Shepherd will not confess to be decisive of his fiction. And therefore we again request Sir Thomas to send us the dimensions of the loch—and we need not add, that his assistance at the dinner will be most delightful to the Knights of St Ambrose.

Ballindalloch, the beautiful estate and seat of Mr Macpherson Grant—sorry are we to say it—suffered sadly from the Aven. On the evening of the 3d, it there suddenly overflowed its banks 700 yards—and during the night the situation of the family was dreadful. The ground-floor, where the dining-room is, had above three feet of water in it; streams were pouring violently through all the vaulted passages of the old mansion, and great part of this period of dread was veiled in the thickest darkness, while the rain and the tempest continued to add to the other horrors. In the morning, it appeared the Aven had established itself within 50 yards of the house—and its former bed was filled up with gravel and enormous stones. Part of the lawn was sliced away—part cut into chasms—and the rest covered with sand, trees, and wreck. The garden was filled four feet deep with sand, leaving the tops of the fruit-trees alone visible. A deep ravine was excavated between the house and the bank—and the whole shrubbery stretching along the base of the bank below the house demolished; and, finally, the flood, bursting across the rich enclosures of the farm, spread devastation over 130 acres of the finest land—18 of which are irrecoverably lost. After the flood all the small birds, there innumerable, left the place; and the lawn trees, which had been flooded round the roots, were immediately struck with the chill of autumn, and prematurely assumed its variegated livery. Many of Mr Macpherson Grant's, fine farms were grievously injured—acres upon acres being swept away. The bench of a saw-mill, eleven and a half feet long, four and a half feet broad, and three and a half feet high, containing two circular saws, and one hundred weight of iron attached to it, was carried down the Spey for twelve miles, and landed uninjured on the Heathery Isle, above Arndilly. And a line of majestic oaks, skirting the water's edge, but high above it, were swept away from the farm of Wearach, and most of them landed on that of Dandaleith, twelve miles below. In the midst of all this overwhelming calamity, the tenants bore their losses with a true Christian temper. Mr Grant, in a letter to Sir Thomas, says, "they talk of nothing but how they are to recover and restore their farms, and have never mentioned the word abatement, leaving that to my decision." Nor did they suffer by so feeling and acting; for Sir Thomas tells us that Mr Grant has made abatements to the full extent of their losses, taking them entirely upon himself, in addition to all he has suffered as proprietor. His loss is calculated at £8000; but the landlord who behaves thus, will never miss his vanished acres, and there will be a blessing on the soil beyond that of human agriculture.

The rapid burn of Tomore descends from the mountain Belriunes, and joins the Aven. There is something sublime in the following picture. It "gives the world assurance of a MAN."

"John Cly, the meal-miller of Tomore, a sturdy, hale, independent-minded old man of 75, has been singularly persecuted by floods, having suffered by that of

1768, and by three or four inundations since, but especially by that of 1783, when his house and mill were carried away, and he was left penniless. He was not a little affected by that calamity which fell upon him, and on no one else; but his indomitable spirit got the better of every thing. About seven years ago he undertook to improve a piece of absolute beach, of two acres, entirely covered with enormous stones and gravel. But John knew that a deep rich soil lay below, buried there by the flood of 1768. He removed the stones with immense labour, formed them into a bulwark and enclosure round the field, trenched down the gravel to the depth of 4 or 5 feet, and brought up the soil, which afterwards produced most luxuriant crops. His neighbours ridiculed his operations while they were in progress, saying that he would never have a crop there. 'Do ye see these ashen trees?' said John, pointing to some vigorous saplings growing near, 'are they no thriving?' It was impossible to deny that they were. 'Well,' continued John, 'if it wunna produce corn, I'll plant it wi' ash-trees, and the laird, at least, will hae the benefit.' The fruits of all John's labours were swept away by the direful flood of the 3d of August. But pride of his heart, as this improvement had been, the flood was not able to sweep away his equanimity and philosophy together with his acres. When some one condoled with him on his loss, 'I took it frae the Awen,' said he, with emphasis, 'and let the Awen hae her ain again.' And, when a gossiping tailor halted at his door one day, charitably to bewail his loss, he cut him short, by pithily remarking, 'Well! if I have lost my croft, I have got a fish-pond in its place, where I can fish independent of any one.' After the year 1783, he built his house on a rock, that shewed itself from under the soil at the base of the bank, bounding the glen of the burn. During the late flood, the water was dashing up at his door, and his sister, who is older than he, having expressed great terror, and proposed they should both fly for it; 'What's the woman afeard o'?' cried John, impatiently, 'hae we not baith the rock o' nature and the Rock of Ages to trust till?—We'll no stir one fit!' John's first exertion after the flood, was to go down to Ballindalloch, to assist the Laird in his distress. There he worked hard for three days, before Mr Grant discovered that he had left his own haystack buried to the top in sand, and insisted on his going home to disinter it. When Mr Grant talked to him of his late calamity, 'Odd, sir,' said he, 'I dinna regard this matter hauf sae muckle as I did that alap i' the aughty-three, for then I was, in a manner, a marked man. Neo we're a sufferin' thegither, an' I'm but neebour-like.' Mr Grant says that the people of this district bear misfortunes with a wonderful degree of philosophy, arising from the circumstance of their being deeply tinged with the doctrine of predestination. I was much gratified by my interview with honest John Cly. Whilst I was sketching him unperceived, Mr Grant was doing his best to occupy his attention. 'Well now, John,' said Mr Grant to him, pointing to an apparently impracticable beach of stones a little way up the glen, 'if you had improved that piece, as I advised you, it would have been safe still, for you see the burn hasn't touched it at all.'—'Na, fegs!' replied John, with a most significant shake of his head, 'gin I had gruppit her in wi' the stanes that cam oot o't, whaur wad she hae been noo, think ye?—Odd, I kent her ower lang.'"

John Cly, we are told, has already begun (months ago—immediately after the disaster,) the restoration of his croft, which he says was a great deal waur i' the seventeen hunder and aughty-three. John! thou art sure of a seat in heaven. We trust there is no heresy in that prediction.

"O mortal man that livest here by toil," there shalt thou have eternal rest!

The flood, both in the Spey and its tributary burn, the Knockando, was terrible at the village of Charles-town of Aberlour. A picture of more sustained harrowing and agonizing passion, than that prevailing through the following passage, we never remember to have met with either in the records of real miseries, in poetry, or in dreams.

"On the 3d of August, Charles Cruickshanks, the innkeeper, had a party of friends in his house. There was no inn-briety, but there was a fiddle; and what Scotsman is he who does not know, that the well-jerked strains of a lively Strathspey have a potent spell in them that goes beyond even the witchery of the bowl? On one who daily inhales the breezes from the musical stream that gives name to the measure, the influence is powerful, and it was that day felt by Cruickshanks with a more than ordinary degree of excitement. He was joyous to a pitch that made his wife grave. I have already noticed the predestinarian principles prevalent in these parts. Mrs Cruickshanks was deeply affected by her husband's unusual jollity.

'Surely my goodman is daft the day,' said she gravely, 'I ne'er saw him dance at sic a rate. Lord grant that he binna fy!'

When the river began to rise rapidly in the evening, Cruickshanks, who had a quantity of wood lying near the mouth of the burn, asked two of his neighbours, James Stewart and James Mackerran, to go and assist him in dragging it out of the water. They readily complied, and Cruickshanks, getting on a loose raft of wood, they followed him, and did what they could in pushing and hauling the pieces of timber ashore, till the stream increased so much, that, with one voice, they declared they would stay no longer, and, making a desperate effort, they plunged over head, and reached the land with the greatest difficulty. They then tried all their eloquence to persuade Cruickshanks to come away, but he was a bold and experienced floater, and laughed at their fears; nay, so utterly reckless was he, that, having now diminished the crazy ill-put-together raft he stood on, till it consisted of a few spars only, he employed himself in trying to catch at and save some haycocks belonging to the clergyman, which were floating past him. But, while his attention was so engaged, the flood was rapidly increasing, till, at last, even his dauntless heart became appalled at its magnitude and fury. 'A horse! a horse!' he loud and anxiously cried; 'Run for one of the minister's horses, and ride in with a rope, else I must go with the stream.' He was quickly obeyed, but ere a horse arrived, the flood had rendered it impossible to approach him.

"Seeing that he must abandon all hope of help in that way, Cruickshanks was now seen, as if summoning up all his resolution and presence of mind, to make the perilous attempt of dashing through the raging current, with his frail and imperfect raft. Grasping more firmly the iron-shod pole he held in his hand, called in floater's language, a sting, he pushed resolutely into it: but he had hardly done so, when the violence of the water wrenched from his hold that which was all he had to depend on. A shriek burst from his friends, as they beheld the wretched raft dart off with him, down the stream, like an arrow from the bowstring. But the mind of Cruickshanks was no common one, to quail before the first approach of danger. He poised himself, and stood balanced, with determination and self-command in his eye, and no sound of fear, or of complaint, was heard to come from him. At the point where the burn met the river, in the ordinary state of both, there grew some trees, now surrounded by deep and strong currents, and far from the land. The raft took a direction towards one of these, and seeing the wide and tumultuous waters of the Spey before him, in which there was no hope that his loosely connected logs could stick one moment together, he coolly prepared himself, and, collecting all his force into one well-timed and well-directed effort, he sprang, caught a tree, and clung among its boughs, whilst the frail raft hurried away from under his foot, was dashed into fragments, and scattered on the bosom of the waves. A shout of joy arose from his anxious friends, for they now deemed him safe; but he uttered no shout in return. Every nerve was strained to procure help. 'A boat!' was the general cry, and some ran this way, and some that, to endeavour to procure one.

"It was now between seven and eight o'clock in the evening. A boat was speedily obtained from Mr Gordon of Aberlour, and, though no one there was very expert in its use, it was quickly manned by people eager to save Cruickshanks from his perilous situation. The current was too terrible about the tree to admit of their nearing it, so as to take him directly into the boat; but their object was to row through the smoother water, to such a distance as might enable them to throw a rope to him, by which means they hoped to drag him to the boat. Frequently did they attempt this, and as frequently were they foiled, even by that which was considered as the gentler part of the stream, for it hurried them past the point whence they wished to make the cast of their rope, and compelled them to row up again by the side to start on each fresh adventure. Often were they carried so much in the direction of the tree, as to be compelled to exert all their strength to pull themselves away from him they would have saved, that they might avoid the vortex that would have caught and swept them to destruction. And often was poor Cruickshanks tantalized with the approach of help, which came but to add to the other miseries of his situation, that of the bitterest disappointment. Yet he bore all calmly. In the transient glimpses they had of him, as they were driven past him, they saw no blenching on his dauntless countenance,—they heard no reproach, no complaint, no sound, but an occasional short exclamation of encouragement to persevere in their friendly endeavours. But the evening wore on, and still they were unsuccessful. It seemed to them that something more than mere natural causes was operating against them. 'His hour is come!' said they, as they regarded one another with looks of awe; 'our struggles are vain.' The courage and the hope which had hitherto supported them began to fail, and the descending shades of night extinguished the last feeble sparks of both, and put an end to their endeavours.

"Fancy alone can picture the horrors that must have crept on the unfortunate man, as, amidst the impenetrable darkness which now prevailed, he became aware of the continued increase of the flood that roared around him, by its gradual advance towards his feet, whilst the rain and the tempest continued to beat more and more dreadfully upon him. That these were long ineffectual in shaking his collected mind, we know from the fact afterwards ascertained, that he actually wound up his watch while in this dreadful situation. But, hearing no more the occasional passing exclamations of those who had been hitherto trying to succour him, he began to shout for help in a voice that became every moment more long-drawn and piteous, as, between the gusts of the tempest, and borne over the thunder of the waters, it fell from time to time on the ears of his clustered friends, and rent the heart of his distracted wife. Ever and anon it came, and hoarser than before, and there was an occasional wildness in his note, and now and then a strange and clamorous repetition for a time, as if despair had inspired him with an unnatural energy. But the shouts became gradually shorter, less audible, and less frequent, till at last their eagerly listening ears could catch them no longer. 'Is he gone!' was the half-whispered question they put to one another, and the smothered responses that were muttered around but too plainly told how much the fears of all were in unison.

"'What was that?' cried his wife in delirious scream—'That was his whistle I heard!' She said truly. A shrill whistle, such as that which is given with the fingers in the mouth, rose again over the loud din of the deluge and the yelling of the storm. He was not yet gone. His voice was but cracked by his frequent exertions to make it heard, and he had now resorted to an easier mode of transmitting to his friends the certainty of his safety. For some time his unhappy wife drew hope from such considerations; but his whistles, as they came more loud and prolonged, pierced the ears of his foreboding friends like the ill-omened cry of some warning spirit; and it may be matter of question whether all believed that the sounds they heard were really mortal. Still they came louder and clearer for a brief space; but at last they were heard no more, save in his frantic wife's fancy, who continued to start as if she still heard them, and to wander about, and to listen, when all but herself were satisfied that she could never hear them again.

"Wet, and weary, and shivering with cold, was this miserable woman, when the tardy dawn of morning beheld her, straining her eyeballs through the imperfect light, towards the trees where Cruickshanks had been last seen. There was something there that looked like the figure of a man, and on that her eyes fixed. But those around her saw, alas! too well, that what she fondly supposed to be her husband was but a bunch of wreck, gathered by the flood into one of the trees, for the one to which he clung had been swept away.

"The body of poor Cruickshanks was found in the afternoon of the next day, on the Haugh of Dandaleith, some four or five miles below. As it had ever been his uniform practice to wind his watch up at night, and as it was discovered to be nearly full wound when it was taken from his pocket, the fact of his having had self-possession enough to obey his usual custom, under circumstances so terrible, is as unquestionable as it is wonderful. It had stopt at a quarter of an hour past 11 o'clock, which would seem to fix that as the fatal moment when the tree was rent away, for when that happened, his struggles amidst the raging waves of the Spey must have been few and short. When the men, who had so unsuccessfully attempted to save him, were talking over the matter, and agreeing that no human help could have availed him, 'I'm thinkin' I could ha' ta'en him out,' said a voice in the circle. All eyes were turned towards the speaker, and a general expression of contempt followed, for it was a boy of the name of John Rainey, a reputed idiot, from the foot of Belrinnies, who spoke. 'You!' cried a dozen voices at once, 'what would you have done, you wise man?'—'I wud hae tied an empty unker-cask to the end o' a lang lang tow, an' I wud hae floated it aff fine near about whur the raft was ta'en first awa', an' syne, ye see, as the stream teuk the raft till the tree, maybe she wud hae ta'en the cask there too,—an' if Charley Cruickshanks had ance gotten a hand o' the rope,'—He would have finished, but his auditors were gone. They had silently slunk away in different directions, one man alone having muttered, as he went, something about 'wisdom coming out of the mouths of fools.'

There is another tale of danger—but of rescue—farther down the Spey, in the plain of Rothes—almost equal to this in intense interest—that of the family of the Riachs. Mrs

Riach, the grandmother, Sir Thomas afterwards saw in her own cottage. How beautifully does he tell the meeting!—

“She had her Bible in her hand, apparently the only wreck of property she had saved; but in that she had found consolation. Her soul had been already well attuned to affliction. In this her widowed state, she had recently lost her son,—and now nearly her all was gone; for, when I visited her farm, not a vestige of new or of old crop was left. The house had indeed been built up, but the offices were still in ruins, a great ravine was dug out between them and the dwelling-house, the surface of the farm was reduced to one waste of devastation,—yet, with all this, pure religion had produced its effect, and the pale mild countenance of the widow, lighted by a celestial smile, met me at her unpretending threshold, wearing the expression of Christian resignation and gratitude, for the merciful salvation which had been vouchsafed to her. There was no lip of complaint,—every word she uttered was expressive of the deep sense she entertained of the goodness of that God, who is ever the widow’s friend, who had so wonderfully preserved herself and those whom she held most dear. One sight of that woman’s face, after having seen and heard the sum-total of her afflictions, was worth a volume of sermons. It is pleasing to think that her lot is cast on an estate where the hearts of both the manager and his constituent are too much fraught with the finer feelings of humanity not to shew the tenderest mercy towards the ‘shorn ewe.’”

As a relief to these deeply tragic, or tenderly pathetic tales, turn to the following humorous scene:—

“The hadgh above the bridge of Lower Craigellachie was very much cut up; and the house and nursery at the south end of the arch are gone. The widow of James Shanks, amidst the loss of her furniture, house, and her son’s garden-ground, lamented nothing so much as her deceased husband’s watch, and his fiddle, on the strings of which hung many a tender recollection. That fiddle, the dulcet strains of which, had come over her ‘like the sweet south breathing upon a bed of violets,’ stealing the tender affections of her virgin heart, till they all centred on her Orpheus Mr James Shanks; that fiddle, to the sprightly notes of which she had so often jerked out her youthful limbs, and whirled round in the wild pirouette of the Highland fling, to the animating tune of Bogan-Lochan; that fiddle, in fine, which had been the fiddle of her fancy, from the heyday of her youth upwards, ‘was gone with the water, and was now, for aught she knew to the contrair, in Norrawa or Denmark!’ The grief of Mrs Shanks for the loss of this valued violin was more than I shall attempt to paint. Great artists often envelope the heads of their chief mourners in drapery, from a conscious inability to do justice to the passion, and so must I hide the lachrymose head of Mrs Shanks. And how indeed shall I describe her joy, some days afterwards, when an idle loon, who had been wandering about the banks of the river ‘findin’ things,’ as he said himself, appeared before her astonished and delighted eyes, with the identical fiddle in his hands? The yell of Mrs Shanks was said, by those who heard it, to resemble the wild shriek with which her husband was wont to inspire additional fury into the heels of the dancers, already excited by the power of his wonderful bow hand. She kissed and hugged the fiddle, and, as if its very contact had music in it, she laid hands on the astonished loon, and went a full round of the floor with him, ending with a fling that surprised every one. The fiddle had been found in the neighbourhood of Arndilly, whither it had merrily floated on the bosom of the waves. But what was yet infinitely more extraordinary, the watch, which had hung in a small bag, suspended by a nail to the post of her bed, was found,—watch, bag, post, and all,—near Fochabers, eight or ten miles below, and was safely restored to its overjoyed owner.”

For some time past our interest has been so riveted to suffering and endangered human life, that we have almost forgotten inanimate objects, except in so far as they were agents instrumental in bringing about the catastrophes of the Tragedies or Comédies Larmoyantes. But now we begin to long for the “dingin’ doon o’ a brig.” The Spey and its tributaries have been sweeping away all this time many of a smaller size, that have sunk in their insignificance like broken bladders. But now we cannot be far off the Bridge of Fochabers, which, we remember well, consisted, last time we had the pleasure of passing along it, of four arches, two of 95 feet, and two of 75 feet span, making a total water-way of 340 feet. Ay, there it is! Lo! one vast undulating expanse of dark-brown water, from the foot of the hill of Beregan to the sea, two miles broad, and ten miles long, strewn with the floating wrecks of nature and of industry, tufted tops of submerged trees, and roofs of houses, to which, here and there, miserable creatures are seen clinging, and heard shrieking to the boats that are plying for their rescue on that maddening loch. It is now eight o'clock on the morning of August 4th, and the flood is 17 feet up on the bridge; but while its great limbs magnificently bestride the roaring stream, which, disturbed by the opposing piers, closes round them in furious vortices, forming a high curved crest from bank to bank, rolling rapidly to the dizzy eye, and to the astounded ear loud as the thunder of heaven or the sea, the crowds of people, who had been looking over the parapets at the wreck, carcases of dead animals, and other bodies which were hurried through, have all run off to the south end, to see the Duke's forester and his men drive piles for the protection of the mound of approach.

"It was now about twenty minutes past twelve o'clock—suddenly a crack, no wider than the cut of a sword, opened across the roadway, immediately over the second arch from the toll-house, about three yards before them, and backwards, parallel with the parapet. 'Good God!' cried Mr Macewan, 'the bridge is falling; run for your lives!' With one cry of alarm, he and his companions sprang forward in the direction of Fochabers. The crack yawned wide ere Mr Russel, one of their number, could step across it. He leaped from the falling ruins, and alighted on that part which was yet firm, with one foot hanging behind him in vacancy. Down went the whole mass of the two arches next the left bank, falling with the loose, shattered, and cloudlike appearance of an avalanche, into the foaming surge below. For the fraction of a moment the furious stream was driven backwards with impetuous recoil, baring its channel to the very bottom, and again rushing onwards, its thundering roar proclaimed its victory, and not a vestige of the fallen fragments was to be seen.

"At the time the alarm was given, William Sivewright, mason; John Cuthbert, slater; and John Anderson, a lame young man, only son of widow Anderson, the toll-keeper, were leaning over the parapet wall. Mrs Anderson, and one of her daughters, had quitted the bridge only a few minutes before. She was sitting by the fire when she heard the terrible crash. 'Oh, my son! my son!' exclaimed she, starting up, 'he's gone! he's gone! my son! my son!—I shall never see him again!' And, rushing out, she stared with a frenzied air on the frightful chasm, wildly repeating the same exclamations. Some of those about her would have persuaded her that her son was on the other side of the river; but the awful truth was too apparent to permit so well-meant a fraud to take effect.

"'I saw them running and waving their hats,' said Sivewright, when narrating the circumstances, 'but before I could guess what they meant, the parapet wall folded round before me, and parted from the roadway, which then seemed whole; but, ere I had time to cry out, it was falling in a thousand pieces, cracking end-long and across from the centre. I sprang sideways past Anderson and Cuthbert, and leaped from fragment to fragment of the falling roadway, as if I had been flying. When I reached the rock I was blind for a moment; and, when I recovered and looked around, Anderson and Cuthbert were gone. In my confusion, I had not at first seen Cuthbert, who now appeared crossing the road. I congratulated him on his escape, and asked him the particulars. "When the brig begud to fa'," said he, "I made a jump to get past, but the shake jostled me over to the tither parapet—a stone struck me, and the road gaed awa' beneath my feet. I then made a claught wi' my hands at the gravel." Luckily for him, it was nearly as hard as a rock, though he did leave the mark of his fingers in it. "When I made the loup," continued Cuthbert, "poor Anderson made a claught at the tail o' my coat. He missed it, and fell on his back. The parapet wall tumbled doon about him, an' I never saw him again." The poor youth's body was found in the evening, about a quarter of a mile below, lying on his back, his greatcoat entangled among some brushwood, and his hands held up, as if to save himself.'

"The shriek that spread along both banks of the river, when the bridge fell, was loud and agonizing. People ran in all directions, clamorously enquiring for friends and relatives. Signals and shouts were exchanged from either bank, to tell of the safety of individuals, and many were the joyous recognitions that took place. The Duke rode in great anxiety to the bridge; but, on seeing Lord Saltoun and Mr Grant on the opposite bank, he waved his hat and gave them a hearty cheer. During the afternoon, the people crowded to the spot from all quarters, and many could not be persuaded that the 'Brig o' Spey' had actually fallen, until they beheld its ruins with 'their ain een.'"

We have now, by quotations, ab-tracts, and abridgements of Sir Thomas's volume, and by occasional description or remark of our own, given our readers, we presume, a full and clear conception of the might and majesty, the pride and peril, of the Great Moray Floods. A thousand humorous incidents, affecting or striking illustrations of general nature, and of individual character, are scattered over the work, which it is impossible for us to collect. The love of property in poor people is, from the necessities of their condition, strong as that of life, and in people not absolutely poor, passionate from the endearing thoughts and feelings that cling to objects in themselves valueless, but, from associations stretching deep and far into the soul, above all price. Many facts proving this truth are narrated by Sir Thomas in a philosophical spirit, but simply and without parade. One old gentleman of the name of M'Intosh, after getting hold "o' something he wad hae done ill wantin'," risked his life to save his "spees." "Trouth," said he to Sir Thomas, "I cou'dna see to read my Bible without them—and mair nor that, they were silver spees, sent me hame in a present frae my son, the Yepiscopeal meenister in Canada." One of the sufferers in the Streets, the morning after the flood, had his heart nearly broken by the fate of his great store-chest. He saw it settled on an opposite bank. But while looking at it with longing eyes, a remorseless eddy swept it away; and after having run the perilous gauntlet of rocks that lined its way thither, it was found afterwards, with only an inch in thickness of the outer part of the meal moistened, about twenty-seven miles below, at the mouth of the Findhorn. But it fell into the hands of the Philistines—the only instance of theft recorded—and crowdly from that chest never cheered the hearts of its former owner's family more. Francis Gibb, from whose farm fifteen acres were swept, observing that the flood was making rapid encroachments on a hill, (and it thought nothing of eating away, in a few hours, three or four hundred feet of bank and brae,) on the brow of which he had some beehives, determined to attempt removing them; an attempt most perilous, from the falling precipices. The ground cracked beneath his feet—but he seized on one hive, and with one bound cleared the chasm, just as the whole mass was quenching its smoking fragments in the flood below. A woman, who, with her husband and family, narrowly escaped from their falling house, was chiefly distressed by the loss of a tubful of clothes. "It just sailed out o' the door," said she, with a melancholy face, "and was whauned afore my very twa een!" A worthy blacksmith, named Maclean, was nearly drowned, by remaining to attend to a favourite sow, that was about to have an accouchement. She kept her reckoning to a minute—and the flood had so inundated the sty in which the fat lady was about to lie in, that her loving master had to carry her up stairs to his own bed, where, at the very height of the Great Moray Flood, she presented him with a beautiful litter of promising young pigs, squeaking in the storm. These, with the mother, who was doing as well as could be expected, and who it was absolutely necessary should be kept quiet, he conveyed to the garret. But had it not been for the timely interruption of James Edwards, shoemaker, Neptune would have been too much for Vulcan. A poor woman, an industrious little shopkeeper, in telling the story of her woes, pathetically said, "We had eneuch ado to escape to the braeside. It took eight o' the stoutest men in the haill country, wi' the risk o' their lives, to get out my kist. We syne saw the waters rise ower the eaves o' our thatch, an' that was the way that a' things was till ten o'clock neist morning, when we came back, an' fund that a' the sma' kinkind o' articles had been floated out o' the back wundo. But waur nor a' that, the haill o' Tam's goode, tea, sugar, an' siclike, war a' gane, and the sugar a' melted!" One curious couple, a Mr and Mrs Yates, amused Sir Thomas by a specimen of conjugal branglement, as he asked them to narrate their misfortunes. When a question was put, the woman opened her mouth to reply, like an impatient turkey, but before she could get out half-a-dozen words, she was silenced by the sharp "Haud yere tongue, woman!" of her husband, who proceeded to deliver the response himself with the gravity of an oracle. He told of a small lake in his farm, which, he assured Sir Thomas, contains a ploughman, his plough, and a yoke of oxen. The man was ploughing in the very field where Mr and Mrs Yates were then reaping, when, scared by a thunderstorm, the animals galloped off with plough and man into the loch. As the oxen are always heard bellowing in bad weather, their tremendous routings on the 3d and 4th of August, quoth the Baronet slyly, may be imagined. A cowherd-boy who slept in a house that was swept away, being asked if he had lost any thing, "Ay," replied he, "I lost twa sarks, and ane o' them was clean too!" In one scene of imminent danger, where peats in black masses, firewood, poultry, and pigs, were all tumbling along, every now and then the young fellows were dashing in, and hauling out huge pigs by the hind legs, or plunging up to the neck after some other live or dead objects. One strapping hizzie who had leapt out of bed up to the hips in water, mistaking the matter entirely, bawled out, "The water's bilin'!" In the midst of a terrified group of grown daughters, who were hanging around her, in a house at Ballater, a place of some resort and fashion, one lady clung to her worthy husband, and their dear papa, till the good man, who was rather corpulent, had been nearly pressed down into the water, by the weight of their united embraces. "Call you this a watering place?" exclaimed he, as he shook himself free from them on reaching a dry spot; "if you catch me coming a-watering again this gate, I'll alloo ye to mak a water-kelpie o' me." In one house, when all the inmates were expecting nothing but death, the water being several feet deep in the room, auld Jean Stronach, fourscore years of age, sat the whole night, "amid a' the jostling, wi' a clockin' hen and a wheen chickens in her apron. Some ane said till her, that she might hae ither things in her mind than a hen and chickens, when she was on the brink of yeternity. 'Poor things,' quo' Jean, 'I cudna thuk o' lettin' them be drowned!'" Another of the doleful party "clam up the lum, an' pat her head oot at the tap, wi' her face as black as a suttymans. 'Oh! Jamie Mill, Jamie Mill,' cried she,

'ye're the blythest sight that ever I saw!'—'Keep us a', is that you, Maggy?' quo' Jamie Mill; 'weel, I've seen blyther sights than you are at this precious moment; but, black though ye be, I maun hae ye oot o' that.' Poor Jeanie Stronach lost five o' her chuckens, as they were draggin' her oot through the water into the boat."

The loss of human life was not great. Besides the deaths already mentioned, one of the most afflicting was that of Mr William Williamson, butcher, of George Street, Aberdeen. He was riding between Kemnay and Monymusk, when his horse started at some wreck that was floating on the road, near a bridge then completely flooded over, by the Bank of Don. The animal leaped over the end of the bridge, and disappeared with his rider in the stream, then ranging along 10 feet deep. His companion was Mr George Williamson, grandson and nameson of the great cattle-dealer so called, well known at every market, from John o' Groat's House to Smithfield, by the name of Stately. With a bravery not often paralleled, he stripped and leaped into the furious flood, diving for his friend in all directions. He got hold of the rein and dragged out the horse; but his rider was irrecoverably lost. This, says Sir Thomas, is perhaps the most gallant action I have to notice; and Mr George Williamson would indeed richly merit some distinguished mark of the approbation of his fellow men. Mr Alexander Don, assistant schoolmaster of Strathdon, on his return from a visit to his relatives at Drumblade, reached the Bank of the Don, about a quarter of a mile below the church. Within a few yards of the ford there was a wooden bridge, along which he might have passed with perfect safety, for it remained uninjured throughout the whole flood. But a strange infatuation seems to have come over him, and pushing his horse into the water without a moment's pause, both were engulfed. His body, found about an hour afterwards, was carried to the house of a poor old woman, but she resolutely resisted its passing across her threshold. The poor creature was overwhelmed by the superstitious dread, by no means uncommon, that the admission of a drowned person into her house was certain to be followed by some fearful calamity. At last she consented to admit it, on condition of its being carried three times round her dwelling. But the charm was but half effectual; for during the night the flood swept off her cottage, though the poor old crone escaped with life. Another life was lost in the Don, in a yet more foolish manner than that of the schoolmaster. A blacksmith undertook, for a bet, to swim across the flooded river, near the Mason-lodge of Glenkindy; but had his strength been that of Hercules, it would have availed him nothing in such a stream. He was whelmed beneath the raging billows, and sunk to rise no more. If he who tempted him to so awful a provocation of Providence, says Sir Thomas, has any human feeling in his bosom, I should say with Douglas, that "happy in my mind was he who died."

Of animals the destruction must have been great. The horses we read of displayed wonderful strength and sagacity in securing their own preservation under the most desperate circumstances—so, we do not doubt, after their own instincts, did the clumsy cows and the silly sheep. Yet the rivers were bloated with carcasses. We read, indeed, of the death but of a single cow—"John Geddes's cow"—and "the thrawsome brute," as he said himself, "was droon'd by her ain obstinacy, for she wad gang nae gait but what she liket." After the flood of the Lossie, a hillock was found covered with the dead and mutilated bodies of an immense number of moles, mice, rabbits, partridges, and hares, which had been trodden into the mire by the hoofs of some affrighted and restless colts driven there for shelter. Many thousands of hares, and rabbits too, were drowned among the furzy patches of ground overflowed by the Spey—and singular enough, and to us a fact new in the natural history of these animals, on the subsiding of the flood, numbers of rabbits were, on different river sides, found alive high up among the branches of trees.

Sir Thomas is decidedly of opinion that these floods greatly exceeded that of the year 1768, or any other in tradition. Old Mr Macintosh of Cuilliachan assured the Baronet that he well remembered the great flood of 1782, or rather, as Sir Thomas suspected, that of 1768—but that any thing like the rain or flood of the 3d or 4th of August he had never seen by five or six feet—"no, nor any one of the oldest people in the glen"—he himself being the "oldest inhabitant." This, considering that the Findhorn filled then the whole width of the glen, was a most prodigious difference. At the Rock of Sourden, where the width from the site of the old castle of Aikenwalls, on the right bank, to the hill on the left of the pass, is 237 feet, the Spey was 20 feet 10 inches above its ordinary level, and 15 inches above the mark made to record its rise in the Great Flood of 1768. Even 15 inches is a great difference over so extensive a space. But the real difference was, in all probability, far more; for in 60 years a great change must have taken place in the depth and capacity of the river's bed, especially in a pass of this kind, where there must be a great rush at all times when the river is full. Indeed, any given quantity of rain must now produce a much greater flood than it could have done before the country became so highly improved. Formerly the rain was either evaporated on the hill side, or sucked up by an arid or a spongy soil, before so much could coalesce as to form a rill. But when we consider the number of open cuts made to dry hill-pasture, the numerous bogs reclaimed by drainage, the ditches of enclosure lately constructed, and the long lines of roads formed with side drains and cross conduits, we shall find, that of late years, the country has been covered with a perfect network, to catch and concentrate the rain as it falls, and to hurry it off in accumulated tributaries to the next stream. In all this we perfectly agree with Sir Thomas; yet, as many brave men lived before Agamemnon, of whom we know nothing, because there was no Homer to sing their deeds, so haply may there have been floods in the olden time in the province of Moray, as illustrious as those of the 3d and 4th of August 1829, the memory of which has perished, because there was no Sir Thomas Lauder Dick to record their achievements.

For the relief of some of the many miseries caused by these floods, a considerable fund has been raised, called the Subscription Flood Fund, which is particularly appropriated to the destitute sufferers in the county of Elgin. On February 20th, 1830, it amounted to nearly L.1500, and owed much to the charitable zeal of Mr Isaac Forsyth of Elgin, Secretary to the Elgin Central Committee of Management. His labours, we are told, have been unremitting and unwearyed; and they cannot fail, says Sir Thomas, to secure him a yet more honourable, though perhaps less extended fame, than rewarded his deceased brother, Joseph, author of the admirable and scholarlike Tour in Italy. The London Morayshire Club were the first to set the example of a subscription; and though the relief afforded by L.1500 to upwards of 3000 sufferers (as appears by Mr Forsyth's statement) must have been but small, yet, under his judicious management, and that of other humane and thoughtful men, it was well-timed; and to virtuous and grateful poverty there is a point of need when there is much blessing in a mite.

We had not room to give a narrative of the noble exertions of the Findhorn boatmen during the Floods. Forty of these fine fellows were engaged in the perilous work of mercy; and not one of them received, or wished to receive, a shilling for their services, by which many lives were saved. But L.20 (it will require L.60) have been set aside as the foundation of a small sum, for the purpose of procuring a silver medal for each man, with his name and services engraven on it; which, with an honest pride, on festive or solemn occasions, could be displayed by himself and his descendants, as a proof of his merits and of the public approbation, and hence become a stimulus, in the little circle of his connexions and acquaintances, to emulate his good conduct, and thus, in a certain degree to elevate the character of this class of the people.

We have little more to say, except that we wish Sir Thomas, in a new edition—and there will be many editions of this book—would try to give a statement of the amount of loss and injury done by these Floods. We wished to do so ourselves from the various items scattered up and down the volume; but we got confused, not being so fond of figures as Joseph Hume, who shewed his skill in arithmetic, and his scrupulous accuracy to the very fraction of a farthing, more conspicuously in that famous Greek affair than in all his appearances put together in Parliament. At the conclusion of the volume, Sir Thomas gives us an admirable summary of the general effects which the Floods have produced on the ancient province of Moray, the chief theatre of their operation. He shews himself thoroughly versed in statistics; and we conclude with hinting to him, that he could not more honourably and usefully employ his talents and his knowledge than in the composition of some important work on the condition and resources of that beautiful province, its antiquities and traditions, the customs and the character of its inhabitants.

THE REIGNING VICE. BOOK VII.

ARGUMENT.

EDUCATION, when properly conducted, the greatest earthly corrective of Selfishness.—Where it has failed of a beneficial effect, every man must commence a course of discipline for himself.—Self-knowledge must precede reformation.—It will shew us that there is a great moral fault in the constitution of our nature.—As a motive to correct this, we must consider how incompatible it is with our situation in the universe, and with our duties to God and man.

As, lured by wealth, the trembling miner braves
The grave-like perils of unfathom'd caves,
With feeble lamp the dark'ning depth explores,
Or hails the gleam of unexpected ores;
From noisome vapours panting turns away,
And now with joy returns to upper day;
So I with anxious toil my paths have wrought
Through the long veins and galleries of thought;
So, tired with evil's noxious breath, I rise
To purer air, and bless the opening skies.

Oh, do not think my satire lends its aid
God's noblest work to lessen and degrade!
Who dares to write on such an impious plan,
Himself deserves not to be rank'd as man.
No! To exalt his nature I would try,
Shew the disease to point the remedy,
And but expose the deeply-seated ill,
To prove it cureless by all mortal skill!
Nor think I seek Religion's aid sublime
To swell the cadence of a sounding rhyme;
If poetry be fiction, I disclaim
The worthless glory of a poet's name.
But Poetry is Truth. Her piercing eye
Sees all things in their primal essence lie.
Ere one bright world in yonder concave glow'd
Her voice in still communion dwelt with God;
When Light and Order rose from chaos dim,
Raptured she sung Creation's morning hymn.
And, when the night of all things darkens round,
Her solemn close shall Nature's requiem sound.
Then who shall dare confound her awful power
With the light meteor of an idle hour?
If she deceive, all Nature is deceit,
And Truth exists not, if she prove a cheat.

O Education! Destiny below,
Stamp of the soul, decree of joy or woe,
What grief were spared, didst thou conspire to bless,
Not join in league with early selfishness!
Forth from ourselves, while new-born reason sleeps,
Like Eve of old, Temptation smiling creeps,
And, scarce contented with our native stain,
In childhood's Eden ruins us again.
Ah, then, when Reason first begins to wake,
And feel the fetters that she cannot break,
Queen of a realm, all anarchy, all storm,
A wild dominion that she did not form,
How sad the scene that asks her stern control!
Gigantic Habit lords it o'er the soul;

Here a rude passion, there a rooted vice,
 Pride, the worst slave, and blind dull Prejudice.
 Then, if she look not for superior aid
 From Him, whose voice the winds and waves obey'd,
 She but ascends her tottering throne too late,
 Like Rome's last monarchs, crown'd in empty state.
 Oh, then ! if manhood's sad and sober truth
 Must quite unteach the lessons of our youth,
 If all the future must unlive the past,
 And slow unravel what was twined in haste,
 If, on the soul, of images imprest
 The first be deepest, timely stamp the best !
 Say, in a home, where heavenly Wisdom guides,
 Where Duty regulates, and Love presides,—
 Where by no heart a selfish joy is known,
 And all weep most for sorrows not their own,—
 Where thorns and roses form one wreath, to dress
 The brow of calm domestic Happiness,
 Could base Self-love an air congenial find,
 Or, as she now enslaves, enslave the mind ?
 From the dove's nest can birds of prey take wing,
 Or Winter follow on the steps of Spring ?
 But thou, whose course from youth has been awry,
 Rouse all thy powers,—To yield were but to die !
 For thee, though harsher discipline remains,
 More glorious wreaths shall crown thy sterner pains.
 Wouldst thou rebuild thy heart, all pride o'erthrown,
 First lay Self-knowledge as the corner-stone.
 Of things above thee, what can be reveal'd,
 If all within thee be a world conceal'd ?
 His bosom's eye shall vainly lifted be
 To see his God, himself who cannot see.
 Why shrink from deeper scrutiny within,
 If not from trembling consciousness of sin ?
 If man's pure soul were Virtue's genial soil,
 To trace her myriad paths were pleasant toil,
 To range her flowers, her thousand fruits partake,
 Without one fear the lurking asp to wake.
 How oft for this we lonely hours should spend,
 Shut out the world, exclude our dearest friend,
 Turn with dull ear from Flattery's sweetest lays,
 To listen to our heart's sincerer praise,
 Forsake the sciences, ourselves to scan,
 And shut our books to read the inward man !

Thou, who to mortals art as truth sincere,
 Bold as the ocean, fetterless as air,
 If to explore thyself thou art not brave,
 I brand thee coward, hypocrite, and slave !
 Coward, who dar'st not face the worst within ;
 Slave—to thy passions and thy ruling sin ;
 Hypocrite—smiling o'er thy bosom's lead,
 Thou deep dissembler to thyself and God !
 Eternal contradiction, living lie,
 Whose words confess what all thy deeds deny !
 Thy heart still blinded, while thy lips allow
 That life's prime wisdom is thyself to know !
 Wherefore distinguish'd at so rich expense
 From brutes, by forethought, reason, judgment, sense,
 If, with all powers to know, decide, discern,
 Thou canst not meditate, and wilt not learn ?

Be, then, a man! Thy inmost heart dissect!
—What law shall fix us, or what light direct?
Shall godlike Wisdom for our guide be had?
One touch of Passion sends her raving mad.
Morality?—Alas! the doting sage
Is almost grown inaudible from age!
Philosophy?—Behold, to thread the maze,
A thousand Mentors point a thousand ways!
Let spiders veil thy philosophic shelf;
Each sage's system but reflects himself!
If what thou shouldst be Solitude impart,
Society shall shew thee what thou art;
Headlong in action, though in reas'ning cool,
Wise in the closet, in the world a fool.
Thy rule of life shall self-indulgence be?—
Is that a rule which veers with all we see?
How ready thou to cry—"I'm fix'd as fate
To love eternal, or eternal hate!"
A week's eternity your passions prove,
Then love is hatred, hatred turns to love.
You hunt an insect for its crimson hue,
And, when 'tis caught, you weep it is not blue.
How vain, how mutable, is that which draws
Its laws from will, and not its will from laws!
Shall the world lead us?—What! vile custom's slave!
That moon, that weathercock, that dancing wave?
Which shifts from age to age with strange caprice,
The reigning virtue, or the modish vice?
See Sparta deck her cunning thieves with fame,
The sot and lecher she consigns to shame;
We hang the thief, and call him all that's base,
While sots and lechers strut abroad in lace!
Shall that teach us, which still untaught appears
By the hard schooling of six thousand years?
What, then, shall guide us on our devious road?—
The everlasting oracles of God!
These, these alone, ne'er gloss the front of vice,
Descend to pride, or warp to prejudice;
To human passions make no fond appeal,
Flatter no frailty, and no truth conceal,
Strip off impartial all exterior things,
Addressing men as men, not clowns, or kings;
To whose straight rule all mortal deeds brought near Must bend, or break, or shew how wide they err;
Be these thy path, thy guide, thy lamp, thy test,
Thence turn the day upon thy darkling breast.
As air, within a half-enlighten'd room,
Seems pure till sunbeams penetrate the gloom,
Then, where the rays in pencill'd columns stream,
A thousand atoms mingle in the beam,
So pure may seem thy bosom's atmosphere;
Let in Truth's lustre—Lo! what specks appear!
That faults you have, you haply, then, allow,
But yet canst guess not whence they come, or how;
You view them simply in themselves as sin,
And not as signs of something worse within.
Go then, thy lust, thy avarice, remove,
Extinguish all—yet leave behind Self-love;
By partial reformation only fed,
The master-sin still rears its monstrous head.
How vain to pluck away the deadly fruit,
Or prune the branches, while untouch'd the root!

The quivering pangs that all the frame convulse,
 The fluttering breath, flush'd cheek, or failing pulse,
 What skill'd physician will begin with these,
 Nor pierce at once the seat of the disease?
 What! shall we thus the body's ills explore
 Nor probe the soul's diseases to their core;
 To blind dull chance the spirit's welfare trust,
 Yet weigh each atom of this heap of dust;
 Pore with minutest eye on vein and skin,
 Nor turn the mental microscope within!
 Think not, though milder symptoms cheat the sight,
 If slight the tokens, the disease is slight.
 The soul's o'erflowings only serve to shew
 The fountain's fulness, not its depth below.
 Say, can the weeds, that mark the billows' line,
 Fathom the ocean, or its power confine?
 Though halcyon Peace now walk the charmed waves,
 Their calmness smiles above a thousand graves.
 Know ye, if once the elements engage,
 What awful ruin waits upon their rage?
 Shall the sheathed sword its scabbard ever keep,
 Or judge ye Passion's waking from her sleep?
 Has not, at times, when fierce temptation fired,
 And treacherous opportunity conspired,
 A flash just trembled o'er thy passion's source,
 And darkly hinted at its fearful force?

No longer, then, the outward signs correct,
 But reach the very heart of the defect.
 Seek arms against Self-love. Devoutly scan
 Thy proper part in Heaven's stupendous plan,
 And, in the mirror of thy soul, descry
 Thy present use, thy future destiny.

Void of self-knowledge, every mortal sees
 Objects proportion'd in inverse degrees.
 Self is the hugest thing in heaven or earth;—
 What line can take its height, its depth, its girth?
 That vast eclipse, that mountain, which upsprings
 To raise the soul and dwarf all other things,
 To which creation seems an idle thought,
 Archangels atoms, and the Godhead naught.
 Impious!—Reverse the scheme! Let God be all!
 Down, down, thyself—to dust, to nothing fall!
 Still we forget that objects, which appear
 Small in the distance, may be vast when near,
 That, seen afar no bigger than an ant,
 An elephant is still an elephant.
 With all Self-love's false logic we discuss
 What the relation objects bear to us;
 But what relation we to them may bear
 Ne'er tasks our judgment, never claims our care.
 Where'er we move, to our deluded view,
 Still with us moves the world's horizon too,
 And to himself, each, like a ship at sea,
 Seems the sole centre of infinity.
 Important fool! and does thy dulness dream
 All creatures made for thee, not thou for them?
 Dost thou, between the cradle and the hearse,
 Colossus-like, bstride the universe?
 From Nature's boundless system shouldst thou drop,
 Think'st thou, vain dust, Creation's wheels will stop?

Behold yon anthill ! See the living soil
 Swarm thick, and ferment with unceasing toil !
 " What's this to me ? " you cry, and view with scorn
 The tiny heroes of a grain of corn——
 To angel eyes, if such our ball behold,
 Seem we, who strive for sceptres, scarfs, and gold.
 Subtract an emmet from yon countless heap—
 Say, cease the rest to bustle, toil, and creep ?
 Poor breathing speck, as little thou'lt be miss'd,
 When thou and thine are struck from Being's list !
 Come forth ! Come forth ! diffuse thyself abroad !
 Scan air, earth, ocean, all the works of God !
 All insect life, all bestial, human see,
 Go, finite being, grasp infinity !
 Survey the midnight Heaven ! In Fancy's car
 Pass every planet, every fix'd star :
 Yet farther, farther still advance thy powers,
 Where what seem clouds are systems vast as ours ;
 Proceed, till all we see has left thy sight ;—
 Then through new systems wheel thy endless flight !
 See boundless space uncounted worlds unfold,
 See countless worlds unnumber'd tribes uphold !
 Then drop to earth, and ask thy single soul
 Its due proportion to the mighty whole !

Sure Angels laugh, if heavenly beings can,
 To see the pompous nothingness of man.
The Earth !—ridiculous and monstrous pride !
 As if there were no other earth beside !
The World !—as if the only world it were,
 That spins in space, or claims its Maker's care !
Our System !—Grant the moon is all our own,
 Were sun, stars, planets, made for us alone ?
Our System !—Let the spiders on a beam
 Boast house and furniture all made for them !
 Pry through thy wondrous tubes—in vision rise
 A few leagues nearer to the peopled skies !
 Discover a new star ! To thee 'tis new !
 And thou mayst think thou didst create it too !
 View and review it—Art thou now more wise ?
 'Tis but a silver spangle in thine eyes !
 Give it a title, yea, a monarch's name ;
 Think you it shines more bright with conscious fame ?

Yet stop not here ; 'tis not enough to view
 Thy littleness—observe thy grandeur too !
 Thyself as mortal, as immortal, scan,
 And learn the meanness, majesty of man !
 As the small pool reflects the boundless sky,
 Its depths impure th' unsullied vault on high,
 Thy breast, though mean, to God and Nature given,
 Is capable to be a mirror'd Heaven.
 Part of a mighty scheme thou still mayst be,
 And, link'd to that, partake its dignity.
 Wouldst thou be wise ?—Thy proper office learn ;
 Glorious ?—Thy rank on being's scale discern !
 What in its sphere shines forth with brightest grace,
 Is but a splendid error out of place.
 The post of honour is thy native state,
 Fulfilling life's great purpose thou art great.
 Ask you that purpose ?—To thyself attend,
 Observe thy means, and thence deduce their end ;

Do Nature's bidding; trace with careful eyes
What best befits thy lofty faculties.

Thou mine of wealth, thou treasure-house of power!
Fraught with thine own and with Creation's dower!
Whose reason, like th' imperial bird, can clasp
All Nature's lightnings in its forceful grasp!
Thou, who dost enter Life's august abode,
Hung round with great memorials of thy God!
If to some end the sacred thrift of Heaven,
To meanest things the meanest gift has given,
Think'st thou on thee her treasures so profuse
Were wildly lavish'd for thy own mean use,
Mere mortal toys of vanity or vice,
Slaves of thy will, and toys of thy caprice?
Wilt thou than brutes no nobler office crave,
To get thy kind, and fertilize thy grave?
For obvious ends thy body was design'd,
But to what purpose serves th' immortal mind?
Look where we may, all Nature's wheels and springs
Employ their functions on congenial things.
With matter our material part must blend;
To outward forms our outward senses tend.
To kindred objects let the spirit fly!
Eternal—let it grasp Eternity;
Invisible—converse with things unseen;
An inward tenant—turn its gaze within;
A Spirit—to the Fount of being tend,
And, born of Deity, to God ascend!
Behold then, Man, thy proper station given,
A link between the universe and Heaven!
See to their several spheres thy powers assign'd,
Thy heart to God, thy actions to mankind!
Image of God, thy glorious lot fulfil,
To know and to obey th' Eternal Will!
Heir of the world, thy use, thy office know,—
Full, to impart, receiving, to bestow,
On man whate'er on thee the Heavens bestow'd,
On beasts protection—give back all to God.
An insulated thing, behold thee poor,
Rich, if thou swell and share the general store;
Mean in thyself, not in relation mean,
The least link 's glorious of the mighty chain!
Die to thyself! To others greatly live!
And learn the lessons God and Nature give!
See all things here to others' good conduce,
Reflect their beauty, or impart their use:
Heaven drops the balmy rain; the bounteous shower
Refreshes earth; earth nourishes the flower;
The flower perfumes the breeze that sweeps the lea;
The breezes waft the fragrant bliss to thee;—
Be thine to bid it from thy bosom rise,
In grateful incense to its native skies!
All things below are like the dewdrop given,
Which, Heaven-descended, is exhaled to Heaven.
Shall God's own image mar th' eternal plan,
And all be liberal, all diffused, but Man?
Say, is it fit, thou Heart of all we see,
That Nature's circulation stop with thee?
Rise, yield, adore, and thy unseal'd eye
Thy just gradation shall at length descry;

Nor only clearer as it inward bends,
But more far-seeing as it outward tends.
Self sinks diminish'd, others rise in view ;
The motive changed, the object alters too.

To common life these principles apply.
Nor rest content with barren theory.
God's light shall be thy guide, his Word thy rule ;
Events thy teachers, and the world thy school.
Behold, one solemn lesson these impart—
The silent self-denial of the heart.
To all, to each, the day revolving brings
Its hourly troubles and its insect stings ;
If fairly met, they bring their own reward,
But pain pursues their selfish disregard.
Like noxious weeds, they wound the timid clasp,
But lose their venom in a firmer grasp.
Face then the worst ; no weak excuse pursue ;
One only standard set before thy view :
If on two sides a duty binding be,
Another's negligence acquits not thee.
Nor seek from stoic pride relief to gain,—
You lose a pleasure in avoiding pain.
Where interest leagues with right, beware of wrong,
Guard most thy weakness where thou seem'st most strong ;
Where the carved lion frown'd, Amorium's wall
Before the Saracen was first to fall.

Wait not for high achievements ; if you hoard,
You rust the edge of Duty's temper'd sword.
'Twere worse than madness trifles to despise,
Since but by faint degrees we sink or rise.
Small cares than great 'tis harder to sustain,—
If it be harder, 'tis more glorious then.
What makes most shew is rarely most of use,
As double blossoms cannot fruit produce.
Judge not of actions by their mere effect,
Dive to the centre and the cause detect.
Great deeds from meanest springs may take their course,
And smallest virtues from a mighty source.
False strength the soul from action's fever draws,
Thrives on its own or on mankind's applause ;
But he, who calmly smiling suffers here
The settled sorrow of the daily tear,
A silent sacrifice to man unknown,
Derives his energy from God alone.
True trial lies in patience ; death is less
Than the pale siege and Famine's slow distress.
Ruin full oft is met with steady eye,
But who hath gazed untamed on poverty ?
He who resigns an empire, scarce may brave
The petty insults of the meanest slave.
'Tis magnanimity to greatly dare,
But 'tis a heavenly fortitude to bear ;
And all the force of self-devotement lies
Not in the first, but after sacrifice.
Yet veil thy strength, nor, save in trial, shew
The changeless wreaths Faith binds around thy brow.
Be, in prosperity, the rock unseen
With ivy crown, 'midst summer uplands green :
Be in adversity that rock betray'd
With ivy crown, when winter strips the shade.

Kill not thy passions, nor too tightly rein,
 Enlist them rather in fair Virtue's train.
 Be obstinate in good; let generous pride
 Disclose thy own, all other weakness hide;
 Against thyself let honest anger rise,
 And noble envy emulate the skies.

Judge none by thine own law, nor harshly bind
 Another to the temper of thy mind.
 Be free as light, diffusive as the air;—
 Has Nature but one form of good or fair?
 Has she not spread abroad a liberal feast,
 And various sweets for every varied taste?
 There's not a tree, a plant, a leaf, or flower,
 But has its own peculiar beauty's dower.
 Then seize the treasures all around thee thrown,
 Nor fret that blockheads stint themselves to one.
 Nor those, who love not all you love, condemn,
 The answering chord may not be found in them.
 If Nature, Habit, Age, Event, Degree,
 Build up the man, how various each must be!
 Think you the stranger, whom you lead around
 The little plot of your paternal ground,
 Will feel, like you, each tree and blossom raise
 The dreams and sympathies of early days?
 Oft man with man in words not meaning fights,
 A definition would set all to rights.
 The self-same object is by each described,
 Each only sees it on a different side.
 To yield in trifles is the art of life,
 And truly conquer by declining strife.
 A shameful prize is gain'd at too much cost,
 He's most the victor who concedes the most.
 'Tis the wrong person we expect to bend,
 Ourselves should learn to yield and to amend.
 Besides, the man who fastest moves his tongue,
 Must more than half suspect himself of wrong.
 He talks so volubly, with outward din,
 To drown the tedious monitor within.
 With frailty and with folly learn to bear,—
 These human nature's chief ingredients are;
 Remember, Man, thou also hast thy share!
 If in thy neighbour's face thou evil see,
 Be it no triumph, but a glass to thee.
 Fret not at weary time to others given;
 It is not lost, but register'd in Heaven.
 'Tis not enough that thou no evil do,
 Who lives for his own heart, must live for others too.

THE REIGNING VICE. BOOK VIII.

ARGUMENT.

The future Destiny of Man considered.—His usual objects of interest contrasted with it.—The necessity of an entire change of principle insisted upon.—The means of that change.

LIFE'S duties known, with firmer step proceed
To trace the glorious future where they lead;
Of all thy powers the scope and meaning see,
And let this Now be mirror of To Be.
Can such beginnings end with parting breath,
So rich a scheme be poorly lost in death?
No!—Prodigal of proof, Heaven gives the soul
A thousand voices to proclaim her goal;
Through earth's disguise still vindicates the sky,
And wraps us round with immortality.

Is there a breast, in which is never heard
A piercing cry for innocence restored?
'Tis the soul's instinct, Nature's heart-wrung prayer,—
We pant, we die, to be as once we were.
'Twas innocence round youth a glory cast,
And makes it seem the Eden of the past.
Dost thou ne'er seem, in thought, thyself to see
An infant kneeling at thy mother's knee?
That thought is the Sinroom. Thy bursting heart
Throbs out a prayer to be as once thou wert,
And longs to plunge into some freshening fount,
Thence, like the fabled bird, anew to mount.
Can God have given these restless thoughts in vain,
Mere curious instruments of futile pain?

Does joy e'er seem to reach its perfect height?
When bliss comes next, we promise full delight:
It comes. Still lurks behind a bliss uncaught,
Beyond our powers, but not beyond our thought.
Observe the sources of our deepest joys—
Concealment decks, Reality destroys.
The hollow clouds, that helm the mountain's head,
And down its steepy sides their shadows spread;
The gloomy trees that thwart the falling stream,
Or veil the richness of an evening beam;
The mists that tremble o'er the waters smooth,
Give more to fancy than they take from truth.
The mind, half-conscious of its mighty dower,
Is raptured with its own creative power.
Our nature is a promise, and we view,
Best pleased, the joy that is a promise too.

See man athirst for bliss, yet never blest,
His restless schemes, yet cherish'd hopes of rest;
The fond desire of home, the wish to range,
The love of novelty, yet hate of change:
For change is sorrow; custom still endears,
And makes the past the fountain of our tears.
Change points regret, when falls a tree we loved,
And swells our anguish when a friend's removed.
See with what zeal we labour from our birth
To make an immortality on earth;

Strive to give longer date to ev'n a flower,
 Grasp every toy, and cling to every hour.
 See o'er the lost how full our sorrows swell,
 And "gone for ever!" is life's dreariest knell.
 This aim to stamp eternity on time,—
 This cry for innocence from gulfs of crime,—
 This quenchless hope to find the lost again,—
 This quest of happiness through ceaseless pain,—
 All points to Heaven, where guilt and death shall cease,
 And all be ecstasy, yet all be peace.

Bound down by sin, wrapt round with earthly weeds,
 Alas! how vainly the immortal pleads!
 In vain created with prospective eyes,
 We stop far short of our predestined skies.
 Each looks to some fond future of his own,
 To various minds at various distance shewn.
 While Hope's horizon, as we forward pass,
 Itself retreats, and still is where it was,
 Death drops on all the curtain, soon or late,
 Then what to us the futures we create?
 Ah! what avails that Man's superior soul
 Outruns himself, and seeks some distant goal?
 Less wise than Nature's tribes of earth or air,
 His proper future never claims his care.
 The ant prepares her treasure-house, and home,
 The bee her cell, the worm its silken tomb;
 God, our true Good, our proper future Heaven,
 To earth our hearts, to time our thoughts are given.
 Infatuate mortal! thus thy labours miss,
 Not only future, but immediate bliss.
 Does Pleasure, lowest sorcery of earth,
 Beguile thy soul? Go, chase her wildest mirth,
 Sing, shout—while Reason gives a mournful smile
 To hear thee laugh, and see thee weep the while.
 Below the brutes to self-oblivion shrink,
 Man's worst disgrace is, not to dare to think.
 Thought sleeps—the tenure of thy joys how slight!
 The lightest touch may break a sleep so light.
 Thought wakes—glides ghastly by in Pleasure's bower,
 And glares upon thee in the lonely hour.

Can riches tempt thee? See yon vessel blaze!
 All crowd the boats, save one who plundering stays.
 Around his waist the gather'd gold he ties,
 Springs from the deck, encumber'd, sinks, and dies!
 Art thou more wise to risk repose and health,
 Eternal blessings for a moment's wealth?
 See Clodio's park, the joy of half mankind,
 How blest must be the owner!—he is blind!

Through Hope's bright vista, lured by beckoning Fame,
 Behold the immortality of Name!
 "When Mutius Scævola and Decius Mus Were consuls, Rome was ornamented thus."
 "When John and Samuel Briggs churchwardens were,
 The parish vestry underwent repair."
 And this is Fame! What matters it if shown Gilded on wood, or carved in Parian stone?

Perchance thy soul Ambition's dream deludes—
 Mount to her throne o'er trampled multitudes!

Through darkest ways the glittering mischief seek,
 Slave to the strong, but tyrant to the weak !
 Yet, ere to vain pre-eminence thou soar,
 Read the sad record of departed Power !—
 “ Cordova’s Caliph, full in fortune’s rays, Reign’d fifty years, and lived but fourteen days.”
 Or dreams thy wily brain of state intrigue ?
 What aims are foil’d, when knaves are join’d in league !
 Where all are selfish, think how interests cross,
 How few can thrive, who gain by many’s loss !
 What is thy trust, where all deludes the view ;
 Where love’s a cheat, and only hatred true ?
 Thou seem’st to touch thy goal of hope ;—thou fool,
 Awake to find thyself thy worst foe’s tool !

Or art thou one, who, seeking joy, still pores
 On musty tomes, black coins, or monstrous ores ?
 Who, for an old inscription, scours the globe,
 And, for a true Corregio, would disrobe ?
 Ah ! think what pangs thy curious soul await,
 When thy best Trajan’s proved a counterfeit !
 How vain the joy a troglodite bestows,
 While thy friend’s cabinet a rarer shows !
 How vain the store thy cautious care collects,
 When death shall scatter what thy life protects !
 Ah ! hurl a prescient glance beyond the tomb,
 See thy loved treasures grace the auction-room,
 While barbarous hands thy mystic drawers profane,
 And thy Corregio’s sold for five pounds ten !

Or shall, in prospect, joys domestic please,
 The desk of science, or the chair of ease ?
 These may be blessings ; reason owns them true ;—
 But are they, therefore, to be won by you ?
 Or, if you win them, will they still delight ?
 The very search has pall’d the appetite !
 You fain would rest awhile ere life be past,
 But death shall find thee restless to the last.
 Vapid and rayless, see thy hopes depart ;
 Where, where is all, that fired the glowing heart ?
 Flat as election’s morrow to the train,
 Who canvast as for endless joy or pain.
 Stale as a lottery puff, which, after date,
 Still tells you in three hours you’ll be too late.

But grant thee blest, thy soul’s full purpose given,
 Thy joys must end ;—that thought would darken Heaven !
 Go then, the mighty ends of life obey,
 To love, to hate, to slander, and to slay !
 To toys of straw confine thy piercing eye,
 Thou time-born nurseling of eternity !
 This frame of dust, this little span of earth,
 Thy place of destiny as well as birth !
 Still let thy hopes, thy fears, thy heart, thy all,
 Creep, toil, and jostle round this play-thing ball ;
 Load thyself thick with clay—heap throng on throng
 Of vainest vanities !—then ask—How long ?

What thus can lead man’s darkling steps astray ?
 The fire of the immortal pent in clay !
 This peoples earth with turmoils, plots, complaints,
 This hath made heroes, and this should make saints.

Religion must be centre of the breast ;
 What but the masterwheel can move the rest ?
 If for a wheel of meaner force exchanged,
 How soon the whole machine would be deranged !
 'Tis not enough it bear a part in thee,
 Thy every deed a part of this must be.
 Yet thy soul's heart is fame, is sensual bliss,
 Gold, science, friendship—any thing but this !
 And thus Creation's jarring note thou art,
 A river lost in sands, an aimless dart,
 A blot, an accident, a strange disease,
 Midst nature's healthful fair contrivances.
 Turn then to this with only half the zeal
 Which for earth's toys earth's wayward children feel ;
 Here point ambition, here give reins to joy,
 Be miser here of immortality !
 Here only fear no fall. Give fancy scope,
 For here enjoyment must eclipse all hope.
 Here only constancy is surely blest ;
 Here warfare leads to conquest, toil to rest.
 Wouldst thou be learn'd, though barr'd from learning's spring,
 King without subjects, subject without king,
 Great without titles, rich without a store,
 Wise Ali said—" Serve God, and sin no more."
 Gain but religion's vantage-ground, and life
 Will seem scarce worth a thought, much less a strife.
 The ship, that down some river nobly steers,
 Lost in mid ocean, but a speck appears.
 Thus fades our being to th' expanded eye,
 That sweeps the ocean of eternity.

Faintly I plead—a bolder course be trod !
 Ere Heaven be thine, 'tis thou must change—or God.
 Learn to regard thine hour of parting breath,
 As life less alter'd, than prolong'd by death.
 No sudden change fix'd nature's laws produce,
 All speaks its future in its present use.
 In endless circles Being's wheel revolves,
 Each atom reappears as it dissolves,
 Nor lost, nor wholly changed. The wings that form
 The butterfly were folded in the worm :
 The acorn's juices in the oak endure,—
 And thus the mind is its own miniature.
 Each infant power, each embryo passion's root,
 Shall spring, shall bud, shall blossom, shall bear fruit.
 Judge then thy future from thy present state ;
 As now, hereafter, thou wilt love or hate.
 Would Heaven unfold for thee a blest abode ?
 Nor fame nor wealth is there ;—but only God !
 Think of the time, when evil woke within,
 And thy young soul yet shudder'd, new to sin ;
 Now thou canst sin, and tremble not. Take heed !
 Think you a downward path to Heaven can lead ?
 Can self-repose to joy celestial tend,
 Or selfish acts in heavenly glory end ?
 Heaven's glorious prize to heavenly love is due ;
 Is it adjudged to mean self-love and you ?
 From mortal motives sprung, the purest deed
 In mortal rapture finds its proper meed.
 When Brutus triumph'd, deaf to nature's cries,
 Fame drest the shrine, fame soothed the sacrifice.

Sublime the action, and in noble thought
 It found the lofty recompense it sought.
 And canst thou boast a title as secure
 To bliss as lofty, or reward as pure ?
 For heavenly rest thy empty clamours cease ;
 Thy aim, thy end, thy Heaven, is earthly peace !
 From pleased self-love thy every joy proceeds,
 To self-content thy every action leads.
 What, then, can happiness be safely built
 On the great base of mortal woe and guilt ?

See through all nature reign two only Wills,
 Of good and bad mysterious principles.
 Obeying one, you slight the other's sway ;
 Resisting one, the other you obey.
 Though now on dubious thrones they seem to reign
 Discordant, and perpetual strife maintain,
 That shall prevail, this crush'd and quell'd retreat,
 And thou must share the triumph, or defeat.
 Reach one sure truth by reason's plainest road—
 Thy own self-will is not the will of God :
 Confess then, man, thy unsubdued self-will
 Is but the opposing principle of ill.
 Go then, rash fool, th' Omnipotent resist,
 Refute the All-wise, thou daring blasphemist !
 While to one Will the universe conforms,
 And views amazed the anarchy of worms,
 While angels shudder at th' enormous fault,
 And ev'n Hell trembles at thy bold revolt,
 Go, thou, who never tremblest for thyself,
 Sport, thing insane, upon destruction's shelf,
 From thy own death an idiot rapture quaff,
 And o'er thy dread rebellion frantic laugh !

Know, all the blessings Heav'n on man bestow'd
 Lie in these words—"Renounce thyself for God !"
 Thy heart's contracted gates wide open throw,
 Abase the lofty, and exalt the low,
 And make a highway for thy God alone
 Supreme to enter and reclaim his own.
 Renounce thyself ! 'Tis Life's prime wisdom—this Thy truest dignity, thy proper bliss.
 Self-love has marr'd thy being's great design,
 To this thou art restored by love divine ;
 Self-love, which lifts thee to the skies in thought,
 In very deed, is that which makes thee nought.
 One moment stoop, eternally to rise,
 Confess thy folly, and be greatly wise.
 Wouldst thou be blest ? Renounce that idle self,
 Which sighs for titles, or which pines for pelf ;
 Self, that uneasy, restless, aching thing,
 Of every woe at once the smart and sting,
 Goaded with malice, piqued into disdain,
 The fool of pleasure and the slave of pain,
 Which fears, plots, hates, revenges, trembles, glows,
 Or sinks and rots away in dull repose :
 What joy is thine, what animated rest,
 When that base tenant is expell'd thy breast ! *
 This hour begin. To shrink from Duty's face
 Is to draw backward from a concave glass :
 The growing shade the frighten'd infant foils,
 More monstrous still the farther he recoils.

But thou mayst ask me, if self-love can die,
 Law of all being, nay of Deity ?
 No ! still our impulse, but no more our guide ;
 It does not perish, 'tis but purified !
 From things below, 'tis turn'd to things above,
 From dark to light, from false to real love.
 No more it seeks some transient joy to share,
 Our lasting good becomes its nobler care.
 It warns, chastises, with such holy zeal
 As tenderest mothers for their offspring feel ;
 A blind brute force no more it roams abroad,
 But moves harmonious on the will of God.
 For coward Sloth a holy peace is given,
 For Self-content a conscience knit to heaven.
 Short of this change thou canst not, must not rest,
 Or dies thy labour futile and unblest.
 The mortal strength which promises relief,
 Fails with the weight of unexpected grief,
 But Faith can bridge the torrent of our woes,
 And, like an arch, more press'd, still firmer grows.
 Leave moralists external truth to teach,
 And point the summit which they never reach ;
 Seek thou a mightier power, a costlier art,
 To heal the bitter waters of the heart.
 Cull'd from celestial Truth's unfading bower,
 Cast in a branch of purifying power !
 Like Marah's spring, amid the scorching waste,
 The gall turns sweetness to the wondering taste.
 Then, as the fountain, so the mighty stream
 Reforms alike its nature and its name :
 'Tis love to God, where late Self-love it ran,
 And Selfishness flows Charity to man.

Oh, consummation of sereneest joy,
 How shall we grasp thee, how the past destroy ?
 What wondrous force, beyond our mortal range,
 Shall pierce our being and our essence change ?
 The universe shall answer ; air and sea
 Shall thunder forth the mystic Agency ;
 And every beam of monitory light
 On earth's great volume shall the secret write.
 Dive deep in Nature, lo, material things
 Are but Creation's wheels, and not her springs.
 An immaterial Power still lurks behind,
 Which baffles all the searchings of the mind :
 A second cause alone our aims detect.
 We reach th' Invisible, and there are check'd.
 Go, babble well of Fate, and Nature's laws ;—
 Laws speak a lawgiver, effects a cause—
 Tell how attraction guides the planets' course,
 Prate of centrifugal, magnetic force,
 Give life to matter, motion to the clod ;
 Attraction, gravity, are only God.
 Th' expanding spring may move the dial's hand
 What gives the spring its impulse to expand ?
 The sap fermenting bursts in vernal leaves ;
 What to the sap its mounting instinct gives ?
 What calls the magnet's prompt affection forth,
 When the touch'd needle trembles to its North ?
 Say, what, thou masterpiece of all, explains
 Thy body's growth, the current of thy veins ?

 Let the breeze stop, the vessel stops of course.
 The bursting blossom, the revolving sky—
 All owns an ever-acting agency,
 Which still impels Creation's meanest part,
 And urges each vibration of the heart.
 Were one fix'd law the guide of nature's frame,
 All objects were, from age to age, the same ;
 But tell me, Man, what soul, what boundless power,
 Varies each leaf, each mind, each face, each flower ?
 Nor deem the world has worn this only robe ;
 Pierce deep the strata of the solid globe,—
 There trace the pattern of the things of old,
 Forms of which Nature has destroy'd the mould,
 Bodies prodigious to our mortal view,
 Which dwarf our dreams, and make chimeras true.
 O, Great First Cause ! so distant, yet so near,
 So all-inscrutable, yet shown so clear,—
 Must we scale Heaven, thy spirit's light to find,
 Or dive to Hell ?—No, seek it in the Mind !
 Shall He, who harmonized primeval strife,
 And woke dull matter into glowing life—
 The mighty Energy, who forceful hurl'd
 Swift into motion each rebellious world,
 Inert, unmoulded leave the mind alone,
 Whose essence is more kindred to His own ?
 If God be absent from the human breast,
 His omnipresence is a dream—a jest.
 He is around us, near us—though forgot,
 He is within us,—and we know it not.
 And vainly too, we call Him of our state,
 Creator, if he cannot re-create.
 The heart's a shatter'd mirror ; once it shew'd
 A full reflection, now a gleam of God ;
 The Almighty Maker can alone restore,
 And set it opposite his beams once more.
 Hark ! hark ! What mighty shout Creation rends ?
 Self-love, behold and die—A God descends !
 From what to what ?—Can thought the distance span ?—
 From Heaven to earth, from Deity to man !
 Emptied of Godhead, human pain to know,
 Sunken from celestial bliss to human woe,—
 From all Heaven's radiance to earth's meanest place,—
 From Heaven's dominion to earth's worst disgrace,—
 From sinlessness divine to sin's dark load,—
 From God's embraces to the wrath of God,—
 From immortality to death, and still
 A lower fall—from Nature's throne to Hell,—
 All this, for whom ?—For rebels to the sky,
 Foes to his power !—Self-love, behold and die !
 Is yet in vain the great example given ?
 I claim thee, Mortal, as the right of Heaven !
 No more thou art thine own ;—Such love sublime,
 Hath made ingratitude a damning crime.
 When Heaven descends, shall earth retain her pride ?
 Dares man to live as if no God had died ?
 You own 'twere joy your tyrant will to shun ;
 Be His disciple, and the work is done !
 " Are we not His ?" the astonish'd world may cry ;
 " Alas ! ye never knew Him !" I reply.
 If ye be His, some traits are surely like ;
 On closest search, does the resemblance strike ?

From those we love we catch the voice's tone,
 Their gestures, nay, their looks become our own.
 Oh! is it so with thee? Impartial ask!
 The Muse shall aid thee in th' important task.
 Christ lived for others. Now an answer give—
 For whom dost thou, oh Man of Pleasure, live?
 Why dost thou flutter still in Folly's train,
 Still chasing Pleasure half an inch from Pain?
 Why dost thou hunt fame, honours, titles, pelf,
 The world's applause?—What, silent?—For thyself!
 Christ wept for human guilt—Ah! when hast thou?
 Thine eyes are tearless, unabash'd thy brow.
 Christ was forgiving, lowly, patient, meek;—
 Art thou all these?—Thou canst not, dar'st not speak;
 Thou art not His. Oh, wherefore art thou not?
 Thou art not happy! 'Tis thy chosen lot.
 Thou seekest happiness on thorny ground,
 Where it was never—never shall be found.
 Say, though amidst the maddening crowd awhile,
 The faithless tongue may jest, the false lip smile,
 Like the cold sparkling of eternal snow
 Conceal they not the wintry waste below?
 Did ne'er in silence sigh thy sickening breast
 For something more than all it yet possess,
 Despise, abhor the selfish, sensual throng,
 Who dance with thee vain pleasure's path along,
 And think, with anguish think, did sorrow rend,
 Did fortune fly thee, that thou hast no friend?
 Alas, thy lonely bosom never proved
 The bliss of loving and of being loved.
 Behold the source and centre of thy woe!
 For love alone is happiness below.
 Not love of self—no, God himself hath shewn
 It was not good for man to be alone;
 Not earthly love—that spark of grosser fire,
 Which glares to injure—shines but to expire;
 But love, which in its holy round shall bind
 Domestic bliss—God, Nature, and Mankind.
 Love is to all most needful;—lives there one—
 Search every clime beneath the circling sun—
 Who hath not, to himself perchance unknown,
 One thought that links some bosom to his own?
 And, if cut off from every human tie,
 In Nature's tribes we seek society.
 Mark the poor shepherd-boy; he, all day long
 Compell'd to watch the grazing fleecy throng,
 From the whole flock his favourite singles out,
 Who knows his voice and follows him about,—
 Takes from his proffer'd hand the choicest green,
 And slumbering on his knee its head will lean.
 See the lone captive: his affections bend
 To court a bird, or spider, as a friend;
 Yes, He, who best must know what most will aid
 The happiness of those Himself hath made,
 Display'd his richest bounty, when his rod
 Inscribed the mandate, "Thou shalt love thy God."
 These simple words with deepest awe behold,
 Earth's plainest surface hides the mine of gold:
 View them, as he who stands in solemn dream
 Beside the birth-place of some giant stream.
 See from their source all mortal blessings flow,
 See in their depths the cure of mortal woe!

From Love we fell—Love only can restore
The glorious image which at first we wore,
And bring earth's wanderers to their home above
In God's similitude—for God is love.
To this His Spirit shall our spirit mould,
While, touch'd by prayer, the gates of Heaven unfold.
Fresh from the sun the light each morn is given;
Then let thy soul seek daily light from heaven.
Sleep nightly doth the body's strength repair;
Thus bathe thy spirit in the fount of prayer,
And, while to God thy heart and knee shall bend,
Let these poor words, or words like these, ascend.

“O God! Creator! who didst frame mankind
In the bright likeness of thy reasoning Mind;
O God! Preserver! who thy life didst pour
To lift our being whence it fell before;
O God! Restorer! whose serene control
Renews the blotted legend of the soul;
Help me to lay my heart upon thy shrine;—
Thus made, thus rescued, I am doubly thine!
Nor led by fear, nor selfish hope of good,
O'ercome by love, enthrall'd by gratitude,
On all its powers my spirit fain would call,
And to Thy service dedicate them all!
Thy countless mercies, O may memory trace,
And ever yield to Thee its dearest place!
May Hope exulting wing to Thee her flight,
Gaze on Thy face, and live amidst Thy light;
With Faith, who scorning all the wealth of kings,
Draws more from shadows than the world from things.
Let Reason mark the wonders of Thy power
In every blade of grass, or bud, or flower.
Love conquers Fear; yet still let Fear attend,
But only tremble lest my deeds offend!
Bid Joy quaff rapture where her Source appears,
And Grief dissolve in penitential tears!
Oh, save me from myself! A lurking foe
Rebels within, and hurls my thoughts below!
I cannot mount to Thee! Debased, o'erthrown,
All will, all power, I ask from Thee alone!
The good Thou givest, in its birth confirm,
And change my being in its inmost germ!
Then let no thought unquesti'd come or part,
But be Thyself the warder of my heart!
From fancied clearness, purge my darkling sight,
And drag beguiling Selfishness to light!
O, aid me hourly! Lead my lingering mind
From love of Thee to love of all mankind,
Of Nature's every tribe;—Oh, bid me see Thyself in every thing, and all in Thee!”

LETTERS FROM THE PENINSULA.

No. V.

Lieutenant Spencer Moggridge, to his Aunt Dorothea Moggridge.

[WE owe many apologies to the author of the following article, which has been in our possession upwards of six months. By some unaccountable mistake it had got into the Balaam-Box, where it might have continued still longer to "waste its sweetness on the desert air," but for a recent gaol delivery, by which many of its brothers in misfortune were committed to the flames. We have now great pleasure in presenting it to the public, and trust that our old correspondent will accept this true statement as an excuse for the unintentional delay which has taken place. C. N.]

THE devil! So Harriet is married! Married to a rosy Warwickshire parson, redolent of tithe pig and tobacco smoke, and absolutely mistress for life of a snug parsonage of two stories, with a green door in the centre, and windows on either flank, tastefully set forth with beaupots of mignonette! What! that Harriet whose eye was so keenly sensitive to the splendours of scarlet and embroidery, who loved the art military—if not for its own sake, at least for that of its professors—and to whose enthusiastic imagination a recruiting captain appeared a being only a little lower than the angels!—who bewailed with indignation more clamorous and bitter the iniquitous order which denuded the subaltern's shoulder of its bullion and invested it with paltry fringe? And this fair being—oh! proclaim it not in Askelon!—is now married to a parson,—a man of black,—a mere commonplace reader of lessons and homilies, undignified by even the extrinsic virtue of an army chaplaincy! Why, my good aunt, I remember when the very sight of a redcoat—ay, even that of a militiaman—was enough to disorder the whole economy of her pulsations, and I declare she once absolutely confessed to me, that perhaps the happiest night of her life was one in which she dreamed of dancing four sets with a Major of dragoons. Poor Harriet! To her a parson of fifty-five, with seven chopping children to begin with, must indeed have been a forlorn hope, accepted only when, after some lustres of unproductive flirtation, the men of tags and epaulettes were found unattainable, and not an ensign had become immeshed in her toils. Nay, I do verily believe, that had a drum-major offered, even at the church-door, she would have braved fate and the doctor, and consoled herself, under every misfortune, with the proud thought of being married to a staff officer! I will now change the subject. Yet offer her, I beg of you, my kind regards, and warm wishes that she may prove ancestress of a battalion.

Your melancholy account of the death of poor Tompkins, though given with all due pathos, I cannot say has materially impaired my tranquillity. Well, Tompkins is dead; I am sorry for him, but my digestive powers have not suffered on his account. Low diet, my good aunt, is a wonderful antidote to extravagance of sympathy. You may call this unfeeling if you please; but only consider, I beg of you, whether a man like myself, compelled to rough it out on ration beef and aqua ardente—I wish you could but taste them!—can be expected to feel very deeply for an apoplectic gentleman in his 64th year, found dead in his chair, when laudably engaged in the discussion of his second bottle. Had I never left home, it is possible my feelings might have been as much excited as your own; but since I commenced campaigner, I have become too familiar with Death to learn of his proceedings in any ordinary case with inconvenient vehemence of emotion. Those who never encountered him, may talk of death as they please, but, believe me, he is but a nine days' wonder at best—a bugbear for grown gentlemen with comfortable establishments and well-stocked cellars. He is an actor—not a well-graced one, certainly—each of whose appearances on the stage is attended with less effect than the preceding. Yet, ill favoured as he may be, look him boldly in the face, and you will find him less frightful than you imagined; muster courage to beard him, and his terrors are gone for ever. Thus has it been with me, who make no pretension to a larger share of courage than my neighbours. Though a young soldier, Death and I have been thrown in each other's way too often not to have formed something of an acquaintance; and this I must say for him, that, within the scope of my own personal experience, he has always conducted himself like a gentleman.

So much for the news contained in your letter, and my dilation on it at such length may be taken as a sign that I have nothing of any very serious importance to communicate. True, we have had a good deal of fighting, but no very stiff work after all. Stay—what am I saying? Take, in contradiction to it, the following narrative of the brilliant conduct of our regiment at El Bodon.

Early in September, our brigade crossed the Agueda by a ford about a league from Fuente Guinaldo, where Lord Wellington had established his head-quarters. We halted in the large village of Robleda, and remained there about three weeks—not a disagreeable interlude, I assure you, in the drama of the campaign. During that period we received no molestation from the enemy, and for once, at least, the lines had fallen to us in pleasant places. Robleda, being at some distance from the main roads, had suffered less than its neighbours from hostile inroads, and, embosomed amid the green hills, it reminded me of some of those quiet and rural villages which are occasionally met with in the pastoral districts of the south of Scotland.

Till our arrival at Robleda, we had enjoyed no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the amusements and social habits of the Spanish people. We then did so; and surely never was there a more simple, innocent, and light-hearted set of beings than those peaceful rustics among whom we sojourned. At evening the whole population poured forth into the market-place, where the voices of young maidens were heard chanting their national melodies, and many light feet kept time to the sound of the guitar, and the clink of castanets. Our wants were here abundantly supplied; the markets of different sorts were excellent, and provisions cheap, for these primitive traffickers had not yet learned the arts of fraud and extortion, in which the presence of a British army generally initiates the natives. In short, we were all partial to the inhabitants of Robleda, and General Colville, as a mark of his satisfaction at our reception, directed the bands of the different regiments to play every evening, and regale the unsophisticated ears of the rustic audience with more crude, though, to my feeling, less beautiful music, than that of the wild and simple melodies of their native land.

Notwithstanding all these agremens, the place was unhealthy. Why, it would be difficult to say. The natives were robust and vigorous,—the air seemed pure and bracing,—there were in the neighbourhood no marshes of any kind to mingle poison in the atmosphere, and the water used by the troops was as fine as any that ever trickled from the rock. Yet the ague was abroad, and made sad work among all ranks. The parades grew daily thinner, and the hospitals more crowded, till at length in our corps alone we had actually seven officers and ninety men hors de combat. Of these seven I was one. You have never had the ague, my dear aunt, and, I thank heaven, are not likely to have it. Refresh your imagination, therefore, with the following picture of the sufferings of a gentleman afflicted with a Tertian, and if the adage of the poet be true—

“He best can paint them who has felt them most,”

the delineation will be graphic enough.

Let it be taken for granted that the intended sufferer is of hale constitution, strongly and symmetrically made, of sanguine complexion, with great facilities of digestion; yet so laudably abstemious as seldom to exceed his tenth tumbler. Well, this gentleman—myself, for example—in the full and vigorous discharge of all bodily functions, suddenly finds himself, on some fine forenoon, when cantering along the road, or busily engaged at home in writing a letter to his people, turning most inexplicably cold. If in the latter predicament, he seizes the bottle of cogniac—seldom far distant—and fortifies his interior works with a bumper, but with no beneficial result. Surprised at this, he attributes his feelings to the coldness of the weather, draws closer to the fire, and exposes his back settlements to the full radiation of the heat. Alas! the current in his veins is too sluggish to be thus stimulated, and while the portion of his person nearest the flame enjoys the temperature of Bombay, he feels as if the more distant ones had been transported to Iceland or Kumschatka.

His troubles go on increasing. His skin, at other times smooth as a gentleman's should be, becomes rough as that of a goose. His teeth chatter; his flesh creeps; his limbs refuse their office, and he who never shook with fear in the hour of danger, yields to an uncontrollable impulse, and trembles like an aspen. All this time his throat is parched with a thirst which the whole waters of the Tagus would not allay. The bottle of cogniac again rises to his thoughts, and he directs his servant to make him instantan a glass of hot grog warm without sugar. Unhappy man! In avoiding Scylla, he runs smack on Charybdis. There is fever in his blood which the ardent spirit, at other times so exhilarating and salubrious, tends only to increase. It indeed shortens the duration of the cold fit under which he suffers, but only adds fuel to the fiery purgatory he is about to enter.

A change is at length wrought in the character of his sensations. The diagnostics of his disorder undergo a mutation unaccompanied by relief. His blood passes rapidly from zero to boiling temperature, or rather his arteries seem filled with the molten lead, and he goes, or, more properly speaking, is carried, to bed, by his servant, who congratulates himself on his good fortune in serving a master whose weight does not exceed twelve stones and a half. In bed, however, matters only get worse, and he writhes for several hours in a fever so violent, that less than two days of it would inevitably prove fatal to the strongest man alive. At length, the fit, having reached its crisis, gradually declines. His skin is bedewed by copious perspiration, and the throbbing of his pulse becomes less like the strokes of a sledge hammer. He at length falls asleep, dreams of all imaginable horrors—such as being tried by a court-martial, and disgracefully cashiered—being run through the body by the bayonet of a rascally sentry of his own company, whose post, by some fatuous but irresistible impulse, he attempted to force; or, worst of all, being condemned, on false evidence, as a deserter, with the alternatives—almost equally odious—of being shot with all due formality, or receiving pardon, coupled with the condition of marrying Sally Biggs—a young lady, my dear aunt, of whose tastes, habits, or pursuits, it fortunately behoves not that you should know any thing. By sleep, however, even such as this, he is refreshed, and awakens at the precise moment when the irrevocable words of the parson are about to make Sally an honest woman, at the expense of one who is far from admitting the equity of the retribution. The fever has left his blood, and he calls lustily for his servant to arrange the implements of his toilet. He is weaker, indeed, but in other respects as well as before the attack, and remains so till precisely the same hour on the third day, when he is condemned to a renewal of the sufferings I have attempted to describe. But of this enough, and more than enough. I will now, according to promise, go on with my narrative.

Well, after leading for three weeks a quiet, and, but for the ague, not an uncomfortable life, at Robledo, on the forenoon of the 23d of September we received the order to march. On the day previous, it had been reported among the natives that the enemy were in force at Salamanca; but as such rumours were seldom to be depended on, the one in question met with less credence than it deserved. About two o'clock, therefore, of the same day, we found ourselves rather suddenly en route, and, fording the Agueda, we soon learned, from various authentic sources, that Marmont and his army were already in the neighbourhood of Ciudad Rodrigo, only two leagues off. The night following was one to be marked with a black stone, in the tablets of my life. The billet allotted to four of us was a miserable shop, about twelve feet square, and abominably dirty. The bed of the owner and his wife was only partially concealed by a tattered curtain, the sanctity of which obscurity, I believe none of us were induced to violate by the charms of the lady, who was absolutely the ugliest and dirtiest woman I have yet encountered in the course of my campaigns. For myself I slept on the counter, with my portmanteau for a pillow; and as my slumbers on so hard a bed were naturally somewhat restless, I had the misfortune to roll off in the night, to the considerable bodily injury of our worthy adjutant, who lay, extended in his blanket, on the floor beneath, and who was utterly unprepared for the descent of a body so ponderous as that of your worthy nephew. As for the owner of this wretched hovel, both he and his rib were astir the whole night, in dismal apprehension of being robbed, though of what article of value certainly could not be determined by any inspection of the premises. Indeed, I have always remarked in Spain, that wherever we halted for a single night, the Patrono or his better half kept a strict watch on all the motions of their inmates, even when their dwellings contained nothing in any form of wealth or garniture, which could tempt the poorest of mankind to an involuntary transgression of the Tenth Commandment.

Well, the night passed slowly and miserably, and no sooner had the grey light of morning begun to peer through the windows, than we sallied forth to exchange for the free air of heaven the close and polluted atmosphere which for so many hours we had been condemned to inhale. We were anxious also to collect as much intelligence as possible, for it had been dark night when we reached our quarters, and we yet knew nothing of the general motions of the army. After roaming for some time about the streets, vainly requesting news from men as ignorant as ourselves, we observed a dragoon, with drawn sabre, standing sentinel near a small chapel, on an eminence which commanded a full view of Ciudad Rodrigo. We immediately assailed him with our questions, but the man was an ass, and nothing could be got out of him but an assurance that the enemy had not yet appeared in the distance. We learned, however, from the natives, that Marmont was already in the city, and that his infantry was hourly coming up. Under these circumstances we knew that an attack might be expected, and experienced all that anxiety, mingled with exhilaration, which generally moves the bosoms of men in such circumstances.

About one o'clock, the brigade received orders to march, and we moved about two miles nearer to the city, and halted for an hour, during which the Paymaster, as usual, on the twenty-fourth of the month, made his muster, selon les règles. We then returned to our former quarters, and passed a night of discomfort as great as the preceding. Our only anxiety was, that the enemy might move, in order to escape from the miserable hovel, in which, by the chances of the service, we had been condemned to find a local habitation. Yes; a soldier, it must be owned, is occasionally something of a selfish being. I do believe, that intelligence of the slaughter of thousands would have cost myself or my three companions less uneasiness than did the prospect of being condemned for a night or two to the occupation of this abominable quarter.

Marmont, on the present occasion, was so obliging as to concede the object of our wishes. An hour before daylight, a loud knocking was heard at our door, which we speedily ascertained to proceed from the orderly man of the company, who came with orders for the officers instantly to get ready, and the baggage to be loaded without signal of drum or bugle. In our circumstances, over-sleeping was out of the question, and portmanteaus being duly packed, we sallied forth from our miserable hovel; and the battalion being speedily formed, we marched instantly to the alarm post. There we joined the remainder of the brigade, and subsequently advanced to a height in front of the village, which commanded a complete view of Ciudad Rodrigo, the object to which our eyes were turned with natural anxiety. Night was fast veering into day as we reached it. The sun rose majestically behind the city, illumining its dark towers with a flood of splen-dour, as he held on his course towards the zenith. Nothing could be finer; but our attention was speedily diverted from such matters, by perceiving that all the roads leading from Ciudad Rodrigo, towards the frontiers of Portugal, were covered with the enemy. Our brigade formed the right of the line, and though the enemy were yet five miles distant, from our elevated position we commanded a fine view of this movement. I certainly never witnessed any spectacle more grand and impressive. Their masses came on in the most imposing order and regularity, with the brazen helmets of their heavy cavalry glittering very gloriously in the sunshine. While I gazed on them, my schoolboy learning came back on me, and I thought of the Roman legions,—but not long, for I well knew that the legions I beheld were not invincible as those.

Whatever the course of my reflections on the scene before me might have been, they were cut short by the appearance of Lord Wellington, who just then rode up, and passing through our regiment, then formed in open column of companies, called loudly for General Colville. The General soon came up at full speed, and Lord Wellington remained for a minute or two—certainly not more—regarding the enemy, without the aid of the telescope, though an orderly was in attendance with that instrument, and its tripodal support. During this brief period, he appeared to have formed his resolution as to our destination, for enquiring what regiments were there, and being told the 5th, 77th, 83d, and 94th, he directed General Colville to proceed with the 5th and 77th to a height at some distance on the left, which completely commanded a road leading from Ciudad Rodrigo to Fuentes Guinaldo. As for us, we were directed to commence our march in the same direction, when the advanced detachment of the brigade should have reached a certain point of their progress.*

At length we too moved off, I hope in such order as to give the enemy, who witnessed all our motions, a good opinion of our discipline. At that interesting moment, there were no skulkers or stragglers. Our route lay across a deep ravine, the ascent on the farther side of which was so steep and difficult, that though the troops moved with all possible alacrity, nearly an hour elapsed before we succeeded in crowning the summit of the height. The object of this movement was to bring the enemy as much as possible on our right, as the route of retreat on Guinaldo lay entirely on the left.

On reaching the apex of the ascent, a new scene opened to us. We saw the great body of the French cavalry close in our front, and divided from us only by a ravine, ready, on the signal being given, to execute a charge. About half a league to the left, we observed the other two regiments of our brigade already under a heavy cannonade from the enemy, whose position along the whole extent of the line was divided from ours by the ravine already mentioned. The spectacle in this quarter, however, became soon more interesting. The two regiments, though posted on a height of difficult ascent, were charged very gallantly by a large body of cavalry, who succeeded in driving the Portuguese gunners from their posts. This was awkward, but a volley from the 5th regiment repaired all. Many of the enemy fell, and the 5th, advancing with the bayonet, drove them back in great confusion across the ravine.

It was not, however, the intention of Lord Wellington to give battle in the position we had assumed; and the different divisions had received orders to fall back, when pressed by the enemy, to Guinaldo. There, a ridge of commanding ground had been strengthened by fieldworks and intrenchments, and on that ground Lord Wellington had determined to keep Marmont at bay, should it be found necessary for his purposes. We had scarcely, therefore, enjoyed the pleasant spectacle of the severe check given to the enemy's cavalry by the charge of the 5th, when we again found ourselves in motion towards our left, retreating on Guinaldo.

You already know that our brigade formed the extreme right of the army, and, when put in motion, we of course formed the rear of the column. We moved on in squares of battalion—a squadron of the 11th Light Dragoons, and another of the 1st German Hussars—all the cavalry we had in this quarter—skirmishing with great gallantry along the flanks of our line of march. But it was impossible that so small a body could make head against the vast masses of the enemy's horse which now came on. In a few minutes, their leading squadrons were within an hundred yards of us, and in a few more, our three weak battalions, the 83d, 94th, and 9th Portuguese, were completely surrounded. At this interesting—nay, that is not strong enough—this awful moment, we had no officer at our head, on whose talent, promptitude, or experience, it was possible to rely. Major—— was a brave man, but utterly devoid of all other attributes of a gifted commander. However, on the present occasion, we had no cause to complain of him. He addressed the men in the native Doric of his country—the major is a Scotchman—told them to take good aim, and not to waste their “pouther;” and I doubt if Cæsar himself, in such circumstances, could have said any thing much more to the purpose.

In this manner did we move for the space of two miles, surrounded by upwards of forty squadrons of horse, who executed repeated and desperate charges on our squares. In every one of these they were repulsed. Men of iron could not have awaited their enemy more firmly and steadily. On came the French cavalry, like successive waves of the ocean, to be broken on the rock of brave hearts and strong arms, which we opposed to their progress. One tremendous charge I remember. It was made by a battalion of Cuirassiers, fine-looking men, and bravely caparisoned. At some distance we gave them a volley, but this had not the effect of checking their progress. At length they reached the barrier of bayonets, on which, by another yard of advance, they must have been impaled, and, diverging in their course, they galloped round the square, encountering the fire of each face, vainly looking for an aperture by which they might dash through our ranks. Repulsed in all their efforts, they at length retired, leaving the ground covered with the bodies of men and horses. I do believe I felt more for the latter than for the former. There is something indescribably touching to me in the sufferings of a horse. Never does a cry of pain escape from this noble and unrepining animal, that is not torn from it by the very extremity of anguish. And then the expression of eye, and the agonized dilation of nostril which mark its countenance!—But if I go further into this matter, I shall get into the melting mood, and that is not my cue at the present moment.

Well, on we continued to march, I believe without loss, though surrounded by clouds of foemen, and to carry on the simile, making a little thunder in our progress. On that day, every man of us was a cheap bargain to the king, to say nothing of my own services, valued only by his majesty at six and sixpence a-day. But our situation, though honourable, was not pleasant. There was the disagreeable conviction, that a single coward might cost the loss of a battalion; for the slightest symptom of confusion, or an aperture a yard broad, would have done the business. Well, on we marched, but the French flying artillery contrived at length to get up, and then came a trial even more severe than those to which we had already been exposed. Their guns opened fire on our dense and crowded squares. One shot, I remember, swept through us, laying fifteen of our number prostrate in the dust. The other regiments were even less fortunate, I believe, and the number of their casualties were greater. But the places of our fallen brethren were immediately filled up, and our aspect to the enemy was not less formidable than before.

Such was our situation when we were joined by the 88th and 45th, which had been dispatched by Lord Wellington to our support. Our force then began to be more effective, and the remainder of our retreat was effected in comparative security. Only one misfortune occurred that I remember. Some ammunition mules, and a few stragglers from the other brigades, were moving up after their regiments by the road to Guinaldo, on our left, apparently little aware of the near proximity of the French cavalry. Your English soldier is the stupidest brute alive. These numskulls kept lounging along at their leisure, and because they did not see an enemy before their noses, never thought of looking for him on either flank. It seems rather odd that the French should have thought it worth while to charge such boobies, but they did so. Suddenly, about thirty of the Polish lancers started from one of the French columns, and making a sweep on our left, at full speed, with the long tails of their horses floating in the air, and red flags waving at the extremity of their lances, came ad improviso on the unfortunate stragglers, who, without means of resistance, became the instant victims of their own stupidity. One man in particular I watched with my eye. He literally continued marching in ignorance of the impending attack, till pierced from behind by the lance of an assailant.

Such, my dear aunt, was the affair of El Bodon, not destined probably to make any great figure in the gazette, yet one which those engaged in it may be excused for relating with some share of pride. Last night the whole army, with the exception of the light division, still on t'other side of the Agueda, halted in position at Guinaldo. We expected that the enemy would have attacked us this morning, but our hopes have not been realised. Marmont contented himself with an exhibition of his force, which, as if for our amusement, he caused to perform a variety of manœuvres in front of our position. Nothing could be finer. The French infantry went through all its evolutions with the greatest precision, and the movements of the cavalry, making due allowance for the badness of their horses, were also laudable. In the meantime, what either Marmont or Lord Wellington intend to do next, we know no more than men dropped from the moon. A few hours, however, will probably reveal something of our leader's intentions, and as the post does not leave the army for a few days, I shall keep this letter open, in hopes of having something interesting to communicate. In the meanwhile, God bless you, my dear aunt.

October 1st.—The 26th, as I have already told you, passed over in unbroken tranquillity, unmarked on our side by the occurrence of any event save the arrival of the light division, for the safety of which very serious apprehensions were entertained. The case was as follows:—By some mistake, General Crawford, who was still on t'other side the Agueda, did not receive orders to retreat, till all the other divisions had fallen back on Guinaldo, and feeling apprehensive that in crossing that river at Robleda, he might be intercepted, he determined to fall back along the right bank of the river, not being aware that General Foy, then in the neighbourhood of Perales, might thus cut off his retreat. Lord Wellington, however, was aware of this, and orders were instantly dispatched to General Crawford, directing him to retrace his steps, and cross by the ford of Robleda. This fortunately was effected without opposition of any kind, and the light division joined the army on the evening of the 26th.

Hitherto, the whole object of Lord Wellington's manœuvres had been to ascertain the enemy's intention, and the position of Guinaldo had only been strengthened to serve as a point d'appui, by means of which he might be enabled to keep out a strong advanced corps to the latest moment. But Guinaldo was in no respect the position in which Lord Wellington had decided on meeting Marmont, and the untoward absence of the light division had alone decided him to remain in it even for a day. That portion of the army, therefore, was no sooner out of jeopardy, than we found ourselves again in motion, followed closely by Marmont, whose boldness seemed to increase with each successive step of our retrogression. During this movement, our division and General Cole's formed the rear corps of the army. On the 27th, the enemy made a powerful attack on Aldea de Ponte, a village occupied by General Cole. The suddenness and vigour of this attack, made it at first successful. The 4th division were ousted, but returning to the charge, the enemy in their turn were beaten back, and the village, in spite of all their efforts, remained in our possession.

At night we continued our retreat, and by day-dawn, had reached a position on the heights behind Solto, in which Lord Wellington had evidently resolved to offer battle. The ground we occupied was certainly strong. It extended across a sort of delta, formed by an inflection of the Coa, which thus afforded protection to both flanks, and prevented the possibility of its being turned. But this, which constituted the strength, constituted also the danger, of the position. In case of defeat, the river in rear and flanks being unfordable, cut off all chance of retreat, so we had nothing to look to (when, indeed, did a British army look to any thing else?) but fighting it out to the last. Should the enemy succeed in forcing the position at any one point, it was all over with us, and I may also say, with John Bull, whose game would have been up, and then, who but Nap? We all knew, therefore—those of us, at least, endowed with any moderate degree of military acumen—that we had nothing for it but the old proverb, “Pull, baker, pull, devil;” and leaving the character of devil to the French, which they better deserved, we prepared, in the former capacity, for a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether.

Whether Marmont knew this or not, I cannot pretend to predicate of that notable—I here take credit for resisting the temptation of a pun—General, but this I know, that after surveying our position, he did not venture to attack it, and fell back, it may be presumed, somewhat chop-fallen, when confronted by that enemy whom he had hitherto made every demonstration of desiring to engage in pitched battle. He has accordingly retired to the neighbourhood of Ciudad Rodrigo. We have been marched back to our former cantonments;—and so, my dear aunt, concludes the memorable campaign of 1811, the result of which has been, to free the whole of Portugal from the enemy. What the next may bring forth, is still, as the poet says, “Far in the womb of time;” but surely the annals of that portion of the struggle already past, authorizes us to look forward to it with hope, as to a period when British prowess will enjoy fresh opportunities of vindicating, against a barbarous and vindictive enemy, the pure and holy cause of freedom and justice. All we ask, is a fair field and no favour, in which, if by God’s blessing we cannot do ourselves right, then the best policy of England is to truckle to Bonaparte, and be quiet. But I am getting on high matters, and as usual in such a case, becoming prosy. It is therefore high time to stop; but were it not so, O’Malley, my worthy and intelligent servant, has just announced that dinner, consisting of ration-beef and rice-pudding, is on the table, and truly, never did the voice of that trusty functionary sound more musical in my ear.—Farewell, then, my dear aunt, and believe me ever, &c.

SPENCER MOGGRIDGE.

TO LITTLE MARY.

I’m bidden, little Mary!
 To write verses upon thee;
 I’d fain obey the bidding
 If it rested but with me:
 But the Mistresses I’m bound to,
 (Nine Ladies hard to please,)
 Of all their stores poetic,
 So closely keep the keys,
 It’s only now and then,
 By good luck as one may say,
 That a couplet or a rhyme or two,
 Falls fairly in my way.

Fruit forced is never half so sweet
 As that comes quite in season—
 But some folks must be satisfied
 With rhyme in spite of reason.
 So, Muses! now befriend me,
 Albeit of help so chary,
 To string the pearls of poesie,
 For loveliest Little Mary.

And yet, ye pagan Damsels !
 Not over fond am I,
 T' invoke your haughty favours,
 Your fount of Castaly.
 I've sipt a purer fountain,
 I've deck'd a holier shrine,
 I own a mightier Mistress—
 O Nature ! T'hou art mine.
 And Feeling's fount, than Castaly
 Yields waters more divine !

And only to that well-head,
 Sweet Mary ! I'll resort,
 For just an artless verse or two,
 A simple strain and short,
 Befitting well a Pilgrim
 Way-worn with earthly strife,
 To offer thee, young Traveller !
 In the morning track of life.

There's many a one will tell thee,
 'Tis all with roses gay—
 There's many a one will tell thee,
 'Tis thorny all the way—
 Deceivers are they every one,
 Dear Child ! who thus pretend ;
 God's ways are not unequal—
 Make Him thy trusted friend,
 And many a path of pleasantness
 He'll clear away for thee,
 However dark and intricate
 The labyrinth may be.

I need not wish thee beauty—
 I need not wish thee grace—
 Already both are budding
 In that infant form and face.
 I will not wish thee grandeur—
 I will not wish thee wealth—
 But only a contented heart,
 Peace—competence—and health—
 Fond friends to love thee dearly,
 And honest friends to chide,
 And faithful ones to cleave to thee,
 Whatever may betide.

And now, my little Mary !
 If better things remain,
 Unheeded in my blindness,
 Unnoticed in my strain,
 I'll sum them up succinctly,
 In "English undefiled,"
 My Mother tongue's best benison,—
 God bless thee—precious Child !

THE ORIGIN OF THE FAIRIES.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

I HAVE heard a wondrous old relation,
 How the Fairies first came to our nation ;
 A tale of glamour, and yet of glee,
 Of fervour, of love, and of mystery.
 I do not vouch for its certain truth,
 But I know I believed it in my youth ;
 And envied much the enchanted Knight,
 Who enjoy'd such beauty and pure delight.
 I will tell it now, and interlard it
 With thoughts with which I still regard it,
 And feelings with which first I heard it.

The Knight of Dumblane is a hunting gone,
 With his hey! and his ho! and hallo!
 And he met a merry maid alone,
 In the light green and the yellow.
 That maiden's eyes were the pearls of dew,
 And her cheek the moss-rose opening new ;
 Her smile was the sun-blink on the brae,
 When the shower is past, and the cloud away.
 And then her form was so light and fair,
 That it seem'd to lean on the ambient air ;
 So very blithesome and so boon,
 That the Knight was afraid it would fade too soon ;
 Mount on the ether from human ken,
 Or melt away in the breeze of the glen.
 His frame thrill'd to the very core
 When he saw that beauty stand him before,
 With the gleam of joy on her brow so meek,
 And the dimple on her damask cheek.
 And then so ripe was her honey lip,
 That the wild-bee, lingering, long'd to sip ;
 And the merl came by with an eye of guile,
 For he hover'd and lighted down a while
 On the snowy veil in which she was dress'd,
 To pick the strawberries from her breast.
 O was there aught below the heaven
 I would not have done, or would not have given,
 To have been the Knight of Dumblane that day!—
 But 'twas better for me that I was away.

The Knight came nigh, and essay'd to speak,
 But the glamour of love was on his cheek ;
 And a single word he could not say,
 For his tongue in thirsty silence lay.
 But he doff'd his cap from his manly brow,
 And he bow'd as low as a knight could bow,
 Then stood with his velvet cap in hand,
 As waiting for the maiden's command.

Sure this was witless as could have been,
 I cannot conceive what the Knight could mean ;
 For had I been there, in right or wrong,
 As sure as I sing you this song,
 I would, as the most due respect,
 Have twined my arms around her neck ;
 And sure as man e'er woo'd a maid,
 Have row'd her in my shepherd plaid,
 And in token of my high regard,
 Have set her down on the flowery sward,

And if some discourse had not begun,
 Either in quarrel or in fun,
 Take never a shepherd's word again,
 And count my skill in wooing vain;
 All this I would have done with speed—
 But for ever would have rued the deed.

Oh, never was knight so far o'ercome
 As he who now stood blushing and dumb
 Before this maid of the moorland brake,
 With the cherub eye and the angel make.
 At first no higher his glance was thrown
 Than the flowery heath that her foot stood on;
 When by degrees it embraced her toe,
 But over the ankle durst not go;
 Till at length he stammer'd out modestly,
 "Pray—madam—have you—any commands for me?"

Shame fa' the Knight! I do declare
 I have no patience with him to bear;
 For I would have look'd, as a man should do,
 From the shoe-tie to the glancing brow;
 Nay, from the toe's bewitching station
 Even to the organ of veneration.
 For what avails the loveliest face,
 Or form of the most bewitching grace,
 Which on earth are made for man alone,
 If they are not to be look'd upon?
 Yes, I would have look'd till my sight had rack'd,
 And the very organs of vision crack'd,
 And I would have sworn, as a man should swear,
 That I never saw virgin half so fair:
 This I had done, despite all pain,
 But, ah! I never had done it again!

But the maid was delighted beyond expression
 To mark the young Knight's prepossession,
 And with a smile that might have given
 Some pangs even to a thing of heaven,
 She took so moving a position
 That set his soul in full ignition:
 One limb alone scarce press'd the ground,
 The other twined her ankle round;
 Her lovely face was upward cast;
 Her sunny locks waved in the blast;
 And really she appear'd to be
 A being divine—about to flee
 Away from this world of self and sin,
 A lovelier, holier clime to win.
 No posture with that can ever compare—
 What a mercy that I was not there!
 But he raised his eyes as hers withdrew,
 And of her form got one full view:
 The taper limb, and the slender waist,
 The modest mould of her virgin breast,
 The lips just opening with a smile,
 And that eye upraised to heaven the while;
 The purple tides were seen to entwine
 In a thousand veins all crystalline!
 Enough! The sequence is too true:
 For though the Knight got but one view,
 One full intoxicating look,
 It was more than his fond heart could brook;
 For on the ground he fell as dead
 As he had been shot out through the head.

Now this was rather a sad o'erthrow;
 I don't think I would have fallen so;
 For though a lovely virgin face
 Has sometimes put me in piteous case,
 Has made me shed salt tears outright,
 And sob like the wind on a winter night,
 Nay, thrown me into a burning fever,
 Yet I never just went off altogether;
 But I have reason, without a flam,
 Thankful to be—and so I am—
 That I was spared the illusive sight
 That was seen by that enchanted Knight.

Now it seems that the maiden to fear began
 For the life of that young and comely man;
 And every art essay'd to try
 To make him uplift his amorous eye.
 But in reality, or in mime,
 The swoon continued a weary time.
 And better had it been if he had never
 Re-open'd his eyes, but slept for ever;
 For when next they awoke on the light of day,
 His cheek on the maiden's bosom lay.
 He felt its warmth new life impart,
 And the gentle throbs of her beating heart;
 He felt beneath his aching head,
 The enchanting mould that had laid him dead;
 He felt her hand his temples chafing,
 And every tenderness vouchsafing;
 He lifted his head—he hid his face—
 And stole his cheek from that witching place;
 Yet still he cast, though disinclined,
 A longing, lingering glance behind,
 Where he saw—but I dare not describe the view,
 For if you are a man it will kill you too;
 If you are a woman, and lovely bride,
 You will turn up your nose in disdain and pride.
 If you are not, without a frown,
 You will laugh at the Knight till you fall down;
 For true it is, when the Knight had seen
 The beauteous bed where his cheek had been,
 The blush, and the smile, and the lucid vein,
 He gave one shriek, with might and main,
 Then shiver'd a space—and died again!

From that time forth, if I durst tell,
 Unto that Knight such hap befell,
 As never was own'd by mortal man,
 And never was told since tales began.
 He got his wish—It proved a dear one,
 It is an old story, and a queer one;
 But free of fear, and free of fetter,
 I'll tell it out even to the letter—
 The wilder 'tis I love it the better

We all have heard the maxim old,
 That a tale of truth should aye be told;
 For nothing in nature happen can,
 That may not a lesson prove to man:
 Now this is true:—Yet things, we ken,
 Oft happen between the women and men,
 So wild, romantic, and precarious,
 So complicated, and contrarious;

So full of passion and of pain,
 They scarcely can bear to be told again.
 Then think of love 'twixt a mortal creature,
 And a being of another nature!

The Knight was lost—that very morn,
 Rung the last peal of his hunting horn;
 His comrades range the mountain reign,
 And call his name, but call in vain;
 From his hawks and his hounds he is borne away,
 And lost for a twelvemonth and a day;
 And all that time, he lived but to prove
 The new delights and the joys of love—
 His mistress, a pattern of sweetness and duty,
 And her home a palace of splendour and beauty.
 But whether it was in the sinful clime
 That bounds mortality and time,
 In a land below, or a land above,
 In a bower of the moon, or the star of love,
 He never could fathom or invent,
 Or the way that he came, or the way that he went;
 But he ween'd, from his love's aerial nature,
 That she barely could be a mortal creature.

And every night in his ears there rung
 The accents sweet of the female tongue;
 Light sounds of joy through the dome were ringing—
 There was laughing, dancing, harping, singing;
 But foot of man in the halls was none,
 Nor sound of voice but his own alone:
 While every night his beloved dame
 In new array to his chamber came;
 And, save herself, by day or night,
 No other form ever met his sight.
 So ween'd the Knight; but his mind was shaken,
 And, alas! how far he was mistaken!
 For love's full overwhelming tide
 O'er the mind of man is hard to bide.
 Yet this full fraught of delirious joy,
 Without reverse and without alloy,
 I would once have liked to have essay'd,
 But at last—how I had been dismay'd!

The times soon changed, for by slow decay,
 The sounds of joy were melted away
 To a tremulous strain of tender wailing
 Of sufferings for a former failing;
 While something was sung, in a plaintive key,
 Of a most mysterious tendency,
 Of beings, who were not of the earth,
 To human creatures giving birth;
 Of seven pure beings of purity shorn,
 Of seven babes that might be born,
 The nurslings of another clime,
 By creatures of immortal prime,
 Of the mother's thrilling fears, and more
 Of the dark uncertainty before!
 The Knight then dreaded, as well might he,
 That things were not as things should be,
 And a hearty wish rose in his mind,
 That he were at the home he left behind.
 To wish, and to have, in the charmed ring
 Of that sweet dome, was the self-same thing;
 For the Knight awaken'd, as from a dream,
 And he stood by the wild and mossy stream,

Where first he felt the bewitching power
 Of the beauteous maid at the morning hour,
 Where he fell a victim to beauty's charms,
 And died of love in a virgin's arms!
 He sought his halls and his stately bower,
 But a solemn stillness seem'd to lour
 Around his towers and turrets high:
 His favourite hound would not come nigh,
 But kept aloof with a murmuring growl,
 And a terror his heart could not control;
 For he prick'd up his ears, and snuff'd the wind,
 Though he heard his master's voice behind,
 Then fled with his bristles of dread unfurl'd,
 As from a thing of another world.

And every maiden, and every man,
 Away from their master in terror ran;
 While his aged mother, in weeds of wo,
 Conjured him solemnly to go
 Back to his grave, and his place of rest!
 For her mind with terror was sore oppress'd.
 But there he remain'd, and once again
 Was hail'd as the true Knight of Dunblane.

But, oh! how changed in every feature,
 And all the vehemencies of his nature,
 As if an eagle from cliffs above
 Had been changed into a plaintive dove;
 From a knight of courage and of glee,
 He was grown a thing of perplexity,
 Absent and moping, pining, panting,
 A vacant gaze, and the heart awanting:
 Earth had no pleasures for his eye,
 When he thought of the joys that were gone by.
 This to some natures may be genial,
 Or, as a failing, counted venial;
 For me, I judge the prudent way,
 Let past time have been what it may,
 Is to make the most, with thankful mind,
 Of that which still remains behind.

The Knight lived on as scarce aware,
 How long I neither know nor care,
 Till at the last, one lovely morn,
 The fairest lady that ever was born
 Came into his bower with courtesy bland,
 And a lovely boy was in either hand;
 Two tiny elves alike, not less
 Than twin flowers of the wilderness.

"Thou art my lord, my own true knight,
 Whose love was once my sole delight.
 Oh, I recall—how can I not?—
 That morning never to be forgot,
 When I met thee first with horn and hound
 Upon the moor to the hunting bound,
 When thy steed like lightning fled away,
 And thy staghound howl'd and would not stay;
 Thou stolest the heart that never had birth,
 The heart of a being not of this earth:
 And what is more, that heart to wring,
 The virtue of an immortal thing.
 Dost thou own these babes in the gold and green,
 The loveliest twins that the world has seen;
 Wilt thou here acknowledge us as thine own,
 Or bear the brunt of our malison?"

Then the Knight shed tears of joy apace
 At seeing again that lovely face;
 And his heart with love was sore oppress'd
 As he fold'd the fair dame to his breast:
 "Thou art my lady love," said he,
 "And I never loved another but thee!"

"Alas, how blind are earthly eyes
 To those that are lighted by other skies,
 By other breezes, untainted by sin,
 And by other spirits that dwell within,
 Well might thy raptures of pleasures be Sublimed by creatures such as we:"
 The lady said with an eye of shame,
 When enter'd another most comely dame,
 As like to the first as she could be,
 As like as cherries on the same tree;
 While hanging on either hand were seen
 Two lovely babies in gold and green.

"Thou art my own true lord and love,"
 The second said, "and thou wilt approve
 This dear love-token, I chang'd with thee,
 When sitting in the bower upon thy knee."
 The Knight acknowledged the token rare,
 And flew to embrace his lady fair;
 But remembrance came with a thrilling pain,
 That instead of a lady he now had twain,
 And instead of two babies of beauty and grace,
 There were four all looking him in the face.
 He stood like a statue, of sense bereft—
 He look'd to the right and then to the left,
 But one from the other he could not know,
 They were both the same, and yet there were two.
 While thus he stood prepared for shrift,
 In came a third—a fourth—a fifth—
 A sixth—a seventh! All round they stand,
 And each had a baby in either hand,—
 And each had her love-tokens to display,
 Which the Knight acknowledged without delay.
 But how that maid he met on the hill,
 And loved so dearly, and loved her still,
 Had thus the powers of nature outdone,
 And multiplied into twenty and one—
 Why, that was more than he could believe,
 Than his head could frame, or his heart conceive;
 And still he cast his eye to the door,
 Distrustful that there were not more.

His lady mother at length attended,
 And her courtesies were with wonder blended,
 To see such beauty in such array,
 Seven dames all lovely as morns of May,
 With fourteen babies in a ring,
 And all like the children of a king;
 And she laid on her son her quick behests,
 To tell her the quality of their guests.

"Why, mother, 'tis strange as strange can be,
 And yet it is truth I tell to thee,
 That all these dames of beauty so bright,
 Claim me for their own true lord and knight;
 Nay, and I may not deny it neither,
 And all these children call me father.
 But I swear by my vows of morn and even,
 And I swear before the throne of Heaven,

That I never knew of daughter nor son,
Nor of a love save only one;
There is glamour abroad in moor and glen,
And enchantment in all the walks of men."

"Why, son, it has often been told to me,
That you never could learn to multiply.
Your bold advancement now I greet;
It is practice that makes the man complete."
This said, the dame with a sullen smile,
And a gloom upon her brow the while;
For she soon perceived by dint of lore,
That the seven weird sisters stood her before,
Who had dwelt in enchanted bower sublime,
From the ages of an early time,
Condemn'd for an unhallow'd love
Endless virginity to prove,
And endless longings for bliss to be,
In their palace of painful luxury,
Unless a mortal knight should fall
In their love-snares, and wed them all.
And for all this numerous comely birth,
She knew that her son was lost to earth,
And perchance would be caught in enchantment's thrall,
And lost to heaven—the worst of all.

"My son," she said, "since so it be
That all this comely progeny
Are here acknowledged to be thine,
Before they can be received as mine,
I have lock'd the doors, the gates, and all
And here within this stately hall
They shall kneel before a sacred sign,
And be christen'd by a name divine."

Then a shriek arose from the lovely train,
Was never heard such a yell of pain,
Till the gorgeous cieling that glow'd o'erhead
Was shiver'd like an autumn reed,
And the images all prostrate lay,
And the casements of the tower gave way,
And the lovely train, all three by three,
Walk'd forth in beauty and in glee;
While many a glance they cast behind,
As they trode the billows of the wind;
For they danced as lightly through the air
As if heaved on the gilded gossamer,
That play'd with a soft and silent motion,
Like the gentlest swell that woos the ocean;
And many an eye beheld them fly,
And heard this plaintive melody:

"Now we are free, now we are free,
We seven sisters now are free,
To fly where we long have wish'd to be;
And here we have these babies of ours,
To dwell within our shady bowers,
And play their pranks in the moonlight dell,
With the human beings they love so well;
For O, they are babies of marvellous birth;
They are neither of heaven nor yet of earth;
And whether they will live till time be done,
Or fade away in a beam of the sun,
Or mount on the polar heights sublime,
And to worlds of unknown splendour climb,

Is a mystery which no eye can pierce
 But His, the Lord of the universe :
 But this we know, that above or below,
 By the doors of death they shall never go.

"Adieu, our sweet little babies, for ever !

Blithe be your lives, and sinful never ;
 You may play your pranks on the wicked and wild,
 But wrong not virtue's sacred child,—
 So shall your frolics be lightsome and boon
 On the bridge of the rainbow or beam of the moon ;
 And so shall your loves in the bridal bowers
 Be sweeter still than your father's and ours,
 And the breezes shall rock you to soft repose
 In the lap of the lily or breast of the rose,
 And your beauty every eve renew
 As you bathe your forms in the fragrant dew,
 That stands a heavenly crystal bell
 In the little dew-cup's lovely well ;
 Your drink be the haze on the moonlight rill,
 And your food the odour which flowers distil,
 And never let robes your forms adorn
 That are not from the web of the rainbow shorn,
 Or the purple and green that shines afar
 In the breast of the eastern harvest star ;
 And then shall you ride o'er land and o'er tide,
 O'er cloud, and o'er foam of the firmament wide,
 O'er tree and o'er torrent, o'er flood and o'er flaine,
 And THE FAIRIES shall be your earthly name :
 In joy and in glee your revels shall be,
 Till a day shall arrive that we darkly foresee ;
 But note you well when these times commence,
 And prepare for your departure hence.

"When the psalms and the prayers are nightly heard
 From the mossy cave or the lonely sward ;
 When the hunters of men rise with the sun,
 And pursue their game till the day be done ;
 And the mountain burns have a purple stain
 With the blood of men in the moorland slain ;
 And the raven croaks in the darksome cloud,
 And the eagle yells in the heavens aloud,
 We you command, with heart and hand,
 To leave the links of fair Scotland.
 Away ! dismiss ! and seek for bliss
 In a happier, holier sphere than this !

"Sweet babies, adieu ! and may you never rue
 The mingled existence we leave to you.
 There is part of virtue and part of blame,
 Part of spirit and part of flame,
 Part of body and passion fell,
 Part of heaven and part of hell.
 You are babies of beauty and babies of wonder,
 But fly from the cloud of the lightning and thunder,
 And keep by the moonbeam or twilight grey,
 For you never were made for the light of day.
 Long may you amid your offspring dwell,— Babies of beauty, kiss and farewell !"

The Knight of Dumblane from that day forth
 Never utter'd word upon the earth ;
 But moved about like a spirit in pain
 For certain days, then vanish'd again,
 And was chosen, as my old legend says,
 The patriarch King of the Scottish Fays,

With full command o'er these beings strange;
But his human nature never would change,
Till, at the end of a thousand moons,
All deck'd with garlands and gay festoons,
He was borne away with lament and yell,
And paid as kane to the Prince of Hell!

From such unhallow'd love as this,
With all its splendour and all its bliss,
Its end of terror and its bane,
The Lord preserve us all!—Amen.

ALTRIVE LAKE, July 10, 1830.

THE TEAR.

I WAS led in a dream to the gate of the Upper Heaven, and I saw many sights on which I must be silent; and I heard many sweet sounds, like the voices of angels, hynning to their lyres. And the seraph Uriel was with me, for he is the regent of the sun, and the conductor of errant sojourners through the paths of Infinity. And the light of Heaven dazzled mine eyes long before I reached its glorious portal; and I must have sunk beneath its insufferable splendour, had not the angel shaded me with his ambrosial wings, and touched mine eyes with balm of amarant, which only grows in Heaven. And when he touched them with this balm, I felt them strengthened, and I could gaze undazzled on any part of the bright Kingdom save one; and I asked Uriel the cause of this surpassing light, and he said it was the light of the Sanctuary. And, lo! at the gate of Heaven stood a pedestal of jasper, and on this pedestal a vessel of pure sapphire, encircled with gold—and within this vessel lay a tear, which evaporated not in the light of Heaven, but remained the same for ever. And I said unto the angel, "Whence cometh this tear?" And he answered, "From the eye of an earth-born maiden, named Leila; if thou wouldst know more of this tear, speak to it—it will answer thee." Then I marvelled, saying, "Can a tear answer?"—"Yea," responded Uriel, "this tear is not as other tears,—it hath a spirit within it, and a voice, for the sake of the maiden Leila by whom it was shed." Then, methinks, I spoke to the tear, and a voice arose from its bed of sapphire in reply.

BARD.

Crystal gem of mortal birth,
Fairer than the gems of earth,
Was it Grief that bade thee mount
Upwards from thy coral fount?
Was it Care, with dewy sigh,
Moulded thee on Leila's eye?

TEAR.

Minstrel, nay, it was not Care
With his breath that framed me there;
Neither did I quit my fount,
From its crystal floor to mount,
(Like the dew on autumn's leaf,)
By the sceptred spell of Grief.

BARD.

Jewel of a maiden fair,
Was it Mirth that brought thee here?
Was it touch of Laughter's spell
That o'erflow'd thine azure well?

TEAR.

Neither Mirth invoked me here,
(Yet thou seest I am a tear,)
Nor Despair's terrific dart
Bade me from my fountain start;

Tear like me had never birth
 Or by Sorrow or by Mirth.
 Whilome was my fountain dry,
 Laughter beam'd in Leila's eye;
 Round her bosom Joy was slung,
 Mirth was floating on her tongue;
 And her step was gay and light,
 And her eye was pure and bright;
 And her soul, with Rapture fraught,
 Harbour'd no desponding thought;
 But a vision of Distress
 Came athwart her loveliness,
 Like a thunder-cloud in June,
 Or a mist before the moon:
 Straight the voice of Pity fell
 O'er her spirit, as a spell,
 And her eye distill'd a tear
 Lovelier than Grief may rear:
 Unto me the power was given
 Leila's cause to plead in Heaven,
 For I have been shed upon
 Others' sorrows—not her own.

And I inclined my head while the voice was yet speaking; and it seemed to come from the drop within the vessel of sapphire—and I knew the tear to be a spirit. And I said to Uriel, "Do all tears find their way to Heaven?" But he answered, "Nay—none but those of compassion: all other tears perish, as a drop of water, when they are shed; but those of pity come hither, and, after sojourning for a season at the gate of Heaven, lo! some of them are changed into jewels, and hang upon the crowns of the archangels; others are mingled with the fountain of benevolence, and they all plead with seraphic tongues for those that shed them." And I knew from this response of the angel that there were no tears like those of compassion.

A MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

THE VALE OF PINES.

How soft is the sound of the river,
 Stealing down through the green piny vale,
 Where the sunbeams of eventide quiver
 Through the scarce stirring foliage, and ever
 The cooing dove plains out its tale;
 While the blackbird melodiously sings
 An anthem, reminding of innocent things.

Grey Evening comes onward, and scatters
 The fires in the western serene;
 And the shadows of Lebanon's daughters,
 Darkly imaged, outspread on the waters,
 Festoon'd with their outlines of green;
 The clouds journey past, and below
 Are reflected their masses of crimson and snow.

Oh sweet is the vision that loses
 Present cares in the glow of the past!
 As the light of Reflection reposes
 On youth, with its blossoming roses,
 And sunshine too lovely to last:
 Sweet dreams! that have sparkled and gone,
 Like torrents of blue over ledges of stone!

But why should break forth our repining
 O'er what we have loved and have lost?
 Whether fortune be shaded or shining,
 Our destinies bright or declining,
 Our visions accomplish'd or cross—

It is ours to be calm and resign'd,
Faith's star beaming clear on the night of the mind.

When morning awoke on the ocean,
Dim tempests were louring around :
Yet see, with how steadfast a motion,
As the clouds bend and glow with devotion,
The sun his asylum hath found !
Twilight weeps ; and all gorgeously red
Are the smooth sloping vale, and the tall mountain-head.

Lo ! thus, when the clouds of life's sorrow
Have pass'd and have perish'd, the sky
An added effulgence shall borrow
From the storms that have flown, and the morrow
Gleam bright in eternity's eye ;
And the Angel of Righteousness send
His balm to that heart which is true to the end !

Δ.

SUNSET, AFTER RAIN.

THE shower hath drifted o'er ; the blue
Of cloudless heaven shines softly through ;
Still is the air, the sea is calm,
The bright-bloom'd flowers outbreathing balm :
And from the west, with orange ray,
Serenely clear and calmly gay,
The sun looks forth o'er ocean's isles,
O'er earth and heaven, and, setting, smiles.

What though the day in clouds hath pass'd,
Though dripp'd the rain, and roar'd the blast,
Though morning's orient flag unfurl'd
Scarce awed the shades that dimm'd the world,
And fire-eyed noon's resplendent car
Plough'd vainly through deep mists afar—
This scene of beauty and delights,
And evening radiance, well requites
For dreary doubts and boding gloom,
And dreams whose dwelling was the tomb.

The murmuring bee from flower to flower
Is roaming round the blossom's bower,—
The clustering bower, where jasmine wreath
Is mix'd with odorous flowers ; beneath
The creeping honeysuckle weaves
Its yellow horns with ivy leaves ;
And round about, in many a row,
The lilies of the valley blow,
Upshooting snowy bells between
Luxuriant stems of darkest green.

How bright, how beautiful, the day
In its calm lustre dies away,
As if the clouds that wept the while
Now dried their tears, and turn'd to smile
Down on the verdant vales of earth,
Whose looks have changed from gloom to mirth !
On every blade, and leaf, and stem,
Of diamond drops a diadem
Around is sprinkled, bright and clear
As beauty's sympathizing tear
When sinless sorrows cause its flow ;
The fruits depend from every bough,

Mellow and ripe ; the downy peach,
 The purpled plum, and nectarine, each
 Half-shaded by its leaves, in hue
 Diversified, and varying too.—
 With note melodious, clear, and free,
 Upon the moss-brown'd apple-tree,
 Within the ancient orchard's pale,
 The blackbird, Scotland's nightingale,
 Sits singing, and responses sound
 From every grove and garden round.

When worldly strife is hush'd, and all
 With Music's murmuring, dying fall,
 The air is stirr'd, how sweet, to rest,
 Remote from men, with easy breast,
 While scenes awake to Memory's eye—
 Scenes, whose bright hues can never die—
 As round the pictures of the past
 Her more than sunlight glow is cast,—
 Scenes 'mid Time's landscape far, but seen,
 By distance hallow'd, calm, serene,
 And bearing in their mellow dyes
 As 'twere the mark of Paradise ;—
 So, over ocean's billows curl'd
 Blue coasts, the confines of a world—
 A world of hope, and love, and truth,
 And beauty to the eyes of youth ;
 Some realm of fancy, which how fain
 The feet would traverse—but in vain.

Yes ! all of calm, and grand, and fair,
 In iris hues are pictured there ;
 There, from terrestrial dross refined,
 We see the shadows of mankind,
 Beyond the clouds of grief and fear,
 Bright wandering in a fairy sphere ;
 All low-born cares dispersed and gone,
 Misfortune fled, and Pain unknown.

We look on valorous deeds, which raise
 To ecstasy the voice of praise,
 As youthful Wolfe sinks down to die
 Within the arms of victory ;
 Or Moore, without a murmur, yields
 His spirit on the last of fields,
 And, by his mourning comrades brave,
 Is laid, at midnight, in the grave,—
 The wailing of the restless surge,
 And cannon of the foe, his dirge :—
 We listen to the words, whose glow
 Makes nations like a river flow,
 As Chatham's kindled lips dispense
 The lava tide of eloquence,
 Unmanacle the friendless slave,
 Stir up the nerveless to be brave,
 And bid his country's armies be Unmatch'd on shore, supreme at sea ;—
 We marvel at the thoughts which climb
 Above our nature, bright, sublime,
 As of the immortal Milton sings,
 His muse on angel-pinion'd wings,
 Aspiring high, till Heaven above
 Seems link'd to Earth with chains of love.

EVENING TRANQUILLITY.

How still this hour ! the mellow sun
 Withdraws his western ray,
 And, evening's haven almost won,
 He leaves the seas of day :
 Soft is the twilight reign, and calm,
 As o'er autumnal fields of balm
 The languid zephyrs stray ;
 Across the lawn the heifers roam,
 The wearied reaper seeks his home.

The laden earth is rich with flowers,
 All bathed in crimson light ;
 While hums the bee mid garden bowers
 With clustering roses bright :
 The woods outshoot their shadows dim ;
 O'er the smooth lake the swallows skim
 In wild erratic flight ;
 Moor'd by the marge, the shallop sleeps,
 Above its deck the willow weeps.

'Tis sweet, in such an hour as this,
 To bend the pensive way,
 Scan nature, and partake the bliss
 Which charms like hers convey :
 No city's bustling noise is near ;
 And but the little birds you hear,
 That chant so blithe and gay ;
 And ask ye whence their mirth began ?
 Perchance since free, and far from man.

Their little lives are void of care ;
 From bush to brake they fly,
 Filling the rich ambrosial air
 Of August's painted sky :
 They flit about the fragrant wood ;
 Elisha's God provides them food,
 And hears them when they cry ;
 For ever blithe and blest are they,
 Their sinless course a summer's day.

Yon bending clouds all purpling streak
 The mantle of the west ;
 And tremulously the sunbeams break
 On Pentland's mountain crest :
 Hill, valley, ocean, sky, and stream,
 All wear one placid look, and seem
 In silent beauty blest ;
 As if created Natures raised
 To heaven their choral souls, and praised.

Above yon cottage on the plain
 The wreathy smoke ascends ;
 A silent emblem, with the main
 Of sailing clouds it blends ;
 Like a departed spirit gone
 Up from low earth to Glory's throne
 To mix with sainted friends,
 Where, life's probation voyage o'er,
 Grief's sail is furl'd for evermore !

THE SILENT MEMBER.

No. V.

A CATHOLIC SCENE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WERE all other evidence wanting, of Mr O'Connell's insignificance on this side the Channel, (and more especially of his nothingness in the House of Commons,) the proof might be found in his own words and actions. "It does not surprise me," said he,* "that they who make attacks upon me are cheered, and that my defence is received in silence. I know I am no favourite with any party. I have never supported any. I have not supported the oligarchy of this House; and both sides, of course, unite to applaud those who oppose me." Poor gentleman! He is ill used much after the fashion of those unfortunate persons who contrive to appropriate to themselves a unanimous feeling of contempt; an achievement almost, if not quite, as difficult, as to unite the good opinion of the world in our favour. But it is his letters to the Irish editors of newspapers—his appeals to the Irish Catholic population, through the agency of the press, and of his myrmidons whom that press is to set in motion—it is to these I would more particularly refer for the proofs, furnished by himself, of his own conviction, that in England—that as a member of the British Parliament—he is powerless for mischief—the only power he seeks or has ever exercised. The truth is, he has little in him but brawl and bluster, tawdry Irish tinsel, and genuine Hibernian blarney. It is not as a lawyer, that I thus speak of him; but as the member for Clare. It may be asked, how such a man can exercise the influence which Mr O'Connell undeniably exercises over a large portion of his countrymen? I answer, it does not require the sun to fire a powder magazine; a match, not worth the fraction of a farthing, can do the feat. Set Mr O'Connell to harangue a non-inflammable body of men, and he is that match tossed into a quarry; give him a gunpowder audience, and you have an immediate explosion. This is consistent with all experience. What did those contemptible incendiaries, the Hunts, the Thistlewoods, and the Dr Watsons, do with a Spa Fields mob? What did men of a similar stamp do with a Queen Caroline mob, and a Manchester mob? We all know. Turn them loose now to bellow to any five hundred, or five thousand, of his Majesty's lieges, that could be brought together to listen to them, and, God save the mark! what pitiful mountebanks they would be accounted! But carry the hypothesis a little farther. Suppose these same oracles of Spa Fields, Manchester, and Brandenburgh House, members of Parliament. You laugh at the preposterous idea. Yet, what they were able to do with an infuriated populace, and the conclusion, to which the mind instantly jumps at the ludicrous supposition of their being seated in the House of Commons, furnishes a solution of the apparent paradox of Mr O'Connell big enough in Ireland to intimidate Arthur Duke of Wellington, and Mr O'Connell so shrunk in dimensions in England, that his presence is hardly perceptible; with this difference, which I willingly concede, that it is only as a demagogue and politician he can be put upon a level with the "agitators" of Spa Fields and Manchester.

It is not, however, for the purpose of recording the extinction of the honourable Member in the atmosphere of Parliament, or of analysing the precise causes of the phenomenon, that I have adverted to the subject. It is, to ask Sir Robert Peel, how he felt on the evening when the discussion arose upon the presentation of Sir Harcourt Lees's petition?† I do not enquire what his feelings were as he listened to the castigation inflicted by Mr Doherty; inflicted in that fearless spirit which dreaded no encounter with a man ready to retort upon an antagonist in a tone of virulent coarseness, the very apostasy by which he had benefited, because there he was invulnerable;—I do not seek to know what the feebriefs are, which seem to impose upon the right honourable Secretary an inflexible determination not to come into angry collision with Mr O'Connell, under any possible provocation.* I would merely ask here how he felt while the following scene was exhibiting before him?

"General Grosvenor said he was of opinion that it was high time the honourable and learned and CATHOLIC Member should be observed. (Cries of Order! Hear, hear! and loud cheers.)

"Mr Spring Rice rose to speak to order. Mr O'Connell attempted to rise, but was kept down by Mr Hume; and considerable confusion existed for a few moments—some members cheering, and some vociferating, Order.

"Mr S. Rice was at length suffered to say, that there was one word, and only one word, used by the gallant officer, which he thought it right to take notice of, which, in fact, the House was bound, he thought, to find fault with, as quite unparliamentary. The honourable and gallant general had no right, since the law recognised no distinction, to call any Member a Protestant Member or a Catholic Member. It was not parliamentary, and certainly it would not be convenient. This was the first time, he believed, that any such allusions had been made, and he trusted that he did not interfere unnecessarily. If they were not checked in time, they would lead to serious inconvenience, and in time to great confusion.

"The Speaker said that the House, and no Member of it more than the gallant officer, must feel obliged to the honourable member for calling the gallant general to order. The honourable and gallant officer must feel the impropriety of making any distinction among the members of that House, since the law had once settled that there are to be no distinctions.

"General Grosvenor bowed to the authority of the Chair, and to the call to order made by the honourable Member in such good humour. He had only used the word as a means of distinction. There were so many honourable and learned members, that he knew not how to describe him. He was glad that the honourable member for Dover had made these observations in his place. The House had been exposed to considerable inconvenience from the number of petitions presented to the House from Ireland against the proposed scheme of taxation, and all these petitions apparently proceeded from the bureau of the honourable and learned member. The letter already alluded to was signed Daniel O'Connell, and that he presumed was the same honourable member. The honourable member had referred to the petitions from Ireland, and described the apathy of the House as discreditable to it; but, in his opinion, those petitions and their consequences were discreditable to nobody but the honourable and learned member."

Blessed effects of Catholic Emancipation! Riot! confusion! Protestant members taunting Catholic members with their religion! Catholic members rising to repel the taunt, but pulled back into their seats again by neutral members: as Mr Jenkins, of a free and easy club, would tug at his friend Mr Brown, to prevent him from throwing the tobacco-box at the head of Mr Green, who had said something that was affronting to the feelings of Mr Brown. The Speaker authoritatively declaring from the chair, that the law had settled there was to be henceforth no distinction of creeds in Parliament! And these are the infant limbs of the baby giant! These are the heart-burnings, bickerings, and angry out-breakings of the first session of a Catholic Protestant Parliament, with only a sprinkling of Catholic members in it! When the giant is full grown—when Catholicism feels its strength in the Legislature, as it has already found it out, may we not expect to witness exhibitions of a still more improving character? may we not prepare for feuds and retaliations, which the forms of the House will be insufficient to control? may we not look to see all other party designations merged in the two religious and hostile factions of Protestant and Catholic? For Protestantism will imperceptibly degenerate into faction from the mere circumstance of its ceasing to be one of the essential qualifications for legislative dignity. The scene was novel and instructive; and the right honourable Secretary evidently felt it as such. I only marvel he was able to remain silent, under all the excitement it was calculated to produce.

* The only instance in which the right honourable Secretary was moved from this determination, was on the 22d of March, when Mr O'Connell presented a petition from the town of Drogheda, praying for a repeal of the Union. On that occasion, he said he "knew of no terms sufficiently strong, in which to express his reprobation of the conduct of those who, by agitating this question, would cause disturbances among the ignorant and unthinking in Ireland." No doubt he was exceedingly indignant; but, good man that he is! he was wont to be quite as indignant at the idea of conceding Catholic Emancipation. Let the honourable member for Clare, therefore, and the Anti-Unionists, go on. They have nothing to fear from him when the proper time comes.

GRIMALDI—THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON—PRINCE LEOPOLD—AND GREECE AND AUSTRIA.

There used to be a famous trick of old Grimaldi's, in one of the Christmas pantomimes, to which the situation of ministers in the question of Greece bears, I think, a remarkable resemblance. He set to work and built up a man out of all sorts of heterogeneous materials. Arms, legs, feet, body, &c. were ingeniously obtained from rolling pins, bandboxes, and sundry other whimsical substitutes for humanity. The head which was to crown the whole, lay on the stage behind him; just sliced off, by the prowess of his single arm, and the aid of a tin scimitar, three yards long, after a desperate conflict, from the shoulders of either Gog or Magog. While, however, he was busily engaged in putting his man together, Harlequin tripped in, and with one touch of his magic sword endued the head with locomotive powers, which immediately danced away, to the tune of "Drops of brandy," to the utter dismay and no small perplexity of Mr Grimaldi. Thus far my parallel holds. The Duke of Wellington and the Earl of Aberdeen having got the political body of Greece all ready for its head, and the head ready for the body, just at the critical moment the said head slips through their fingers; but who the Harlequin has been by whose Katterfelto trick the hocus-pocus was accomplished, does not appear. Neither is it yet apparent whether the parallel will stop here, or whether, as Grimaldi made his man walk without a head, his Grace and the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs, will settle it that Greece shall be governed without a king. Be that as it may, there is already this additional point of resemblance between these celebrated performers—the audience always laughed immoderately at the jig danced by Gog's head; and all Europe is laughing at the dance which the abdicated King of Greece has led our excellent ministers.

But to approach the subject in a more serious strain. A voluminous mass of papers has been communicated to Parliament; and though more information has been called for, (and more is wanting to elucidate some points,) there is enough to prove that we have been played upon by others, as well as played with by Prince Leopold. With regard to the latter, indeed, I confess myself puzzled, as at present advised. I cannot make out, from the documents before me, whether his Royal Highness ever seriously wished or intended to be King of Greece; whether, if he did wish or intend it, his alleged reasons for abdicating the throne are his real ones; whether, if not, he has been the tool of any party, either abroad or at home; and lastly, whether, if he be the tool of no party, person, or interest, he has been the dupe of Capo d'Istria. The solution of the mystery must be sought in some one or other of these suppositions; and as I do not happen to entertain very extravagant notions touching his Royal Highness's capacity as a statesman, I will frankly own that the bias of my opinion is towards the last; and that Capo d'Istrias scared him with a bug-a-bo, while, as nurses sometimes do to children, he kept crying, "Come on, my dear, don't be afraid—Come along—there 's nothing to be frightened at." At the same time, when I recollect the questions that were asked by Lord Holland at the beginning of the session, and the hypothetical facts upon which his Lordship affected to ground those questions, protesting he knew nothing concerning the state of the negotiations for the final pacification and independence of Greece, its frontier, the contemplated arrangements respecting Candia and Samos, &c. &c., but what he learned from the public journals of Europe,—when, I say, I recall these circumstances, and apply them to the authentic disclosures made in the papers communicated to Parliament, I am not wholly unprepared to find that ministers have been baffled by intrigues nearer home. Two things are certain, that baffled they have been; and that they cut a very ridiculous figure in the business.

It is not, however, in having their king snatched out of their hands at the eleventh hour, that consists the whole of their mortification. More remains behind; and more that they are ashamed to avow, or my Lord Aberdeen could not, in his extremity only, have cried out, "ask no further—the papers you require will be very inconvenient and detrimental to the public service."* It would have been more dignified, more candid, more consonant to the usages of Parliament in all similar cases, to have met the motion of the Marquis of Londonderry, in limine, by this declaration. Such an avowal would have ended the discussion at once. But no. His Lordship took his chance for dissuading the House; and it was only when he saw that the House, instead of being dissuaded, very naturally estimated the importance of the papers in the ratio of his reluctance to produce them, that he "had no hesitation in stating most explicitly it would be very inconvenient, and detrimental to the public service;" in answer to the "explicit" demand of Lord Calthorpe whether such were the fact or not. And why would it be, "detrimental to the public service?" or, in more intelligible words, "very inconvenient" to the noble Secretary, to grant the required information? Because it would substantiate in a regular, parliamentary way, what is as notorious as that the sun shines at noon, namely, that Austria was, if not positively inimical to, most positively disinclined to, the objects of the treaty of the 6th July; because it would prove, that she endeavoured to thwart its execution in every possible mode, through her Internuncio, (Baron d'Ottensfels,) who was a pliant instrument in the hands of Metternich, suffering his acts to be owned and disowned, just as it suited the purposes of his Machiavelian employer. The Marquis of Londonderry and Lord Holland know what they are about right well, when they call for "the recorded sentiments of our ambassadors on the subject."† Why, the Foreign Office is full of "recorded sentiments," loading Prince Metternich with reproaches for his crooked policy, and unequivocal in their expressions of disgust at the servile and degraded subserviency of the Internuncio to his perfidy. "It is impossible for that man" (Metternich) "to go straight-forward: whatever he means to do he will try and accomplish by a circuitous path, even when a straight one is the nearer." Something like this—perhaps, even, there might be a curious coincidence of words—would frequently appear in those recorded sentiments of our ambassadors which Lord Holland vehemently desires to obtain. It is possible, too, were they produced, they would shew whether Austria, at that time, was or was not acting upon a secret understanding with Russia; for, most assuredly, could the ambassadors of the Allied Powers have prevailed with the Ottoman Porte, (and the Porte would have yielded, left entirely to itself, with no assurances, or expectations of support from Austria,) there would have been no occasion for Russia to take the attitude she afterwards did; or to play the magnanimous part she now seems to play, by renouncing large indemnities under the treaty of Adrianople, to induce the Sultan to acquiesce in the arrangement with respect to Greece. But, as I have already said, the production of the papers would only substantiate, in a regular, parliamentary way, (and so lay the ground for parliamentary investigation,) facts which are in themselves perfectly notorious. Nay, in the documents that have been granted, conclusive, though indirect, testimony, is supplied upon the subject. In a dispatch annexed to the Protocol of the 15th June, 1828, and addressed by Count Nesselrode to Prince Lieven, occurs this expression:—"Austria herself, by overtures, of which I will treat in a separate dispatch, manifests a visible tendency to draw nearer to the courts which have undertaken to restore peace to Greece, and expresses no intention of supporting Turkey." Austria, then, in June 1828—that is, twelve months nearly after the signing of the treaty of the 6th July—begins to shew a "visible tendency to draw nearer to the courts which have undertaken to restore peace to Greece"—she having till then manifested a no less visible tendency to keep at a distance from those courts: moreover, she

"expresses no intention of supporting Turkey." There was a time, then, when she did express such an intention, or at least when she was suspected of harbouring it; else why put its non-existence upon record? I dare say it was not thought necessary to obtain from the Austrian cabinet an assurance that she had no intention of invading France or Prussia; simply because it would have been as ridiculous as to require from the Duke of Wellington or Sir Robert Peel, an assurance that neither of them has any intention of horse-whipping Mr O'Connell.

If we may anticipate how the Portuguese question will appear, (when we are favoured with two or three hundredweight of protocols and dispatches respecting it,) from the subordinate character maintained by this country in the Greek business, as well as the clumsiness with which some of its details were managed, we are in a fair way to have the opinion confirmed, that his Grace of Wellington would never keep by his pen what he conquered by his sword; and that the Earl of Aberdeen has more talent for antiquities than tact for diplomacy, especially when opposed to that most subtle, experienced, and perfidious of all modern statistes, Prince Metternich. I do not even except his brother prince, Talleyrand.

SIR JAMES SCARLETT.

Who would be a Whig Attorney-General, to stand in the pitiable condition of Sir James Scarlett? * None but a Whig can be his parallel; and I am constrained by honesty to confess, that though I make this concession in favour, exclusively, of his party, I know not the man among them, at the present moment, whom I would gratuitously insult by affirming, a priori, he either would or could, under assumed circumstances, fall so low. There must be something peculiarly noxious in what Lord Darlington calls a "Tory government acting upon Whig principles," or something sui generis in the character of Sir James, to account for the spectacle. Why, even the honourable member for Colchester, Mr Daniel Whittle Harvey, flings his gibes upon him—rails at him—and tells him to his teeth he is no "true man!"—tells him, moreover, that he, his Majesty's Attorney-General, talks in the House as if he were in a court of law, "with some unfortunate printer writhing under him," indul-

* Debate in Committee of Supply (June 4) upon the following item, moved by Mr Dawson:—"That the sum of £.7000 be granted for EXTRAORDINARY expenses of prosecutions, &c. relating to the coin of the kingdom, for the year 1830, when Mr R. Gordon observed, that 'among other prosecutions were included the recent celebrated persecutions; for so he must call them, of the press.'"

ging, "he would not say in sarcasm, for that implied wit, but in that coarseness in which he fully succeeded." By Jupiter! this is "too bad." Mr Daniel Whittle Harvey, indeed, has ten times, aye, fifty times, the talent of Sir James. He would grind him to dust in an argument, and leave him immeasurably behind in glib dexterity of speech (the only thing, save his law, which he has brought out of Westminster Hall into the House of Commons.) But then—to think of his Majesty's Attorney-General—a dignitary of the crown—a high official personage—an embryo Lord Chancellor, or Lord Chief Justice, or Master of the Rolls—to think, I say, of such a functionary, whipped and scourged and cuffed by Daniel Whittle Harvey! member though he be for Colchester!! It is heart-breaking. I detest the man—(I mean Sir James, and I mean farther the political and Attorney-General part of Sir James, being all my knowledge of the said man)—and yet I declare it destroyed my night's rest, when I got to bed at four o'clock that morning, after listening to the attacks, (not merely of the honourable member for Colchester,) and the taunt, spiritless, I had almost said abject, defence. "Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just," says our great bard: and surely thrice is he disarmed who stands forth in a quarrel that is unjust. 'This was Sir James Scarlett's predicament, and I pitied him from the bottom of my heart. I don't know how it is, but one is apt to feel that soft emotion, when a fellow-creature is hunted down, in spite of whatever conviction there may be upon the mind that the object of our pity deserves his fate. The deep disgust that was visible in the faces of some—the contemptuous indifference of others—former friends ashamed, present ones lukewarm—enemies exulting—and an old white-headed man trying to fix attention in vain—was, altogether, a scene of contumely and humiliation such as I hope never to witness again. The confusion at one time was so great, (arising from an impatient disregard of whatever he might say,) that Sir James had to appeal to their justice as his only chance of securing their ears. "I do not know," said he, "from what part of the house, or with what intention, this clamour is raised. But I do trust, that honourable gentlemen have not come into the house with an intention to stop their ears against the claims of justice." An Attorney-General, addressing the House of Commons as an accused party, could command no attention from the weight of his personal character—none from the authority of his official one—not even the ordinary indulgence extended towards every person who has to purge himself of imputed misconduct, but is compelled to entreat the boon from their sense of justice! Well might Sir Robert Peel observe afterwards, that he "had never yet seen a gentleman placed in such a situation as his honourable and learned friend beside him;" and well might I begin by asking, who would be a Whig Attorney-General to stand in such a situation?

HYDROPHOBIA, AND THE LAW OF DIVORCE.

A subject of vital importance to human felicity has occupied a small portion of the time, so largely devoted to talking, this session, and to so little profit. I do not allude to Alderman Wood's bill, for putting an end to that bugbear, hydrophobia, (which is quite the fashion this summer,)—and in which the worthy member had an admirable clause, "authorizing any person to seize hold of a mad dog, or dog suspected of being mad, and deliver it to a police constable," (the said police constable being bound, by virtue of his office, to take charge of such dog, "being mad, or suspected of being mad," and knock it on the head, by a summary jurisdiction, without the benefit of a writ de lunatico inquirendo,)—I do not, I say, allude to this profound emanation of a great legislative mind, but to Dr Phillimore's motion (3d June), "that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty would be pleased to direct the commission now sitting to enquire into the ecclesiastical courts, to take into their consideration the Law of Divorce, and to enquire into the best means of bringing such case under a legal jurisdiction."

If it were not that we can look back upon the history of the human mind, and mark the origin, progress, decline, and final extinction, of opinions once deemed sacred, but at last repudiated with one common voice of condemnation; if it were not that we have memorable examples, solemnly recorded, of errors, defended with the ardour that only truth should inspire, yielding to the reiterated assaults of reason; and of doctrines, believed to be infallible, because the undisputed legacy of ages, subverted by the resistless power of knowledge; if, in short, (for to that simple fact it comes,) the world and all that is in it, were not one vast memorial of ceaseless change, the idolatry of to-day becoming the opprobrium of to-morrow, it would be with more diffidence and hesitation than I actually feel, that I should venture to state my own sentiments upon the question of the Law of Divorce. In doing so, too, I shall divest it entirely of those technicalities and reverend mysteries, which, like cumbrous robes and drapery, have served to conceal the deformities of what is, as well as to hide the perfections of what might be. It has, indeed, no more need of such mysteries and technicalities than the commonest privileges we enjoy, whether by the free charter of nature, or the conventional obligations of society; as to breathe the air of life, to eat the food which nourishes our bodies, or to receive the protection of the laws we do not infringe. But the subtlety of crafty churchmen, in those ages when religion itself was converted into a system of frauds and fallacies, and the sordid instigations of cupidity added to the timid apprehensions of conscientious minds, acute enough to see the thralldom, but not bold or energetic enough to question its moral fitness, have built up the fabric which it is now almost sacrilege to touch with the profane hand of innovation.

It is not my intention to attempt an elaborate disquisition upon the law of divorce. All that I would submit for consideration, may be comprised in a few observations on the arguments used by Dr Phillimore, Sir Charles Wetherell, and Sir Robert Peel.

Dr Lushington expressly declared there were two points against which he was most anxious to guard, in whatever alterations might be made. "I wish to have it distinctly understood," said the honourable and learned member, "that it ought to be, in my opinion, the principle of the law that marriage is indissoluble. The interests of families, of the whole community composed of families, demand that marriage should be declared indissoluble. The next point to which I wish to advert is this—that, in my opinion, no other cause but adultery should be allowed to be a sufficient ground for a divorce."

Sir Charles Wetherell observed, that "the increased facilities to divorce which his honourable and learned friend's proposed commission would afford to the less wealthy, would, owing to the undeniably greater immorality and moral coarseness of the poorer classes, tend to increase very much the occasions for divorce, by adding to the already numerous cases of adultery that occur in the middling and inferior ranks of society."

Sir Robert Peel said, "with reference to public morality, it appears to him it would be much better and, in all the existing inconveniences, than make divorce easily attainable. To do that, would be to hold out a temptation to adultery."

There are two considerations involved in this latter argument; first, that by facilitating the means of obtaining a divorce for adultery, the crime itself would be multiplied; and therefore, secondly, that the morals of society would be, pro tanto, deteriorated.

Now, with all possible humility, I beg leave to ask Sir C. Wetherell and Sir R. Peel, and every other person who holds the same doctrine, whether they really believe the crime of adultery ever was, or ever will be, committed, merely as the legal preliminary to a divorce? The supposition is founded upon the grossest ignorance of human nature, of the constitution of the human mind, and of the operation of human passions. I am willing to admit the possibility of apparent cases, though rare, when such might seem to be the motive. But it would not actually be so. That is, assuming the previous existence of proper moral feeling, and of virtuous habits, up to the point at which this supposed motive must come into play, it never could of itself subvert those feelings and habits. But grant it otherwise; grant that these few apparent cases are real ones; it is not upon extraordinary exceptions to general principles that legislation should proceed. Suppose the ceremony of a divorce attended with no more difficulty than that of marriage, (or even with less,) but that the qualification necessary to entitle applicants to relief must consist in the pollution of the marriage-bed. Good God! Is it conceivable, that the frequency of this pollution would be increased by one solitary addition, under the influence of no other earthly motive save that of being separated? Picture to yourself, a virtuous wife and mother, wedded to a man of brutal character, who would willingly give half the years she has to live to be released from his control, in quest of a paramour by whose aid she may be enabled to comply with the legal conditions necessary to obtain her wish. Take the counterpart of this picture: I have no objection. Imagine a husband, entitling himself to a certificate from a brothel, for the same purpose; he being a man who, but for such a purpose, would abhor such profligacy. Are either of these cases, and, above all, is the first one, among the consequences rationally to be anticipated from facilitating the means of obtaining a divorce? Yet they are the consequences, and the only consequences, contemplated by Sir Robert Peel, Sir Charles Wetherell, and all who object to rendering divorces of facile attainment, on the ground that it would be "holding out a temptation to adultery," or that "it would add to the already numerous cases of adultery that occur in the middling and inferior ranks of society." For their argument is, not that we would be dealing unwisely with the amount of vice as it now exists in society; but that we should be offering such a tempting premium, establishing such an attractive reward, that the amount would be increased to an extent not otherwise to be apprehended. This, I contend, is an unsound inference, incapable of being sustained by any knowledge we possess of the springs of human action, and certainly, as a mere abstract position, intensely derogatory to the moral character of a religious and civilized community. The victim of passion, under whatever modification it may assault the heart, is an object of respect compared to the despicable creatures whose existence is assumed in the hypothesis of Sir Charles Wetherell and Sir Robert Peel,—chapmen and dealers in crime at a price,—bargain-drivers, who consult their lawyers or an act of Parliament, to calculate the precise value of the sin before they commit it, and then commit it for its value.

But let us consider for a moment the practical absurdities which flow from the doctrine, that marriage itself should be an indissoluble contract, (no divorce a vinculo matrimonii;) but that in special cases, each case being disposed of upon its own merits, adultery should be allowed as a sufficient ground upon which to obtain a divorce a mensa et thoro, and sometimes even a vinculo matrimonii. "The principle of the law," says Dr Phillimore, should be, that "marriage is indissoluble," and that "no other cause but adultery should be allowed to be a sufficient ground for divorce."—"I am far from thinking our present system is a good one," says Sir Robert Peel; "but I am by no means prepared to say with the honourable and learned member for Clare, that the husband should have no remedy for the infidelity of his wife. It is well to make it the general rule, that there shall be no divorce, but there must be exceptions; yet these exceptions ought to be strictly enquired into, and ought to be the subject of distinct acts of legislation."

Now as to the first part of this doctrine. There shall be no divorce—neither the imperfect one, a mensa et thoro, nor the perfect one, a vinculo matrimonii—unless there is adultery; and divorce shall not be of easy attainment, lest the facility should promote adultery. If the argument, in the latter case, be sound, the principle, in the former, is vicious. If you believe that increased facilities to divorce would work proportionate corruption among the middle and inferior ranks of society, the existing facility, which lies in a long purse, (for the rich can and do obtain divorces,) must have the same tendency in degree. This is rickety morality, if morality it be; and it is partial justice. The dishonoured husband who is poor, shall carry the burden of his dishonour to the grave; but the brow that wears a coronet as well as a certain figurative emblem of female frailty, shall have the privilege to cast his burden off again: there shall not be a turnpike road of divorce, for plebeian couples, smooth and pleasant, lest it should be too much thronged with travellers; but there shall be a private one, straight and level, over which they who loll in carriages may roll without a jolt. We cannot think of making divorces easy, because every body would be qualifying themselves for the accommodation; and yet we will not allow of divorces at all, without that very qualification which we are so fearful of encouraging. Such, as they appear to me, are the conflicting absurdities of these two principles. By declaring marriage to be indissoluble, and combining with that declaration the condition, that adultery alone shall entitle parties to a divorce a mensa et thoro, (though not, except in particular cases, a vinculo matrimonii;) to a certain extent we encourage adultery; at least, if the fears of Sir Robert Peel and Sir C. Wetherell be well grounded, that adultery is a crime which would be committed for the sake of divorce.

¶ But is this all? Are there only conflicting absurdities in the law of divorce as it is now administered? Or are we short-sighted moralists seeking to promote the interests of virtue and morality, by exacting their performance under circumstances which strike at their very existence? Surely, when we reflect upon the feelings which impel us to the married state, and still more upon those which it produces; when we consider what the sentiments are which are kindled in the heart by the reciprocal obligations and attachments of husband, wife, father, mother, we need be under no morbid apprehensions that the ties of wedlock would be capriciously loosened. Look, for example, at the actual condition of society. We hear of many unhappy marriages; we see a few. But how few, how very few, of those we either hear of or see, do we find accompanied by that mode of relief which it is competent for the sufferers to bestow upon themselves: how few, though living together infelicitously, can determine to try the experiment of living apart? And why is this? Because there are a thousand mutual interests, sympathies, affections, wants, conveniences, which hedge them round, and through which, unless the suffering be great indeed, they have not power to break. The petty grievances, the idle discords, the peevish complaints, of matrimonial life, sink into nothing, when contrasted with the alternative of separation, with all its train of miserable consequences; the breaking up of domestic habits, the exposure in the eyes of friends, and of the world; the embarrassing distribution of the children, the amount of income to be allowed, &c. &c.; and this is the case when it is only a question of experimental, not of penal separation. Such separations, I have said, are few. They are necessarily so; while of that few the number, I am persuaded, would be still less of those who would avail themselves of any legal facilities to divorce, to make them final and complete.

Of all the grounds, however, upon which the present law of divorce in this country is defended, that of anxiety for private morals is the most fallacious. One moment's reflection will demonstrate this; and in stating the argument to prove it, it is not necessary I should trouble myself with the nature of the causes which prevent a man and woman from continuing to live together as man and wife. The instant that crisis arrives, the instant a wedded pair are single in all things save the civil obligations of the contract into which they have entered, the inexorable principle of marriage being indissoluble, works the same practical consequences as celibacy in the Romish church; and we have authentic evidence of the odious profligacy which has always grown out of that system. The conservative impresses of nature cannot be set at defiance. Buffon, and Haller, and Tissot, record frightful examples of enthusiastic devotees, who imagined they could set them at defiance. What follows, what must follow, is obvious. Certainly the very antipodes of moral refinement, or exemplary conduct. The advocates for the indissolubility of marriage may fortify their doctrine by a reference to those of theology, by the authority of long usage, by the opinions of grave lawyers and graver moralists; but most assuredly they cannot do so upon the principle that the interests of morality are promoted. As little could they shew that individual happiness is advanced by it. To discuss this point, however, with all its collateral details, would lead me far beyond the limits I have prescribed myself in simply noticing what appeared to me to be the vulgar error of Sir Charles Wetherell and Sir Robert Peel, and the unphilosophical one of Dr Philimore.

WILLIAM THE FOURTH—REGENCY—DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

GEORGE THE FOURTH is no more!
WILLIAM THE FOURTH reigns!

This were a theme to dwell upon—but not here. The monarch is in his grave, has had his meed of honest praise from a thousand pens and tongues, even in the little space since that moment of mortal agony, when his soul felt what his closing lips declared—“This is death!” The mightiest monarch on his throne cannot hear the voice of truth—the din of courtly adulation is too loud. On the one hand, therefore, I am forestalled, or left to play the echo merely with barren repetition. On the other, I am forewarned not to play the lunatic patriot, he who prepares wisdom for kings, as some bards have written for posterity without a passport for their messengers. It is no treason now, however, to say, (and it is all I shall say,) that I deeply regret the nation has been spared its present grief so long. Such a calamity, had it happened eighteen months ago, would have permitted George the Fourth to close an illustrious reign, untarnished by one fatal measure which will forbid future historians to record, that he transmitted the constitution to his brother perfect and unimpaired as he had received it from their father. Neither can we indulge the hope, that it will be the historian's office to institute a parallel of names and characters—to remark, that the annals of our county contain a William, who was its Conqueror; a William, who was its Liberator; and a William, who was its REGENERATOR. What a glorious title! But it is only in abeyance. Either the monarchy itself has run its course, and is hastening to decay, (and in that case all must perish with it,) or there is an appointed time, when it shall devolve upon one destined to restore its original brightness. Crippled, mutilated, defaced, as it now is, it can merely totter along in feeble but tenacious vitality, unless that current of its life-blood which has been poisoned be cleansed from the infection. Let us pass, however, from the consideration of what may or must be, at some future period, to the more important one of what is; the great concernment, after all, of such fugitive beings as ourselves.

His most gracious Majesty, having been duly condoled with upon that mournful event, which called forth, in the same breath, the most lively congratulations—the Lords and Commons (in those piebald addresses which are carried up to the throne of a new monarch, beginning with tears, and ending with smiles, like a soldier's funeral, which sets out with the hundred and fourth psalm, but returns to the tune of “Maggie Lauder,” or “St Patrick's Day in the Morning,”) having expressed their profound sorrow for the death of

* The most authentic accounts concur in stating, that just before he expired, he attempted to raise his hand to his breast, faintly ejaculating—“Oh God! I am dying;” and after the intervention of two or three seconds of time, he added—“This is death;” but his expiring condition barely enabled him to announce the fatal sensation so as to be heard by the page on whose shoulders his head had fallen. They were the last words he uttered!

George the Fourth, and their heartfelt delight at the accession of William the Fourth—these solemn plausibilities, I say, being all duly performed, and the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel having, moreover, exhausted their panegyric upon both Kings,* Parliament was invited to thank his Majesty for his gracious intention of dissolving it.

I am not hypercritical—I am not fastidious—I do not insist that every poet should write like Satan Montgomery, nor every statesman talk like Waithman; but I have my prejudices notwithstanding, and among them, a decided one against that species of oratory in which his Grace of Wellington excels. I have already analyzed it,† and I abhor the sin of iteration, else would I immortalize it again. The Peers are remarkably well bred; an improved edition, a refinement of Chesterfield himself—grave, dignified, decorous, polite. They never laugh at, and very seldom with, one of their own body; are free from that catarrhal affection which so frequently attacks the House of Commons with all the malignity of an influenza, and those convulsive twitchings of the legs, that produce such a disagreeable sound of scraping on the floor; in short, they seem to apply the irony of the poet with a literal sobriety of interpretation:

"What woful stuff this madrigal would be
In some starved, hackney'd sonneteer, or me;

But let a lord once own the happy lines,
How the wit brightens, and the style refines!"

This being the case, it is not surprising, when members of the House of Commons are turned into lords, that they find themselves also turned into orators, so far as attention from those they address may be regarded as presumptive orators, or that his Grace the Duke of Wellington obtains respectful listeners. But for that gravity, decorum, and refinement I have mentioned, it would have been morally impossible even for a Prime Minister to have delivered the speech his Grace did on the 30th of June, in the first year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord King William IV., without being horribly laughed at. It was upon the motion for taking into further consideration his Most Gracious Majesty's message; and I maintain there is neither exaggeration nor burlesque in the following abstract of it:—

"You see, my Lords, that formerly the Parliament was naturally dissolved when the King died; but now, 'owing to an act of Parliament passed in the reign of King William, and continued in the reign of Queen Anne, this and the other House of

* Surely these addresses of condolence and congratulation, speaking, in fellowship, the language of grief and joy, are among those mummeries which enlightened times might spare. "Who," asks Macbeth,

"Can be wise, amazed, temperate and furious, Loyal and neutral, in a moment? No man."

It may be too much to expect all these contradictions in an individual; but I think they co-exist in the jumble of official affliction and rejoicing which marks the "demise" of the crown—its transit from one head to the other. They often stand in such ludicrous juxtaposition as to remind one of the droll, mentioned in Tom Coriat's Cruelties, who had acquired so great a command over the flexible muscles of his face, that he could cry on the left side, and laugh on the right, at one and the same moment. When, too, Ministers harangue in praise of the public acts, the political character, of their deceased royal master, what is it but indirect flattery heaped upon themselves, by whose advice, or under whose sanction, all those things were done, or presumed to be done, which they so complacently applaud? Sir Robert Peel was quite profuse in his posthumous tribute to the late monarch, who "never exercised his prerogative except with the view of promoting the welfare of his people," and so forth. But the Duke of Wellington extolled him for qualities which certainly had no reflex operation in favour of his Ministers. His Grace was contented to celebrate his "excellent education" and "polished manners," the "condescension, affability, and kindness" of George the Fourth. It is Montesquieu, I think, who remarks, that we are always most forcibly struck with those things in another, which we have not in ourselves.

Parliament are now sitting, and are enabled to continue sitting, for the dispatch of business.' Under these circumstances, we, his Majesty's servants, have advised his Majesty to send you a message; in which message his Majesty informs you, that though he might leave you alone for six months, he intends to get rid of you immediately. 'That, my Lords, is the effect of the King's message.' And now, my Lords, I will tell you why we, his Majesty's Ministers, have advised his Majesty to 'dissolve you in such haste.' My Lords, 'we are now arrived at that period of the year at which it usually happens that the business of Parliament is about to terminate; at least, my Lords, it generally happens that the business is so far advanced about this time, or within a month from this time, that it is possible to close Parliament.' Your Lordships need not be told, for the state of the votes of both Houses will inform you, that there is a great deal of business to do, and which, if done, must postpone the dissolution to a distant period; therefore, 'considering that the great calamity to which we have all been exposed, has been expected for a considerable time,' and that 'all men have been looking forward to a dissolution of Parliament within a limited period, and looking forward to a general election,' and so forth, I therefore think, after we have got such sums as will be necessary for the public service placed at our disposal, all the other public business can wait well enough till the next Parliament is called together. And these, my Lords, 'are the views and intentions of his Majesty's government, and their motives for recommending the dissolution of Parliament in such haste.'"

It is not very surprising that Earl Grey, after listening to this statesmanlike speech, began his with the following exordium: "In considering, my Lords, his Majesty's most gracious Message, which was yesterday read, it appeared to me to contain some propositions of a most novel and extraordinary nature; and if that were my impression yesterday, that impression is not weakened or diminished by the short and unsatisfactory statement—(Hear, hear)—by the very meagre explanation, of the noble Duke—(Hear, hear, hear)—of the course which his Grace recommends the House to pursue." Truly, it was refreshing to pass from the tangled thread of his Grace's ideas, to the lucid arrangement, and intelligible character, of those of the noble Lords who took part in the debate that ensued; save and except, now and at all times, the rapid, frothy, shallow egotisms of that pert prater, Lord Ellenborough. If there be a doubt as to the prodigious bump of self-approbation which his lordship's glossy locks conceal, his eternal "I," and "we," and "us," when speaking of the measures of government, would alone be sufficient to destroy that doubt. Other ministers (to be sure they were only such men as Pitt, Liverpool, Eldon, Canning, &c.) were content to refer to themselves in the third person, except on special and extraordinary occasions. Not so my Lord Ellenborough: Whenever he opens his mouth, it is to announce what "I did," or what "we determined," or what was advised "by us." As for example, in this evening's debate, "It is necessary for me that I should assure your Lordships, that the course which his Majesty's government have determined to pursue, is one which we have not arrived at without much and most anxious consideration. Never have I, at any time, given an opinion, upon any public subject, with such a perfect conviction of its being right, as I have upon the present occasion. I am sure that in this cause are involved the best interests of the royal family, of the country, and of this constitutional monarchy; and it is upon this persuasion alone that I have concurred with my colleagues, upon the advice which we have thought fit to give to his Majesty. And it is my belief, that if this subject were fairly and dispassionately considered, there would not be one member of the House of Commons, or of this House, entertaining, as I believe they all do, an affectionate regard, and a decided determination, to," &c. &c. —"It was the saying of a very wise man, one of the wisest this country ever produced, 'Stay a while that you may end the sooner.'—There is wisdom in this sentiment, and I adopt that wisdom in applying it to the subject under consideration."—"I can only say, that if such be his (Earl Grey's) opinion, I most sincerely rejoice that he has at length openly declared himself. An open foe is better than a secret enemy; and I rejoice that we, at length, know where we are to encounter opposition; who are our enemies, and who are our friends." Is not all this deplorable imbecility? His lordship, too, presumed to read a lecture to that fine old fellow, Lord Eldon, who had pounced, with his eagle mind, upon the baby reasonings of the Duke of Wellington, and scattered them to the winds. His squeamish sensibility, forsooth, could not bear the "jocularities" of the venerable peer, and he "hoped he heard it for the last time!" Just suppose that great man had been in the mood, with one pat of his majestic paw, he would have squeezed out the entrails of the troublesome gnat, which had ventured to settle on his mane, and with impertinent malice, was trying to poke his puny sting through its shaggy folds! "No one," said he, "entertains, so much as I do, a deep hereditary regard for the noble and learned Earl;" and he repeated this stuff, about hereditary regard, when the Duke of Richmond reprobated his coarse attack. Lord Ellenborough seems to have inherited some remarkable things besides goods and chattels, from his father. He lately told us, he had an hereditary protection from any mischievous disposition to interfere with the independence of the judges; and now, he has an hereditary respect for Lord Eldon. As to these particular inheritances, I shall say no more; but I am decidedly of opinion, every thing his lordship possesses, which is of any value, is hereditary. To return, however, from this digression.

Parliament is to be dissolved; and I confess I think the resolution of Ministers has been wisely taken. It is true, there is a great deal of public business yet undone; but it is not less true, that under the impatience, excitement, and distraction of an impending dissolution, it would be utterly impossible to do it. Nor, indeed, does it much concern the welfare of the country, whether nine-tenths of those measures which are in progress be completed this year or next; for though they may embrace objects of practical benefit, they are not objects of such paramount necessity that we cannot go on, a few months longer, without them. When, therefore, to these considerations is added the still graver one, that from the moment the fever of a general election is upon the body politic, all its more healthful functions are either wholly suspended, or much vitiated, it would be unfair to deny that Ministers have exercised a sound discretion in seeking to abridge, as far as they are able, the duration of that fever. As to the question of the Regency, brought forward to the House of Lords by Earl Grey, and in the Commons by Mr Brougham, (with somewhat of that rancour and bad taste, which used to characterise Whig tactics when there was really a Whig opposition,) I admit all its importance, but cannot see its urgency. That life is uncertain—that kings as well as subjects, die—and that sudden death may visit the palace, as well as the easy-chair of a turtle-fed alderman, are truths, of which, if neither my Lord Grey nor Mr Brougham had enforced them, I should still have been duly sensible, though without hence inferring that our situation was so alarming as they would have us believe. The bare and forced possibility, that his Majesty may die in the course of the next three or four months, can hardly be considered a substantial ground for delaying the dissolution, all other objections being removed. Say the event took place, it could not find the country unprepared. If the new Parliament were returned, and the day appointed by the writ of summons for its assembling arrived, it could instantly sit; and if the day were not arrived, then, by the 37th Geo. III. cap. 127, the present Parliament, though dissolved, would meet again, and continue its sittings for six months, if not sooner prorogued or dissolved by the authority therein provided. All I pray is, that the people, thus called upon to act, will do so in the spirit of their complaints; that they will remember the things of which they have complained; against what, and for what, they petitioned in vain; and that in choosing their representatives, if they cannot always return tried men, they will prefer the chance of untried, rather than send back some whom they have tried. It may not be in their power to do all they would wish; but much is in their power, which, if they do not do, their right to complain hereafter may be far less than their cause.

About two hundred years ago, or rather more, when James I. meditated the holding of a Parliament, out of his "princely judgment and paternal care," Lord Bacon drew up a proclamation for his Majesty's approval, setting forth the reasons of that proceeding. "For that part of it," says his Lordship, in a letter to the Marquis of Buckingham, "touching the elections, I have communicated it with my colleagues, Sir Edward Coke, the two Chief Justices, and Serjeant Crew, who approve it well: and we are all of opinion that it is not good to have it more peremptory, more particular, or more sharp." I will quote this part "touching the elections;" and were it in my power, it should find its way into the hands of every man in the empire who has a vote to give, or an influence, direct or indirect, over the votes of others. His language is the language of eternal truth, which takes no bias from times, or seasons, or persons.

"And because," says the King, (after reciting the various reasons why he deemed it necessary to hold a parliament,) "as well this great cause, (there to be handled among the rest, and to be weighed by the Beam of the kingdom,) as also the true and ancient institution of Parliament, do require the Lower House, (at this time if ever,) to be compounded of the gravest, ablest, and worthiest members that may be found; We do hereby, out of the care of the common good, wherein themselves are participant, (without all prejudice to the freedom of elec-tious,) admonish all our loving subjects, (that have votes in the elections of knights and burgesses,) of these few points following:

"First, That they cast their eyes upon the worthiest men of all sorts, knights and gentlemen, that are lights and guides in their counties, experienced parliament men, wise and discreet statesmen, that have been practised in public affairs, whether at home or abroad; grave and eminent lawyers; substantial citizens and burgesses; and generally, such as are interested and have portion in the estate.

"Secondly, That they make choice of such as are well affected in religion,—without declining either, on the one hand, to blindness and superstition, or, on the other hand, to schism, or turbulent disposition.

"Thirdly, and lastly, That they be truly sensible not to disvalue or disparage the House with bankrupts and necessitous persons, that may desire long parliaments only for protection; lawyers of mean account and estimation; young men that are not ripe for grave consultation; mean dependents upon great persons, that may be thought to have their voices under command, and such like obscure and inferior persons; so that, to conclude, we may have the comfort to see before us the very face of a sufficient and well composed House; such as may be worthy to be a representative of the third estate of our kingdom, fit to nourish a loving and comfortable meeting between us and our people, and fit to be a noble instrument, under the blessing of Almighty God, and our princely care and power, and with the loving conjunction of our prelates and peers, for the settling of so great affairs as are here before expressed."

THE LAY OF THE DESERT. A POEM.*

MAGA is always the mildest—the meekest of monthlies—in a Double Number. She then feels her power, and her bosom expands with all the Christian virtues. She would not hurt a fly—nay, not a spider—nay, not even a rat. With a face even more expressive of moral and religious, than of intellectual worth, she looks over nature and over man; and if ever there were an angel on earth, then it is surely she. Far down the profound depths of her dark-blue eyes, you see slumbering the divine spirit of universal philanthropy; peace pitches her tent on that smooth and ample forehead, as on a heaven-kissing hill in Arcadia; and as she “enchanted smiles, and waves her golden hair,” she diffuses the Pleasures of Hope over all the inhabitants of the literary world. Christopher North, “that old man truculent,” beneath her snow-white wand, is transformed from a lion into a lamb; you absolutely hear him bleating; the knout drops from his hand; he is the very emblem of primeval innocence; Adam before the Fall.

Thrice happy they with whom he communes—commerce at such a season! Their bread is baked—their immortality is secured—and a voice is heard crying, “Oh! bards! live for ever!” He pats each pretty poet-aster on the pate with his paw, and thenceforth in Paternoster it is an Apollo. Under a benignant star wert thou born, Henry Sewell Stokes! Hadst thou flourished but one little month ago, a cruel frost from the biting North might have chilled thy blossoms; but the first of August is a Saint’s day in the calendar of criticism; and like a rose-tree full in bearing, thy poem shall shed unscathed its sweet scents over the wilderness. It shall not be born to blush unseen; many noses shall smell its buds; and over its fragrant crimson the eyes of many maidens let fall the pensive tear.

“THE LAY OF THE DESERT!”—a taking title—a touching text—and on it we shall discourse most excellent music—and preach a small sermonette, which haply shall soothe our subscribers to sleep with a congenial strain.—“THE LAY!”—’Tis a pleasant and ingenious misnomer. “LAY” suggests the idea of something wild and irregular—Æolian, rather than Jew-harp-like—some such song as the Silvans might play to Pan sinking hairily asleep in the forest, and drawing up his hoofs in a dream. Or it reminds us of travelling Troubadour singing to captive king—or of him of whom ’twas said—

“The last of all the bards was he,
Who sang of Border chivalry;”

a strain the gracious Muses will not willingly let die—no, not while those silvery sisters, the Ettrick and the Yarrow, blent with the taintless Tweed, by abbeyed banks and keep-crowned braes, in sunshiny and shaded music, flow proudly to the sea.

But the “Lay” of Henry Sewell Stokes is all in Spenserian stanzas—and many a gross has he given—fourteen to the dozen—till arithmetic stands aghast, and her twins, addition and multiplication, fade away into nought, swooning at the dim foresight of the final sum. Their souls die within them at the bare imagination of the “Tottle of the Whole.”

Yes, he is the longest—the lengthiest—the most interminable and eternal layman of the age. ’Tis impossible to speak of him without a contradiction of terms. Time treads on the heels of eternity; space loses all bounds; and standing on a shoreless sea—if that indeed be practicable—we feel that the metaphysical mind strives in vain to conceive limits to infinitude. Yet some mystery is here, which may neither be analyzed nor followed. For true it is, or seems to be, that the Lay has an—End. To it, as to all other human works—even the great wall of China—is appended that incomprehensible word—Finis. We feel that the Lay is over at last—and yet that the Last Day has not come. To reconcile these two great truths, is, we verily believe, beyond the reach of its present capacity, merged as mind here is in matter, and circumscribed in its reaches by those slaves the Seven Senses, so fond of playing the tyrants in their thralldom, and making their shame their pride.

So much for the first—now for the second clause of our text.

THE DESERT! Is it the Great Desert? The Great Desert of Africa, so nobly sung by George K. Rickards, of Trinity College, in a poem, crowned at Oxford with Sir Roger Newdigate's prize? If so, ought the world to weep or smile, while she wonders at the strange coincidence, and to which of the mighty rivals shall she assign the palm? First hear Mr Rickards:—

"The sun hath set—yet, mark'd you from afar,
High o'er that hill, which thrones the western star,
In dim relief against yon streak of red,
The stately camel rears his dusky head?
No bright illusion this, of hope untrue,
Their shadowy forms are nearing on the view—
They come:—e'en now the far-stretch'd eye may scan
The pictured outlines of the caravan;
Like marshal'd band appears their long array,
As down you steep they wind their toil-some way.
First in the troop, elate with conscious pride,
The leader camel asks no human guide;
'To him the herd th' unenvied post assign,
Each knows his rank, and fills the destined line;
Next steeds and chiefs, a mingled train, appear,
And slaves, reluctant following, swell the rear."

What simple, yet original imagery! What flowing, yet faultless expression! "Mark'd you from afar!" How imaginative, yet rational, the appeal to the inexperience of the reader! "From afar." Vague, indefinite, and sublime,—while it makes us feel that the poet would not use a word for the sole sake of the rhyme, for the whole world. Observe how the camel's head is higher than the western star. The western star is throned on the hill—that is, sitting on it—o'er which the ship of the desert rears high his top-gallant-mast. But no comparison is drawn between the western star and the camel's head. That is finely left, in the conscious power and pride of genius, to the reader's fancy. It is left doubtful whether or no the star were camel-eclipsed. Far grander is the image expressed. The dusky head of the camel in dim relief against yon streak of red! Not the whole camel, mind ye, but his simple head. That his body will follow, we have all the assurance that scepticism can have, in the established and immutable laws of nature. In due time, depend upon it, the corpus delicti will make its appearance. Nay, much sooner than might have been expected; and not only that one stately camel, in particular, with the dusky head, but hundreds of others whose shadowy forms, asking no dim relief from yon streak of red, are nearing on the view. But, look steadily at them, and assure yourself that "no bright illusion this of hope untrue." No bright illusion,—although from its being dim and dusky, you might naturally fall into the error of thinking it so. Above all, be confident that these camels are not the mirage. The mirage is an illusive vapour, seeming to be a lake. These are flesh and blood, hid and hairy, and each with a ball of flesh beneath each foot, to fit him for making his way rapidly and pleasantly along the sands. Observe, too, how, in his inspiration-fit, the young poet forgets his grammar,—substitutes rears for rear,—till for him seems to have been written that verse—

"Break Priscian's head, and ravish all the Nine."

How naturally he speaks of the caravan! "The pictured outlines." Not the real outlines, observe; for that would be plain dull matter-of-fact. But remembering Horace's advice, "Ut pictura poesis," our bard, while writing his poem, supposes himself looking at a picture, and conceives, not from the desert itself, but a bit of canvass. "Like marshal'd band appears their long array." That it is so he will not venture to assert, for he still fears it may be all illusion, and that what appears a caravan may, in sad truth, be but mirage. Rarely indeed do we meet in the same individual, especially an under-graduate, with such a promising union of caution and enthusiasm. "As down yon steep they wind their toilsome way," bears a beautiful and close resemblance—which could only have been suggested by a genius as vivid as original—to Gray's forgotten lines,

"As down the steep of Snowden's shaggy side,
They wound, with toilsome march, their long array."

Why a caravan, in travelling through the Great Desert, should march up sand-hills throning the western star, except it be merely for the pleasure of marching down them again, lest we break the charm of the passage we shall not conjecture; any more than we shall conjecture why King Edward marched his long array up and then down Snowden's shaggy side,—a manœuvre which we have always contemplated with that wonder which is the daughter of ignorance, and which sheds an obscure splendour over the incomprehensible character of all great military achievements. "To him the herd th' unenvied post assign," contains a fund—a treasure of zoological knowledge. That not one of all those long array of camels should have envied the post of his leader, is a fact which proves them all, male and female, to have been either free "from that last infirmity of noble minds," ambition, or to have successfully smothered its fires under a strict system of discipline and subordination. But that they, taking upon themselves the election, assigned his post to their leader, is a fact illustrative of so much sagacity in the camel—and such well-reasoned and soundly-digested knowledge of civil and military affairs—that we are delighted to believe it on the authority of George K. Rickards, and Mr M'Farlane—if such be the creed of that gentleman—though overlooked by Buffon, Cuvier, and Griffiths. "Next chiefs and steeds, a mingled train, appear"—is a line altogether worthy of the rest of the passage—the repetition of the word "appear" having a fine effect; and the reader being left in a poetical dubiety, whether the chiefs are on horseback, or each leading his steed by the bridle, from fear of accidents—though, for our own parts, we should prefer in such a situation what Leigh Hunt calls "some horseback," and be willing to take the chance of being dismounted, rather than the certainty of being kicked. "And slaves, reluctant following, swell the rear"—is a truly Oxonian line; and that is the highest praise that can be bestowed upon any ten consecutive syllables. That the slaves disliked their condition and situation, we do not doubt; but we do not believe they ventured to shew any reluctance—for that would have insured them instantly a sound flogging; nor, classical as the expression may be, do we Goths see any peculiar merit—or indeed accuracy—in "swell the rear"—since the slaves—a few drivers excepted—entirely composed it. That the drivers—when ever the slaves shewed themselves at a chance time "reluctant," "swelled their rear," is more than probable; but farther the deponent sayeth not. The passage, as a whole, is certainly a fine one; and we are sorry that the rigid rules of criticism imperiously forbid us to preach longer about one Poem, when we are prosing about another—so, leaving the Desert of Mr George K. Rickards, who, in spite of the general laxity and feebleness of his style, shews himself a scholar and a gentleman, let us enter the Desert of Mr Henry Sewell Stokes, whose claims are somewhat dubious to that character.

It is what Mr Rickards so finely calls "a dim relief," to turn from the Great African Desert to the Small Dartmoor. One is apt to be lost in the African Desert—for it is nearly as dangerous in its dust as the North Bridge of the city of Edinburgh. A Simoom or Sirocco is almost as bad as an Easterly-Harr; and we pity a caravan on its way to Timbuctoo, as tenderly as we pity the Telegraph Coach on its way to Glasgow. Neither the one nor the other has yet discovered the means of consuming its own sand, as some engines consume their own smoke; and we never look at the basket of the latter, where, in ~~more~~ senses than one, "Slaves, reluctant following, swell the rear," without feelings of the most Christian commiseration. But from all such painful sympathies Mr Henry Sewell Stokes sets us free; for he is a pedestrian, and, staff in hand, sets boldly off for the distant Desert of Dartmoor, without even making his will —such is his oblivion of all sublunary affairs. Imagination follows him with awe, on his pilgrimage to regions “beyond this visible diurnal sphere,” while Hope cheers our dream with prophetic whispers of his return, on some distant day, to the bosom of his discousolate family, two stone lighters at least, his figure like whipcord, his face brown as a berry, his mother tongue no longer in his mouth, but gabbling a strange jargon caught among the Tors,—an indigenous dialect, not unlike that with which our dear Shepherd bathes the lips of Mador of the Moor,—delivered in a sort of metre, too, which occasionally reminds us in this nether sphere of the Spenserian stanza.

Mr Stokes has been, he tells us, from his cradle upwards, a lover of solitude. So have we. He seems to have been born at Gibraltar, which he kindly assures us is likewise called Calpe. We were not. There, in boyhood, he used to climb the cliffs, where he says “his musings were subject to no mortal interruption,” save when they were “disturbed by some squalling ape.” In like manner, our musings are often interrupted—on the Calton Hill—or, as at present, in the Sanctum, by “a squalling ape;” but the squall is nothing, when one is accustomed to it. He seems also to have sought for solitude, some years ago, in some part of Spain, but was disturbed—just as we too often are out of Spain—by mules and asses. So, to indulge his passion for self and solitude, he has penetrated, with the spirit of a Mungo Park, into the interior of Dartmoor, and on his return will be fairly entitled to the reward and prize of £10,000, which Government, we understand, have declared their resolution not to bestow on any foolish mariner who may reach the North Pole, or sail through the Northwest Passage—discoveries which, if made, would be barren of all useful practical results—but to give it to the first adventurous spirit who shall bring back authentic intelligence of what is going on in the moral, intellectual, and physical world of our own many unexplored interiors, or even exteriors, centre or circumference, of this our partially civilized and enclosed native country. We hope that, in these “piping times of peace,” the “interrita pubes” of these kingdoms will desire to share with Mr Stokes the danger and glory of such enterprises, and trust that, before the close of the century, we shall have a map of England, at once so minutely accurate, and so sweepingly comprehensive, that the march of intellect and of agriculture will meet with no impediment, and Dartmoor exist only in the Lay of the Desert.

We know not whether Mr Stokes’s pilgrimage to the Desert has been prompted solely by his love of self and solitude, or by his love of science and of his kind. Punts he to extend the bounds of human knowledge—especially in the geographical department? Or daunners he away to dawdle and twaddle in the Desert, to “babble about brown fields,” and sit like a simpleton till he catches a cold that may spread from his posteriors to his pericranium, on damp clammy stones, against the dripping death of whose unsunned chilliness two pair of corduroy breeches, and an equal number of flannel drawers, will be found a fallacious protection? We shrewdly suspect that the poor young gentleman is a misanthrope. Nay—there is no shrewdness shewn in such suspicion; for Mr Stokes is not ashamed to confess the melancholy truth. He is at once Timon and Tims. He thus addresses the Desert:

“I to thee hie, because my soul is sick,—
Sick with mankind and their disgusting ways;

Although but lately kindled my life’s wick,
And but now gathering into manhood’s blaze,

Much hath it felt the world’s foul murky haze;

Ay,—I have lived quite long enough to tell,

That Love, Truth, Virtue, in the world’s wild maze

Perish,—they cannot bide the boisterous swell—

Corruption’s mighty surge—that roars their funeral knell.”

Mr Stokes is in a sad taking. Better far for himself, at least—if worse for the world—that he had remained among the squalling apes at Gibraltar. Perhaps, instead of his soul being sick, it is only his stomach. The two are often confounded by people who think themselves poetical; but the difference is well known and easily distinguished by the simplest practitioners in medicine; and we strongly and earnestly—nay, seriously and solemnly—recommend to Mr Stokes a dose of Glaubers.

Let the primæ viæ be well cleaned out—as well as a blackleg's purse with a bad book after the Derby—and a day or two afterwards, he may, without danger—nay, with great propriety, retire to the Desert—not forgetting to put a cold fowl and a quarter loaf in his pouch, for he will wax exceeding yawp when the salts have done their work; and then, instead of giving way to melancholy, why, he will be busy picking a merry thought, and betting right hand against left which is first to be married. What sort of society, pray, has Mr Stokes been moving in since he bade farewell to the apes of Gibraltar, that he is sick with "mankind and their disgusting ways?" Has he a cottage in Cockaigne? A box in Little Britain? To what practices does he allude? Is he hand and glove with Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt? Their ways certainly are disgusting enough—but who supposes that they belong to "mankind?" Let him associate for a short time with the common run of Christians, and he will be delighted to see that the moment a human creature conducts himself "in disgusting ways," he is kicked out of company. The gorge does rise—nay, the soul as well as the stomach does get sick—at the "disgusting ways" of Cockneys; but how illogical to reason from brute to man, and to believe, because the one is disgusting, that the other may not be delightful? Let Mr Stokes but try—and we lay our lives on the success of the experiment. Let him cut all his present cronies—just as he cut the squalling apes of Gibraltar; let him quit Cockaigne as a place of residence, and he may depend upon it, that, on his entrance into England, he will find some spot more suitable, even to a lover of solitude, than Dartmoor Desert. 'Tis an absurd place, notwithstanding Mr Carrington's craze about it; but then Mr Carrington is a man of genius, and can find "sermons" in stones, and good in every thing." Not so Mr Stokes—to whom a stone is a stone, a stump a stump; although he has no right to complain, for the great principle of compensation reigns all over the world, and to him, as to other men, Glauber salts are Glauber salts, a purge a purge, an emetic an emetic, though a moor is not necessarily a desert, nor a lay in his hands by any means a poem. Mr Stokes seems occasionally not a very unamiable young man. "Life's wick" is an expression that shews some humility, and suggests the image of a farthing candle; but he relapses into a bad habit of self-conceit when he speaks of it "gathering into manhood's blaze," for no human eye, no human imagination, ever in this world saw the blaze of a farthing candle—twinkle is the proper word—or rather twinkling in the socket. The concluding line of the stanza is meant to be magnificent, but it comes in awkwardly upon the blazing wick of the farthing candle; whatever Mr Stokes—misunderstanding Milton—may be disposed to think to the contrary, a knell and a roar are two sounds most different to all ears of a moderate length, and with drums not of ben-leather; and if love, truth, and virtue, have all perished in the world's wild maze, beyond all possibility of resurrection by the Humane Society, Mr Stokes, instead of retiring to the Moor of Dart, ought to scorn to survive the death of all that makes life of any value, and, like Cato of Utica, read Plato on the immortality of the Soul, and with the spit seek refuge in suicide on the kitchen dresser.

"But half an hour and I was in the world,
The din of mortals overwhelm'd the roar
With which the surge its mighty masses hurl'd

Against the bulwarks of the western shore;

In half an hour it seem'd the world was o'er;

*I climb'd the steep—the troubler, man,
seem'd dead,*

The sea's was drown'd in human din no more;

Where dwelt the timid partridge did I tread,

And in the eagle's realm aerial lift my head."

We shall suppose that Mr Stokes—as he was not walking for a wager, did the distance at about the rate of four miles an hour—which, if the day was hot, must have put him into a profuse perspiration—a strong sweat. Two miles, therefore, from a flourishing seaport town, he considered himself to be far beyond the bounds of the inhabited world—out of the reach of mankind and all their disgusting ways. With what a face he must have left the suburbs! Conscious of the high emprise on which he was bound, how must he have turned up his nose at the ragged urchins squalling round his path, till his eyes, in a fine frenzy rolling, met the lines intersecting the sky, and all fluttering with old seamen's jackets and trowsers, exposed to sale in Petticoat-lane! Had it been known in the town that he was about to plunge all alone into the perils of the desert, and to encounter single-handed all the monsters,

"Gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras dire," with which the imagination of a timid nautical population dreamt it to be infested, his exit would have been attended from the Pig and Whistle with a band of instrumental music, in which the cloth-covered marrow-bones and cleavers would to the muffled town-drum have moaned to the self-devoted hero an everlasting farewell.

"In half an hour it seem'd the world was o'er."

About the time consumed by a reasonable sermon. Did the world give o'er by degrees, like a pound of melting butter, or smack all in a moment like a burst bladder? For the first mile or so, there must have been,—nay, there were—for we have ourselves been in them, and at divers times, and in sundry manner, slaked our thirst both with blue ruin and heavy wet at their nut-brown oval oak-tables—here and there, as if dropped from heaven, small, comfortable, well-kept change-houses, or public, into whose ever-open doors we were smiled and beguiled, courted and curtsied, by slim-waisted maiden or barrel-bellied matron, wide awake to the wishes of wayfaring men, and "swifter than meditation or the wings of love," away and back again with a plateful of poached eggs, or welsh-rabbits, which in half an hour, nay, in far less time, "were o'er," like the vanished world. We have too good an opinion of Mr Stokes, in spite of his misanthropy, to believe his stomach —as well as his soul—dead to all ordinary feelings of humanity; and do not doubt, to use his own poetical language, that "he hurled mighty masses" of toasted cheese down his gullet, according to "mankind's disgusting ways," washing them down with a deluge of brown-stout, before burying himself in the central solitude of the desert, perhaps a mile off that House of Entertainment for Man and Horse. Perhaps a pigeon-pie was in him, when treading among the "timid partridges" in the moor. But that eagles have their "realm aerial" within ten minutes' run of a donkey from a town, where Tars overwhelmed with their din the ocean's roar, is, we suspect, a traveller's tale, nor could we swallow it, even were Mr Stokes to shew us the stuffed body of an alleged Bird of Jove, which he had shot in that remote desert with a single ball from his shillela right through the heart. The creature he saw must have been a goose.

But what have we got here? Lord Byron? Indeed!

"Exception grand of these degenerate days!

Exception grand of thy degenerate caste!
In comet travel, and in comet blaze,
Thy genius o'er the mental midnight past,
While the dull common orbs look'd quite aghast.

But soon was ended thy sublime career,
Thy glorious course for man was, ah! too fast,—

Ay—and 'twas when thy ray most bright and clear,

Illumed, alas! it sank, never to reappear!"

Mr Stokes, squatted on the furze, half an hour's walk from the world, no doubt imagines himself a compeer of Childe Harold; and inwardly—we had almost, by a slip of the pen, written mentally—compares himself with Byron, when he says,

"To sit alone, and gaze o'er flood and fell," &c.

Now, the bird called a Booby, perched with his fat doup on a large stone, about a ton weight, in the slush of a creek, half asleep, digesting a flounder, is just every whit as much a bird, and as scientifically included in the class Aves, as an Eagle, sitting broad awake on a cliff ten thousand feet above the sea, and staring at the sun to clear his eyes before he sets sail on his vans to "prey in distant isles." But the moment he begins to flap himself up six feet above the level of the shore at low water, he feels painfully that he is a Booby; though, to do him justice, we question if he knows of the existence of the Eagle. Just so—and yet not just so—with Mr Stokes. He must know, figuratively speaking, that he is a Booby, and that too most painfully, the moment he attempts to fly. But, unlike his brother Booby, the bird, he bethinks him of the Eagle—that is, of Byron—and, forgetful of the prodigious weight which he constantly carries behind, and the feebleness of his finlike flappers, nothing less will satisfy him than to mount into what is called the empyrean, as if he belonged to the genus Falco. To the immediate consequences of this shot-star ambition, decency prevents us from making more than a slight allusion as we pass along; but the ultimate consequences are not only shameful as the others are, but fatal; and fatty gets a fall which shews him in the shape of a pancake.

Pray—if we may be permitted to indulge in a little verbal criticism—what does Mr Stokes mean by "exception of degenerate days?" And does he really, now, in his heart think these days degenerate? Are they degenerate from the virtue of the olden time? If he says so, alas! was poor Byron the man to restore their raciness? Are they degenerate from the genius of the olden time? If he says so, then we must change him from a biped and a booby into a quadruped and an ass; and even then the sentiment is too much to suffer from the largest animal of the class that "chews the thistle."

Will Mr Stokes be pleased, next time he goes to the Desert, to make out a list of names of noblemen distinguished by all mental endowments, during any preceding age, as numerous as that which now glorifies the peerage? Has he ever looked into an Army or Navy list? Or read a Gazette? Were Wellington's aide-de-camps degenerate from their sires of old? Was all the blood of our nobility, so prodigally shed on field and flood, from the era of the French revolution, to that of the battle of Waterloo, base blood and poor, in comparison with the high and rich blood of those undegenerate heroic families, the Stokeses and the Sewells, the two main branches of the great Trunk,—the right and left wings of the illustrious House of Tims? In all this he shews himself—if not a low-born—a low-bred man. In low birth, there is no disgrace—none but fools think so—and we should not esteem him the less—but the more—were he to turn out to be a natural son of the tailor who wrote the Age. But low-breeding is shameful, in all who have had the luck to be born at all, and peculiarly so in one who pretends that he cannot endure "mankind's disgusting ways;" indeed we have uniformly remarked, that he who plucks up courage to sneer at Lords, is the creature who would volunteer to lick their spittle, in the most "disgustful way;" and if spit upon accidentally by a nobleman, would pride himself on the expectation, and thenceforth claim three gobs on his scutcheon. Mr Stokes, like all other poetsasters, treats us with the old story of the comet. Byron has been compared to a comet about a billion times at the very lowest computation. Pray, did Mr Stokes ever see a comet? To the eye, it neither travels, nor blazes, nor particularly passes over midnight. It seems a soft lazy light, at which Mr Stokes, genteely tucking up the tails of his coat, might warm his posteriors. The dull common orbs—so he chooses to libel the stars—do not look quite aghast at a comet. They know their own place and keep it, and do not fear but that he will keep his, however eccentric may be his orbit. With regard to Byron again, did all the dull common orbs, alias all the great living poets of Britain, look quite aghast on his portentous career? All of them either admired, loved, or pitied him; even those whose innocuous brightness, in his unhappy and diseased temper, he vainly strove to stain with ridicule and abuse. Mr Stokes is mistaken, too, in supposing that the life of a comet is short. Comets are as ancient as the fixed stars—the transitory effulgencies are the meteors.

"Thy glorious course for man was, ah!
too fast,"

is about the most miserable line that ever was written, except the one which follows it—

"Ay,—and 'twas when thy ray most bright and clear Illumed——"

where utter drivelslobbers in wretched grammar, and the faculties are exhibited in the last stage of pauperism. "It sank, never to reappear," is indeed the last sob of inanition.

"Behold, a bard—I need not tell his name,
Grey in the service of servility,
Whose pallid cheek is somewhat tinged with shame,
With shame indeed it deeply tinged may be."

Who may be this old unhappy creature? Let us turn over the leaves and see. Here he is again—

"The apostate turn'd him to the world, and join'd
The gang of hypocrites, the servile throng,
For whom the gilded smile of Power is coin'd,
How strange he look'd the fawning crew among!"

Such is the character this small insignificant sinner Henry Sewell Stokes draws of ROBERT SOUTHEY. Faugh! the offence is rank; and the nostrils are surprised to feel how strong may be the stinking breath of a Lilliputian. To look at a poor poetaster, with his unmeaning face, and silly eyes, you would deem his disposition to be milk and water—but it is small beer turned into vinegar. Imbecility is almost always malignant—the feeble-hearted are generally foul-mouthed—and the weak, in a world where glory waits on power, are in fretting envy, the most worthless of the wicked. The head of that Illustrious Man is grey; for the brain within, working in intellect and imagination, for many laborious and glorious years, has whitened the locks that once were dark as the raven's wing; nor has Providence exempted him from mortal affliction.

But the world, whom his genius and his virtue have blessed, the race whom he has elevated by the divine spirit of his works, and the spirit diviner still of his life, will hold his name in everlasting honour and gratitude: and though loathsome to the mere senses, yet harmless after all will be the slime of the reptiles that may crawl over his grave.

Literary jealousy and envy, the bitterest passions that poison the heartsblood, and political party-spirit, that as often lies coolly as savagely, have for many years been assailing Mr Southey, with little other effect than public scorn spit in the faces of the mean malignants. But why should Master Stokes join the gang? If he be jealous of Mr Southey, so may green cheese be jealous of the moon. And as for party, why, Whigs and Radicals alike would scoff at a poetaster who dignifies Dartmoor with the pompous designation of a Desert. His abuse of Mr Southey therefore must be the abuse of a heartless blockhead, repeating by rote the gabble of the geese with whom he plowters about in the same pond. Motive he can have none; his fibels are even more ludicrous than loathsome; and we are disposed, as soon as our disgust subsides, to pity the poor fellow as a Fool. He is, after all, perhaps a simpleton rather than a sinner.

Uncle Toby we believe it was who dismissed a large bummer that had been teasing him, out at the window, with some such humane ejaculation as this "Go thy ways—poor devil—there is room enough in the world for both thee and me"—and Uncle Toby was in the right of it, for the blockhead of a blue-bottle had no sting, and was in his native element only in horse-dung. But small Stokes has a sting, which, though short and blunt, is yet venomous—and therefore we put our foot upon him—So.

KANT IN HIS MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS.

TO THE EDITOR OF BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

SIR CHRISTOPHER,

I HAVE talked with you so often upon the grand philosophic question of this age—the value and interpretation of the doctrines advanced by the great Thinker of Königsberg, that to you I shall not need any apology for drawing the public attention to any thing connected with that subject. Perhaps the direct philosophy of Kant, meaning by that term the Critical or Transcendental System, is not altogether fitted for a popular miscellany. Though, candidly speaking, I am not quite sure of that; for one excellence of your thrice-famous journal lies in its vast compass. There is no note within the gamut of human enquiries, and the largest scale of human interests, which has not been sounded by you on one occasion or other; and the true caution seems to be—not to reject such themes altogether, but (as in reality you have done) to keep them down within their just proportions. After a certain period of discussion, when books have familiarized us with their names, even the most abstruse enquirers after truth become objects of a mere popular interest in a limited degree. Fontenelle finds it convenient to expound one mode of philosophy to a female audience, Voltaire and Algarotti another. And such facts, possible for our ancestors of three generations back, are much more possible for ourselves, or ought to be, consistently with our pretensions. Yes, it will be said, mere abstruseness or subtlety, simply considered, is no prima facie objection to the policy of entertaining a great question even before a popular and mixed audience. It is not for its abstruseness that we shrink from the Transcendental Philosophy, but for that taken in connexion with its visionariness, and its disjunction from all the practical uses of life. In an age which, if ever any did, idolatrizes the tangible and the material—the shadowy (but not therefore unreal or baseless) texture of metaphysics is certainly called into a very disadvantageous comparison. Its objects are not those of any parts of knowledge to which modern curiosity is directed; neither are its weapons such as modern education has qualified us to wield. We are powerless for the means, and without reverence for the ends. The subsidiary pursuits of Logic, Psychology, &c. languish under the same neglect in this country. And thus every avenue being barred to this great and central philosophy, our ignorance, gross in this point as that of the Esquimaux, becomes reciprocally cause and effect in relation to our want of interest. Yet, after all is said and done, and when vassalage to the eye is most matured, and the empire of sense absolutely systematized by education,—still under every obstacle—oppression, thwarting, stifling, such is the imperishable dignity of the human mind, that all the great problems concerning its own nature and destination, which, without one exception, happen to be metaphysical, must and will victoriously return upon us.

“Of Providence, Foreknowledge, Will, and Fate,
Fixed Fate, Free Will, Foreknowledge Absolute,”

the ruined angels of Milton (Par. Lost, b. ii.) converse, as of the highest themes which could occupy their thoughts; and these are also the highest for man. Immortality—is that a natural prerogative of the human soul, or a privilege superinduced upon its original nature? God—does he exist by laws capable of a regular demonstration, as Des Cartes (borrowing from the Schoolmen), and, upon different grounds, Samuel Clarke, imagine? Or is He far transcendent to every mode of apodeictic evidence? Is man free, i.e. has that stupendous phenomenon of human nature—the will, or the practical reason—absolute autonomy? Or is that also under laws of mechanism? In fact, all parts of knowledge have their origin in Metaphysics, and, finally, perhaps revolve into it. Mathematics has not a foot to stand upon which is not purely metaphysical. It begins in Metaphysics; and their several orbits are continually intersecting—as in the questions arising on the Higher Curves—the Differential Calculus—and generally on the Infinite. Natural Philosophy even, which might have been presumed to have the least of a supersensuous origin, plants its first steps—those, namely, which concern Motion, Rest, Gravity, Force, Action, Reaction, Plenum, Vacuum, &c.—on ground which is so abundantly Metaphysical, that the shallowest philosopher has been forced to see that the solution of the difficulties, in any case where they are solved, and the anarchy of opinions in some of those cases where they are not, alike rest—not upon experiments enough or too few—but simply upon a better or worse theory, or Metaphysical construction by the understanding of the known facts of the case. These facts are to be exhibited in a system, i. e. in their relation to each other; and that can be done only under the guidance of Metaphysical principles.—And this necessity is absolute; no speculations on these elementary parts of Physics, not those which are the most obstinate in nominally abjuring Metaphysics, can really and bonâ fide forego this necessity. As well might a man abjure Geometry when investigating the affections of the Parabola. “Hypotheses non fingo,” says Sir Isaac Newton; yet, as Kant has shewn, in the business of a Vacuum—he not only did introduce a hypothesis, but that hypothesis a metaphysical one, and (worse still!) a needless one. Many are the men, indeed, who have railed at Metaphysics by metaphysical arguments; and have sought to establish the baselessness or the uselessness of Logic, Ontology, &c. by arguments drawn wholly from the armories of those sciences. The late walking Stewart, for example, spent his life and some scores of volumes in metaphyzizing against Metaphysics. And so in Physics, no matter how much opposed in other respects, all investigators of nature in her earliest incunabula, and expounders of the “dark foundations” upon which her elementary forces repose, are compelled, in substance and reality, to enter the province of Metaphysics—however much they may disown the name; and can excel their predecessors or antagonists only in so far as good Metaphysics will furnish better results than bad.

Meantime, my dear Sir Kit, form yourself—with my present purposes—the question is of no moment. Put what value you will on Metaphysics, your appreciation is a matter in which neither Kant nor myself can be much interested. Not Kant; for a disparagement, applied to the science in abstract, cannot personally or separately affect the individual. That Sparta, which has fallen to his lot, sterile as it may be, it is yet possible that he may have ornamented and developed to the extent of its capacity. On the other hand, not myself; for I am not at this time meditating any incursion into that unpopular region. On some future day, it is very possible, that I may trouble you with a short exposition of the Transcendental Philosophy, so framed that, without foregoing one iota of technical rigour, it shall convey, for the first time, to merely English ears, a real account of what that philosophy is. For take notice of this, that every thing yet published on the subject of Kant, in the English language, errs by one of two defects. Either it is mere nonsense, in a degree possible only to utter and determined ignorance of the German language; or it is so close a translation of the ipsissima verba of Kant, as to offer no sort of assistance to an uninitiated student, to say nothing of the barbarous effect produced by a German structure of sentence, and a terminology altogether new. To the former class belongs the long paper in an early number of the Edinburgh Review, written, as I judged upon internal evidence, and have since had confirmed to me, by Dr Thomas Brown. To the latter, the various essays of Mr Wirgman, published in the Encyclopædia Londinensis. These, like some thousands of similar works published in Germany and Denmark, are sure to be in the right by benefit of an artifice which, at the same time, makes them utterly useless, viz. by evading every attempt at commenting upon difficulties, or illustrating them, or giving their own sense of ambiguous passages, under one uniform caution of simply rehearsing and echoing the identical words, (unaltered, unexplained, unexpanded by so much as a little parenthesis or note,) of the master himself. Hence, whilst we have thousands (yes, thousands!) of German or Latin "Commentaries," "Dictionaries," &c. on the Philosophy of Kant, they are pretty generally, as I have often said, to be regarded as no more than mere concordances, more or less carefully compiled. If you would know the meaning of the word "Transcendental,"* for instance, the Dictionary of Schmidt, or any other contemptible work of that kind, will be sure to give you Kant's own definition of it; and it will also collect laboriously from all Kant's writings, a pompous enumeration of the various cases to which he applies this term; but not a syllable will you find of any attempt to harmonize their several applications, and to evolve the common principle which gives unity to so many apparent differences; no, nor a single attempt at anticipating and smoothing the difficulties likely to arise in the effort to grasp so subtle an idea, nor an atom of illustration wrought out proprio marte. In short, what assistance you might expect from an index of parallel passages, which should bring all the acceptations of a word under your view at one instant, that, and no more, you may promise yourself from the commentators of Kant. And this is the more disgusting, because Kant not only had no talent for communicating ideas luminously, but had even the good sense to be aware of his own deficiencies in that respect, and publicly to avow them. After that avowal, it became criminal in a soi-disant commentator on Kant to rest contentedly in the words as he found them. Neither, indeed, had it been otherwise, and that Kant, instead of the obscurest had been the most luminous of expounders, could it have happened that another expounder, who had really mastered his meaning, would have uniformly acquiesced in his particular way of explaining it. We see, for instance, in Algebra, that the clear and most determinate truths of that science, are presented in a different way and order by each successive teacher: quot homines, tot rationes docendi. And hence we are forced upon a very unpleasant conviction, in regard to modern Germany, viz. that, beyond any other nation, she breeds a race of sciolists, who derive a strange pleasure from wielding a pompous machinery of distinctions and technicalities, which they do not even fancy themselves to understand. For it is evident that, upon the faith even of a fancied knowledge, they would have courage to venture some fragment at least of an occasional illustration from their own stores. It must happen too, in some instances, that they would differ a little from their master. The main doctrines of a great systematic work may have too logical a cohesion to allow of this: grant one, you grant all; but still, in a very diffusive philosophy, there is room in some minor point for the most confiding disciple to hang a doubt perhaps, or an insinuation of a conditional demur. If nothing must be absolutely suspected, still (as in the French reign of terror) it may be suspected of being suspicious. The very blindest allegiance will allow of this. But naturally, where all is chaos and darkness, there can be as little of sincere doubt or hesitation, as of self-originated illustration.

* On this word transcendental, as most arbitrarily distinguished from the word transcendent, Mr Coleridge says, (Biographia Literaria, Vol. I. p. 241,) that the distinction is "observed by our elder divines and philosophers, whenever they express themselves scholastically. Dr Johnson, indeed, has confounded the two words; but his own authorities do not bear him out." Nothing can be more unfounded; and the best proof that it is so, lies in this,—that the schoolmen themselves, whom our elder divines, &c., are here supposed to follow, never dreamed of any distinction. Neither was their use of these words, either one or other, at all akin to Kant's. In the scholastic use of the word transcendentalis, it was opposed to predicamentalis, if two correlates, as, e. g. Father and Son, fall under the category of Relation, they were then said to be predicamental notions; but if the two correlates, as, e. g. Causa and Causatum, Subject and Adjunct, did not fall under that category, but transcended the limits of all the categories collectively, in that case they were said to be transcendental notions. Now, though it is true that a Kantian category and an Aristotelian category are very different things,—the latter being a mere inert abstraction or generalization, and the former a true operative conditio sine qua non in the genesis of all our thoughts,—yet, so far as our present purpose requires, we may compare them by saying, that the transcendental in Kant's system, was so far from transcending the categories, that the transcendental, and that only, constituted the categories.

However, all this is by the way; for, though my statement of Kant's system will be very different, in these particulars, from those which load the German catalogues for the last thirty-five years, yet at present I shall cautiously abstain from every part of his works which belongs to him in his quality of founder of a new philosophy. The best way to a presumptive, or analogical appreciation of a man's pretensions in matters which we do not well understand, is to try him in those which we do. Metaphysics are pretty generally out of the reach of a nation made up of practical men of business. To judge a metaphysician directly, is therefore out of our province; but indirectly we may fairly enough compute his amount of power, by observing how he acquits himself on that neutral ground which is common to all intellectual nations. Civil Polity, for example, Natural Theology, Political Economy—these are parts of knowledge which furnish an arena, not less to the subtleties of the speculative, than to the good sense of the practical. Now it happens, that on these, and other subjects of a more miscellaneous nature, there exists a large body of essays, written occasionally (i. e. in the philosophic sense of that term, as occasions arose to draw them forth) by Kant, at many different periods of his long life. These have been collected since his death, and published in four octavo volumes, under the title of Kant's Vermischte Schriften, (Kant's Miscellaneous Writings.) The editor, Tieftrunk, was personally acquainted with Kant; a man of talent, and one of the few, perhaps, who really understood him. His notes, therefore, in the rare cases where he gives any, are valuable; and much to be lamented it is, that he did not give us more. It is also matter of regret, as with reference to my present popular aim, that the essays themselves have too little of a literary cast: too generally they have a scientific leaning, and always a scientific diction and mode of treating the subject. In reality Kant was a bad writer, and in some respects a pedant, and also, in a qualified sense, (and without meaning the least disrespect to him,) something of a brute. That is to say, though—from an early horror which he conceived for the character of a mere scholastic dreamer, unfitted to take his place in the business of real life—he affected, in his own person, the manners and knowledge of a man of the world, sought the society of ladies, and did not shrink from that of kings, soldiers, nobles, foreigners, &c.; and though, in the same spirit, and as part of that policy, he acted on the memorable counsel given to a Grecian philosopher,* and “sacrificed to the Graces;” though he went so far even as to write an illustrative essay on the Sublime and the Beautiful, which he did his best to make popular, by making it determinately shallow and trivial; though, in the same spirit, he seasoned all his works with elegant citations from classical poets—always apposite, however trite; yet, under all these disguises, it is very evident that Kant's original determination was to a coarse, masculine pursuit of science; and that literature, in its finer departments, whose essence is power and not knowledge, was to him, at all parts of his life, an object of secret contempt. Out of regard to what he considered the prejudices of society, it is true he concealed his contempt; and perhaps, in its whole extent, he did not even avow it to himself; but it is clear that it lurked in his inner nature. What, then? do I pretend to know Kant better than he knew himself? In some things, perhaps, I do. How, for instance, I ask, could that man have had any sense for the graces of style, in the largest meaning of that word, that is, for the mode of presenting a subject, of effecting the transitions and connexions, for the artifices by which parts are brought forward into prominent relief, or withdrawn from too conspicuous a station; for the arts of preparation, of recapitulation, of peroration, together with the whole world of refinements which belong to a beautiful and impressive diction?—how, I demand, could he have had any organ for the perception of all this, who in his own case, and in those works which he most of all designed as the classical monuments of his own power, shews uniformly that, in a question of manner, he knows of no higher a purpose than a man can, or ought to have, than in any way whatsoever, no matter how clumsily, disorderly, ungracefully—no matter with what perplexity or confusion, tautology or circumlocution, to deliver himself of a meaning? In some degree this is certainly surprising; for Kant was really a good scholar, at least as respected Latin. He had, indeed, been a schoolfellow of Ruhnken, that admirable master of classical learning; he had corresponded with him, and he wrote Latin excellently, indeed a sort of Latin very much superior to what passes for good amongst ourselves. But, for all that, he wrote his own language most uncouthly; some would say barbarously, but that would be going too far. Joseph Scaliger, in the Introduction to his Annotations on Manilius, insists, very properly, on the distinction between barbare loqui and incondite loqui. This was precisely the difference between Wolf (the systematizer of Leibnitz) and Kant; Wolf, in our Queen Anne's time, who wrote in a piebald hybrid diction, made up of German, French, and Latin, might be said to write barbare, Kant, incondite, i. e. without composition or digestion. Frederick Schlegel, who was eternally weaving false refinements, represents Kant's style as the product of a deliberate system, and the result of infinite pains. Nothing can be more untrue; mere carelessness, combined with fulness of thought, self-confounded in the tumult of discharging itself, accounts for all that distinguishes his style. It is said that Kant was jealous of the reputation of Leibnitz. Perhaps, though in a way that never disturbed his candour, he was; and in some great endowments undoubtedly he had the advantage of Leibnitz; but in others he was vastly his inferior, and in none more than in this very quality of style. The philosophic style of Leibnitz is excellent: to subjects already difficult in themselves, he brings no super-added difficulties of language. In fact, Leibnitz had lived too much in Paris for that. German prolixity and involution are inevitably pruned away by intercourse with French models.

One or two of these smaller essays of Kant, therefore, with all their defects, that is, with the defect quoad hoc, (or relatively to a popular treatment,) of too great a bias to severe science, and with the absolute defect of a bad style, and bad in that way which least allows of a remedy being applied in any faithful translation, I purpose to lay before your readers, not in a full version, but in a critical abstract. Allow me, however, to introduce them by a few general remarks on Kant's habits of thought, and on those peculiarities in his literary character and opinions which are likely to be most offensive to English readers, unless previously warned and taught to allow for them.

One fact, which struck me by accident, and not until after a long familiarity with Kant's writings, is this, that in all probability Kant never read a book in his life. This is paradoxical, and undoubtedly is in the very teeth of general fame, which represents him to have been a prodigious student in all parts of knowledge, and therefore, of necessity, it may be thought, a vast reader. A pretty general student he certainly was, but not, therefore, a great reader. And, fully conceding his great attainments, I still adhere to my thesis, that Kant never read a book. What! none? No, none at all; no book whatsoever. The books of which he read most were, perhaps, books of voyages and travels; for he himself gave lectures on what he called Physical Geography, i. e. descriptive sketches of our planet, both with reference to those obvious features of its terraqueous distribution and arrangement, (which constitute the sum of what is usually understood by geography,) and also with reference to its geologic structure, and the classification and condition of its human occupants. Books of that kind which are made up of independent notices, and a vast variety of details, could not be read by any process of short-hand; and these he borrowed from his own publisher (Hartknoch), and most unwillingly, I venture to say, glanced his eye probably over the whole, pausing, perhaps, to dwell a little upon any passage where a prominent word or two might give a promise of some interesting discussion or statement. But wherever the business of the writer was not chiefly with facts, but with speculations built on facts, Kant's power of thought gave him a ready means of evading the labour of reading the book. Taking the elementary principles of the writer, as stated by himself or another, and supposing that he thought it worth his pains, he would then integrate these principles for himself; that is to say, he would supply all that was wanting as a complement to an entire systematic hypothesis. In this way he judged of Plato, Berkeley, and many others. Locke he had evidently read only in an outline; and authors of obscurer name, such as Plotinus, Boethius, Cudworth, and thousands of others, he had never so much as looked into. Yet these were writers in his own department; and if he would not read them, it may be presumed that (unless for relaxation) he would read nobody. For this abstinence, so long as he was forming his own system, I give him credit. Having his own principles fully conceived more than thirty years before he brought them forward in a full development, he was perfectly in the right to retreat from every thing that could disturb their evolution; but once having matured his own scheme of philosophy, undoubtedly it was his duty to have examined the writings of others who had trod the same ground; as in this way only he could ascertain the amount of his coincidences with former philosophers. These are, in fact, very numerous in Kant; whilst the air of intrepid originality, with which he uniformly presents both his principles and their consequences, forbids us to suppose that he was aware of them as such. I readily grant that, if an elder philosopher advances a truth as an insulated fact, and afterwards another deduces that same truth in a regular way, from principles peculiar to himself, the second propounder has a right to esteem himself under no obligation to the first. But he will do well in policy to notice the coincidence, and to point out the systematic tenure which it has obtained from himself, in opposition to the loose footing on which it stood previously. It is undeniable, however, that in many instances Kant has not the excuse which I have here suggested for him; he brings forward truths not at all better demonstrated, or illustrated, or applied, than they had been by others, as pure novelties, and all for want of reading. The same want of reading is conspicuous in another class of cases, viz. those where he has missed the most tempting opportunities for applying his own undoubted principles to the exposure of errors countenanced by popular writers—errors of which he was not aware; for we may be sure that no man willingly foregoes such challenges, as it were, to the victorious application of his own principles.

Secondly, It must not be concealed that Kant is an enemy to Christianity. Not content with the privilege of speaking in an infidel tone, and with philosophic liberty, he manifestly thinks of Christianity with enmity, nay, with spite. I will never believe that Kant was capable (as some have represented him) of ridiculing in conversation the hopes of immortality; for that is both incredible for itself, and in contradiction to many passages in his writings. But that he was mean and little-minded in his hatred to Christianity is certain. Nor is it at all unintelligible, that philosopher as he was, and compelled to do homage therefore, unwilling homage, to the purity and holiness which so transcendently belong to the Christian morals, (a subject which he could not decline or evade, having himself treated that part of philosophy with such emphatic truth and grandeur,) after confessing, as, in fact, he did, its superiority to the Stoic morality, which certainly approaches nearest to the Christian in uncompromising rigour of principle, it is still not unintelligible that he should harbour enmity to Christianity as an entire scheme of religious philosophy. Though at first sight startling, I repeat that this co-existence of two opposite states of feeling with regard to Christianity is no inexplicable phenomenon. Infidel philosophers have in general displayed a bigotry of hostility to Christianity, which, whilst openly testifying their hatred, covertly testified their respect. In this there is really no marvel, though it is true that many writers have treated it as such. Humphrey Ditton, for instance, in his once celebrated book on the Resurrection, addressing the infidels of his day, says, (p. 42,) "Why is there so loud a cry of juggle and imposture set up against Christianity, against which the charge has scarce ever been attempted to be made out, rather than the religion of Mohammed, where they grant the forgery to be past dispute? If there be a little fling sometimes by chance at the Koran, the critics are always exercising their wits upon the Gospel. Now, I say, why all this noise and stir about Christianity? Why Jesus Christ more than Mohammed?" The answer to this is not difficult upon philosophic grounds. In any case whatever, let a man persuade himself that he has reasons for despising in one view what forces his homage in another, and a struggle will inevitably take place between the two opposite impulses, such as will always terminate in a lively state of anger and irritation. Absolute and unmitigated contempt will generally preclude hostility. That feeling will arise more naturally when the contempt is disturbed (and, therefore, from a quiescent raised to an active force) by a counter agent, a sentiment of imperfect respect. On this principle is solved the cruelty practised on slaves by some men humane enough to brute animals. The inevitable respect for their own common nature in the person of the slave, meeting with their contempt for the individual, raised a conflict in their minds; but in the case of the brute, where the state of the feeling with which it is contemplated is not $+ X$ (or plus X) in opposition to $- X$ (or minus X), but simply $= 0$, no such conflict could arise.

The explanation, therefore, of Kant's hostility to Christianity was not at all the more difficult, because, in many capital points, he venerated Christianity. On the contrary, it was on that account so much the easier. But, however that may be, the fact is undeniable. In one passage, though I cannot at this moment cite page and volume, he peremptorily denies that the moral or political condition of the earth, and the general face of society, have been at all improved by eighteen centuries of Christianity, (more properly fifteen, regard had to the era of its civil establishment.) But Kant's works yield many instances of unfair dealing with Christianity; one of which, as it will amuse you, I will here translate.—In the conclusion of his "Streit der Facultäten," Kant had remarked in the text that the Biblical History "presents us with a very remarkable Numeral Cabala, in regard to the most important epochs of its chronology, such as cannot but in some degree weaken the impression of its authenticity." This remark he illustrates at length in the following foot-note: "Seventy Apocalyptic months, (of which there are 4 in this Cycle,) each month of $29\frac{1}{2}$ years, make 2065 years. Now from this product subtract every 49th year, as the great year of rest, or Sabbatical year, that is, subtract in all 42, and there remain exactly 2023 for the year when Abraham went up to Egypt out of the land of Canaan, which God had given him. Thence to the recovery of that country by the children of Israel are precisely 70 Apocalyptic weeks = 490 years. Four periods of that length ($= 1960$ years) added to the former period of 2023, make 3983 years (the era of Christ's birth, dated from the Mosaic creation); and that so exactly, that it is true even to a year. Seventy years after comes the final destruction of Jerusalem, and that also is a mystical epoch. But it may be objected, that Bengel (in his Ordo Temporum, p. 9, and p. 218, seqq.) deduces a different number as the era of Christ's nativity. True: but that makes no manner of difference in the mystical sanctity of the number 7; for Bengel's number is 3939. Now the number of years from Abraham's Call to the Birth of Christ is 1960, which number expresses the amount of four Apocalyptic periods, each of 490 years, or (if you choose) of 40 Apocalyptic periods, each of 7 times 7 years (49.) Subtract, then, from every period of 49 years, one as the representative of the Sabbatical year, that will give you 40 for a subtrahend; and next subtract, on account of every great Sabbatical year, (namely, every 490th year) one also, and that will give you an additional subtrahend of 4, as there are four such periods of 490 years. Your total subtrahend, therefore, will be 44. This, taken from 3983, will leave Bengel's number of 3939 for the era of Christ's nativity. And thus it turns out that the two numbers 3983 and 3939, assigned on separate systems for the Birth of Christ, differ only thus far—that the latter of the two arises when, in computing the amount of time for the former, all that time which belongs to the four great epochs is reduced by the number of the Sabbatical years. According to Bengel's reckoning, the chronological table of the Sacred History would stand thus:—

- " 2023—Promise to Abraham of the land of Canaan.
- " 2302—Accomplishment of this promise.
- " 2981—Dedication of the First Temple.
- " 3460—Order for the building of the Second Temple.
- " 3939—Birth of Christ.

Subtract from every one of these numbers the one immediately preceding, and it leaves 490. Even the year of the Flood may be learned on this system by à priori calculation. Four periods of 490 (that is of 70 times 7) make 1960. Subtract every 7th year ($\therefore 280$), and there will remain 1680. From this 1680 again subtract every 70th year ($\therefore 24$), and there will remain 1656; and that was the year of the Flood."

Upon all this long calculation Kant concludes thus:—"What shall we say then? Is it to be inferred that the sacred numbers have actually predetermined the course of history? Frank's system, entitled Cyclos Jobilæus, turns upon this very centre of mystical chronology."—By way of answer to it all, I think I cannot do better than transcribe the words of Mr Coleridge, as I once found them in a blank leaf of that volume which contains the Essay in question:—"In this attack on the New and Old Testament from Cabala of Numbers, how came it that Kant did not perceive that Jews could not join with Christians? And one of the events, at least, is downright history, the destruction of Jerusalem. A single perusal of Eichhorn (no believer himself in the supernatural) dashes to earth all these objections. Besides, how unfair to subtract every 49th year in the first 2065 ($= 2023$), and not to subtract them in the 70 times 4 Apocalyptic weeks that follow; to make the Apocalyptic month 295 years, and then four Apocalyptic weeks $= 28$? What coincidences may not be produced by these means? I doubt not you might fix on some one number in the Greek or Roman history, and play the same marvels off with it. Petavius may omit, and Bengel introduce, the subtraction of the 49th year, and all is fair; but Petavius must not now omit and now introduce ad libitum. In short, the whole range is included in 10; and what wonder if, with such license allowed, half a dozen remarkable events, in the course of 6000 years, should be brought all to some one number? Every man's own experience would furnish equal coincidences in every year, if he examined minutely." True. Take an instance from the immortal Niebuhr. From Aeneas to the building of Rome—how many years? 360. Thence to the capture by the Gauls? 360. Thence to the foundation of the empire? 360. Thence to the foundation of Constantinople? 360. Was this Cabala? With respect to the Flood, Call of Abraham, Building of the First Temple, &c., these are all events that lie beyond the earliest limit of Grecian chronology, and therefore, of necessity, want all collateral evidence. Resting, therefore, upon purely Jewish testimony, it is open to an infidel to insinuate that events, synchronizing so perfectly with a fanciful Rabbinical Cabala, were themselves likely to be equally fanciful. But when he goes on to apply the same principle of criticism to events authenticated by collateral records—Pagan as well as Christian, and Jewish, Greek, and Roman, no less than Hebrew—his scepticism recoils sadly on his own character for good sense. If a monkish chronicler were to assure us that great famine or pestilence had occurred, according to intervals indicated by the powers of the number 2, (viz. 1, 8, 16, 32, &c.) we should be disposed to laugh at his theory; and if we found him alleging confirmations of it from the dark ages, we should certainly suspect him of forging attestations so as to quadrate with his cabala. But if this same monk were to shew us that certain recurrences in our own actual experience had been governed by this law, in such a case, supposing that we still persisted in rejecting his theory, we must do so in spite of his illustrations, and not surely in consequence of them. Now, Kant's illustrations from the relations of time between the Crucifixion and the Destruction of Jerusalem, are brought forward as additional grounds of suspicion against Biblical testimony; whereas evidently, so far as it goes, the tendency of this particular illustration is entirely in favour of the Cabala. Did Kant mean to question the Christian chronology of these events? If he did not, he meant something which tended against himself.

In the very same Essay, and in the very next page, is another instance of Kant's hatred to pure Christianity: if he would tolerate it in any shape, it seems it must be in that which is farthest removed from its primitive purity; which, by the way, is an argument in favour of my way of accounting for Kant's feelings on this matter. Talking of the Roman Catholics, he says—"That church, in avowing that there is no salvation except within its own pale, speaks much more consistently than the Protestant, which admits the possibility of salvation even to the Roman Catholic. For, if that be so, then (as Bossuet* observes) a man will make the safest choice by attaching himself to the Papists. Since, after all, to be happier than happy, is what no man need desire." It is scarcely possible, in the same number of words, to crowd more or heavier errors. Even the last words have no truth; since a Protestant may, very consistently with Scripture, believe in de- grees of future happiness. But the great blunder, and one which possibly never was surpassed by any man priding himself (and justly, for the most part) upon accuracy of logic, is in the application of Bossuet's remark. For it is obvious, that, if a man already believes in the Popish creed, then he has no choice to make. To suppose him in a state of freedom for making a choice, we must necessarily suppose him an unbeliever in that form of religion. If then, being an unbeliever, he yet adopts it on politic considerations of safety, (as having the votes in his favour both of Papist and Protestant,) that is no religion at all, either in the eyes of Papist or Protestant; for both must include sincerity in their idea of religion. Obviously, the maxim is of no prudential application at all; that is, it does not beforehand serve to guide a man in his choice of religion: its use is merely reflex or retrospective; that is, supposing a man, in sincerity of heart, to have, bona fide, adopted the Popish faith as his own, such a maxim is consolatory afterwards, and on reflection, by suggesting the double guarantee which he has for having made a wise choice, first, in the assurance of his own church, and secondly, in the admission of the hostile church. That a logician so keen as Kant should have committed so monstrous an oversight, and allowed his spite to betray him into such an Irish Bull as that of making a man to be prudentially religious in professing a religion which he does not believe, has certainly no parallel. Here again I found a note of Mr Coleridge's in these words: "It may well surprise one to find in Kant a confirmation of so ridiculous a sophism as that of Bossuet and the Romaniists. The Protestant does not say that a man can be saved who chooses the Catholic religion, not as true, but as the safest; for this is no religion at all, but only a pretence to it. A faith sincere, from honest intentions, will save Catholic or Protestant. So St Paul on meats and holy days." But Bossuet may have been the person who first gave this notion extensive currency; and in that sense it may be properly attributed to him. Otherwise, it was used by Papists, and answered by Protestants, before Bossuet was born. See, among others, Archbishop Usher, Dr Christopher Potter, (of the age of James the First); and doubtless many scores beside. The root of the sophism came from Athanasius.

the best, most triumphant, and most comprehensive answer which this monstrous abortion of sound logic ever met with, was from the pen of Jeremy Taylor. Never, perhaps, on any subject, were there two such annihilating arguments on this point, as these which follow. First, on the supposition (a very possible one) that we Protestants are wrong in our concession,—“Whatever we talk, things are as they are, not as we dispute, or grant, or hope;” and hence he reminds a convert to Popery, whom he is here addressing, that it would be no great consolation to her, in the unfortunate case of finding herself damned, that we Protestants had, in our charity, believed the contrary. But, secondly, on the supposition that we are right in our concession, what is the true meaning and value of that concession? It may safely be affirmed, that, had Bossuet or any other Papist ever read the clench which follows, we should never again have heard this Protestant concession insisted on:—“I wish,” says Jeremy Taylor, “I wish that you would consider that, if any of our men say salvation may be had in your church, it is not for the goodness of your new proposition,” (i. e. for the additions or changes interwoven with Protestantism, or Primitive Christianity,) “but only because you do keep so much of that which is our religion, that upon the confidence of that we hope well concerning you. And we do not hope any thing at all that is good of you or your religion, as it distinguishes from us and ours; we hope that the good which you have common with us may obtain pardon, directly or indirectly, or may be an antidote of the venom, and an amulet against the danger, of your very great errors. So that, if you can derive any confidence from our concession, you must remember where it takes root; not upon any thing of yours, but wholly upon the excellence of ours. You are not at all safe or warranted for being Papists; but we hope well of some of you for having so much of the Protestant.” Other arguments follow and precede this, in which Jeremy Taylor has pursued the sophism with such overwhelming ridicule, and so merciless an exposure of its hollowness, to the very end of his letter, (a letter to an English Lady, who had been recently seduced to Popery,) that, laying all together, one is perfectly astounded to find that any one single proposition can be comprehensive enough to cover such a variety and enormity of error. And had Kant been induced to read this flagrant exposure of the true Protestant sense of the famous Protestant concession, which he had backed with his imprimatur, under the Popish acceptance of it, he was too good a dialectician not to have blushed purple for his own levity and thoughtless precipitance.*

Writing with such habitual contempt for revealed religion, and with more bitter contempt in proportion as that religion came nearer to the ideal of absolute purity, Kant (as it may well be supposed) could not fail of drawing upon himself the notice of government. With all our modern outcry for toleration, it may be hoped that a time will never come, in any Christian land, when a public

* Kant was eternally using, in his own writings, the scholastic distinction of objective and subjective; and I readily grant, not without good reason, and great benefit. Strange that he did not see how much that distinction applies to this case! The Romanists talk as though our concession, opposed to their absolute refusal of a corresponding concession, argued something objectively superior and more convincing in their faith: but evidently, and before examination even. It might be presumed quite as likely to argue only a subjective difference in the two parties, viz. in charity. Not any more dubious appearance of error on their part, but on ours, greater charity as to the pardonableness of all error that is merely error of the understanding, extorts from us such a concession. On this view of the case, it is clear that greater impudence and greater uncharitableness will always be sufficient to secure the imaginary triumph of the Papist, or indeed of any other partizans in any other cause. A Cartesian might say to a Newtonian, I presume you do not think me in damnable error? Certainly not, replies the Newtonian. Then take notice, rejoins the Cartesian, that your errors in my mind are damnable. Upon this argument, according to Kant, a man would do well to abjure his Newtonianism.

Professor in a great national university, authorized and protected by the government,—a Professor, too, whose extraordinary talents and knowledge diffused his opinions far and wide, and whose otherwise irreproachable life gave them additional weight and influence,—can have reason to count upon toleration, in sapping the very foundations of those doctrines upon which all the sublimer hopes of poor frail humanity repose. Such a time, we trust, will never come, even in the heart of infidel Germany. At all events, it had not come in the 18th century. And accordingly, on the 12th of October 1794, Kant was surprised by an unwelcome letter of stern rebuke from his sovereign, the reigning King of Prussia, Frederick William the Second. The immediate occasion of this letter was his book on Religion within the limits of pure Reason: but it is probable that this particular book did but mature and furnish the immediate occasion to the explosion of that displeasure which must have been long accumulating. The thunder fell with the more effect upon the old Transcendentalist, for a very particular and facetious reason, viz. because he considered himself (visum teneatis?) a remarkably religious character. In one thing the old man's feelings were spared,—the letter was a private one, and first made public by Kant himself after the king's death. As it is short and to the purpose, perhaps I may as well translate it.

“Frederick William, by the grace of God King of Prussia, &c. &c. To our well-beloved Immanuel Kant, Worthy and very learned Professor, our dear liegeman! So it is, that for some time past it has come to our high knowledge, with great displeasure, that you misapply your philosophy to the purpose of disfiguring and disparaging many capital and fundamental doctrines of Holy Writ and Christianity; as particularly in your book entitled Religion within the limits of pure Reason, and in other similar Essays. We had looked for better things from you; since you cannot but yourself be aware how deeply you offend, by such conduct, against your own duty as a teacher of youth, and against the spirit of our paternal wishes—to which you were no stranger—for the welfare of the country. We look for your conscientious answer as soon as possible; and expect, on pain of our highest displeasure, that you will give no ground for blame of that sort in future, but will rather apply your influence and your great talents to the task of furthering more and more our gracious designs for the public good. Otherwise, in case of persevering opposition to our pleasure hereby notified, be well assured that you will have unpleasant consequences to expect. Meantime, we assure you of our gracious regard. Berlin, the 1st of October, 1794.”

Such was the rebuke, such were the menaces, which, in hoary old age, (then upwards of 70,) Kant drew upon himself from his king,—a prince otherwise so well disposed to him, that nothing less than the highest provocation could have extorted from him a harsh word to a man, in other respects of merit so distinguished. But surely grey hairs and irreligion make a monstrous union; and the spirit of proselytism carried into the service of infidelity,—youthful zeal put forth by a tottering decreed old man to withdraw from poor desponding and suffering human nature its most essential props, whether for action or for suffering, for conscience or for hope, is a spectacle too disgusting to leave room for much sympathy with merit of another kind. What was Kant's reply?—It has often been observed that, when once a man gets deeply involved in debt, he is rarely able to preserve his integrity or his honour quite unsullied; or at least loses the edge of his aversion to petty meanness. Something of the same effect is visible in the conduct of those who allow themselves openly to propagate infidelity. Let a man be as sincerely an infidel as any ever has been, it is most difficult to suppose that he can have framed to himself any notions of moral obligation, which could make it a duty to extend his opinions. So that it is a thousand to one that, in publishing his opinions, he has yielded almost consciously to a vanity or to a spite which he is ashamed to avow. Hence arises a necessity for lying. And melancholy it is to record, that Kant,—the upright, stern, stoical Kant,—in his answer to the king, shuffled, juggled, equivocated, in fact (it must be avowed) lied. To what an extravagant height Kant carried his general reverence for truth, is well known. So sacred, in his estimate, was the obligation to unconditional veracity, that he declared it to be a duty, in case a murderer should apply to you for information as to the route taken by a man who had just escaped from his murderous fangs, to tell him the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Not to save a poor innocent fellow-creature from instant and bloody death, not even to save the assassin from the guilt and misery of so hideous a crime, would it be lawful, in Kant's judgment, to practise any the slightest evasion or disguise. The right to truth, even of the most abhorred matricide, and in the very act and agony of accomplishing his hellish purposes, is, according to Kant, absolute, and incapable of restraint or qualification. This explanation it was necessary to make, that we may be able to appreciate properly the miserable dilemma in which Kant must have involved himself, before he would seek shelter from a king's displeasure in a palpable untruth. But such it was, a lie gross and palpable, on which this proud philosopher mainly rested his apology. His letter to the King of Prussia is a perfect model of all that a letter to a king ought—not to be; long, wordy, perplexed, miserably pedantic, and, by its tortuous involution in some passages, (if that were not the ordinary character of Kant's style,) one might think expressly designed to mystify the king, and throw dust in his eyes. The substance is this:—after rehearsing the words of the king's charges, he says, that, as “a teacher of youth,” i. e. in his character of public lecturer, he could not by possibility have committed the offence imputed to him; since he had always taken, as the text-book for his lectures, a well-known work in which no mention of the Scriptures or of Christianity had occurred, or could occur, viz. Baumgarten's Metaphysics. But might he not have wandered from his text? No: that was a fault which no man could tax him with. Having set his face through life against the popular error of confounding the limits of different sciences, could it be supposed that he would himself trespass in that way? Thus far, certainly, Kant said no more than the truth. But now hear what followed. As to his work on religion, that was to be considered as a sealed book, never meant for the public at large, or what we may call the lay public, but addressed ad clericum, i. e. to the learned and professional public. Shameless falsehood! to say this of a book which is no otherwise an unpopular book than as it became such by the heavy, rude, and cumbersome style in which it is written, bristling with scholastic distinctions, and disfigured by hyper-composite terms of art. Such a style might have a good deal to repel; but was there nothing ex adverso in the widespread fame of the author, and the curiosity connected with his philosophy, that might avail as a counterweight to that objection? And will Kant pretend to tell us, that it was in any man's power, writing rationally and with simplicity on a subject of such diffusive interest as religion, so to conceal his meaning as that it should not be penetrated by all people of education with a tolerably good understanding? He had not so much as interposed the thin veil of Latin betwixt himself and the public. Such a veil, it is true, lasts only for a moment, as translators in abundance are always at hand for a book of any interest; but at least there is a homage to decorum in assuming that disguise. Perhaps, however, you may think that an acquaintance with the Transcendental Philosophy was a conditio sine qua non for understanding the book. By no means. It was absolutely independent of that and of every philosophical system. And, had Kant spoken the naked truth, he would have said—“It is most true that I have done the worst of what your Majesty imputes to me, and even worse; but, however, my book is written in such a disgusting style, very much resembling that of my present letter, that I am inclined to think very few people will read twenty pages without finding it act upon them as an emetic; on which account it may be considered as a book not written, or self-cancelled.” The practical result of the matter was, that Kant promised to offend in this way no more. But even here he practised a jesuitical reserve; for, in the last sentence of his letter, which made this promise in the most solemn (and to an unsuspecting reader in the most unreserved) terms, he prepared an excuse for a future evasion of his promise, by introducing the words, "as your Majesty's most faithful subject;" which words, he tells us in a note, were secretly meant by himself as limiting his engagement to the term of the King's life; though the words neither pointedly express that limitation, nor were at all designed by Kant to be interpreted by the King in any such sense. This is not quite the good faith and plain dealing of a man of honour.

But enough of this. Another essay of Kant's, which I shall notice, is one which bears the following title—*"On the common saying, that such or such a thing may be true in theory, but does not hold good in practice." In this Essay the primary purpose of Kant (or that which is ostensibly primary) is the correction of a vulgar error, which is all but universal, viz. the notion of a possible want of harmony (or even a possible irreconcilability) between the laws of theory and the facts of experience; as if it were possible, or even common, that the first should teach us to expect what the other might refuse to ratify. No notion can be more erroneous, or, indeed, upon a proper definition of the word theory, more self-contradictory. For theory is, in fact, no more than a system of laws, abstracted from experience: consequently, if any apparent contradiction should exist between them, this could only argue that the theory had been falsely or imperfectly abstracted; in which case, the sensible inference would be, not a summons to forego theories, but a call for better and more enlarged theories. There is, however, a sense of this popular saying under which, though the ex-

* The idea of a theory, as it differs from that of a hypothesis, is much in need of rectification. Most writers use the terms indiscriminately, and with no sense of any precise difference; and others, who have such a sense, have it so vaguely developed, as to fancy that the word hypothesis means a theory in a state of immaturity, or so long as it is sub judice and undemonstrated. But the distinction turns upon quite another hinge. The Grecian etymology, in fact, points in each case to the true meaning. Imagine, in any science or speculation, that all the elements (i. e. the forces, the modes of action, the phenomena, &c.) are given; but as yet they exist to the mind as an unorganized chaos. Then steps in contemplation, or reflective survey (ὁρᾶν); to assign to them all their several places or relations; which shall be first, which middle, which last; which shall be end, which shall be means; which subordinate, which coordinate; which force is for impulse, which for regulation; which absolute, which conditional; which purpose direct, which indirect or collateral; and so on. This introduction of organization amongst the facts or data of science is Theory. A theory, therefore, may be defined—an organic development to the understanding of the relations between the parts of any systematic whole. But in a hypothesis, it is only one relation which is investigated, viz. that of dependency. A number of phenomena are given, and perhaps with no want of orderly relation amongst them; but as yet they exist without apparent basis or support. The question, therefore, is concerning a sufficient ground or cause to account for them. I therefore step in and underlay the phenomena with a substructure or sub-position (ὑποβῆναι) such as I think capable of supporting them. This is a hypothesis. Briefly, then, in a theory, I organize what is certain enough already, but undetermined in its relations; whereas, in a hypothesis, I assign the causality when previously it was either unknown or uncertain. For example, we talk properly of a theory of combustion; for the elements, i. e. the phenomena and results, are indeterminate only with regard to their reciprocal relations. But with regard to the aurora borealis, it is a hypothesis that we want in the first place, for the phenomena are of uncertain origin. And perhaps this hypothesis would demand, as its sequel, a theory of the whole agencies concerned; but this could not be until the causality should have been determined. Again, suppose the case of algebraical equations, here all possibility of hypothesis is excluded. But a theory is still wanted. Many theories have started from the genesis of equations first proposed by Harriot, viz. that which views the higher equations as generated by multiplication out of the lower. But perhaps a different view of their origin would lead to more comprehensive results. Hindenburg with his disciples, Stahl, &c. have most happily applied an improved theory of combinations to this subject. I conclude with this recapitulation.—Theory is = Ordination. Hypothesis is = Substratum.

pression is inaccurate, it is very true and very extensively applicable. In one passage, Kant seems to allude to such a sense, though he has not sufficiently illustrated his meaning. But waiving this, it is very certain that the ordinary application of the saying labours with the whole error charged upon it; and this is stated by Kant as follows. Having first shewn the futility of pretending to practical skill, in disconnexion from a knowledge of theory, he says:—

“Meantime it is far more tolerable that an unlearned person should represent theory as superfluous for the purposes of his imaginary practice, (though not questioning their harmony,) than that a shallow refiner, whilst conceding the value of theory for speculation and scholastic uses, should couple with this concession the doctrine, that in practice, the case is otherwise; and that, upon coming out of the schools into the world, a man will be made sensible of having pursued mere philosophic dreams. In short, that what sounds well in theory, is not merely superfluous, but absolutely false for practice. Now the practical engineer who should express himself in these terms upon the science of mechanics, or the artillery officer who should say of the doctrine of projectiles, that the theory of it was conceived indeed with great subtlety, but was of little practical value, because in the actual exercise of the art, it was found that the experimental results did not conform to the theory, would expose themselves to derision. For, supposing that in the first case should be superadded to the theory of mechanics, that of friction, and that in the second, to the theory of projectiles were superadded that of the resistance of the air,—which in effect amounts to this, that if, instead of rejecting theory, still more theory were added, in that case the results of the abstract doctrine and of the experimental practice would coincide in every respect.

“However, it cannot be denied, that a theory such as this I have just mentioned, which has reference to objects of sense, is very differently circumstanced from a theory which has reference to mere ideas: a theory, for instance, which is employed upon mathematical objects (i. e. apon the determinations of space, which admit of a sensuous construction) differs much from one which is employed upon philosophic objects, (i. e. upon notions which admit of no such construction.) Hence it should seem, prima facie, not impossible that these last objects may be very accurately conceived and pursued into a theory, whilst yet, at the same time, they should be incapable of being given, (to use the technical term,) i. e. not capable of being realized in actual experience: in other words, the conceptions, and the theory built upon them, might be alike ideas in the true Platonic sense, that is, transcendent to all experimental exhibition, and susceptible of no practical application, or even of a very injurious one.

“Primá facie, I say, in these cases, it seems not impossible that such a want of correspondence might be found between practice and theory. Whether it really would be found, is another question. But, waiving this question as a general one, let me confine myself, throughout the present essay, to one particular case of this question, viz. that in which the theory should happen to be built upon the idea of duty. Now, in this case, I affirm, and shall undertake to prove, that all fear lest the theory should prove inapplicable in practice, on account of the idea on which it reposes, is utterly groundless. This is demonstrable; no theoretic demand of duty can by possibility be impracticable. Why? Because it never could be a duty to propose any such result as an object of legitimate desire, if it were not capable of being realised in experience—whether now and perfectly, or by approximation. This is the sort of theory which I shall treat in the present essay. For of this it is, to the scandal of all philosophy, that we hear it not seldom alleged, that what is abstractly right in it yet cannot be made available for practice: and that, too, in a conceited tone, full of presumptuous pretensions for correcting the reason (and correcting it, observe, in that very point which constitutes its most glorious distinction) by experience; under the vainglorious fancy of seeing farther and more surely by means of mole eyes fastened upon the earth, than with eyes fitted to a being that was framed to stand upright, and fix his gaze upon the heavens.

"In our days, so rich in words but poor in deeds, this very popular maxim, (of the discord between theory and practice,) as often as it happens to be applied to any question of duty, whether it be a duty in that mode of obligation which is called ethical, or in that which is called juridical, is sure to be the parent of the very greatest evil. On this account I shall state the relation of theory and practice in three articles or sections: First, as it respects moral obligation in general, with a view to the welfare of every man indifferently, taken individually; secondly, as it respects juristic or political obligation, with a view to the welfare of states; thirdly, as it respects cosmopolitical obligation, with a view to the welfare of the human species as a whole."

Such is an outline of the introduction. From the body of the essay, as the parts of it are separately intelligible, and, indeed, quite independent, I shall select the second section; because this treats a question of politics in a high degree interesting to ourselves, not only as having often been discussed through the two last centuries, and by very celebrated writers of our own, but also as being now of real historical importance in determining the merits of our ancestors at the great epoch of our Revolution. The question I mean respects the right of subjects to resist, in case of fundamental violation of the contract (implicit contract) between themselves and the supreme power. The origin and the limits of this right might still give room to much metaphysical casuistry. But it must excite the burning indignation of Englishmen to find Kant roundly and broadly denying the existence of any such right in the uttermost extremity; and that, too, with a special regard to the particular case of England; yet with all that ignorance of the facts which we might look for in a man who (as I have said before) never read any thing at all.

I know not how others think upon this matter, under a point of view which I am now going to suggest. I know not how you think, most excellent Sir Kit; but for my part, I am stung with scorn, when I consider in what manner, and by what authorities, the capital questions which arise upon the rights of great nations have been adjudicated. A litterateur of no very masculine intellect, Hugh Groot, (or Grotius,) or suppose Puffendorf, (who certainly had as poor an understanding as any creature that ever lived,) simply upon the strength of a little Latin and Greek, which also neither of them (not Groot even) had in any perfection,—inconsiderable knaveslike these, whom no man would allow to interfere in the most trivial domestic dispute, take upon them to lay down the law in the most peremptory manner for the weightiest concerns of mighty nations, on which are suspended, perhaps, the happiness and dignity of countless generations. Their arbitration would not be valid for a contested claim to the tail of a herring; and yet, from the imbecility of men, who will catch at any opinion which countenances their side in a quarrel, nations themselves will accredit and give weight to judgments, which else are lighter than vanity. But perhaps Grotius, &c. rest their doctrines upon their intrinsic force, upon their coherence with each other, and their logical dependency from a sufficient original ground. By no means. All is blank dogmatism; mere autocratic bulls, ukases, or rescripts; a continual stat pro ratione voluntas. Forth steps Barclay, a tooth-eating slave, one who practised adulation to kings, in the original sense of that word as a slavish homage (δουλική), that is, with Phrygian cringes and genuflexions:—well, what says Barclay? I allow, says he, of resistance in cases of hopeless extremity. Be it so; but now, tell us, hound! which be they? Why, these: For instance, first, if a king should commit enormous cruelties. Here note the abject understanding of the animal. Cruelties could never, in a populous nation, be an anti-national crime; they could bear no proportion co-extensive with the nation; they would constitute an offence against individuals. And the inviolability of the kingly character, in its relations to individuals, is a doctrine, not merely of the free British constitution, but one which is found more or less developed in all refined countries; and, as civilisation is matured, it will become universal. So that this sycophant destroys the sanctity of the regal character in the very point in which the warmest friends of popular rights must allow it. Then, again, what business to erect a privileged case for the sufferer in mere animal interests, which is denied to every possible mode or degree of damage or peril as to interests which the same being can have as a moral and intellectual creature! So that the inference is—if the social compact is liable to dissolution on this single ground—that the paramount purpose of society is to protect a man's carcass. What says Groot to all this? Why Groot nods approvingly. So much, then, is settled: hear it, ye nations, and obey! But is this all? No; yet another boon will Barclaius confer upon the nations of this planet. I allow one other case, saith he; and that is, when a king is taking measures to sell his people to a foreign prince; in such a case, be it understood that I, Barclaius, by these presents, allow of that people's resisting the conveyance. Now for Groot: doth Groot nod as before? No. Groot reclains. This, saith he, is what I shall never allow of in that unlimited shape. No; I require proof, absolute proof, of signing, sealing, and delivery of the article. So Groot's concession amounts to this—that, supposing King John had so far accomplished his celebrated treaty with a Moorish prince, as that all England had found itself chained at Tangier or Mequinez, in that case all England had Groot's gracious permission to commence resistance. I, Sir Christopher, as well you know, am no admirer of brutal punishments; in particular, the very word knouting is abominable to mine as it is to all refined ears. Yet, as even Barclay and Grotius allow of resistance in cases which they conceive to be desperate, so even I would unwillingly concede the use of the knout in cases unsusceptible of other remedies, and upon subjects insensible to other arguments. To some people, the only appropriate style of reasoning is by kicking them. A posteriori arguments are alone intelligible to their perverse senses. And I must confess that it strikes me as far below the majesty of the subject, that any apologist for great historical passages, and for nations who were the actors in them, should permit himself or the clients whom he has adopted to be cited to the bar of a low Dutch rascal, self-constituted a judge, and raised into an authority merely by force of his own coxcombry and self-sufficiency.* The time for knouting Barclay or Puffendorf is past. That was the proper answer. Being now impossible, let us have none at all.

The same feeling—the same unwilling side-glance at the knout as the

* Grotius is one of those names which time is rapidly reducing to its just level. Two centuries ago—that is to say, soon after the publication of his De Jure Belli et Pacis (in the summer of 1625)—his name was unquestionably the highest literary name in Europe. More extravagant encomiums might be alleged from Lord Bacon, Thuanus, &c., in regard to him, than any modern writer. [See, in particular, a passage in Bishop Burnet's Speech in the House of Lords on Dr Sacheverell's case.] But since then he has been woefully cut down. His edition of the Greek Dramatic Fragments, under the keen examination of exquisite modern scholars, has amply exposed his imperfect scholarship. In his work on the Evidences of Christianity, every way an attorney-like piece of special pleading, his ridiculous fable of Mahomet's Dove, which Peacock denounced, would have furnished the Mahometans with a standing handle against Christendom, had it not been omitted in the Arabic translation. His Annals are without historical merit. And his main work, De Jure, has kept its ground chiefly by means of its early possession of the ear of Europe, and also, in a considerable degree, by means of the little scraps of Latin and Greek with which, in contempt of all good composition, it is tessellated; these, being generally short, are of the proper compass for poor scholars; weak birds must try their wings in short flights. Take away the Greek and Latin seasoning, which (in conjunction with the laconic style) has kept the book from putrefying, all the rest is pretty equally divided between empty truisms, on one hand, and time-serving Dutch falsehoods, on the other. Had the book been really the powerful one it has been represented, it would have intercepted the extravagancies of Hobbes, which commenced thirty years after. Well and truly did Grotius, when dying, lament that he had consumed a life in levities and strenuous inanities.

appropriate instrument of reply—must come over every body, friend or foe, who reads Kant's attack on the English nation for their political Revolution of 1688-9. A great people solemnly effect a change in the government: [no matter whether, by introducing the doctrine of an abdication on the part of James, they were merely passive in the first step of the affair, since, upon any theory, they were undoubtedly active in the latter steps:] this people consecrate that event in their annals, and deduce their prosperity from that date. Forth stalks a transcendental pedant, and addresses them thus:—"You think yourselves very clever fellows in all this affair, and strut about Europe like so many peacocks on the score of your imaginary merits; and you value yourselves much on the public prosperity you ascribe to this event. But, as to the results of it, take notice that if, in fact, you have prospered, yet, in good logic, you ought not to have prospered. And as to the event itself, apart from its results, just step into my closet, and I shall shew you, in one volume octavo, that such conduct as yours merited capital punishment."

"The Consul quoted Wickefort,
And Puffendorf, and Grotius,
And proved from Vattel
Exceedingly well,
Such a deed must be quite atrocious."

So says the excellent ballad; but what came of the Consul? Why, the barbarous Dey—he "strangled him in his prating." And what some would think even a worse fate, has, in this instance, befallen poor Mr Kant. For that which he designed as the most alarming insult to a great nation, and which was for ever to throw a taint upon a capital point in their historical pretensions; in fact, what was put forth as a withering annihilation of British pride, as connected with the Revolution of 1688-9, has not yet, fifty years after it was published, been so much as heard of by those at whom it was aimed. I, for the first time, apprehending no mortification to our national pretensions in this great event, shall give the whole of what he says, without bestowing one syllable of reply upon it. So infinitely has England the start of all other nations in political knowledge, that even at this moment in France (where, however, they are far ahead of the Germans) a great authority, M. Cottu, is constrained to admit of his countrymen that they are not yet "ripe" for discussions on civil liberty; and as to German philosophers, whosever will look back to the full report of Dr Sacheverell's trial in Queen Anne's time (which said Dr Sacheverell, by the way, was called over the coals for pretty much the same opinions as are here advanced, with much less caution and good sense, by Kant) may there find an ample refutation of every notion here brought forward in almost every page of the speeches delivered by the managers of the case on the part of the House of Commons. So general was the diffusion of light even at that time in England; so total the darkness almost a century later upon the same topic among the illuminati in the "haughty schools" of philosophic Germany! But now let Mr Kant be heard:

"Hence it follows, that all resistance to the supreme legislative power, all rebellion, for the purpose of giving effect to the discontents of the subject, is the highest and most punishable crime in any form of civil polity; inasmuch as it destroys the fundamental props of that polity. And this prohibition of resistance is unconditional; so that, for instance, the legislative power, or its agent, the supreme governor, may even have violated the original contract, and thereby, in the opinion of the subject, have forfeited the legislative function,—still, even in that case, all right of resistance continues equally forbidden to the subject. The reason is, because, during the subsistence of a civil constitution, the people can rightfully be entitled to no co-permanent voice in determining—how, or by what rules, that legislative power shall be administered. For, suppose the case, that the people had such a voice, and that the judgment delivered by this popular voice were in opposition to the judgment of the existing supreme governor, who, I ask, is to decide with which side lies the truth? Manifestly neither side can do this, as judge in his own case. Consequently there would arise a necessity for a supreme head of the state, paramount to the supreme head, who might thus be authorized to decide between the actual supreme head and the people; which, however, is clearly a contradiction. Furthermore, I affirm that no right of desperate extremity, [ius in casu necessitatis],—which, besides, as a supposed right to violate acknowledged rights, in a case of extreme physical necessity, is otherwise a nonentity in philosophical distinctions—can have any admission here, or can ever unlock that barrier which puts restraint upon the people. For the head of the state may just as well justify his severe measures against the subjects, by their contumacious resistance, as they their seditious movements by his tyranny. Who then is to decide? Doubtless, he that finds himself in possession of the supreme administration of the law; and that is precisely the head of the state: he only has the right of decision; and no member of the body politic can have a title to dispute this possession with him.

Notwithstanding all this, I find respectable authorities, who take upon themselves to stand up for the right of the subject to a counter-power, of resisting under particular circumstances. Amongst these authorities, I shall here cite only one, viz. the very cautious, precise, and discreet Achenwall. This writer, in his Jus Naturæ, (5th Edit. Pars Poster. sec. 203—206,) delivers himself thus:—‘If the danger, which menaces the state from a longer toleration of the injustice exercised by the supreme magistrate, be greater than that which there is reason to apprehend from taking up arms against him, in that case the people are at liberty to resist him, in maintenance of this liberty are entitled to disengage themselves from their contract of allegiance, and are free to depose him as a tyrant;’ and he concludes, ‘that in this way the people must be held, with reference to their former governor, to have reverted to the state of nature.’

“I readily persuade myself that neither Achenwall, nor any other of those worthy† men, who have been led into agreement with him upon this point by metaphysical refinements, would in any case of actual occurrence have

* There is no such thing in morals as a casus necessitatis, except in one situation, viz. in a collision between unconditional duties on the one side, and, on the other side, duties which, though great, are yet conditional; as, for example, suppose an impossibility of averting a calamity from a state, except by betraying an individual that should stand in some near relation to oneself—that of father, perhaps, or of son. Now, in this case the duty to the state is unconditional; but the duty to the individual is purely conditional; viz. subject to the condition that he shall be free of all criminal acts or designs towards the state. The denunciation, therefore, which a man might make to the magistracy, of criminal enterprises, on the part of an individual so circumstanced, though made under the heaviest shock of pain and violence to private feelings, could yet be made under an absolute compulsion—viz. a moral compulsion. But in another case, when it is affirmed of one who pushes a fellow-sufferer, in a shipwreck, from his plank, for the purpose of saving his own life—that he had acquired a right to this act by a case of necessity (viz. physical necessity)—this, I take leave to say, is utterly false. For the duty of self-preservation is a mere conditional duty, (that is, subject to the condition that it shall be accomplished without guilt;) but, on the other hand, to forbear taking away the life of another, who is not offering me any injury, nay, who is not the author of that situation which puts me into any risk of losing my own life,—this is an unconditional duty. However, the teachers of general municipal law proceed quite consistently with the privilege which they concede to this self-consideration, in a case of desperate necessity. For obviously, if it were prohibited, the supreme magistrate could not connect any penalty with the prohibition, inasmuch as this penalty could be no other than death. Now, it would be an absurd law that should threaten a man with death for not voluntarily resigning himself to death in circumstances of danger.—Note by Kant.

† Here is another instance of Kant's want of reading. He speaks of Achenwall, and some nameless writers, whom he calls, contemptuously, “worthy men.” But he ought to have known that Locke, Barbeyrac, Noodt, Burlamaqui, and all the writers on this subject of any celebrity, since the era of Locke, take the same course as his own “worthies;” but generally with much more decision and plain-speaking.

counselled or even have sanctioned such perilous experiments;* and further, it is hardly to be doubted, that, had those popular movements, by means of which Switzerland, the United Netherlands, or even Great Britain, succeeded in extorting their present constitutions, upon which they set so high a value, come to a less fortunate issue, the readers of those histories would have seen, in the capital punishment of the several leaders in those revolutions, all honoured as they now are, nothing more or less than the well-merited punishments of great state criminals. For, generally, the final issue mingles in our judgment upon the rightfulness of actions; notwithstanding that the first can never be certain, nor the last ever doubtful. It is, however, evident, in what regards the latter, that even if nowrong were done to the sovereign, (as possibly having himself previously violated his compact with the people,) yet the people would, by this mode of seeking its rights, commit the very rankest injustice, as thus making all rightful constitution of a state impossible, and introducing a state of entire lawlessness, (status naturalis), in which all right ceases, or at least ceases for effectual existence.

"This theory, in fact, we see sufficiently confirmed in practice. In the constitution of Great Britain, which that nation parades with such prodigious ostentation, as though it were a constitution for the whole world, we find that it is wholly silent about the rights which belong to the people, in case the monarch should violate the contract of 1688; consequently,† it is clear that the English constitution secretly reserves the privilege of rebellion against the king, in the case of his designing to violate it, inasmuch as no law exists upon the subject. For, to suppose that the constitution should contain a law for this case, justifying the overthrow of that subsisting form of government from which all special laws emanate, even assuming that the contract were violated by the king,—this is a self-evident contradiction; because in that case it would involve a direct counterforce, publicly constituted; consequently, there must be a second head of the state, for the protection of the popular rights, and after that a third, to arbitrate between the two first. Accordingly, we see that the leaders of the people at that crisis, (or, if you will, the guardians of the people,) apprehensive of some such accusation in the event of their enterprise failing, chose rather to palm upon the king (whom, in fact, they had panic-stricken into flight) an act of voluntary abdication, than

* How deplorably weak is this remark! For, suppose that Achenwall, in the circumstances stated, would act as Mr Kant here chooses most arbitrarily to assume, what would that prove, but that a particular individual was a bolder man upon paper, than under the trials of real life and of immediate danger? A very supposable thing, and which might, or might not, happen to be the result, if Mr Achenwall were summoned to such a test; but in any case, that result could illustrate nothing but Mr Achenwall's character or temperament—a matter surely very impertinent to the question before us. Manifestly, it could in no degree affect the doctrine under discussion. Let Mr Achenwall behave in what way he might, we should always be entitled to reduce the whole affair to this simple dilemma:—The case imagined and stated by Achenwall either is, or is not, realized: if it is not, then it is impertinent and puerile to talk about it. On the other hand, if it is, then we know what is the conscientious decision of Achenwall,—what, as matter of duty, he would both "sanction," and "counsel," and do, far better and more unequivocally from his book, where he speaks, under no possible bias, from promises on the one side, or terrors on the other, than we could ever do from his actual conduct, in circumstances which might probably lay him under disturbing influences from both. What sense in appealing from that which could not be other than a sincere decision to one which, if different at all, must differ by being insincere?

† Few people, it is to be hoped, out of Germany, or rather the cloisters of German universities, will see much logical consequence in this "consequently;" i. e. because the English constitution does not openly provide for rebellion, it must secretly reserve such a right! Had Kant, instead of speculating on this subject, read a little of such works as we English allow for faithful expounders of our constitution, he would not have needed to romance in this way. But, as usual, he read nothing.

to claim the right of deposing him; a claim by which they would have placed the constitution in open and undisguised contradiction with itself.*

After this you will smile, Sir Christopher, to hear that Kant passes, first stopping, with infinite complacency, to compliment himself as a man whom, assuredly, nobody would ever think of charging with adulation to kings, or too indulgent a spirit to their rights,—he passes, I say, to undertake the defence of popular rights against Hobbes. Hobbes's notions on this subject we all know; and Kant protests that they are shocking (erschrecklich.) But I daresay you will dispense with this part of his Essay, which is simply bent upon demonstrating that, although the people have no shadow of a right to enforce their rights,† yet still (contrary to that shocking man Hobbes's doctrine) they have some rights; and if the monarch—be his name what it may, king or senate—will not grant these rights, then they are to tell him, by means of a free press, that really he acts in a very disagreeable kind of way.

But what if he refuse to allow them a free press, (this being the one sole resource conceded to the people?)

Why, in that case, they are to wait until he takes a more transcendental view of the case.

Next I shall give you, my dear Sir Christopher, the substance of Kant's famous Essay upon the famous problem of a Perpetual Peace; which Essay, it has been alleged, was pilaged, during the French Revolution, by the celebrated Abbé Sieyès.

ESSAY TOWARDS REALIZING THE IDEA OF A PERPETUAL PEACE.

This Essay, of 112 pages, is not included in the four volumes of Kant's Miscellaneous Works, published by Tieftrunk. Why, I cannot conjecture. It is true that it was not buried in the rudera of any voluminous periodical Miscellany, as others were among Kant's fugitive and occasional papers. It had been published separately; and, perhaps, more than once; for my edition (Koenigsberg, 1796) professes, on the title-page, to be a "new and improved edition." But yet, as a volume of so little substance, so easily lost therefore, and upon a theme of so much interest and curiosity,—perhaps beyond any other short essay of Kant's, this merited preservation.

The problem of a perpetual peace, were it only for its impracticability taken in connexion with the reasons for that impracticability, will for ever retain its interest; that is to say, so long as it is not absolutely demonstrated to be a desperate problem; and such a demonstration, considering that the objections are purely moral, is at least as impossible as the problem itself. With the prevailing tone of thought in this country, and under the despotism of the practical,

* Now, here again, had Mr Kant condescended, (when writing upon the affairs of a foreign nation,) instead of speculating in a transcendental closet, to take the common-sense course of reading that nation's own account of its proceedings, speaking through its great political leaders, at that era, in their parliamentary debates, or speaking through its political annalists, in their secret history of parties and intrigues at that time, (such as Bishop Burnet, for instance,) or speaking through those who have since discussed the great event of the Revolution, he would have learned why, with what explanations, reserves, and temperaments, and to what extent among the ruling parties, contemporary with the case, that particular fiction of the abdication was adopted; and also in what light it has been considered by constitutional critics in the century and a half which have since elapsed.

over every application of the mind, the mere entertainment of such a problem, though but for half an hour's speculation, is apt to throw the same sort of suspicion upon the sanity of a man's good sense as among geometers justly attaches to the problem for squaring the circle, or among mechanicians to the problem of a perpetual motion. But, in reality, this is very unjust; for the two mathematical problems are demonstrably impossible; that is, necessarily unattainable, and for that reason *eternally so. But the moral problem of a Perpetual Peace is only accidentally unattainable: with every step taken in the moral development of human nature, as, for instance, in the abolition of slavery, (or, more philosophically speaking, in the possibility of such an abolition,) one step in advance would be gained towards the possible realization of a Perpetual Peace. For what makes such a problem impracticable at present? Simply the moral nature of man in its present imperfect development. The impracticability is therefore commensurate with that obstacle. As that wanes, this will wane; as that grows, if it ever can grow, this will grow. Properly speaking, therefore, a Perpetual Peace should be classed, as to feasibility, with the great geographical problems of the advance to the Pole, attainments of North-east or North-west Passages, determination of the Course of the Niger, much rather than with the mechanical problem of a Perpetual Motion. Take, for instance, the ad-

The general or unmathematical public are in a continual delusion about the nature of the barrier which separates us from the perfect solution of these problems. Every six months, the newspapers announce that some self-taught mathematician of original genius has succeeded in squaring the circle. Upon this, the mathematician, without troubling himself to enquire into the particular form of the man's nonsense, contents himself with laughing. And to this laugh the non-mathematical observer replies by saying, or thinking, that previous to enquiry, such a contemptuous dismissal of any man's pretensions is illiberal. But now let me explain to him that it is not so, and why. His mistake is in supposing the difficulty to be transcended, merely a subjective difficulty: because, if that were so, he would be right in arguing that all the failures in the world could not be sufficient to preclude the hope that some day or other the thing might yet be accomplished. Not only would it be a really illiberal use of the argumentum ad verecundiam to forestal any man with the objection that Plato, Archimedes, Leibnitz, Euler, had not succeeded; and, therefore, what hope remained to a nameless tiro? for, obviously, each of these great names might have been urged with the same invidious purpose of stifling in the birth each one in succession of the other three; but, secondly, the man might fairly protest—"Measure the value of my talent by the discovery I offer, and not the value of my discovery by my talent wantonly and invidiously assumed;" or, thirdly, he might say—"Not as equal, still less as superior to these great men, but as standing on their shoulders, I pretend to have seen farther than they;" or, fourthly, not even needing thus much assumption, but (whilst disclaiming a higher station, even upon their shoulders) simply insisting on the accidental difference of the station from which he had contemplated the question at issue; on any one of these grounds, the candidate for the honours of discovery might roll back the burden of invidious feeling upon those who laughed at him in limine, were the barrier between us and the discovery of these truths merely subjective. But it is not so. The barrier is objective: it lies not in the person attempting, but in the thing attempted. And the commonest reader will understand what I mean, when I tell him, that if it were possible for the relation between the square and the circle (i. e. between the diameter and the circumference) to be assigned exactly, and not (as it now is) infinitely near,—the consequences would be, not merely (as he supposes) that a mind had arisen which saw what had escaped all former minds—so far all would be pure gain—but also that, for the first time, an internal war would arise in mathematics: antinomies would be established: A and non-A would be equally true: contradictory positions would co-exist; in short, the supposed discovery would be inconsistent with existing truths. The objection, therefore, to a pretended squarer of the circle is not—"You, sir, by adding to our knowledge in a point impregnable to others, would compel us to believe you a greater than the greatest of those we honour;"—But this—"You, sir, by propounding a discovery that would unsettle the foundations of our former knowledge, oblige us to disbelieve you on the faith of that very science to which you do and must appeal."

vance upon the Pole. This, in the first place, has been influenced greatly by a subjective obstacle—(i. e. an obstacle entirely on the side of man, the agent, not on the side of nature, the subject of his attempt)—viz. the imperfect development of nautical science and nautical skill. These are progressive: in that proportion has the approximation been making for the two last centuries. But there are other elements to be contended with besides the sea. These are, as yet, even less tractable than that to our scientific resources. But a revolution, not greater than that effected by the steam-engine, may suddenly reduce them to obedience. And hence this problem can never become demonstrably desperate. A Perpetual Peace, without being liable to any such subsidiary advances, yet so far agrees with these great physical problems, that it is progressive, though more continuously, and therefore less perceptibly progressive; at least, it is so in the faith of all those who believe in the continual moral advancement of the human species. But now let us hear Kant:—

SIX ARTICLES UPON WHICH A PERPETUAL PEACE CAN BE FOUNDED.

- I.—No Treaty of Peace shall stand for such, which is made with a secret reservation of matter for a future war.

COMMENTARY.

Why? Because in that case it would be a mere armistice, in other words a mere postponement of hostilities, not a peace: for that means the end of all hostilities; and in reality the very idea of a peace is such, that to qualify it with the epithet of perpetual, is already something of a needless pleonasm. All grounds for future war, existing at this moment, though possibly as yet unknown to the contracting powers, are understood to be annihilated by the treaty of peace; let them be afterwards fished out with ever so much dexterity and sharpness of vision from old archives. Any reserve (reservatio mentalis) of pretensions or grievances to be first of all devised in future, which neither side mentions at present, because both are too much exhausted to pursue the war, yet with an evil design to revive them on the first favourable occasion for this purpose, are neither more nor less than Jesuitical Casuistry, and in that view below the dignity of sovereigns. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that, if the true honour of the state be placed, as agreeably to the maxims of state cunning it will be placed, in continual aggrandizement of its power, no matter by what means, in that case this principle of mine will be viewed as that of a mere scholastic and dreaming pedant.

- II.—No self-subsisting state (little or great is in this case all one) shall be capable of becoming the property of another state by inheritance, exchange, purchase, or gift.

COMMENTARY.

A state in fact is not, like the soil on which it is seated, a possession, (patrimonium.*) It is a society of men, over which no person but itself can have peremptory rights of disposal. Now, to inoculate such a body, a stem with its own separate root, as a graft upon another state, is virtually to take away its existence as a moral person, and to treat it as a thing; this is in contradiction to the idea of the original contract, without which no right whatsoever over a people can be so much as conceived. Every body knows into what grievous dangers the imaginary right of this mode of acquisition, has in our times plunged Europe, (for the other quarters of the globe seem never to have recognised it,) to the extent even of believing that states

* An hereditary kingdom is not a state, which can be inherited by another state, but one whose governing rights can pass by inheritance to another physical person. But in this case the state, properly speaking, should be said to inherit a governor, not the governor as such, (that is 'as already possessing another kingdom,) to inherit the state.—Note of Kant.

could marry each other. Partly it has been pursued as a new mode of industry, viz. as the art of creating an overbalance of power, without expense of exertion, by means of family compacts.

Even the loan of troops from one state to another, for hostile purposes against one who is not a common enemy, must be referred to the same head; for in this act the subjects of the state are used and abused at pleasure, as things or tools of mere material application.

III.—Standing armies (miles perpetuus) shall gradually be altogether abolished.

COMMENTARY.

My reason is this :—Standing armies threaten other states incessantly with war, chiefly by means of the front of defiance and eternal face of equipment which they present. Hence they irritate other states to perpetual and unlimited competition with each other in the number of their armed troops; and whilst by the cost of these measures it happens that peace itself is at length more oppressive than a short war; eventually they become themselves the causes of offensive wars, adopted as the best chances for getting rid of such heavy pecuniary burdens. Add to this, that for men to be taken into pay, as blank agents for killing or being killed, implies a use of them as pure machines or things, which cannot well be reconciled with the rights of humanity involved in personality.

IV.—There shall be no National Debts contracted, with a view to external intercourse of the State.

COMMENTARY.

For purposes of internal economy, this resource is not liable to suspicion :—but as a means of carrying on wars, it is most dangerous : inasmuch as this single expedient, summoning all posterity, by way of anticipation, to the aid of the existing generation, transcends all resources combined of simple taxation.

V.—No State shall intermeddle by intrigues with the Constitution or Government of another State.

VI.—No State, during a period of war with another State, shall allow itself in hostilities of such a quality as preclude all future return to reciprocal confidence; for example, the employment of assassins, or poisoners; the infraction of Capitulations; or the organization in the hostile country of domestic treason, &c.

COMMENTARY.

These are all base, dishonourable stratagems. Some confidence in the honourable sentiments of the enemy must remain even during war; else all peace, or treaty of any kind, becomes impracticable, and the war degenerates into a war of extermination (bellum internecinum); whereas war is, at any rate, and at worst, but the sad resource of necessity to enforce rights by force, in default of any court with adequate powers to enforce them by a process of law. In this view, it is plain that neither side can be pronounced an unjust enemy; for that would presuppose the function and authority of a judge; but the issue, as before the tribunal of God, is to decide which party is in the right. And between states no such thing as a penal war (bellum punitivum) is conceivable; because between states there is no such relation as that of superior and vassal. Hence it follows, that a war of extermination, leaving no room or hope for a peace, except such as would be indeed perpetual by assembling all the combatants upon one general Aeeldama, must be held to be under the ban of international law; and all the means and agents be held prohibited, which lead to such a war.

Such are the six preliminary articles on which Kant's project is built.

Three definitive articles follow, which are these : 1st, That the internal con- stitution of all states shall be republican; 2d, That their internal relations shall rest upon Federalism; 3d, That a cosmopolitical right shall be recognised in mankind to passive hospitality, (meaning by that the right of free intercourse to the extent of access, though not of ingress.) The first of the three, coming from Kant, may startle you; but take it in connexion with his important explanation:—"That you may not," says he, "confound (as usually men do confound) the idea of republican with the idea of democratical, attend to the following distinction: Forms of state polity may be divided on two principles: first, on a personal distinction in the supreme minister of the state, as whether prince, nobles, or people. Here the distinction is in the Form of Administration (Forma Imperii); and of this no more than three modes are possible—Autocracy, Aristocracy, Democracy. Or, secondly, the principle of distinction lies in the Mode of Administration (Forma Regiminis); and, in relation to this, the state is of necessity either republican or despotic. Republicanism is the separation of the executive power from the legislative; and of Democracy it may be affirmed, that this, only, of the three Formae Imperii, is essentially a Despotism." The third article sufficiently explains itself. As to the second, Kant supposes (p. 37) that the very same impulses which have carried men, at a considerable price of personal sacrifice, to renounce the state of nature and lawless violence for one of social security, might weigh with states to an analogous renunciation of their right of war. True: but in the case of the individual man, his surrender of power, once made, is enforced upon him by the government to which, by the supposition, he has resigned it. What corresponding force can be devised for states amongst each other still retaining their independence? Certainly no absolute one; but, as the best surrogate, Kant proposes a Federal Union of States. To those who should treat such a resource as a reverie, I would suggest the just remark of Kant, that all international law whatsoever (Fœdial Law, Rights of Ambassadors, Laws of War, &c.) do of necessity appeal to and presuppose such a Federal state, no matter how immature. Indeed, recent experience is on the side of Kant. According to the remark of Mr Southey (in his Sir T. More, vol. II. p. 425,) "The Holy Alliance, imperfect and unstable as it is, is in itself a recognition of the principle" (of a Perpetual Peace.) Certainly this was the first step taken by leading nations to realize the fact of a Federal Arcopagus for Europe, let the immediate purpose have been what it may. Meantime, the growth of a Federalism, purified for Kant's purpose, will be slow. Perhaps he did not himself think otherwise. Nay, it is very possible that the satirical signboard of a Dutch innkeeper, which he pleasantly alludes to in his preface—viz. a churchyard, filled with graves, and bearing the sarcastic superscription of Perpetual Peace—may, in fact, express the amount of his own serious anticipations in this region of human hopes.

I am really shocked, my dear friend, to find the length of my paper. Yet, supposing that I were treating the same subject in a separate book, rather than in a journal, I should be disposed to lengthen it by five entire essays: one, entitled the Natural History of the Heavens, in which Kant anticipated much of Herschell's views on the System of the Universe; another upon the idea of a Race in natural history, which deduces the physical varieties of man from a single aboriginal pair; a third, upon supposed marks of scintilla in our own planet. These would furnish popular illustrations of Kant's science; whilst his subtlety in paths more peculiarly his own would be best sustained by a little essay On the Introduction into Philosophy of the idea of Negative Quantities, and by his Scheme of a Universal History on a Cosmopolitical plan. This last I myself translated and published some years ago; and I shall not think my time lost, were it only for the following opinion which this essay was the occasion of drawing recently from Mr Southey:—"That Kant is as profound a philosopher as his disciples have proclaimed him to be, this little treatise would fully convince me, if I had not already believed it in reliance upon one," &c.—Southey's Sir T. More, v. II. p. 408.

I had much to say of Kant in the way of blame; but I am not sorry that my last words about him happened to be those of praise—and praise from a writer who had great prejudices to overcome, being, in an ultra-British sense, hostile to metaphysicians as a class.

By way of a literary curiosity for the History of Popular Sophisms, let me tell you at parting, that the original root of the famous argument grounded upon the Protestant concession of safety to Romanism—(about which I have said so much in the earlier part of this letter) lies in the following words of Arnobius: Nonne purior ratio, ex duobus incertis et in ambigui expectatione pendens, id potius credere quod aliquas spes ferat—quam quod omnino nullas?

Yours ever, my dear Sir C.

THE WILD GARLAND, AND SACRED MELODIES.†

THESE two little unpretending volumes, from the pens of sister and brother, are, in our eyes, severally or conjointly, of more worth than many an ambitious tome put together in one heavy lump, that, by power of puffing, had each in its day enjoyed, perhaps, no inconsiderable share of popular applause. In these days, much as we love and admire the age, it is, we fear, one of the very rarest qualities even of true merit to be unpretending; perhaps because there is so much pretence without any merit at all, that people of worth feel they must stand up for themselves and their claims, else both will go unheeded and unacknowledged by the world. Yet they who in happy humility

"Hold the noiseless tenor of their way,"

and prefer the pleasure to the fame of doing good, the calm of conscience to the trouble of glory, seldom go altogether without the reward even of reputation. Their path, though silent, is not unseen, though lowly, is not obscure. More eyes are upon them than they think in their simplicity; ears from a distance catch the sweet music of their strains; and tongues "syllable their names," even in cities, while themselves know it not, in their seclusion. How pleasant—nay, how much more than pleasant—to take up by chance from some table groaning under a load of fashionable novels, some small volume, composed by some lover of nature, that hath found its way there, heaven knows how, like some real rosebud yielding its fragrance among artificial flowers. 'Tis next best thing to meeting in commonplace but talkative society, where all are jealously a-jabber from fear of being thought stupid, some maid or matron who loves silence best, except when her heart inditeth a good matter, and who then breathes, in a voice

"Gentle and low, an excellent thing in woman," some sentiment, which, whether original or not,—and we doubt if any thing be entirely original,—touches an answering chord in our heart, and inclines our head kindly—perhaps tenderly—towards the fair speaker all the rest of the evening. That handsome, spanking girl, rather above the common height by a few inches, and with ankles not so very much amiss, may stare and speechify at you about Madame de Stael and Lord Byron, till she believes your name is added to the list of her conquests, and that in a few days, under unremitting management, you may be brought to propose. Meanwhile you wish her reddish-lidded amorous eyes, of no particular colour, would go an-ogling in the direction of the Doctor or the Captain, and leave you at peace and liberty to whisper in the shade of the curtained bow-window, commauding, perhaps, a view of a lake, mountains, and woods, some affectionate and almost loving words in the ear of the meek-faced, soft-voiced stranger, who, as she listens, becomes lovelier and lovelier, and is felt at last to be, though few know, and none will acknowledge it, by far the prettiest girl in the drawing-room.

We believe the authors of these little volumes are Quakers. Alas! of one of them we must say was; for Samuel Miller Waring lost his life by a lamentable accident. He was a man of genius, undoubtedly, as his poetry proves; that he was a man of virtue was proved by his life. His sister survives; and of her Duodecimo let us first speak—The “Wild Garland; or Prose and Poetry, connected with English Wild Flowers, intended as an Embellishment to the Study of Botany.” We believe that in the fulfilment of her pleasant task, she was assisted by her brother; but hearts touched by the same or kindred feelings express them in language that breathes of their common origin; and therefore we shall not think of speculating on the shares respectively to be assigned to each of the coadjutors. The “Wild Garland,” though manifestly written by one who is an adept in the science of Botany, yet lays no claim to science, professes not to throw any fresh light upon the subject, nor to initiate by any new method into its hidden mysteries; but simply to give additional interest to any, by the association of ideas poetical, historical, or classical, with some of the beautiful productions of our fields and woods. As it is absolutely “a Wild Garland,” the author says that the strict arrangement of class and order has not been observed. The flowers of which it is composed have been gathered as fancy directed, and are offered to the reader, not as the fairest and most fragrant, but as a sample of the treasures every hedgerow and meadow may furnish. There are in all but eighty pages—and we have no fault to find with them except that they are too few. The engravings are excellent—and it does one’s eyes and heart good to look on them all so naturally coloured—the round-leaved Sundew, the Common Furze, the two-flowered Linnaea, the Red Poppy, the Wild Germander, the Violet, the Snow-drop, the Common Primrose, the Cowslip, the Common Daisy, the Common Broom—treasures which are strewn along the wayside, both the highways and bye-ways, which he who stands still may gather, and he who runs may read. There are some touching lines on the round-leaved Sundew. Its beauty is truly said to consist in the form and appearance of the leaves which are thrown out immediately from the root, and spread over the surface of the ground; each plant forming a little circular plot of green cup-shaped leaves, thickly fringed with hairs of a deep rose-colour. These hairs support small drops, or globules, of a pellucid liquor-like dew, which continue even in the hottest part of the day, and in the fullest exposure to the sun. It is found in mossy bogs, and on the borders of ponds and rivulets in moorland districts.

TO THE ROUND-LEAVED SUNDEW.

“By the lone fountain’s secret bed,
Where human footsteps rarely tread,
Mid the wild moor or silent glen,
The Sundew blooms unseen by men;
Spreads there her leaf of rosy hue,
A chalice for the morning dew,
And, ere the summer’s sun can rise,
Drinks the pure waters of the skies.

“Wouldst thou that thy lot were given
Thus to receive the dews of heaven,
With heart prepared, like this meek flower?
Come, then, and hail the dawning hour;
So shall a blessing from on high,
Pure as the rain of summer’s sky,
Unsullied as the morning dew
Descend, and all thy soul imbue.

“Yes! like the blossoms of the waste,
Would we the sky-born waters taste,
To the High Fountain’s sacred spring,
The chalice let us humbly bring;
So shall we find the streams of heaven
To him who seeks are freely given;
The morning and the evening dew
Shall still our failing strength renew.”

The common furze, gorse, whins, —is not a bank of it beautiful, gleaming goldenly amid the summer woods, and scenting the thin mists that in morning hour float over the murmur of the awakened river? Here are three feeling quatrains to that bank; and—brae-brightener-and-sweetener.

"Mid scatter'd foliage, pale and sere,
Thy kindly floweret cheers the gloom;
And offers to the waning year
The tribute of its golden bloom.

"Beneath November's clouded sky,
In chill December's stormy hours,
Thy blossom meets the traveller's eye,
Gay as the buds of summer bowers.

"Flower of the dark and wintry day!
Emblem of friendship! thee I hail!
Blooming when others fade away,
And brightest when their hues grow pale."

All the verses that ever were written on flowers, are good—at least, we remember no bad ones. So spiritual in their balmy beauty, they inspire not only clods but clod-hoppers. A bunch of flowers suddenly held up before the eyes and the nose of the veriest blockhead, makes him for the moment a bard—a poet. The delicate and sensitive mind, again, alive to the visitings of the spirit of beauty that goes glimpsing over the earth, can never be at a loss for joy as long as the daisies dance in the sunshine. Gentle reader! perhaps you never saw a daisy dance? Then are you much to be pitied. They go dancing up hill and down brae, in no regular figure, but overspreading the whole green floor in one indistinguishable gallopade. The sunbeams in which they swim along, settle; and lo! in an instant all the dancers are motionless on their seats. They seem absolutely rooted to the ground—and all their faces covered with blushes. But here is a cowslip, and we absolutely smell the sweet-scented pale yellow blossom. But listen to a little lay in honour of the flower.

THE COWSLIP.

"Unfolding to the breeze of May,
The Cowslip greets the vernal ray.
The topaz and the ruby gem,
Her blossom's simple diadem;
And, as the dew-drops gently fall,
They tip with pearls her coronal.

"In princely halls and courts of kings
Its lustrous ray the diamond flings;
Yet few of those who see its beam,
Amid the torch-light's dazzling gleam,
As bright as though a meteor shone,
Can call the costly prize their own.

"But gems of every form and hue
Are glittering here in morning dew;

Jewels that all alike may share
As freely as the common air:
No niggard hand, or jealous eye,
Protects them from the passer by.

"Man to his brother shuts his heart,
And Science acts a miser's part;
But Nature, with a liberal hand,
Flings wide her stores o'er sea and land.
If gold she gives, not single grains
Are scatter'd far across the plains;
But lo, the desert streams are roll'd
O'er precious beds of virgin gold.
If flowers she offers, wreaths are given,
As countless as the stars of heaven:
Or music—'tis no feeble note
She bids along the valleys float;
Ten thousand nameless melodies
In one full chorus swell the breeze.

"Oh, art is but a scanty rill
That genial seasons scarcely fill.
But nature needs no tide's return
To fill afresh her flowing urn:
She gathers all her rich supplies
Where never-failing waters rise."

But let us now pensively turn over the leaves of the "Sacred Melodies." Some of them are truly beautiful—and will bear to be read after the hymns of James Montgomery, of Heber, or of Keeble. Oh! that people who take pen in hand would but write from the heart! All men, women, and children, have hearts—and we would fain believe not bad hearts either—nay, good hearts,—till the Prince of the Air, feeling himself called on by thoughts, by incipient sinners unexpressed, alights before them unseen,

"And then a wicked whisper turns
Their hearts as dry as dust."

Then the corrupt become stupid—and great proserers. Poetry breathes not, brightens not for such; yet once there was music in their souls, and in dim memory of the past they become versifiers—poetasters,—and without meaning to be impious, they tag-rag-and-bobtail the very verses of the Bible. But a truly pious man or woman always writes well on sacred subjects, for they always write from the heart; and in song the heart of a Christian justifieth itself before men and angels. Samuel Miller Waring was a pious man. Had he not been so, never could he have written the following lines:

"Thou, dear enthusiast, sayest,
None can like nature preach;

That in her fane thou prayest ;
 That woods and rills can teach :
 Yes, more than e'er Ilyssus
 Taught sages by his stream ;
 Or groves beside Cephissus,
 That waved o'er Plato's dream.

" Then leave these vales below thee ;
 Come, stretch thine eagle eye,
 And nature more will shew thee
 Of him thou canst not spy.
 Gaze on the fire-stream, pouring
 Down Eden's viny steep ;
 Go where the billow's roaring
 Is loudest on the deep.

" Where earthquakes mutter deadly,
 And domes and turrets reel ;
 Where camel-bells pause dreadly,
 When h'd in the hot Samiel ;
 Where thunders roll before him,
 And where his lightnings shine,
 Bow, tremble, and adore him ;
 For this—this God is thine.

" Yet see, through clouds storm-broken,
 The dove-borne olive bough !
 Take thou, and bind that token
 Around thine awe-struck brow.
 Then where his bow he spreadeth,
 Behold him dark no more ;
 Him, who the wild waves treadeth,
 Seek now on yon green shore.

" Around his footsteps springing,
 What wreaths embalm the air !
 While hills break forth in singing,
 Go, trace those footsteps there
 When morn's first beam from slumbers
 Awakes the dewy flowers ;
 Or with that bird whose numbers
 Charm starry midnight hours.

" To Him let rapture wing thee,
 From heights where eagles dwell ;
 Or let the glad bee bring thee
 Home to her thynny cell.
 Where'er thou wilt, observe him
 In things that fairest shine ;
 Then, joyful, fly to serve him,
 For He—that God—is thine."

There is something profound in the pathos of the lines addressed "To the Magdalen."

" Yes, weep, O woman frail and fair ;
 Though tears that fall so fast
 Amid that bright up-braided hair
 Can ne'er efface the past.

" Though other drops, whose power divine
 Can wash thy stains away,
 Must plead e'en more than tears like thine ;
 More holy still than they.

" Had He who pardons bid thee bring
 Those tears his love to buy,
 That word had ne'er unseal'd the spring
 That fills thy streaming eye.

" Ah 'twas not Sinai's flash that taught
 That frozen fount to glow :
 No—milder, mightier rays it caught ;
 And lo, the waters flow !

" Pour then thine odours—pour, and see,
 In Him on whom they fall,
 The vase of clay that holds for thee
 Balm costlier far than all.

" More fragrant unction on that brow
 Rests, where his Father smiled :
 He bears a brother's name ; for thou,
 Thou too art call'd a child.

" Oh wondrous !—pour a heaven of tears :
 When sin's erased above,
 How dark that record torn appears,
 In the full light of love !"

We have room for one other strain.
 It is not without majesty—and would do honour to a far higher name than that of Samuel Miller Waring.

" Peace ' peace ' swelling trump that re-peatest
 The praises to victory given !
 Let the harp, with the chords that are sweetest,
 Sound softly—' The banner of heaven !
 Oh bring forth the cross-bearing banner !
 The banner ! the banner of heaven !"

" Never blood of the vanquish'd imbrued it :
 Those drops from the Victor did flow ;
 And the tears that alone have bedew'd it
 Were shed o'er the wounds of a foe.
 There is victory dwells in the banner
 Of the Leader that bled for his foe.

" Yon standard, inwoven with flowers
 From the groves where sages have trod,
 And from Paradise too—how it towers !
 'Tis all, save the banner of God.
 Oh give us the banner !—the banner !
 Bring forth the true banner of God !

" Whence came that fierce zeal that is glowing—
 That would call down the flame from above ?
 Proud spirits their missiles are throwing :—
 Ah, where is the banner of love ?
 The banner !—oh bring forth the banner !
 Bring forth the mild banner of love !

"There are songs that break forth at its beaming,

As of warblers when dawning is bright;
And hark! lo, the night-bird is screaming,

As he flies from the banner of light.

'Tis holiness beams from the banner:
It breathes round the banner of light.

"Hail it not where the trampler hath found it:

Serene to the breeze be it given;
And soft airs shall whisper around it,
'This sure is the banner of heaven!'

Unfurl then—unfurl all the banner!
Every fold!—'tis the banner of heaven!"

Nay, we must quote yet another little poem. Which shall it be?

PETER WEEPING.

"O strong in purpose—trail in power.
Where now the pledge so lately given?
Coward—to creatures of an hour;
Bold to the challenged bolts of heaven!"

"Shall that fierce eye e'er pour the stream
Of heart-wringing tears before its God?
Thus did the rock in Horeb seem,
One moment ere it felt the rod.

"But Jesus turns:—mysterious drops
Before that kindly glance flow fast;
So melt the snows from mountain tops,
When the dark wintry hour is past.

What might it be that glance could paint?
Did one deep-touching impress blend
The more than sage—the more than saint—
The more than sympathizing friend?

"Was it, that lightning thought retraced
Some hallow'd hour beneath the moon?
Or walk, or converse high, that graced
The temple's column'd shade at noon?"

"Say, did that face to memory's eye,
With gleams of Taber's glory shine?
Or did the dews of agony
Still rest upon that brow divine?

"I know not—but I know a will
That, Lord! might frail as Peter's be!
A heart that had denied thee still,
Even now—without a look from Thee!"

It is delightful to know that much poetry such as this is almost every season stealing into existence, not transitory, since it lives in many gentle hearts, breathing its balm in quiet homes, like that of the favourite flowers that bloom in their parlour windows—even like the ever-blossoming rose that often sheds its beauty unheeded, but every now and then, both in gloom and sunshine, suddenly attracts the eyes of the inmates, and often wakes a silent blessing, almost a prayer. Such poems as these, of which the world takes little or no heed, are felt peculiarly to belong to those who have been so fortunate—so happy—as to meet with them by accident perhaps, or to have received them from the hand of some chance-acquaintance, who, after the pleasant gift, is thenceforth considered to be a friend. Albums might be repositories for such productions. By the way, speaking of Albums—thanks to Charles Lamb for his Album verses, so beautifully printed and got up by his young friend Edward Moxon, himself gifted with much poetical feeling and fancy, witness his "Christmas." Charles! we love the following strain:—

ANGELIE HILL

"This rare tablet doth include
Poverty with sanctitude.
Past midnight this poor maid hath spun
And yet the work is not half done,
Which must supply from earnings scant
A feeble bed-ridden parent's want.
Her sleep-charged eyes exemption ask,
And holy hands take up the task,
Unseen the rock and pumple ply,
And do her earthly drudgery.
Sleep, saintly poor one, sleep, sleep on,
And, waking, find thy labours done.
Perchance she knows it by her dreams,
Her eye hath caught the golden gleams,
Angelic presence testifying,
That round her every where are flying;
Ostents from which she may presume,
That much of Heaven is in the room.
Skirting her own bright hair they run,
And to the sunny add more sun
Now on that aged face they fix,
Streaming from the crucifix;
The flesh-clogg'd spirit disabusing,
Death-disarming sleeps infusing,
Prelubations, foretastes high,
And equal thoughts to live or die.
Gardener bright from Eden's bower,
Tend with care that lily flower;
To its leaves and root infuse
Heaven's sunshine, Heaven's dews.
'Tis a type, and 'tis a pledge,
Of a crowning privilege.
Careful as that lily flower,
This maid must keep her precious dower;
Live a sainted maid, or die Martyr to virginity."

"Oh! rare Charles Lamb!"

THE REVENUES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.*

WRITTEN by rooted principle to the old and tried institutions of the country, we gladly avail ourselves of the clear and conclusive arguments used in this little publication, for the purpose of dissipating the monstrous delusions which are too prevalent with respect to the revenues of the Church of England. The more enlightened members of that establishment appear to us to treat with too much contempt, the effect which must be produced upon the public mind by the incessant misrepresentations of its enemies: reposing listlessly, or over-confidently, in the security of legal protection, they seem to consider it unnecessary to counteract the efforts of those who labour to undermine the ecclesiastical institutions ordained by the state. The ever-vigilant and indefatigable enemies of all institutions which have a tendency to uphold social order and public morals, dexterously take advantage of this sapineness, and are thus enabled, almost uncontradicted and unretuted, to exaggerate, in the grossest manner, the amount of the revenues of the Church of England, as well as misrepresent the sources from which those revenues are really derived. In the little work, from the pages of which we purpose borrowing largely, the most important and dangerous of these misrepresentations are, as we conceive, very successfully exposed. Indeed, it appears to us so well calculated to serve the object which it has in view, that we earnestly recommend its contents to the attention of all those who are desirous to uphold the English Establishment.

The first fallacy to which the author adverts is, the very common and prevalent notion, that all the members of the community are compelled by law to pay towards the maintenance of a set of teachers appointed, by a part only, though it be a majority, to preach a particular system of doctrine: that those who dissent from the doctrines of the Church of England, and support their own religious teachers by voluntary contributions, are compelled, in addition to this burden, to contribute towards the maintenance of the established clergy, and bear their full proportion of the expense attending the discharge of the ecclesiastical functions ordained by the state. There can, indeed, be little doubt, that much of the hostility felt towards the Established Church, by the various classes of dissenters throughout the empire, arises from the belief, that they are compelled by law to contribute, in proportion to the amount of their property, towards the maintenance of the established clergy. Nor is this delusion confined to those who dissent from the Church; it operates, it is to be feared, powerfully, as well as extensively, on the minds of persons who might be expected to be exempt from its influence. A large portion of the population of England has been taught to consider the established clergy as a body of public functionaries ordained by the state, and drawing a proportion of their stipends from the property of every member of the community. But this is a gross and dangerous fallacy, arising from an entire misconception of the nature and origin of the revenues attached to ecclesiastical offices. There is, in truth, no ground for the assertion, that the legislature compels all the members of the community to pay towards the maintenance of a set of teachers, appointed to preach a particular system of doctrines. The author before us has, we think, succeeded in proving, not only that the minority of the people who dissent from the Church do not really bear the proportion which is alleged to fall upon them of the expense of the ecclesiastical functions ordained by the State; but also that the established clergy cannot properly be said to receive pay from any member of the community, whatever may be the terms of his creed, or the amount or nature of his property. "It must," he adds, "be observed, that when it is alleged that the minority of the civil community is compelled 'to pay' a particular set of teachers appointed by this majority, the expression 'to pay' must bear a different signification from that in which it is used when a tenant is said to pay rent to his landlord, or when a debtor is described as paying a creditor a debt which he owes him. If the expression be used simply in the latter sense, the proposition that all the members of the community who possess real property are compelled to pay towards the support of 'the ecclesiastical institutions established by the majority,' is a mere truism, which admits of no more dispute than the assertion that all the occupiers of land are compelled to pay towards the support of its owners. But if it be used in another sense—in that of transferring to ecclesiastical property, which either in equity or law belongs to those who are said to pay them, the expression involves a plain fallacy; for it will not be difficult to prove that, in this latter sense, no payment is made towards the discharge of the ecclesiastical functions ordained by the state by any member of the civil community."

If any member of the community can properly be said to contribute towards the expense of supporting an ecclesiastical establishment, it must manifestly be in one or other of the three following capacities—he must do it either as the occupier of land—as the owner of land—or as the consumer of agricultural produce.

"That this burden does not fall on the occupier of land can be rendered abundantly clear. Assume that the incumbent of a parish receives, in lieu of tithes, a composition of five shillings per acre, and the landowner forty shillings per acre as rent; were tithes abolished,—were the claims of the ecclesiastic to his share of the produce to cease,—no reasonable man doubts that at the expiration of the agreement subsisting between the occupier and the owner of the soil, the sum now paid for tithes would be added to the amount of rent exacted by the landlord. Land which he now lets, subject to tithes, for forty shillings per acre, would then be let by him, free from tithes, for forty-five shillings. The abolition of tithes would, in such a case, merely add five shillings per acre to the present income of the landowner; but to the occupier of the land it could produce no pecuniary advantage whatever. Hence it clearly follows that the occupier of land, whether he be a member of the Church of England or dissent from its communion, cannot be said to make any contribution towards the expense of the national establishment. The occupier now pays in the form of rent and tithes a gross sum, which, if tithes ceased to exist, would inevitably be exacted from him as rent.

"But granting it to be true, that if the claim of the tithe-owner ceased to exist, the amount would be added to the present demands of the landlord, does it not follow that the burden of our ecclesiastical establishment falls upon the owner of the soil? If it be admitted that the rent payable to the landowner is reduced by the exact amount now received by the ecclesiastical proprietor in lieu of tithes, is it not a necessary consequence that the lay proprietor of the land has to defray the whole expense of the ecclesiastical functions ordained by the state? By way of replying to these questions, it may be asked, Did not this proprietor or his ancestor purchase his land subject to the claim of the tithe-owner? And was not the price paid for it less by the exact amount of the fee simple value of the tithes, than it would inevitably have been if the estate had been purchased free from this burden? If these questions be answered, as they must be, in the affirmative, it will necessarily follow, that there is no reasonable ground for alleging, that the landowner in reality contributes towards the expense of an ecclesiastical establishment. That portion of the produce of the soil which has been reserved and set apart in this country for ecclesiastical purposes, never was the property of the present lay owner of the estate on which it is levied, nor did it ever belong to any of his immediate predecessors. Every acre of land contained within the limits of England and Wales, not exempt from tithes, has been sold and let subject to that burden, from a period long antecedent to any written record; and on every successive transfer of landed property, the estimated value of the tithes has been invariably deducted from the price paid for it by the purchaser. It is, therefore, a manifest perversion of language to affirm, that the established clergy are paid either by the occupier or the owner of the soil, except in the sense in which a landlord is said to be paid by his tenant. If the owner of an estate alienated it twenty years ago, reserving to himself, or his assigns, a perpetual rent charge upon it equal to a tenth part of the produce, could the individual receiving such an annuity be considered as paid or pensioned by the present owner of the freehold from which it accrues? It is presumed that the most violent impugnors of the rights of ecclesiastics would scarcely undertake to maintain the affirmative of such a proposition.

"There are others who maintain, that tithes constitute a burden which falls, not upon the occupier or owner of the soil, but upon the consumer of titheable commodities: admitting that tithes neither diminish the net revenue or rent of the owner, nor the profits of the occupier of land, they allege that this burden makes an addition of one-tenth to the money price of the article on which it is levied. In order to place in a clear light the opinion entertained by this class of economists with respect to the practical effect of tithes, let it be assumed that an acre of land subject to this burden, and let for forty shillings, produces twenty bushels of wheat, which sell for one hundred shillings; the tithe of the produce of this acre would be two bushels of wheat, worth ten shillings. Adam Smith, and other eminent writers, who have been hitherto regarded as authorities in questions of political economy, admit that if the ten shillings levied as tithes in the case here stated ceased to be exacted, the amount would be added to the rent already received by the landlord, but that it would make no alteration in the money or selling price of the wheat which this land produces. But the persons who have recently set themselves up as oracles in matters of this kind, pronounce this to be an erroneous opinion; they contend, that if tithes were not levied on the acre in question, the result would be, not that the landlord would add ten shillings to the forty shillings now received by him as rent, but that the market price of wheat would fall one-tenth, and that the grower would sell the whole twenty bushels for ninety shillings,—the price which he now obtains for eighteen bushels.

“This singular theory of what its authors quaintly term the ‘incidence of tithes,’ is made to rest on a basis equally singular: it is assumed as a fact not to be controverted, that the least fertile soil brought in this country into a state of tillage pays no rent. The expense of raising wheat upon this ‘least fertile soil,’ is then assumed to be the ‘natural cost of production,’ which regulates the market value of wheat grown not only upon that ‘least fertile soil,’ but upon all other soils, however superior in quality. From these premises they deduce it as an inference, that tithes, adding one-tenth to the cost of producing wheat on the least fertile soil in a state of tillage, must at the same time make an addition of one-tenth to the money price of all the wheat offered for sale in the public market.

“But the very fact on which this delusive theory is constructed is utterly destitute of foundation. That the least fertile soil retained in a state of tillage pays no rent,—that the owner of the least productive spot in a state of cultivation will permit it to be occupied for any length of time without exacting some part of its produce, under the denomination of rent, is an assumption controverted by general experience. No spot of land can be found in England or Wales, permanently retained in a state of tillage, which yields the owner no surplus of its produce as rent. The very worst soil which can be tilled, with the reasonable prospect of a remunerating profit, possesses some natural powers and local advantages which are the property of the owner, and for the use of which he will exact some amount of compensation from the occupier.

“Suppose, however, it be conceded, in the teeth of all practical experience upon this subject, that the least fertile soil, in a state of tillage, subject to tithes, yields no surplus as rent, but barely makes the ordinary return of profits for the capital employed in its cultivation,—still this concession will not support the inference which is drawn from it: for it will by no means follow as a matter of course, that the abstraction of the tenth part of the produce of this ‘least fertile soil’ will affect the money price of the other nine parts when brought to market. For this ‘least fertile soil,’ even upon the supposition that it yields no surplus as rent, evidently yields a surplus beyond the cost of tillage, as tithes. If the demand for tithes ceased to exist, the consequence in this very case would be,—not that the market value of the whole produce would be diminished, but—that the landowner, who is now said to receive nothing, would then obtain as rent the portion which is at present the property of the tithe-owner.

“Granting, therefore, a fact which no man can credit,—that the least fertile soil permanently retained in a state of tillage yields no surplus to the landowner, still it appears clear that the amount now levied upon it as tithes would, if this claim were abolished, be exacted from the cultivator of the same soil, as rent, by the landlord. For even those who most strenuously contend that the burden of tithes falls ultimately upon the consumer of agricultural produce, will, it is presumed, admit that the produce of the least fertile soil permanently retained in a state of tillage, paying no rent, but subject to tithes, must yield a remunerating profit to the cultivator,—otherwise he would cease to till it. Were the charge for tithes to be abolished, it would evidently yield more than the average profit of capital by the amount of the tithes now levied upon it; and this excess of profit, arising from the abolition of tithes, would be instantly claimed by the landowner, who, as these persons assert, now receives no rent for his land. Let it be assumed that the produce of a given extent of fertile soil, which is said to pay no rent, sells for £40, and that the claim of the tithe-owner, now amounting to £4, were to cease; would the whole produce which now sells for £40, be in that case sold for no more than £36? ‘Yes,’ say the theorists :—‘ No,’ says common sense ; ‘ if the £4 now paid in lieu of tithes ceased to be exacted, another claimant to an equal amount would instantly spring up in the person of the landlord.’ ”

It appears not a little singular, that the same authorities who are found to argue that tithes fall upon the consumers of agricultural produce—upon the poorest beggar, as well as the proudest peer, in the ratio of their respective consumptions, should at the same time maintain, that the payment of rent is not attended with any such consequences. This is a manifest inconsistency : for if it could be rendered apparent, that tithes increase the money price of the produce of land one-tenth, it would follow, as an inevitable consequence, that the payment of rent must raise this price still farther in the same ratio as its amount might be found to exceed that of the tithes.

There seems, therefore, no ground whatever for the assertion, that tithes make any addition to the exchangeable value of the articles of consumption on which they are levied, and upon the consumer of agricultural produce in the form of an increased price : on the contrary, it appears quite clear that a bushel of wheat sells for the same money-price in the market, whether the crop, of which it forms a part, has been tithed or not.

It is, we apprehend, a maxim which few political economists will venture to controvert, that the selling price of every commodity must be regulated by the relative proportion subsisting between the supply and the demand in the market—it can manifestly make no difference whether this supply be furnished by one or by fifty sellers. Whether one hundred bushels of wheat be brought to market by the grower alone, or ninety bushels by the grower, and ten bushels by the tithe-owner—the money price of the commodity must remain the same. Those who contend that tithes increase the selling price of agricultural produce, seem to argue upon the assumption, that, when taken in kind, the tenth is annihilated by the owner—that it is absolutely withdrawn from the aggregated supply of the country—and that the effect upon the exchangeable value of the remainder is the same as if this portion of the produce of land were annually destroyed.

But as this assumption is clearly erroneous—as the quantity of produce which passes into the stores of the tithe-owner is sent to market equally with that portion of it which remains in the granary of the grower, it clearly results, that the effect of tithes, even when levied in the most rigid manner—in kind—is not to render agricultural productions dearer to the consumer, but simply to diminish the amount of the surplus which, under the denomination of rent, would otherwise inevitably fall to the share of the landowner.

“Tithes, therefore,” concludes our author, “constitute merely a portion of the surplus produce of the soil, which the cultivator yields to an ecclesiastical, instead of a lay, owner. Their burden does not fall upon the consumer, because they do not affect the price of agricultural produce ; nor upon the occupier, because his rent is reduced in proportion to the average value of the tithes ; nor upon the owner, because this charge was taken into calculation when the property which he holds was purchased.”

We are aware of but one objection which can be made to the above conclusion. It is perfectly clear that, with respect to the quantity of agricultural produce actually raised, and also that portion of it which is sent to the public market, it cannot signify to the consumer whether it has been tithed or not ; as its selling price cannot be affected by that circumstance. It may, however, be urged, that tithes, as they are now levied in England, discourage, to a certain extent at least, the production of agricultural commodities, and by thus diminishing the quantity actually raised, increase the price of that portion which is sold to the consumer. We are free to admit that there is some weight in this objection. It appears, however, we apprehend, much stronger in theory than it turns out when put to the test of practical experience. If the exaction of tithes operated practically, in the way and to the extent which a theorist would lead us to expect, it would necessarily follow that land, free from tithes, should, at least in general, be found better cultivated than land which continues subject to that burden. Now, England furnishes ample means for making a comparison with regard to this very point : under the operation of modusses and other legal exemptions, or under the provisions of the numerous enclosure bills, which, within the course of the last century, have been passed by the legislature, a very considerable portion of the surface of England has become exonerated from the payment of tithes. Now, we take the liberty of asking, are those parishes or farms, which are tithe-free, better cultivated and more productive than other parishes or farms, of equal quality, still subject to tithes? We are told that they are not. On the contrary, we are assured, that Kent, where tithes are more rigidly exacted than in any other district, is still the best cultivated of any county in England. If this be the fact, there is an end to the objection raised against tithes, on the ground that they operate as a general discouragement to tillage. That they do so act in particular instances, we can readily conceive; but these partial exceptions cannot go for much in the general argument. But to remove this objection altogether, the mode is both simple and obvious: Let a law be passed, enabling the owners of tithes, like the owners of land, to grant leases for a term of years certain, and this objection would instantly vanish. The only impediment which tithes can throw in the way of investing capital in the improvement of land, would be at once removed; and such an arrangement being effected, the community at large would not care one straw whether the land-owner should take the whole surplus produce to himself, or be compelled to share it with an ecclesiastical proprietor. We, therefore, confidently hope, that the judicious measure recently introduced by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and for the present withdrawn, will be resumed and completed in the ensuing session; we are convinced that, when carried into effect, it will do more to strengthen the Church than any law which has been passed since the Reformation.

Most of the persons who propose to alter the mode in which the clergy of the English establishment are now provided for, would have us believe, that tithes constitute a general tax, originally imposed upon the nation by Parliament. On this ground they contend, that this species of property still belongs to the public, and that the legislature has a moral and constitutional right to deal with this property as it may think fit,—to withdraw any part, or even the whole of it, from the ecclesiastical benefices and dignities to which it is now attached, and appropriate it to any other purpose which may appear beneficial to the public. But such a representation of the origin of tithes is utterly irreconcilable with the fairest deduction from historical probabilities. A very brief summary of the steps by which ecclesiastical benefices originally acquired the endowments now attached to them will serve to dissipate many of the delusions which prevail with respect to the origin of church revenues.

We learn, from undoubted authority, that during the earlier ages of Christianity, a general fund was established in every congregation or church by the voluntary contribution of its members. "The Apostle of the Gentiles" advised that every man should lay up for this treasury a weekly "offering, more or less in its amount," as the Lord had prospered him. The custom or law by which the Jews devoted a tenth part of their earnings to religious purposes, was by degrees very generally adopted, of their own accord, by the converts to Christianity. The supplies thus voluntarily raised, formed, in fact, the only source from which the Christian commonwealth derived its revenues for a period of about two centuries after the death of its founder. But towards the close of the second century of the Christian era, the custom of bestowing permanent endowments of land upon particular churches began to be prevalent; for, by the middle of the succeeding century, the wealth of the church is said to have in many places become so considerable as to attract the cupidity of the Roman Emperors. Indeed, Faustus, in his treatise on benefices, states it to be his opinion, that the greedy wish of getting hold of these endowments formed the real, though concealed, cause of the persecutions which arose against the church after the death of Commodus. It is, however, wide of our purpose to trace the progress of endowments in foreign churches. We shall, therefore, pass on at once into our own country, and point out the manner in which those institutions, which have been since moulded into one establishment were originally introduced into this island.

"We are informed," says our author, "that, towards the close of the sixth century, Austin the monk, accompanied by several associates, was dispatched to propagate the gospel among the Saxon inhabitants of Britain. Ethelbert, who at the time of their arrival was King of Kent, is said to have received these missionaries with considerable favour; he gave them an edifice at Canterbury to be used as a place of Christian worship, and conferred upon them a spacious residence in which they might dwell in common. Austin, under the title of Bishop, was appointed the superintendent of these ecclesiastics, who, acting under his orders, laboured to propagate the new faith in different parts of Ethelbert's kingdom.

"Thus, in fact, was laid the foundation of an ecclesiastical establishment in this country. At that period, the church which King Ethelbert had given to the monks on their arrival in the island, was the only consecrated place of Christian worship in the kingdom of Kent; it was the axis; or seat of the bishop, and the whole of what forms the modern county went under the denomination of parochia, parish, or district, appendant to the cathedral church. At that time, the population of Kent was scattered throughout detached hamlets, which had been cleared of wood, and brought under tillage; these villages, or little colonies of cultivators, were occasionally, or perhaps periodically, visited by itinerant missionaries, dispatched from their chief residence at Canterbury. At first, divine worship must have been performed in some private and unconsecrated dwelling situate in the village; here the inhabitants of the surrounding districts assembled, and here the travelling missionary expounded to the peasantry the doctrines of the true faith. That this mode of imparting religious instruction prevailed in the wildest and least populous parts of the country at a later period, is a fact, which we learn from the Venerable Bede. Describing the labours of Cuthbert, Bishop of Lindisfarne, he says, that 'leaving the monastery, sometimes on horseback, but more frequently on foot, he went to the surrounding villages, and preached the way of truth among their erring inhabitants; which Basil, in his time, was also accustomed to do. For at that time, it was the custom of the people of England that, whenever an ecclesiastic arrived in a village, all the inhabitants should, at his bidding, assemble together to hear the word of God.'

"In each village the converts to the new faith gradually multiplied, until they became too numerous to meet in a private dwelling for the celebration of divine worship; hence it was found expedient that 'an oratory,' as it was then termed, or house of prayer, should be set apart for the accommodation of the increasing community of Christians.

"It was natural to expect, that the labours of these able and zealous teachers would finally succeed in making a deep and lasting impression upon the inhabitants of the island. In the course of time, the great landlord of each district, yielding to their exhortations, became a convert to the new religion. His own conversion to the Christian faith rendered him desirous to secure for his immediate domestics, as well as the villins and slaves who cultivated his estate, a more frequent and regular administration of religious ordinances, than could have been obtained from the casual visits of an itinerant missionary. To obviate the manifest inconveniences of this irregular system of religious instruction, he built, at his own cost and charges, a church in which the inhabitants of the district might assemble for public worship, and a house, with an attached glebe, which the minister might inhabit. Having thus created a parochial benefice, he voluntarily, and expressly endowed it with a certain portion of the gross produce of his estate as an independent and inalienable provision for each succeeding incumbent constantly resident upon his cure, and devoting his attention to the religious and moral improvement of the parishioners.

"In this manner it was that not only the county, of Kent, but the whole of this island, became originally divided into parishes; not all at once by a general regulation or legislative enactment, but gradually, according to the disposition and circumstances of the various owners of estates. It was the work not of one particular era, but of a long series of centuries: a parish was instituted whenever the landowner felt disposed to build a church and found a benefice for the religious instruction of his tenants.

"This furnishes a satisfactory reason for the singular forms and unequal extent of English parishes. Whenever a benefice was instituted by the owner of the soil, the limits of his private estate became the boundaries of the newly-created parish. Hence our manorial and parochial boundaries are in general found to be still coincident; and all exceptions to this rule are capable of being accounted for by a reference to the revolutions which have taken place in the state of landed property at various periods subsequently to the endowment of parish churches.

"This account of the origin of parishes is strongly corroborated by an anomaly familiar to all those who have devoted any attention to topographical researches. In every part of the kingdom, parcels of land, insulated and surrounded by other parishes, are to be met with situate at a considerable distance from the parish to which they belong. These anomalies appear to be quite inexplicable upon any other hypothesis than that which has been here put forward to account for the institution of benefices and the origin of tithes. In every reasonable mind they must succeed as effectually as the testimony of existing documents in establishing the conviction, that the endowments of English parish churches were originally derived from the free and spontaneous grants of the owners of estates. These owners endowed the benefices which they founded with the tenth of the produce, not only of their principal estates, but also of such detached parcels of land as happened to lie at a distance from the churches which they had built.

"The extent to which the institution of parishes had proceeded in the southern division of this island at the date of the Domesday survey, is a matter involved in considerable obscurity. The whole number of churches mentioned in that celebrated record amounts to about 1700. But as the precept issued for its execution did not expressly require a return of churches, it leaves room to suspect that, in many instances, these structures were omitted. Hence it has been inferred, that the churches actually inserted in the Norman survey fall considerably short of the number of such structures actually existing in this country at the close of the eleventh century.

"But whatever may have been the number of parish churches built before the conquest, little doubt can be entertained that the greater portion of our parochial benefices are of more recent institution, and owe their endowments to the politic munificence of the early Norman barons or their immediate successors.

"Secure in the possession of the manors which their leader had conferred upon them, and naturalized in their adopted country, the followers of the Conqueror turned their attention to the cultivation of their estates and the civilisation of their vassals. They vied with each other in the beauty and magnificence of the ecclesiastical edifices which, at their own expense, they constructed for the accommodation of their tenants and retainers. Hence parish churches and parsonage houses sprung up on every considerable estate, built and endowed by their owners. Another circumstance operated very powerfully in adding to the number of parish churches endowed during this period. The original grantees of the crown, in many instances, split their extensive manors into minor fragments, which they conferred upon subfeudatories. These subgrantees claimed and exercised, as of common right, the privilege of building churches on the fees which they thus acquired; and to avail themselves of this privilege they were impelled by two motives:—When the subfeudatory built a church upon his own estate, his tenants and domestics were relieved from the inconvenience of resorting for religious purposes to the mother church, lying generally at some distance from them. As long as no church existed in the underfee, the tithes of its produce were demandable by the incumbent of the mother church, who was appointed by the superior lord; but as soon as a church was built and consecrated upon the subfee, it became an independent parish, and the tithes vested in an incumbent nominated by the owner of the property, from the produce of which they accrued. The grantees of mesne manors were thus impelled to build churches on their estates, not only for the convenience and accommodation of their tenants, but frequently for the more interested purpose of securing to themselves the right of nominating the individual entitled to receive the tithes."

The writer introduces various specimens of ancient grants of unquestionable authenticity, which render it clear, that the above is a correct view of the origin of the endowments now attached to ecclesiastical benefices. The lord of a manor, or rather the owner of an estate acquired by a grant from the crown, by descent, or by purchase, erected a church for the accommodation of the inhabitants of the district, who were then his tenants at will, and endowed it with a tenth, or some other proportion, of the whole produce. Hence, the ancient limits of a private estate became the public boundaries of the subsisting parish. The emoluments set aside for the maintenance of an incumbent, made no addition to the burdens already pressing upon the occupiers, as they formed in fact a deduction from that portion of the surplus produce, which would otherwise have fallen to the share of the owner, under the denomination of rent.

"Assuming," he proceeds, "this representation of the origin of ecclesiastical endowments to be correct, it necessarily follows, that the advantages which the inhabitants of a parish derive in a religious, moral, social, or political view, from the discharge of the ecclesiastical functions ordained by the state, were originally a gratuitous boon conferred upon them by the proprietor of the estate who first built a church, and endowed it with tithes. The funds now expended in maintaining these institutions are the proceeds of his bounty. He might, had he thought proper, have devised to his heir the whole surplus produce received from his estate as rent, undiminished by a claim on account of tithes. But such was not his pleasure. On the contrary, he bequeathed his landed property to his eldest son, encumbered and charged with a provision for securing, on a permanent foundation, the religious and moral instruction of its occupiers. It appears, from the language of one of the ancient grants already transcribed, that the heir at law was actually consulted as to the intended alienation: it is indeed reasonable to presume, that in this instance the grantor was only tenant for life, and that, therefore, the consent of his son and heir was necessary, in order to render the deed of endowment valid. It is surely both reasonable and lawful that every man should be at liberty to do what he likes with his own, provided 'what he likes' be not injurious to the rights and interests of others; and it will be difficult to point out a 'reason' which should debar the lay owner of an estate from setting aside any portion of its produce for the purpose of instructing its occupiers in the duties of religion and morality, until it can be proved that such an object is repugnant to the interest and welfare of society: and when an individual has actually, and for ever, thus alienated any portion of the produce of his estate, it is extremely difficult to comprehend on what grounds his descendants, much less those who have subsequently purchased his property, or their tenants, can represent themselves as bearing any part of this burden. The founder and endower of a rectory, reserving to himself and his representatives the privilege of presenting to the benefice when vacant, conferred upon the parishioners a right to require the appointment of an individual to the living properly qualified to discharge the ecclesiastical duties of the parish: but the emoluments derived from this endowment do not come from the pockets of the parishioners,—they are a portion of the surplus produce of the estate, which, before the endowment of the rectory, belonged to the owner, and were received by him as rent, and which, from the moment of their appropriation to ecclesiastical purpose, ceased to be his property.

"Those who maintain, that the whole of our ecclesiastical revenues are the property of the state, and may therefore be diminished, annihilated, or dealt with according to the pleasure of the legislature, ask us, 'What can be the meaning of the phrase, that tithes neither are, nor ever were, the property of the state? or that the right to these, especially clerical tithes, was probably, too, established on a basis of much greater antiquity than the property of any landed estate in the kingdom? Assuredly it is not meant to say that the state, that is, the community at large, or any individual under the protection of the legislature, never had a right to do with the land itself, or the whole produce of it, whatever they deemed proper.' It will not, surely, be maintained that there never was a time when Christian clergy were not known in this kingdom, and when, of course, no title could have been appropriated for their support? If this position cannot be denied, what can be the meaning of saying, that the tithes did not belong to the state? What other power than the legislative authority could have appropriated tithes to the clergy? And if it was not under the power of the legislature, by what right could the clergy acquire it? If the whole of the property once belonged to the state, or to those to whom the state had assigned it, must not the tithes, which was only a part of the whole, have belonged to it?"

"It may be admitted that the premises put forward in the above extract are true; that at some remote period, all the land of this country 'may have once belonged to the state; or, in order to render the expression intelligible, may have been occupied in common by all the members of the community;—that, by division and allotment, this land gradually ceased to be common, and passed into the hands of individual owners as private property; and that these individuals had, under the protection of the legislature, a right to do with the land itself, with the whole produce of it, or with any part of this produce, whatever they deemed proper.' But granting these premises to be well founded, they will not bear out the inference which is drawn from them—that 'ecclesiastical revenues are the property of the state.' Indeed, they seem all to bear the contrary way. If the individuals into whose hands the land originally passed in a state of severality, had, under the protection of the legislature, a right to dispose of the whole of its surplus produce at their own discretion, I would beg leave to ask, whether the same individuals, the same assignees of the state, had no right to do with a part of this whole 'whatever they deemed proper?'—to confer a tenth, or any other proportion of it, as an endowment upon parish churches founded by them? That they possessed such a right cannot be questioned. Before the institution of each parish, the owner of the land now included within its limits had the whole of the soil vested in himself as private property. (On every principle of natural equity, he could, had he so thought proper, have conferred the whole surplus produce of his land, or, in other words, the fee-simple of his estate, upon the church as an endowment. Hence it appears, that the reasoning advanced to prove that tithes are public property, furnishes the very strongest ground upon which the holder of any species of property can rest his title: instead of invalidating the right to tithes, it establishes this right beyond all cavil and dispute. The opponents of tithes admit that the owners of the estates which now constitute parishes, had a legal as well as moral right to dispose of the whole net revenue of their land according to their own discretion: they appear, therefore, singularly inconsistent when they deny these landowners the right of endowing the benefices which they founded with a tenth part of the produce."

It must, no doubt, be admitted, that in the greater number of cases, the original documents by which the lords of manors conferred upon the churches which they built the tithes of their estates, cannot now be actually produced; but the absence of this direct proof, rendered unavoidable by the lapse of nine or ten centuries, will by no means invalidate the reasonable presumption, that in most parishes the right to these endowments was originally acquired in the manner stated by this writer. It is a well-known maxim of law, suggested by common sense, and confirmed by every principle of equity, to infer that a civil right, which has been enjoyed without interruption for a long series of years, must have originated in some express agreement or grant, although the original conveyance be not now actually forthcoming. The law, in this case, creates what is called a title by prescription, and assumes that a right actually enjoyed was originally acquired under a legal instrument, which has disappeared in a manner of which no account can now be given.

"Every candid individual must acknowledge that the same equitable principle will establish, on the firmest grounds, the right of ecclesiastics to the incomes accruing from the endowments of the benefices which they hold. It is, beyond all comparison, the most ancient title to property which now exists: in many instances, its origin in particular parishes may be traced to ancient records, which, having escaped the ravages of time, still subsist; and in all other cases, the actual assertion of this right can be traced back to a period of antiquity so remote, that we are entitled to rest it upon the fair and equitable presumption, that it was originally derived from the voluntary act of the owners of the land which continues subject to the payment of tithes. From the language and tenor of the ancient records, which are to be met with in our public repositories, it seems extremely probable that, in the instance of all the parochial benefices founded subsequently to the Norman conquest, each church was, on its consecration by the bishop, formally and legally endowed with the tithes of the parish by a written deed, executed by the owner of the land; and it also appears that, where the estate was entailed, the heir was found to concur with the actual possessor in the execution of this conveyance. It is, no doubt, possible, that in some instances this claim may have been originally introduced by the gradual influence of custom, acquiesced in by the piety, or, as the adversaries of the church would perhaps say, by the superstition, of our ancestors; but, although this should be conceded, still the right of a parochial incumbent to the income of his benefice will stand upon grounds equally firm in the eye of reason and law, as if it were derived from an express and voluntary grant; for, whatever may have been its origin, the exercise of such a right, acquiesced in for a number of centuries, commits no wrong whatever upon the individual now seised of property subject to this claim, but who has acquired it subsequently to the imposition of the burden with which it remains charged.

"In whatever manner we suppose the church to have become originally entitled to a tenth of the produce of the soil, it can make no difference with respect to the pressure of this charge at the present time; for it is indisputable that the whole real property of the country has frequently changed hands, since the payment of tithes was finally recognised by the laws as a burden upon land. If it be assumed that the tenth part of the produce of the soil became, in the first instance, appropriated to ecclesiastical purposes, not by an immediate and express grant from the owner of the freehold, but by the gradual operation of custom, which is the origin and substance of our common law, the effect is still the same. The owner of the land, at the period when this custom was in the first instance introduced, did, no doubt, find the value of his property affected by its operation—by the pressure of such a novel charge upon his land; but those who have succeeded him in his possessions, either by inheritance or by purchase, cannot properly be said to bear any part of this burden. The onus of tithes having been once permanently fixed, all the landed property of the country has descended to, or been purchased by, its present owners, subject to this charge; and on every transfer of this species of property, its selling price was reduced in proportion to the permanent charge to which it is subject.

"As soon as this arrangement was carried into effect, it is clear, that the rent which the owner of this property, unencumbered with a charge for tithes, previously received from its occupiers, must have sustained a diminution proportioned to the amount of the claim which the incumbent had acquired. The cultivator, yielding the tithe of his crops to the ecclesiastical proprietor, deducted this charge from the amount of the rent, which he would otherwise have been called upon to pay to the landowner. It becomes, therefore, manifest, that the endowment of a benefice with the tenth part of the produce of land made no addition whatever to the whole surplus or rent exacted from the occupier."

Whatever obscurity may therefore hang over the manner in which the practice of paying tithes was first introduced into this island—whether it originated in a voluntary grant from the owners of the soil, or in the gradual influence of custom acquiesced in by the proprietors of the land now subject to this payment—still there can be no difficulty in proving that the introduction of tithes cannot be ascribed to an act of the legislature. In the oldest parliamentary records which the industry of antiquarians has brought to light, no trace can be discovered of the origin of this charge upon land. The earliest acts of the legislature, which refer to tithes, do not treat them as a novel demand, but as an old and well-known burden already recognised by ancient and immemorial usage. It is no doubt true, that at various periods the legislature has interfered, either to regulate or enforce the payment of tithes, as already due of common right; but no instance can be adduced in which it has undertaken to create a right to this species of revenue, where it did not previously exist; which proves that this burden was not originally imposed upon land by the authority of Parliament.

Precisely on the same principle has the legislature dealt with rent; it has frequently come to the aid of the landlord, where the common law had been partially found deficient in the means of enforcing the payment of rent; but it has never interfered—nor can it, without an usurpation of power which does not belong to its constitutional functions, interfere—with the amount of rent which the proprietor may demand for his land. This is a point with which the legislature does not presume to meddle; it is left to be arranged between the owner and the occupier; but the amount having been fixed by the voluntary agreement of the parties interested, the legislature then steps in to ratify the contract, and enforce its due performance.

It would be evidently absurd to make this interference on the part of the legislature, the ground of contending that rent is a tax levied upon land by the authority of Parliament; or that acts of Parliament which give landowners the means of enforcing the payment of rent when withheld by the occupiers, constitute the foundation of their right to that species of revenue.

“In like manner, there is no pretence for alleging that tithes originated in any act of the legislature. Parliament did not impose this burden upon land; but, finding it already subsisting as a charge laid upon real property by the voluntary act of the owners of the soil, it has in this, as in the instance of rent just mentioned, stepped forward to assist those who are entitled to tithes in the effectual enforcement of their lawful claim. There exists, therefore, no ground for maintaining, that tithes originated in the acts of Parliament which have from time to time been passed to enforce the due payment of this charge upon land.

“This view of the origin of ecclesiastical endowments will at once dispose of the opinion of those persons, who represent tithes as a charge upon the produce of land similar to a tax imposed by the legislature, and who assume that, as Parliament is acknowledged to be constitutionally invested with authority either to modify or remit a tax imposed upon articles of consumption, it possesses, on similar grounds, the power either of abolishing tithes altogether, or of limiting the extent to which they shall be levied. It must, however, be seen in an instant, that no analogy whatever exists between the authority of Parliament over a tax, and its power over that portion of the produce of land which was set aside for the support of an ecclesiastical establishment. Between tithes and a tax there are various and essential distinctions, which invest Parliament with authority over the latter, which it cannot constitutionally exercise over the former. A tax is imposed by the legislature in the first instance; what Parliament has the right to impose upon the nation, it has, therefore, the power to modify or remove. When a tax has been laid on by the legislature, the same body, as guardian of the public purse, is in effect the party which receives the impost; what it is entitled to receive, it must necessarily possess the power to remit at its pleasure. But it is far otherwise with respect to tithes; to the receipt of these the government of this country has not, nor ever had, the least claim. They still are, as they ever were, the inalienable property of a third party. No power, therefore, without an absolute subversion of the most sacred principle of equity as well as of a fundamental article of the British constitution—an uniform and inflexible maintenance of the private rights of individuals—can surrender the minutest portion of that property which is not its own.

“If the opponents of ecclesiastical endowments should be able even to prove that tithes constitute a tax originally imposed upon land by the authority of the legislature, they will be as far as ever from the object which they wish to accomplish. If this charge must be termed a tax, it falls, like the land tax, upon the net revenue derived from land, and not upon the commodities which the land produces—that is to say, its effect is to diminish rent, and not to enhance the price of provisions. No man will argue, that the abolition of the land tax would yield a benefit to any member of the community except the owner of the land; or that the repeal of that impost would have the slightest effect upon the selling price of the produce grown upon the land which is now subject to this charge; its extinction would merely enable the landed proprietor to put into his own pocket the amount which he now pays to the exchequer in the form of a land tax. To the extinction of this burden upon his estate the present owner can prefer no claim; it was imposed before the land came into his possession; and the price paid for it by the first purchaser, after the imposition of the tax, was diminished in proportion to the amount of this charge.

“Between tithes and a tax imposed upon articles of consumption there is also the following broad and palpable distinction: A tax is levied upon every member of the community in proportion to the quantity of the taxed commodity which he consumes. Hence the relief derivable from the abolition of a tax would fall to the share of each individual in proportion to his expenditure. But as tithes fall solely upon the net revenue accruing from land, the abolition of this impost, tax, or rent charge, (call it what you please, for the term applied to it will not affect its nature,) would merely serve to augment the rent of land from which it now forms a deduction; and in no respect diminish the price of agricultural produce to the general consumer. If there be, therefore, any persons who insist upon being allowed to call tithes a tax, let them at the same time remember, that they fall exclusively upon the net revenue or rent of land; and that from the abolition of this burden and the consequent annihilation of the advantages which the public is acknowledged to derive from an ecclesiastical establishment, the only class who could expect to reap the smallest profit, even in a pecuniary sense, are the owners of landed property.

“But it matters little in what manner tithes were originally introduced into this country. Whether they were, in the first instance, conferred upon parochial benefices by the spontaneous liberality of individual landowners who built churches upon their estates, and endowed them with a tenth of the produce of their land; or gradually acquired by the force of a custom tacitly acquiesced in by the public, and solemnly recognised by repeated acts of those authorities in which is constitutionally vested the power of legislating for the nation;—these are points which it does not appear of vital importance to ascertain. The right to tithes may very safely be made to rest upon one broad fact, which cannot be controverted; no man will dispute that the right of the incumbents of ecclesiastical benefices to exact the tenth of the produce of land protected by no special exemption, has been uninterruptedly recognised by the law and customs of this country. It is not a dormant right, to be found only in books and records, but a right which has been acted on for ages, and which continues to be daily enforced in practice. Whatever theory may be adopted with respect to the origin of this charge upon the net revenue of land, it is indisputable that it had been universally recognised in practice, and expressly sanctioned by law, at a period of far greater antiquity than the oldest titles which the owners of any lay property can produce. It may therefore be assumed as a conclusion, which no reasoning or historical investigation can shake, that, for five centuries at the least, every acre of land which remains titheable in this kingdom has been inherited, purchased, or let, subject to this charge.”

But admitting that tithes were originally derived, as we have represented, from the voluntary liberality of the owners of land, it is sometimes contended, that under the peculiar circumstances attached to the present mode of cultivating farms in England, the exaction of the full tenth of the whole gross produce of land subject to tithes, is an unfair and unwarrantable extension of the claim which the founder of the benefice conferred upon its incumbent; it is argued, that on equitable grounds the tithe-owner is entitled to exact the tenth part of the natural produce of the soil only, and not a tenth part of the artificial produce of land, in the cultivation of which the occupier has expended a large capital. Some persons who concede that the tithe-proprietor is fairly entitled to a tenth of the produce yielded by land in an unimproved state, still deny that he can justly claim an equal proportion of the produce of land which has been improved by an expensive process of tillage. Let it be supposed that a farmer expends £20 in preparing an acre of land for the growth of hops, and that the produce of this acre, which as grass land would not in the whole be worth more than L.5, should sell for L.30 :—is it, ask these reasoners, fair and equitable, that in the case hypothetically put, the tithe-owner should claim the tenth of L.30, the value of the improved produce, instead of being satisfied with the tenth of L.5, the value of the ordinary produce ?

“ In considering this question,” says this writer, whose words we shall again take the liberty of borrowing, “ it must be remembered, that the point to be decided is, not whether the landlord would obtain a larger revenue—of this there can be no doubt—but whether the profits of the capital employed in tillage would be increased by reducing the claims of the tithe-owner. It is indeed certain, that, as to the amount of rent, the reduction of the claim for tithes would prove an advantage to the landlord : but it appears almost equally certain, that, so far as regards the profits of the occupier, no permanent effect would be produced by this restriction. The net profits of the capital employed by the occupier of land in the production of the most expensive and valuable crops that are ever grown, would not be increased permanently, even by a total abolition of tithes, much less would they be affected by a partial reduction of their amount. The reasons upon which this opinion is grounded may be shortly stated ; and if they be admitted to hold good with respect to the most expensive crops—to hops, for instance—they must be equally conclusive with regard to all capital laid out in preparing land for the growth of any other species of agricultural production. It is an acknowledged axiom in political economy, and sanctioned by common sense, that, in every country where capital has a free circulation, the profits accruing from different branches of industry cannot, for a period of any duration, vary in amount. If capital, in a given average of years, should make a larger return of profits in one branch of agriculture or commerce than in another, a portion of it will naturally and unavoidably flow from the less lucrative channel into that which is more profitable, until the rate of profits, in every branch of public industry, become at length equalized. Applying this axiom to the produce of a hop-ground, let us consider whether the partial reduction, or even the abolition, of tithes would augment the profits of the capital employed in producing hops. Assume that the produce of an acre of hops sells for L.30.—in this case the tithe-owner’s claim would amount to L.3 ; it is, however, clear, that, notwithstanding this charge, the crop must return a fair average of profits for the capital expended in its production ; otherwise the farmer would discontinue the cultivation of hops, and transfer his capital to some other undertaking where his profits would be higher ; for it is hardly conceivable that any man would persevere in cultivating hops if he could derive better returns from his capital by growing wheat. On the contrary, if the L.3, paid as tithes for an acre of hops, ceased to be exacted by the tithe-owner, the profits accruing from the produce would exceed the average rate of profits in other branches of industry—more capital would be attracted to the cultivation of hops, or a higher rent would be exacted by the landlord, and the profits of the grower would, in consequence, fall to the level of the general average of the rate of profits.

“ It may perhaps be objected to this representation of the effect which tithes have upon the profits of capital embarked in agriculture, that when a farmer rents land in a bad state of cultivation, with the intention of incurring an extraordinary expense in improving it, he obtains a lease from the landowner, which secures to him exclusively, for a definite and certain time, the whole profits of the capital expended on the land ; but that the claims of the tithe-owner, being put in force from year to year, absorb a portion of the produce which the landlord could not reach, and which would, therefore, fall to the share of the occupier in the form of augmented profits on the capital which he had embarked in agriculture. But when the occupier is said to reap exclusively the returns of the capital expended by him in the improvement of land held under lease, his real advantages are considerably overstated. When a landowner proposes to let a farm on lease, the basis on which the rent is calculated is not the produce of the land in its natural or untilled state, but the produce which it will, on the average, yield when a given amount of capital or labour has been laid out in its improvement. The landlord in effect addresses his tenant thus :—‘ I have one hundred acres of land which I propose to let for a term of twenty-one years—in its present unimproved state it cannot yield, as a net revenue or rent, more than 10s. per acre ; but if a capital of L.1000 be laid out in improving it, the augmented produce will return to the occupier a fair profit on the amount of his outlay ; and at the same time enable him to pay 20s. per acre as rent ; if you, therefore, are not both able and willing to lay out such amount of capital in the improvement of my farm, I must look out for another tenant possessing the means requisite for its cultivation, and who will, in consequence, be able to pay me the rent which I am fairly entitled to expect from my land.’

“ Indeed, every discreet landlord takes care to ascertain that the tenant who hires his land is able to advance the capital required for its proper tillage; nor is it by any means unusual that where a lease is granted, the amount of this capital should be expressly specified, and the manner of expending it particularly defined.

"Let the subject be twisted how it may—place it in whatever view or light the reader pleases, the conviction will still force itself upon every candid and reflecting mind, that neither the partial reduction nor the total abolition of tithes would, under any conceivable circumstances, augment permanently the average profits of capital embarked in agriculture. If a claim for tithes ceased to exist, to the rent previously paid to the landlord would be added unavoidably and universally the full money value of the tenth portion of the average crop, which the land, when improved by the outlay of the necessary capital, would produce."

This is a point in the discussion respecting the true pressure of tithes, which particularly deserves the attention of the actual cultivators of the soil: who are too frequently taught to believe that they are the parties principally if not exclusively aggrieved by this exaction. If, however, they reflect upon this matter calmly and dispassionately, they will, we are convinced, perceive, that to them no real advantage could accrue from the extinction of the claims of the tithe-owner. The profit derivable from such a change would (at least at the expiration of the subsisting leases) fall entirely to the share of the landlords. The occupying farmers possess ample means of judging whether this opinion be well founded. In this part of the island tithes have been for a long time virtually abolished: that is to say, a limit has been permanently fixed beyond which this claim upon the produce of land cannot be pushed. In England, also, a very considerable extent of land (under the operation of modusses or other legal exemption, or under exclusive acts assigning land in lieu of tithes) is, in effect, tithe-free. We would, therefore, request the occupiers of land to enquire into the practical effect of this exemption: we shall acknowledge ourselves greatly in error if they make it clear to us that persons who as tenants cultivate land thus freed from tithes, derive from their capital a larger return of profit than their neighbours who hold farms which are subject to this burden. As far as the interests of the occupying farmer are concerned, we are convinced that the whole enquiry resolves itself into the simple question of paying the same amount to two instead of one landlord. The actual farmer would, we dare say, prefer keeping in his own pocket the annual amount which he now pays the tithe-owner; but this he never can accomplish: this portion of the produce, or an equivalent for it in money, must and will be exacted from him by somebody: by the tithe-owner, under the present system—by the landowner, if this system were to cease. As far, therefore, as the interests of the class of persons who hire land are implicated, the sole question is, whether, even in a mere temporal view, it would be more accordant with public policy, that the emoluments attached to a parochial benefice should be received by an individual residing in or near the spot from which they accrue, or that they should be added to the already ample revenues of the landowners.

With the view of counteracting the exaggerated statements of those who labour to undermine the Church of England, various statistical details are given in this publication, shewing in a manner which cannot be controverted, that even admitting the clergy to be as they are sometimes represented, a body of functionaries, paid by the public, still the average amount of their incomes can scarcely be said to exceed the scantiest remuneration with which the most penurious financier might be willing to reward them for their services. The author then presents an estimate of the professional incomes of the English clergy: it appears to us to come as near the truth as the nature of such an attempt will permit. Together with the summary result of his calculations and enquiries, he has given the data on which his estimate has been formed. The reader is furnished with the ready means of detecting and correcting any mistakes into which he may have fallen.

From his calculation, it appears that the aggregate revenues of the English parochial clergy amount to £3,447,138: which being divided by 11,342, (the actual number of benefices in England and Wales,) gives in the average about L.300 as the annual income of each incumbent.

The estimate of the average income annually accruing from an English benefice, is followed by a calculation of the expenditure usually incurred in acquiring the qualifications required in an ecclesiastical for the due discharge of his professional functions. It is assumed that a sum, which seldom falls short of L.800, has been expended upon the education of every candidate for orders by the time he has completed his twenty-third year: and further, that taking the average of ecclesiastical promotions, he cannot expect preferment until he has been at least seven years in orders.

"If to the principal thus expended in educating a young person for the ministry, its interest for seven years be added, the total will amount to about L.1100. Hence it appears clear, that at the earliest moment in which an ecclesiastical stands an average chance of obtaining preferment worth L.300 per annum, a capital amounting to no less than L.1100 has been laid out in preparing him for the discharge of his official functions. If a man at the age of 30 laid out L.1100 in the purchase of a life annuity, it would buy him an income of about L.90 per annum; which being deducted from L.300, leaves a balance of L.210 as the pecuniary compensation which clergymen, on the average, receive for their professional services. The state thus enjoys the labour of between eleven and twelve thousand well-educated individuals, whose province it is to instruct the population of this country in the duties which they owe to God and to society; and as a recompense for the devotion of their time and talents exclusively to this object, they do not, on the average, receive more than L.210 per annum! This is, in truth, the revenue which excites the spleen of those who are inimical to our ecclesiastical establishment; and who exaggerate beyond all bounds the amount of the revenues set apart for the maintenance of the clergy, with the secret or avowed design of weakening the attachment which the people of this realm have hitherto cherished towards the ecclesiastical institutions ordained by the state."

Neither should it be forgotten, that the most numerous, and (what is still of more importance, with a reference to any proposed scheme of altering the church establishment) by far the most valuable portion of the ecclesiastical preferments of England, are the private property of lay patrons, in whom these advowsons have become vested either by descent or purchase. There are in the patronage of the Crown, bishops, capitular, and other public bodies, 1723 rectories, containing 4,637,508 acres;

tithes at 3s. 6d. per acre,	.	L.811,563

In the gift of private patrons there are:—

Total annual value of private benefices	.	L.2,084,043
---	---	--------------------

It thus appears, that the revenues of private benefices very nearly double the amount of the income annually derived from public endowments. It is perfectly well known, that this is a species of property which sells for nearly as much as a freehold yielding an income of equal amount: a benefice of a thousand per annum realizing to the seller nearly as much as an estate of the like value.

"Hence it may very truly be asserted, with reference to at least a very large proportion of the whole body of English ecclesiastics, that, combining the expense of their education with the capital sunk in purchasing the livings which they hold, they make a sacrifice of time, labour, and talents, in promoting the good of the public, for which, in a pecuniary view, they receive little or no compensation. Let us suppose that a gentleman has two sons, to each of whom he intends giving twenty thousand pounds; one he educates for the bar, and the other for the church. The portion of the ecclesiastic is vested in the purchase of an advowson, which yields him an income of one thousand pounds per annum; with his patrimony the lawyer purchases an estate, from which he derives an annual return of nearly equal amount. In this case a thousand pounds is the whole annual income of the ecclesiastic; and it is an income accruing principally from the capital which he has advanced; and but in a very trifling, if in any, degree as a reward or compensation for his professional services. His lay-brother derives an equal, or very nearly an equal, income from the estate which he has purchased; and to this he may add as much as his talents and industry in his own profession may enable him to acquire. It is difficult, therefore, to point out an individual who makes a greater sacrifice than an ecclesiastic who purchases an advowson, and conscientiously devotes his time and talents to the due discharge of his professional functions. If he laid out his money in the acquisition of any other species of property, he could hardly fail to derive from it an income of equal amount; and to this might be added the emoluments arising from any other pursuit to which he might choose to devote himself. The time, the industry, and talents of the lawyer or physician are rewarded with a pecuniary compensation proportionate to the reputation and practice which each respectively enjoys; but the time, the talents, and exertions of an ecclesiastic, who holds a purchased living, are conferred, in most cases, gratuitously upon the public. From his professional services he derives but the most trifling, if indeed he derive any, pecuniary advantage; the income of his benefice being seldom more than a fair return of interest for the capital expended in the purchase of the advowson.

“Those who labour to generate and foster feelings of hostility towards the civil as well as ecclesiastical institutions of the country, are found on all occasions to hold up the clergy of the established church—not as in truth they are—men faithfully discharging important duties, attached to the property which they enjoy in their respective parishes, and which, subject to the conditions on which it is held, is as much their own as a private estate is the property of its lay owner—but as men who consume an inordinate proportion of wealth which belongs to the public, and which it is therefore inferred the public has a right to resume at its pleasure. But I appeal to every honest and honourable Englishman, and fearlessly ask, whether such a representation be just—whether ecclesiastics, who enjoy incomes derived from a portion of the net revenue of land, set aside for specific purposes by its original owners, can be described as the consumers of public property in any other sense than the opulent proprietor of Holkham may be said to consume national wealth?”

Largely as we have already transcribed from the contents of this clear and seasonable publication, we shall venture to conclude with another extract, which we recommend to the candid perusal of all those classes who, being neither proprietors nor occupiers of land, may have been deluded into the belief that any profit or advantage would accrue to them from the confiscation and secularization of ecclesiastical revenues.

“It cannot surely, with any appearance of justice, be represented as inimical to the interests of the public, that a moderate portion of the net revenue accruing from land should pass from hand to hand, and be enjoyed, subject to the discharge of specified ecclesiastical services. If the incumbent of a parish performed no duty, never resided upon his benefice, never appeared among his parishioners—even under these circumstances, he would not stand in a more injurious position, either with respect to his parishioners or the community at large, than the lay landlord into whose pockets this ecclesiastical income would fall on the abolition of tithes. But if, as is generally, and always ought to be, the case, (for the question must not be argued on the abuse, but the proper use, of ecclesiastical endowments,) the incumbent should reside upon his benefice, should expend his income among his parishioners, and devote his time and talents to their instruction and improvement, it must be more advantageous, not only to the inhabitants of each parish, but also to the public, that an ecclesiastic so discharging the functions of his office, should receive the value of the tithes, than that it should be added to the rental of the landowners.

“In all the views of receipt, expenditure, and personal employment,” says Burke, “a sober legislator would carefully compare the possessor whom he was recommended to strip of his property, with the stranger who was proposed to fill his place. Before the inconveniencies are incurred which must attend all violent revolutions in property, through extensive confiscation, we ought to have some rational assurance, that the purchasers of the confiscated property will be in a considerable degree more laborious, more virtuous, more sober, less disposed to extort an unreasonable proportion of the gains of the labourer, or to consume on themselves a larger share than is fit for the measure of an individual, or that they should be qualified to dispense the surplus in a more steady and equal mode, so as to answer the purposes of a politic expenditure, than the old possessors, call those possessors bishops, deans, canons, prebendaries, rectors, vicars, or what you please.’

“It seems, indeed, by no means easy to comprehend what motives can actuate some of those persons who are found to join in the clamour raised by interested malevolence, upon the subject of ecclesiastical endowments. That among the owners of the soil, some individuals should receive, without disapprobation, a proposal for curtailing, or perhaps for abolishing, ecclesiastical revenues, is a circumstance calculated to excite regret rather than surprise; for in every numerous body of men, however respectable, honourable, and upright as a whole, individuals will be found in whom a feeling of immediate interest is able to stifle the sense of honesty or public policy; but why persons, who, under no possible combination of circumstances, could derive the slightest advantage, either pecuniary or political, from such an act of spoliation,—why English citizens who are interested neither in the property nor in the cultivation of the soil,—why the commercial, the manufacturing, and operative classes should join in the clamour against ecclesiastical endowments, whenever it may suit the views of selfish or unprincipled demagogues to raise it, cannot be explained on the ordinary principles which regulate human conduct. If the sequestration and secularization of these endowments could indeed yield the most trifling advantage to any one of the individuals composing these several classes,—if such a measure held out the prospect of increasing the wages of the labourer, or the profits of his employer, or adding to the weight of bread which either of them could purchase for sixpence,—their motives would appear at least intelligible; but as they could derive no such benefit from the measure here contemplated, it seems somewhat difficult to account for the eagerness which some of them occasionally evince, when it is proposed to wrest from a man who wears a black coat property which he holds under a grant from some previous owner of the soil, and transfer it, not into their own possession, but into that of another man whose coat happens to be brown or blue.

“Whatever appetite the weavers of Manchester, the cutlers of Birmingham, or the miners of Newcastle, may have for the endowments of the English establishment, they should be reminded that this property is placed at least beyond their reach. They may concur and assist in perpetrating this act of spoliation,—they may allow themselves to become active tools in the hands of designing persons, eager to deprive the church of the endowments conferred upon parochial benefices by their munificent founders. But from this act of plunder, no pecuniary benefit could accrue to them; the whole profit would pass by them, and fall exclusively to the share of the landowner, whom it would enable to add the amount, now paid as a composition for the tithes of an acre of land, to the sum which he receives already as a rent.”

PART II.

A GENERAL ELECTION.

WE find it impossible to resist the influence which the approach of a General Election exercises over public attention, and we must therefore endeavour to make the best use of our submission to it. Nothing could be conceived more momentous than the objects and consequences of such an election, or more curious than its process; and a glance at them may be made, by the simple exercise of reason and honesty, to yield a most salutary lesson. We confess we are not over sanguine on this point, because we are not sure that reason and honesty have any existence during an election; but we will write, as we have too often done already, against hope.

The electors, in forming a new House of Commons, select a body of men, who, for seven years, are to hold boundless authority over the greatest empire in the universe,—an empire not more distinguished by its magnitude, than by its peculiarities of situation and population, and the multiplicity, complexity, and discordance of its interests. These men are in real power above both the Crown and the Cabinet; they can practically govern the King in the choice of the Ministry, and the Ministry in the choice of its policy and measures. They are equally above the community; they can protect the Executive from its influence, and render it powerless in every thing save open rebellion. All laws and institutions, all collective and individual possessions, are at their mercy.

If they make themselves the tools of the Government, they invest it with actual despotism, more unlimited than that of any absolute monarch; if they become the followers of innovators and demagogues, they can by law fill the empire with the evils of revolution. By one act they can smite the Constitution or public freedom; and by another, they can create war, or subject property and bread to virtual confiscation.

In the regular and necessary discharge of their duties, these men, by their opposition or subserviency, regulate the Government in its general conduct. They sit in judgment on its policy and measures,—on all its acts; therefore it shapes the latter accordingly. From them it takes its character. The public purse is under their management. It is to them that the community and individual must look for the removal of evils, and the redress of wrongs. They are continually employed in making and abolishing laws which bear vitally on right, privilege, and liberty, on institutions—on the rich man's wealth, and the poor man's necessities; in this the largest share of knowledge and wisdom will barely suffice for enabling them to act correctly. By honest indolence, or well-intentioned toil, they may easily plunge the empire into calamity and misery. They are not only declared to be omnipotent, but their omnipotence is constantly occupied in placing national and individual interests under regulation, experiment, and hazard.

These men, as a body, enjoy privileges for their protection, which amount to the most odious tyranny. Their privileges not only make them the accusers, witnesses, and judges, in their own cause, but empower them to extort from the accused party evidence of his own criminality. Thus, in what they may assert to be offences against themselves, they can set aside law, trial by jury, and evidence, and punish at pleasure. Of course, however unjust and destructive their general conduct may be, they can easily, so far as concerns it, extinguish the press and public opinion, and place it above animadversion and moral control.

In general, men who exercise delegated power in a body, have a deep personal interest in labouring to act wisely and uprightly; they are, in loss and profit, fame and disgrace, circumstanced much like an individual. But the case is the reverse with those who form the House of Commons. The heads of this House make the public interest subservient to their own; they are continually impelled, by passion, prejudice, and private gain, to attempt inroads on the weal of the empire; and they carry the rest with them not only as disciples, but as mercenaries. While the mass of the members have, on the one hand, little to incite them to the conscientious discharge of duty, they have, on the other, the most potent temptations to its neglect and violation. The influence, and even direct authority, of patrons, party feelings, and bonds, bribes, and the fear of loss, operate on the side of wrong almost without counterpoise. With regard to reputation, it is to the House, both collectively and individually, a matter of trivial moment. Responsibility for its conduct falls on the House in its abstract corporate character, but extends not to the men who compose it; and it is not of sufficient magnitude to have any influence. Houses of Commons are held to be about equally wise and pure; the proper distinction is not drawn between the good and the bad ones; and they are looked at as something rather combined with, and subordinate to, the Ministry, than separate and independent. The members severally are not made accountable for the acts of the House; the men whose profligacy constitutes its own, know that it will bear the blame, and they will be held guiltless. Its deeds are like those of the populace; no one commits them, or feels that he is affected by their character. Thus, in the aggregate, and individually, the House of Commons is scarcely reached by the salutary influence of the world's opinion.

Such is the case, speaking generally; but the electors at this moment have not only the nature of things, and history, but the most grievous wrongs and sufferings, to deter them from an improper choice. The House of Commons now happily passing to the tomb, took a course which placed it in revolting contrast to former ones, and rendered its misdeeds as incapable of being overlooked as of being palliated, or ascribed to any parent but itself. When it passed the Catholic Bill, it made a vital change in the constitution; and in doing this, it audaciously trampled on national feeling and constitutional principle: it not only disobeyed the voice of the community, but cast on it every insult. A large part of its members, in profligate defiance of the sentiments of their constituents, violated the most solemn pledges that man could give, to commit a most perilous breach of trust: they wantonly made themselves both apostates and traitors, to deprive, in the hour of danger and necessity, those they represented of both freedom and right; and it was abundantly obvious that many of them acted from motives equally corrupt and despicable. Whatever might be the character of the measure, the House, in passing it, displayed every thing which patriotism and virtue denounce and abhor.

This House at its birth found the community involved in intolerable suffering, and while it, on the one hand, refused enquiry and remedy, it, on the other, zealously protected and enlarged the sources of the suffering. It religiously adhered to the conduct it commenced with to the last. The term of its existence formed one of loss, bankruptcy, want, and misery, without example in English history; yet not a solitary instance can be found in it in which the House listened to the prayers of the nation, investigated, or attempted to restore prosperity. It stands an appalling narrative of fearful decline and wretchedness in regard to the empire; and of flinty disdain of humble petitions, obstinate defiance of public feelings, and attacks on the constitution, pillars of the monarchy, revenue, property, and bread, in respect of the House of Commons.

Amidst public men, fidelity and consistency have been made matters of reproach, and the corrupt abandonment of pledge and faith has been exalted into a cardinal virtue. Thus, the leading restrictions to the discharge of obligation and duty have been replaced with potent temptations to violate them; the elector has lost his securities.

To give to this the utmost capacity for the production of evil, a Ministry is in existence which has exhibited a faithlessness to principle, cause, and party, wholly without parallel, and which employs its gigantic power to aid its example in making such faithlessness general. Instead of maintaining itself, according to honourable precedent, by its own principles and legitimate strength, it does it by adopting any principles which are the prevailing ones, and weakening its opponents through treachery and desertion. Its creed is avowedly a neutral compound, destitute of definition, and capable of bearing any meaning; it dooms the consistent Tory, and the consistent Whig, alike to exclusion; and its favour is only to be gained by the betrayal of either Toryism or Whiggism. The proper division of the two great parties, in regard to both principle and person, enters into the essence, and governs the working, of the Constitution; yet it labours to destroy this division, to make itself lawless. In addition, public men have made it a fashion to disregard the public weal, and look on its sacrifice as a proof of wisdom and desert. From their wretched contests for private gain, it is now, even as a secondary object, excluded; if its promotion on leading points touch their contests, they become unanimous against it. Is some fiction to be acted on, which confessedly will plunge this or that great interest into distress, and take away the bread of hundreds of thousands—where is the public man who will not win fame by supporting it, or at any rate avoid disgrace by neutral-ty? Are these great interests, are millions of souls, is the whole empire struggling with bitter suffering—where is the public man who will commit his reputation by detailing the causes and insisting on remedies? On such petty matters as free beer-shops, change in the sugar-duties, and the abolition of trifling sinecures, public men may venture into disunion and battle, Ministers may be overthrown, and the government may be broken up; but these men must harmoniously shun the infamy of preventing the creation of loss and want, giving food to the starving, extricating vast bodies from bankruptcy, and relieving the whole empire from wretchedness.

A new reign is commencing; the Sovereign, although ripe in years, has yet a public character to form; and thus far, he has given no proof that he sees error in the policy of his servants, or suffering in the condition of his subjects. Amidst his plans of governing, those for calling into action right principles do not appear; amidst his devices for gaining popularity, those for banishing hunger and restoring prosperity cannot be discovered. The House of Commons, about to be chosen, must decide his policy and the character of his reign. It is not impossible that this House will spend part of its existence under a regency of the most unpromising character. The prospect at present is, that the Regent will be weak, ignorant, and capricious from birth and sex—will be from nature and necessity the instrument of faction; and that such a Regent will rule amidst circumstances which will plunge the Royal Family into contention, make even the succession a matter of intrigue and dispute, cause party contests to turn on the most injurious questions, and give power to the most unprincipled of the candidates for it. In such a state of things, the salvation of the empire must rest chiefly on the House of Commons.

From these considerations, and especially the facts, that all interests and classes are enduring great suffering—that the latter has been mainly produced by incapacity in Houses of Commons—that the mass of the population cannot procure a sufficiency of the necessities of life—that the state of this mass is suffering constant declension—and that the hope, not only of present relief, but also of protection from still more fearful distress and calamity, must depend principally on a proper choice; it might naturally be expected that the community would, as one man, see in the Election a thing of the very highest solemnity and moment. It might be regarded as certain, that candidates would only stand on the most exalted qualifications, and electors would only act on the purest motives,—that rich and poor would zealously combine in preventing improper candidates and votes from profaning the sanctity of the hustings.

Alas! reasoning from what ought to be, is just as fallacious here as it is in most of the cases in which it is held to be unerring. Let us now sketch, according to past facts, and present appearances, the reality of a General Election.

Parliament is dissolved, and the community, speaking of it in the aggregate, is in raptures—why?—because an hour of amusement, party conflicts, rioting, lawlessness, and profit, is at hand. One set of people rejoice because there will be a gaudy show,—a stirring spectacle; because there will be ribbons and colours, music and processions, broken windows and the battles of mobs, to delight them. These people have no vote, and they have no business which the election can benefit; nevertheless, they have as deep a stake in the matter as those who have; therefore are they not anxious that the most fitting men may be elected? Absurd! such anxiety could not perhaps be gratified, unless the exhibition were stripped of its leading beauties, if not wholly prevented: they are so far from entertaining it, that if they were called on to choose between the loss of the sights, and the expulsion of the very best members, by the election of the very worst; they would prefer the latter. They have their partialities and antipathies, but these are minor matters which must bow to the wish for a contest.

Another set of people, who are in trade, and whose sight never wanders from the shrine of profit and loss, rejoice because their business is on the point of receiving “a fil-lip.” The mercer sees before him an animated demand for ribbons and handkerchiefs at his own prices—the glazier beholds a brilliant harvest of broken windows—overwhelming calls for ale, spirits, wine, and post-horses bewitch the eyes of the publican and innkeeper—and silk manufacturers, glass-makers, brewers, spirit-merchants, &c. &c., are duly sensible of the approach of an influx of orders. These people have votes, but they place them at the disposal of their customers in return for purchases: one votes for this candidate, because Mrs So-and-so will never enter his shop, if he do not; another because Mr So-and-so promises him his business for so doing; and a third will not vote, because he cannot without losing his sales to certain families. With them the issue of the election in regard to the public weal, is a matter not to be thought of; for a few extra orders, they would do their utmost to fill the House of Commons with lunatics and pick pockets.

A third description comprehends people, who, although not in business, still rejoice from motives of personal gain. They have votes to sell, and the tardy market once more irradiates the perspective; they seek dignities and emoluments for their children; and the patrons smile upon them in the distance whose favour can be melted by plumpers into the creation of clerks, excisemen, and butlers, milliners, ladies-maids, and cooks. If their hopes of profit rise no higher, they see before them a number of delectable days, on which they can get drunk without cost; keep up rows for public good, and break the peace under shelter of law. With these people, an Election is only desired for the sake of such advantages, and it is used only to gain them: the highest bidder and most bountiful giver is the man to be elected; and the new House of Commons may do what it pleases with the empire.

A fourth description consists of people whose joy flows in but a secondary degree, from the hope of individual benefits. They form the grand parties, the Pinks and the Blues, the Purples and the Yellows; and the glorious moment for measuring their strength, recovering past losses, gaining new victories, gratifyng revenge, and giving boundless scope to party madness, is arriving. It is but doing them justice to say, that they not only make individual gain subservient to that of party, but they frequently make enormous sacrifices for the sake of the latter. Wofully mistaken is he who imagines that their animosities and warfare flow from the wish to elect the most deserving candidates. At the best, the rival parties only seek to elect slaves to the Ministry and Opposition, whatever may be their principles and measures; if an accomplished candidate, who in Parliament would study the public good alone, in contempt of party, should offer himself along with their slaves, they would oppose him with all their might; even here, they in reality are more anxious to serve their own party feelings and interests, than to strengthen the Ministry and Opposition. But in general, they are actuated by motives still more objectionable. The candidate of the Pinks is supported by some individual of great influence; and through hostility to this individual, the Blues must oppose him, whatever may be his merit, and however worthless their own candidate may be. Or the Pinks must oppose the candidate of the Blues, without any reference to his character, solely because they constitute a hostile party.

The Purples have the interest of the Corporation, and from this reason alone, the Yellows must endeavour, in opposing them, to change the best representative for the worst. Or the candidate of the Purples is the "Third Man,"—the one who creates a contest; therefore, he must be supported against the Yellows, in contempt of all other considerations. They are so far from looking at public good, that they place the merits of the candidates out of the question, and knowingly labour to substitute the dunce and profligate for the man of tried ability and virtue. The tradesman loses his business, the tenant his dwelling and land, the labourer his employment, and the family its bread; the man of wealth squanders away his money, the bonds of natural affection are severed, friendship is converted into enmity, inextinguishable feuds are created, and the House of Commons is filled with incapacity and vice;—all this is done to gratify the animosities of those parties, and enable them to injure each other.

And now, where are the people who regard the Election as a matter of the highest national importance,—who are labouring to bring forward candidates of the best description, are determined to use their votes and influence in favour of worth alone, and are willing to make any sacrifice to form such a House of Commons as the interests of the empire require? Putting out of sight a few scattered individuals, they cannot be discovered: there are no such people.

Let us now look at the candidates.

Here is one whose genius is not equal to the composition of his advertisements, and to whom the making of a speech is an impossibility; he knows nothing of public interests, he is incapable of understanding them, and he will not even attempt it. Amidst his vague boasts of patriotism, independence, and all the virtues, he declares himself a friend to the institutions of the empire, in "Church and State." These are the cant words of his party, and their meaning in plain English is, that he will be a servile follower of Ministers,—that at the nod of the latter, he will divest himself of deliberation, and will oppose his constituents, attack any institutions, forfeit any pledges, renounce any principles, and do any thing. This individual may mean well, and may be above bribe, but nevertheless, he differs not practically from the most corrupt of the Ministry's hirelings.

Here is another, who in ability and knowledge barely equals the first. He, however, far surpasses him in boasting, his professions are perfectly ravishing. He is the champion of "civil and religious liberty," the foe of "tyranny in all its forms," an especial hater of "corruption," and a friend of "the people." These cant words of his party reveal that he is the slave of the Whig opposition,—that at its command he will join in any violation of liberty, any tyranny and corruption, and any outrage on the people's feelings and privileges. This man may also possess good intentions and clean hands, but in effect he differs not from the deliberate traitor.

A third appears, who is equally destitute of understanding, but who possesses a trifle more of intelligence. In dilating on his perfections, he raves furiously against "sin-ecures," "taxes," and the "corruption of Parliament;" and in favour of "universal suffrage and annual elections." His cant proclaims him a Radical. This man is, in speech, a wholesale innovator; every thing in the State is wrong, and nothing will operate as a remedy save general demolition and anarchy; he would sweep away the aristocracy, the church, and even religion itself. The merit of honest madness cannot be conceded him; for he knows his assertions are false, and his nostrums would produce ruin. He is a lying mountebank, because he can be nothing else; he must differ from the Ministerialist and Whig, or all will oppose him; he cannot gain support by addressing truth and reason to the intelligent, therefore he enables himself to appear on the hustings by speaking falsehood and folly to the ignorant. The Ministerialist and Whig will, in obedience to their leaders, labour at times to promote the public weal; but he must constantly attack it to retain the favour of his patron the multitude.

We have next a man of great talent and political acquirements. Because he is so, he is a party leader; and because he is this, he has personal interests which compete and clash with those of the community. To him the public good is a thing, not to be studied and promoted without regard to other considerations, but to be made use of, trifled with, postponed, and sacrificed, for the private benefit of himself and his party. It is his great object to make the House of Commons the reverse of what it ought to be. Is he a Minister—he labours, by the most impure as well as other means, to change it from a deliberative body, charged with the duty of watching vigilantly the conduct of Ministers, and sitting in impartial justice on their measures, into their unprincipled instrument—into a thing for giving them despotic power. Does he belong to the Opposition—he endeavours, without regard to means, to change this House into an engine for opposing and harassing the government in the fulfilment of its duty; creating discontent, misleading public opinion, deluding the lower orders, stifling the legitimate voice of the country, and trampling on public interests, merely to give power to him and his confederates. His efforts are not fruitless; in Parliament, he causes many well-meaning men, as well as different ones, to act the part of public enemies.

A bankrupt and swindler now stands before us. The fellow has ruined himself by gaming and debauchery; he is overwhelmed with debts, and he lives by robbing every tradesman who will trust him; his knavery spares nothing; it wars as much against female innocence and family peace as against goods and money. He wants a seat in Parliament, partly that he may be enabled by privilege to cheat and defraud in defiance of law, and partly that he may sell his constituents and country for the polluted means of indulging his depravity.

Here is a young lordling, who has just escaped from his teens into an age which is ashamed of him; his disqualifications are not confined to incapacity, ignorance, and inexperience. He is the tool of his father, and his vote will be sold by this father to the Ministry or Opposition for valuable family benefits. It is from this alone that he seeks a seat.

The next is an opulent capitalist. He seeks a seat merely as the agent of the Bank, the East India Company, or some similar corporation; and, of course, his employers are the only constituents and country he knows and cares for; to their interests he must regularly sacrifice those of the empire.

Here is a double-faced heartless wretch, who has made a secret bargain with the Ministry or Whig club, in virtue of which it is to supply him with money and interest, and he is to be its menial if elected. The man actually boasts of his independence and patriotism, when he is under bond to be a slave, deceiver, and betrayer.

A sober, long-headed person now exhibits himself; he is a city haberdasher, or a stock-jobber, or a merchant. Is he an orator? No; he cannot make a speech. Does he understand public affairs? No. Does he wish to serve his country? No. Is he an instrument of party? No; he is wholly unknown to it. Why, then, does he desire a seat? He is an expert calculator, and he has discovered that, by vesting a certain sum in one, he can make it yield him enormous pecuniary profits; he proceeds on no vague suppositions; he has the whole matter traced on a balance-sheet, in proper counting-house form, and the mighty gain shines in arithmetical proof. By standing aloof from party, observing severe impartiality concerning creed to all customers, and carrying his vote to the best market on all trying questions, he sees that he can obtain lucrative contracts, agencies, &c. for himself and his connexions. Self, self,—money, money, are his idols; they are reflected in every object that meets his eyes; they are interwoven with everything which enters his thoughts; to make them secondary to public good would be, with him, downright idiocy. On matters from which he can extract no direct benefit, the same spirit still guides him; he will vote on a certain side, because it will “do good to trade;” morals, religion, laws, and institutions, must all be made subservient to the “good of trade.”

A lawyer follows him, who is actuated by similar motives. A seat may be made prolific of briefs; a vote may extort golden favour from Ministers. When parties seek recruits amidst lawyers, what may not pliability, sycophancy, declamation, and a forehead bearing the notice, “Any side for fee,” be made productive of? On the hustings, he will pledge himself, by every thing sacred, to oppose some measure which vitally affects the Church and Constitution; in Parliament, he will, at the nod of the Minister, audaciously advocate it. Deny him a silk gown, and he will be as furious a patriot as ever scattered flame amidst the rabble; but give him one, and it will convert him into the most supple worshipper of the powers that be. He will rail with republican indignation against the corruption of the Court, and then a retainer will make him a Court parasite; he will attack this mighty abuse and that destructive system, and then the smile and substantial fee of government will make him the impudent defender of both. The wretched creature, who disgraces the form of man, regards constituents and country as things only to be given in barter for the means of gratifying his avarice and ambition.

Passing by a host of similar candidates, we search almost in vain for men who possess the requisite qualifications in regard to ability and intelligence, who are really independent, and who are determined to look at duty alone, if they be elected. A few such men may be perceived, but in numbers they only form the exception to the rule. The mass of the candidates are incompetent, and, in addition, they seek seats on party and personal interests, which are at variance with those of the empire.

What is the source of this lamentable state of things? Is it to be found in the non-existence of men properly qualified? No, there is no lack of such men; but they do not offer themselves, because they are prohibited from so doing. What forms the prohibition? It is formed, saying nothing of other matters, by the electors. Throwing the expense and aristocratic authority out of the question, they would, in offering, be opposed by the Ministerialist, Whig, and Radical,—by the various parties and the multitude,—in a word, by the body of the electors. The dunce, the slave, the profligate, the knave, and the traitor, may enter the field with hope of success, but not the wise and upright patriot.

We will now place before us the Election. The manner in which the “boroughmongers” elect their members is too well known, and too generally declaimed against, to require notice, a description would supply neither novelty nor lesson. We will, therefore, go at once to the “open” places, and commence, as dignity prescribes, with a County.

Here, then, is a county, the members of which, in the last Parliament, gave great dissatisfaction; they proved themselves to be destitute of capacity, and voted on important questions in opposition to the sentiments of their constituents. Surely these men will be dismissed by the “free and independent freeholders.” No. The one is a Ministerialist, connected with the great Ministerialist families of the county; and the other is a Whig, connected with the Whig ones. Some half-dozen of the Ministerialist families decide that their member has been to them excessively docile, and shall not be removed; an equal number of the Whig ones form the same decision touching theirs, and then both decide in confederacy that "the peace of the county shall not be disturbed." To the latter decision the smaller families on both sides humbly bow, and the mass of the "independent freeholders" have no resource but submission.

Why is this county thus practically converted into something worse than a close borough? The blame rests not on the more humble, but on the wealthy electors. The fetters of the great families could be at once broken by the body of the gentry, but it must not be done, because it would hazard favours and friendships, or at the least, it would beget strife, and call for exertion. The landowners know that the old members support a system which is taking from them their estates, ruining their tenants, and starving the husbandry labourers; but they must submit to all this rather than give offence to their heads, by calling for new ones. The election in this case is a mockery; it takes place that the county may send men to Parliament to oppose, insult, and scourge it.*

Here is another county, which has had a Ministerial member and a Whig one. The former's incapacity is declaimed against by the whole county, and the great families, which have supported him, are so well convinced of it, that they wish to change him. After due deliberation, these families discover, that if they cause him to resign, and start a new candidate, another Whig will oppose the latter with great prospect of success; they of course determine there shall be no change. The determination binds the body of the electors, and virtually deprives them of the franchise.

The Whig member of a third county resigns, and there must necessarily be a new one. Two-thirds of the electors are Ministerialists, but it is not for them to decide who their representatives shall be. A few of the families of both persuasions discuss the matter privately. The Whigs protest that if another Ministerialist offer himself, they will oppose him to the last; the Ministerialists submit for the sake of peace; and, in consequence, the sense of the "independent electors" is disregarded, and a man is elected, who, in their judgment, is unworthy of the trust.

We have now a fourth county, for which, from the resignation of the old Members, there must be new ones. Two-thirds of the electors are Whigs. The leading Ministerialists and Whigs agree in solemn conclave, that each side shall have a member, and there shall be no contest. From this, the electors, as a whole, are not suffered to exercise their right of choice, and they are decidedly opposed to one of the men returned in their name. This is not all; the two members, being Ministerialist and Whig, will take opposite sides on all important questions, and thereby neutralize each other's vote; the county, therefore, will not, in effect, be represented in Parliament.

The next county is to be contested. Why? Perhaps there is a vacancy? No. Probably the incompetency of one, or both, of the old members is the cause? No. The only thing which can be fairly alleged against the latter is, they are both Ministerialists, and the contest is to be raised solely to oust one of them in favour of a Whig. The Whig candidate is, in qualification, far inferior to his opponents.

And now we have a county which is deserted by its old members. A man, in every respect properly qualified, is anxious to offer himself, and as a necessary preliminary, he sounds a few of the leading men. They give him no encouragement, because he is neither Ministerialist nor Whig, but a compound of both: to stand in opposition to them would be a hopeless matter, therefore he is compelled to abandon his wish. Another well-qualified individual is accepted by them, because he is strongly Ministerial, and he offers himself to the county at large in due form; but retracts his offer on the appearance of two other candidates. Does he do this for fear of being at the bottom of the poll? No; he is certain of being placed at the top by a triumphant majority: the sole reason of his retreat is this—a contest would cost him fifty thousand pounds, and he cannot afford to waste the money.

His opponents are ignorant and imbecile, but they are rich; weight of purse is to them a majority of votes, it practically strips the electors of the franchise, and the county of representatives.

We will not describe a county contest, because it does not differ materially from a borough one, of which we shall soon speak. Of county elections, we will observe generally:—

1. To a great extent, there is an understanding among the leading men of each county, that its members shall be a Ministerialist and a Whig. There may be a strong probability, and even a certainty, that two candidates of the same creed would be returned by the great majority of the county; but, nevertheless, the minority must be permitted to return one without a contest. In cases where this understanding does not prevail, the minority regularly puts forward its candidate, and his expenses are paid by clubs, subscriptions, &c; he thus stands a contest comparatively free from cost, while his opponents have to bear their own expenses; the supporters of the latter, secure of returning one member, will contribute no money towards the return of two. The minority must, therefore, have its seat, or opposing candidates must have the cost of a contest, and by this it scares away opposition. The effect is, that county representation is degraded into a nominal matter. To render it effective, the majority in each county ought to return both the members; it is by this alone that the sentiments of the county can find their way into Parliament, and the parliamentary majority can be made to represent the national one. But from what we have stated, the members, on important questions, nullify each other's votes: so far as they are concerned they virtually destroy the House of Commons, or at the best compress it into the casting vote of Mr Speaker.

Three-fourths of the Yorkshire electors are strongly opposed to this ministry, or that system of policy; but in all divisions in the House respecting either, two of the Yorkshire members vote on one side and two on the other. It follows that in effect this county has no representatives, save on minor matters. Many of the counties thus in essentials are placed in a worse condition than even the close boroughs; they are practically deprived of members.

2. None but the very rich, and the instruments which party puts forward and supports with its purse, can maintain a contest for a county; the qualifications, in consequence, are confined to great wealth and party servility. It, therefore, naturally happens, that county members, as a whole, cannot be other than men deplorably inefficient in ability and intelligence. Agriculture embraces the especial interests of their constituents, yet on matters connected with it, scarcely an individual can be found among them capable of making an able, argumentative speech; they can neither confute their opponents, nor support their friends; and they display so much ignorance and folly in what they utter, that they are about the worst enemies of their own cause. In respect of its own representatives, agriculture is the interest which is destitute above all others of capable advocates and defenders. We need not speak of their capacity for managing the general affairs of the empire. If they make a display of independence, their want of talent and knowledge too often causes them to do it to the injury of the State; they oppose or support the Ministry when they ought to do the contrary. We speak of the body, and admit a few exceptions. Counties, therefore, are not only to a great extent virtually without representatives, but those they possess are of the least value possible.*

* So long as the Country Gentlemen formed a kind of independent party, it operated to bring forward independent men as candidates, and to counterpoise the divisions of Whig and Tory. However party might divide them on secondary questions, they acted together on leading ones; this raised the counties to be represented, in regard to sentiment, with reasonable efficiency, and the influence of public sentiment supplied in a great degree any lack of ability. The party was guided by the legitimate voice of the county, and it seldom erred; it held the balance of the House of Commons, and thereby placed the corrupt boroughs under the regulation of the counties.

We turn to the boroughs.

Here is one which contains some fifty or one hundred "free and independent burgesses;" no "borough-monger" waves his iron sceptre over them, and compels them to elect his menial; but they are free as air to choose their own representatives. They wish to dismiss their old Members. Doubtlessly it is for incapacity or breach of trust? No. The reason is, these members cannot be depended on for a good price, or early payment in the purchase of votes. The worthy burgesses do not trust to chance, or wait, with their fingers in their mouths, for a godsend, but, like men of business, they apply to some wholesale broker in boroughs. This man's trade is so extensive, that the price of every rotten borough and every borough-buyer in the kingdom are known to him. They leave their votes with him for sale, and restrict him to nothing save price and solvency of purchaser, precisely as cotton and sugar are confided to a broker for sale; the buyer may be Christian or infidel, honest man or rogue, patriot or traitor, Ministerialist, Whig, or Radical; it is the same to them, provided he makes the due bidding and produces the necessary cash. Or, to the extent permitted by law, they advertise themselves to be sold as cattle are.

A customer exhibits himself, and the bargain is concluded. The man buys his constituents like swine, and he afterwards treats them as such animals. He knows it is useless to consult their sentiments, and he does any thing with his vote which best comports with his own interest. The member for an aristocratic borough is influenced by the owner of it, if not by his nominal constituents; he is generally bound to certain principles, and restricted from voting corruptly. But a man like this is free from all influence whatever; no restriction of any kind exists to prevent him from making the most corrupt use of his vote on all occasions.

Here is another borough; the old members are men of high character, and they have discharged their duty in the most meritorious manner, but notwithstanding this, a considerable part of the burgesses wish for new ones. Why? Because these members were returned principally through the interest of the corporation or some wealthy individual; and the burgesses in question, who are called the Pinks or Independents, always oppose such interest, without reference to merit in the candidates. But they do this for the holy purpose of preserving the independence of their borough! Hold, and let us have the basis of this wish for independence. If there be no independence, there is no contest; and in consequence there is no liquor to drink without price, no money or patronage to be obtained for votes—no benefit to be extracted from the franchise. Make it the same to the upright Pinks in these matters, whether there be a contest or none, and they will resign independence without a sigh.

These Pinks are so violently anxious for change, that they advertise for at least one new candidate, and they are gratified. Some trading lawyer, gamester, or other worthless person, makes his appearance, and is received with rapture. In the furious contest which follows, character and principles are scornfully disregarded: granted that the stranger is a profligate—that his creed is of the most pernicious kind—that, if elected, he will violate his duty and support the most destructive measures, still he must be worshipped by the Pinks. What he is, and what he will do in Parliament, are with them out of the question; they only want him to oppose the other candidates for the sake of a contest; and for this purpose he is as deserving as the best man living could be. He is elected.

What are the fruits? The borough intentionally deprives itself of a valuable representative, and replaces him with one who is a disgrace to it, and who will violate his duty to it in every way.

The House of Commons receives in exchange for an intelligent, upright, patriotic member, a vicious traitor.

Members of Parliament in general receive the lesson, that the most conscientious discharge of duty will avail them no more with their constituents than the most criminal neglect of it; and they have a living example placed amidst them to lead them to such neglect.

But the "free and independent burgesses" secure their independence. They take from the obnoxious interest the means of returning a worthy representative, and invest themselves with the power of returning one destitute of character and principle; they secure to themselves at every dissolution of Parliament, a contest, and the bribes and other iniquitous benefits which a contest produces.

These Pinks are, to a man, staunch Reformers; they annually hold public meetings, at which they put forth the most indignant diatribes against the corruption and profligacy of the House of Commons, and prepare the most moving petitions in favour of Radical reform.

We have next a borough, or city, in which there is no powerful interest, and the members are chosen by scot-and-lot voters. The election, of course, is in the hands of the labouring orders. It might naturally be presumed, that at this place no man would be permitted to shew himself as candidate, who was not the champion of good wages, the sources of employment, the poor laws, proper instruction, and other matters possessed by the labouring classes, or required for their weal.

Alas—alas! that the things which ought to be, are not!

If any such champion should venture to solicit the votes of the electors, well would it be for him if it should not put his person in jeopardy. This is so well known, that all such scrupulously avoid the place. The enlightened electors are vehement reformers, and their ardour in favour of freedom of election is so great, that they seek the lives of both voters and candidates whom they oppose. Impatient of the tedious process of ejecting the opponent of their favourites by polling, they put him down at once with stones and Irish bludgeons. No one can hope for their votes, who is not the determined enemy of their interests.

This place is contested. The three candidates necessarily agree in essentials; they are all enthusiastic advocates for the things which will reduce wages to the famine ones, contract to the utmost the sources of employment, and produce amidst the low orders the greatest portion of want and misery. They wish to sweep away the poor laws, and make the labourer, in his intervals of idleness, a beggar and vagabond; and, to give this the greatest effect, they denounce charity as a pernicious vice: They fiercely withstand all attempts to give to the poor greater means of religious instruction; they are decidedly hostile to all efforts for shortening the hours of labour, and securing to the labourer honest payment in money: With them, it is a political crime to protect and encourage industry by law. In a word, they eagerly seek on principle to reduce the labouring classes to the lowest point of penury, degradation, and wretchedness. On these matters they agree, and therefore are received with about equal enthusiasm by the electors; but on some less important ones they differ. One of them cannot wholly divest his lips of truth and common sense; in throwing the hatchet, he places himself under limitations; he exaggerates and caricatures unmercifully, but still he avoids pure fiction. His incapacity here ruins him. Those alone can gain the highest point in the favour of the electors, who do the most not only to injure their interests, but to impose on, and delude them.

On the hustings the more honest candidate bridle himself to the extent we have stated, while his two opponents riot in all the superlatives of slander and falsehood. They solemnly assure the worthy electors that Ministers are not only dolts, but the greatest knaves and tyrants in being—that the Aristocracy exists only to oppress and plunder them—that the Clergy are drones, tools of despotism, and public robbers—that the House of Commons is a sink of corruption, a den of swindlers—that the taxes are levied only to feed the rapacity of the “borough-mongers,” and other sinecurists—and that the people are enduring the extreme of injustice and tyranny. They maintain that Radical reform, and like nostrums, would remove all the evils which flow from the ruinous influx of foreign goods, bad harvests, and other causes of the same kind. And they vehemently protest that the electors are the most knowing, wise, and pure of their species; and that all who differ from them are imbecile and dishonest in the last degree.

We are tracing no libel on human nature; incredible as it may seem, there are men—men of education and fortune, men who are tolerated in decent society, and even admitted into the legislature—who exhibit such despicable and damning iniquity.

This is received with uproarious acclamations by the enlightened electors; "It is all true!" bursts in thunder from ten thousand voices. The moderate candidate imitates his opponents, but he throws out the spice and seasoning, and delicious morsels; his orations, therefore, taste too much of truth, reason, and probability, to be relished. He is listened to, but the cheers are cold, few, and feeble. For the first day or two of the poll, matters go on peaceably, and this candidate, from being supported by the more respectable of the voters, receives about as many votes as the others. The latter take alarm, for his triumph must necessarily be the defeat of one of them; they privately coalesce, and then denounce him as a hypocrite, tool of power, and connexion of the borough-mongers. The electors, weary of peace, and anxious for pretexts of battle and vengeance, hear the denunciation with boundless joy; and they salute him with horrible yells and execrations. In vain he attempts to justify himself, for not a word will they listen to; his opponents having him thus gagged, nurse the fury against him in every speech, by heaping on him calumny and sarcasm. The electors next assail the heads and limbs of his supporters, and deprive him of votes, by making it a matter of life and death to give him one; then they assail himself in the same manner, maim him, and expel him from the hustings; and finally, by a majority of bludgeons and brickbats—by prohibiting him from soliciting and receiving votes, from acting and appearing as a candidate, they close the poll against him.

The candidates who triumph through such means, and their electors who use such means, take precedence of all radical reformers; they surpass all others in passionate devotion to freedom and purity of election; they carry their holy abhorrence, not of intimidation only, but also of influence, so far, that they advocate election by ballot.

What is the conduct in Parliament of the men who are thus elected by, and who are the especial representatives of, the labouring classes? They constantly support every measure which is calculated to lower wages, and destroy employment—to take away the comforts and bread of these classes—to demoralize, barbarize, degrade, and starve the labourer. Never are they the parents and friends, or other than the opponents, of any rational plan for bettering the condition of the poor. If the working orders be in severe distress, they never propose any measure of relief; and all petitions for it meet their hostility: their speeches on all questions have for their object to delude and inflame these orders to their own injury. With regard to public interests generally, they never discuss them honestly, with a view to their promotion; but, on the contrary, they intentionally carry on eternal war against them, merely to gratify the passions and prejudices of their misguided constituents.

Will such conduct injure them at the next election? No, it will secure their return in defiance of all competitors. Let them act in an opposite manner—let them endeavour to protect the labourer, benefit the poor man, inculcate truth amidst "the people," and serve the public weal; and they scarcely obtain a vote—they will be spurned from the electors as enemies and traitors.

The electors who so act, stand almost alone in the country in being free from the influence of superiors, and the desire for personal profit. No landlord, master, or customer, commands their votes, and no sordid bribe stains their fingers. Yet they stand almost alone in electing the very worst enemies of both themselves and the empire: the most servile and corrupt electors in other places return better members in regard to the labouring classes, and the community at large, than they do.

The honest reformer may here find instruction.

And now we have a large borough, in which there is no preponderating interest, and a considerable admixture of wealth and intelligence is found amidst the burghesses. It is in all respects one of the best in the country,

The old members have given great and general dissatisfaction by their ignorance and incapacity. The borough is a seaport, and depends largely on shipping; or its dependence is on the silk manufacture, and these members have been not only incapable of promoting its interests, but regularly opposed to them; they have constantly dissented from, and voted against, its petitions. In addition, they are strangers to the place, and have no interest in serving it. They offer again, and no new candidate appears to oppose them.

What is done by the burgesses— we mean by the rich and knowing part of them—by those whose property has been largely diminished, and is suffering daily waste through the principles of the old members; and whose only hope of escaping further losses and ultimate ruin, rests on the return to Parliament of men of opposite principles? Do they bestir themselves like men in labouring to procure suitable candidates? Do they meet, unite, and solicit some opulent townsman to offer, whose intelligence, integrity, and independence, are known to them, and whose interests and creed are identified with their own? They do nothing; they even manifest no anxiety for change; if any stripling stranger, any officer, lawyer, or adventurer, will voluntarily shew himself, they will support him—if not, they will return the old members to ensure their own ruin.

This disgraceful apathy, and criminal neglect of duty, must be ascribed to the following cause:—These burgesses are divided into Ministerialists and Whigs, and each division has its representative in the old members. They cannot act in concert, because the one party must oppose the candidate of the other; their representatives must, if possible, be a Ministerialist and a Whig, however destructive it may be to themselves.

The case is different with the less exalted burgesses. Their longings for at least, one new candidate are intense. The fear that there will be no contest—no gratuitous liquor to drink—no money and other benefits to be had for the vote, distresses them even to agony. The grief of the women equals that of the men; it wrings the hearts of children, and it is fully participated in by the “unrepresented.” The borough is filled with lamentations. A report spreads with the swiftness of lightning, that a “Third Man” is coming—that the Telegraph coach actually passed him on the road; and there is a general burst of exultation. An immense throng, of all sexes and ages, instantaneously start to welcome the stranger; and they trudge some five weary miles only to discover that malicious invention has made them its victims. The misery which follows is relieved for a moment by another fable of treacherous rumour, only to be rendered more intolerable. Hope finally vanishes.

The worthy burgesses now resolve on proper exertion. They transmit instructions to the outvoters to send them a candidate with all imaginable speed; and then a deputation of them waits on a wealthy Ministerialist to solicit him to offer himself. He receives them with all possible courtesy—is deeply sensible of the honour they do him, but declines. Creed is nothing to them, and they next press a seat on a Whig. He cannot express his gratitude—he intimates that it will survive his existence—but still family reasons extort from him a refusal. The unhappy burgesses, wholly foot-sore, and almost heart-broke, now betake themselves to a rich individual, who has too little intellect, and too much eccentricity, to know any thing of principle and party—but they care as little for sense as for creed; unfortunately, they find him in a lucid interval, and he rudely resists their blandishments. Who may describe their march home? The measured step, the solemn silence, not broken by a whisper, the woful visage, which, in the extreme of longitude, shews a perfect abstraction from every thing save one overpowering cause of sorrow, render a funeral procession a matter of merriment in comparison.

The dismal tidings are quickly communicated to the body of the electors and “unrepresented,” and for a moment wrath mingles itself with despair; a disposition is partially felt to break a few windows, and perform other exploits of a similar kind, from sheer anger; but it is subdued.

The night passes, and then the bells suddenly break out in sounds of joy; their repeated volleys prove that their rejoicing is of no ordinary character. Enquiry is told that a "Third Man" is certainly coming; but all is incredulity. Next, placards proclaim the fact in every quarter; but even the old women are so swollen with unbelief, that they are provoked to tear them down. At length, a letter from the "Third Man" himself, and the assurances of certain of the leading burgesses, place the matter above question; and it is announced that the stranger will make his entry at four o'clock on the following day.

We speak not of the sleepless eyes and delicious dreams of the intervening night, or of the brilliance of countenance which irradiates the smoky atmosphere of the borough in the morning. At ten, impatience ceases to be endurable; and waiting for six hours in idle expectation becomes impossible. Men, women, and children, old and young, troop forth to meet their favourite, and line the road for sundry miles in all imaginable groups and postures. At the appointed time he appears.

An enormous multitude, headed by music and flags, now enters the street, and fills it to suffocation. In the centre there is seen an open carriage, drawn by men, which, with its occupants, is thickly covered with dust; heads are so closely wedged all round it, that it is barely perceptible. All in it are seated, save one tall, slim, dust-covered person, who stands with his hat in his hand, and bows incessantly to every house he passes. He is the "Third Man." The mighty mass moves slowly along, while every window is filled, throws on it the smiles of beautiful women, and streams with ribbons and handkerchiefs: shouts continually rend the air, the procession frequently pauses before the door of some favourite, and then the hurrahs rise to sublimity. It is a spectacle not to be enjoyed by the eyes alone; it reaches the heart of the stork, and makes it throb to share in the approaching struggle. The borough is filled with tumultuous exultation. If the empire had been saved from fall, would the joy have been greater? No. If national prosperity had been substituted for suffering, and the millions of the hungry and naked had been supplied with food and raiment, would it have been so great? Alas! far from it.

A contest is now inevitable. On the following morning, one of the old Members is to enter the borough; and, as devotion to the Third Man is naturally hatred of his opponents, the multitude sallies forth to encounter him, breaks his carriage to pieces, or throws it into some river, and he narrowly escapes with his life.

The Committees are duly formed, and the Candidates give pledges that they will not petition Parliament against the proceedings of each other; this is done that the greatest scope may be given to bribery, intimidation, &c.

After the "Third Man" has been received with such boundless enthusiasm, the question flies round the borough—Who is he? The true answer probably is this. He is a gay, untaught cousin of some noble family; or he is a dependent of some Government-supporter, sent by the menial of the Treasury; or he is some hanger-on of the Whigs, sent at the cost of the Whig Club; or he is a London confectioner. But at any rate he is an utter stranger to the place and its interests; a man destitute of talent, knowledge of shipping, or the silk trade, and all leading qualifications; he is, moreover, in creed a blind supporter of the system which is ruining the borough.

The lower classes necessarily have another answer. With them he is a man of high family and boundless riches: he will pour money about like water, and pay profusely on the first moment allowed by evasion of law; he has lodged thirty thousand pounds at a certain bank, and is determined to spend every penny of it, or double the sum, if necessary. Probably, in the exercise of Roman virtue, he has quarrelled on politics with his father, and is, therefore, compelled to seek a seat at his own cost. When at the University, he astonished it with his genius. He has posed the Duke of Wellington, and actually floored Sir R. Peel, on the most intricate public questions; and both have made him the most magnificent offers to gain him, which his patriotism has scornfully rejected. As a friend of the poor he has no equal. In short, he is a man in which perfection of every kind delights to shew itself.

We have now the canvassing. The free part of the poorer burgesses at once pledge a large number of plumpers to the "Third Man;" and the other part makes a reserve of one vote for him. Canvassing is to him an unnecessary formality; it is supreme happiness to receive his acceptance of votes. The case is different with the other candidates. They proceed from house to house, wheedling the husband, kissing the wife, fondling the children, and hinting an anxiety to bestow all manner of favours; but all is coldness and distance. The man means to divide his vote, but he will make no promise at present; the woman bristles up, and haughtily utters insinuations against the hearts and memories of great people; and the urchins look fierce, as though they wished to kick the suppliants out of doors. Flattery, falsehood, promises, and delusion, are used in vain, and then recourse is had to intimidation and compulsion. The landlords and masters insist on the votes of the tenants and workmen, under the penalty of loss of occupancy and employment.

The polling begins, and, in the first place, we have the speeches of the candidates. The Ministerialist labours under the immense disadvantage of being restricted in topics and assertions by the conduct of the Ministry. The contest lies between him and the Whig, and he cannot wander from the doctrines of Ministers, without floundering into those of his opponent, to his ruin with his supporters. He has no party to abuse, and no public grievances to dilate on; he cannot promise, lie, and slander with effect; and, moreover, he is wholly ungifted as an orator. He makes no impression.

The Whig is in far better circumstances. He boasts of his independence, and yet the man, for his whole life, has been the miserable slave of a party; his conduct in Parliament has differed in no respect from that of the meanest of the Whig borough mercenaries. He boasts of his "liberal opinions," and in proof, he claims infallibility, and labours to excommunicate all who differ from him as bigots. He boasts of his devotion to civil and religious liberty; his object here is to gain the Dissenters, therefore he adds the most intolerant and despotic diatribes against the Church and its friends. He boasts of his love of the "people;" and yet, in Parliament, he has always treated their petitions with insult, refused to relieve their distress, and sanctioned all invasions of popular rights and privileges. He boasts of his affection for the "liberal system of trade,"—does he understand it? He is as free from such understanding as an infant; he does so from blind party fanaticism. He boasts of his hatred of taxes, and passion for economy; the truth here is, he labours to cause embarrassment to the revenue, and loss to the public creditor, from party motives. Then he utters savage, incoherent words on reform, and other topics dear to the populace; and scatters vituperation on his opponents, and all who do not support him. Finally, he lavishly lauds the perfection of the electors. The savoury parts of his orations obtain a few shouts, but no feeling in his favour displays itself.

The "Third Man," happily for his powers, has not to enter into particulars touching creed. He stammers and coughs, and the half-finished sentence, the meaning of which cannot be guessed at, is huzzaed as a specimen of matchless wisdom. He deals only in magnificent generalities and impossibilities—he will banish this grievance, and produce that blessing—he will alone do more than satisfy the most extravagant desires of the burgesses. All is greedily swallowed—the more impossible, the more true and certain. The cheering is tremendous, and the women are actually electrified. An aged matron totters on her crutch, and screeches in tears of ecstasy—"God bless him, what a dear creature!" A more youthful one responds—"Yes, he will give us wheat at a shilling a-bushel!" His male worshippers exclaim—"He will take off every tax!" and dart round them looks of indescribable importance, as though they were gaining immortality by supporting such a prodigy.

In the midst of all this, do the candidates discuss in a sober, rational manner, the great questions which bear vitally on the interests of the empire? Do they prescribe statesmanlike remedies for public loss and distress, and give pledges to advocate them? No, they would not be listened to. Do they prove themselves to be acquainted with shipping, or the silk trade, or whatever else the prosperity of the borough depends on? They prove the contrary. Do they point out the proper means for removing the suffering of the borough, and promise to call for their adoption in the Legislature? They avoid themselves the friends of the system from which the suffering flows. Can any one refrain from exclaiming—"Oh, sage and patriotic bourgeois!"

Squibs now circulate in profusion. Every speech on private character is blazoned forth—every dastardly wound which the assassin of reputation can give, is given—credit in business is smote with fame in society—the tender female is treated as mercilessly as the man—and slander ransacks the tomb for materials, even to the third generation of its inmates.

Each candidate has his drums and fifes, colours, and band of men decorated with ribbons, to fetch his voters in bodies to the hustings; and they continually traverse the streets. For the first day, peace and good humour prevail, but the second presents causes of discord and battle. One candidate must necessarily be thrown out; and, of course, there must be animosity between the two who are the most in danger of the calamity. The success of the "Third Man" is certain; therefore, the ousting must fall on the Ministerialist or Whig. The lower classes of bourgeois begin to weigh the merits of the latter, in order to determine which of them they shall split in favour of. Principles and character are out of the question with them; and they call to mind that the Whig paid his men late,* and it was thought would never pay—that he is afraid of his money—that he manifests much jealousy and spleen towards the "Third Man," and that he is the lowest on the poll. From all this they determine to treat him as an enemy, and the determination is embraced by the whole populace.

At the close of the poll on the second day, the Whig, when he appears to address the multitude, is received with groans and hisses; the wrath of his supporters is excited, and it nurtures the ire of his opponents. Immense squabbling takes place in the streets between individuals and groups; towards midnight, a huge congregation of his foes, which comprehends numerous women and other members of the "unrepresented," marches to his committee-room, and demolishes every window; it then swiftly proceeds to the house where he is quartered, and shivers its windows in the same manner; next it subjects the dwellings of several of his principal friends to the same work of destruction; and then, grown wanton with success, it pours volleys of stones into every window, indiscriminately, treating friend the same as enemy, for the mere fun of the matter.

In the early part of the third day, the parties of the Whig and Ministerialist exchange much abuse, and not a few blows, as they pass each other; they gradually arm themselves with bludgeons, but no serious conflict takes place before the close of the poll. As the various detachments of the Whig voters are brought up, they are received with execrations: those of the "Third Man" are welcomed with boundless rapture; the women round the hustings and in every street look valorous, shake their hands at the voters, and cry, "Bring in the 'Third Man!'—If you do not, you will never have another!"

The poll closes for the day, and it exhibits a doubtful aspect to both the Ministerialist and the Whig; the latter stands on it the lowest, but there is a sufficient number of unpollled votes to give him the victory, if they can be obtained; these votes must decide the matter, therefore a tremendous struggle must be made by both to obtain them. In the evening, the heads of both parties, some of them on horseback, attended with vast mobs armed with staves and other weapons, parade the different streets in quest of the unpollled. In a leading street, well calculated for a field of battle, the two hostile bodies meet; and they cannot pass each other without a grand conflict. The pedestrians first involve themselves in murderous combat, and then the cavalry on each side furiously charges to aid them. A doughty merchant is knocked off his horse, and carried home insensible—the steed of a rich grocer, who is unskilled in the management of such cattle, rears, and he drops to the dust to be trampled into a mass of bruises—the favourite mare of an alderman, not having been taught the art of war, fairly turns her tail on the business, gallops home with her hatless, wigless rider, and covers his reputation for prowess with grievous suspicion; amidst the pedestrians, heads are broken here, and legs there, and some two or three are slain outright. At length the Whigs fly in all directions, the combatants vanish, and the wounded and dead are removed.

* To evade the law, candidates do not pay their voters and hired partisans until after the last day allowed by the House of Commons for receiving petitions against elections on the score of bribery. They too often make use of this to take intolerable credit. A member will often forget to pay for years, nay, until the end of the Parliament; and it is to be suspected, that the man pays rather to secure his re-election than to discharge the obligations of honesty. Instances are numerous enough in which he never pays, to the fearful loss of the pure electors. The laws against bribery, then, merely have the effect of enabling the candidate to make himself a rogue, and cheat the voter.

Would these men have fought with equal hatred and desperation against a foreign enemy of their country? No. Would they have so fought for any real benefit to their country or themselves? No. Would they have fought thus to return the most suitable representative? Impossible.

On the next morning, the most strenuous exertions are used to gain the sagacious bourgeois who have reserved their votes for the top of the market. The committee-men of the Whig ferret out one, but he is obstinate; a kitten frisks around them, and they offer L.10 for it; they are understood, but the sum is too small,—they rise to L.15, and in consideration of their giving this money for his kitten, the immaculate bourgeois gives them his vote gratuitously. They discover another, but he cannot bear the Whig; he has a battered plaster bust of Bonaparte on his chimney-piece, which his wife bought when new for ninepence; they assail the woman, but she is at the first excessively unmanageable; after prodigious entreaty, she consents to sell them the bust for L.20, and to prevail on her husband to give them his unbought vote. They ply other bourgeois in a similar manner.

Yet this Whig is an outrageous champion of purity of election; his flags attest it in letters of gold. He owed his last election to such means; nevertheless, in Parliament, on such questions as the East Retford one, his virtuous indignation against corrupt electors knew no limits. He and his Whig brethren knew they were indebted for their seats to the basest corruption; still they laboured to strip ignorant bourgeois of the franchise by wholesale, who would never have been bribed had it not been from their own seductions and temptations.

In passing from voter to voter, gained in this manner, the party of the Whig raises the shout—"Hurrah for Purity of Election!"

Then the Whig committee-men resort to compulsion. They terrify tradesmen, tenants, and servants into the surrender of their votes by threats of the loss of business, discharge, and dismissal.

After gaining votes in this manner, they triumphantly cry—"Hurrah for Independence and Freedom of Election!"

The committee-men of the Ministerialist vie with them in the use of similar means.

While this is in execution, the ladies are not idle. Lovely women, the members of haughty and opulent families, are seen humbly soliciting petty tradesmen and labourers. One beautiful creature, whose charms might subdue the most stubborn resolution, and who might be thought incapable of offering homage to man, is seen squeezing the greasy hand of a butcher. Another employs the witcheries of a tongue, which might be imagined unapt to articulate other sounds than those of purity and timidity, in uttering the filthy and insincere slang of party to a dustman.

We pause from disgust, only adding, that the Whig, after keeping the poll open to the last, and buying up the out-voters at enormous cost, is thrown out.

The members here are elected on no principle of public or local good. At the best, the one is sent to support the Ministry, and the other the Opposition, in any thing however injurious, merely because it is the Ministry or Opposition. To this, the interests of both the empire and the borough are made subservient. But with regard to one of them, he is really elected in utter contempt of what he may do as a legislator, solely that the burgesses may extract corrupt private gain from the exercise of the franchise. Both the members are grossly incompetent in talent and knowledge; and both are opposed to the mass of the burgesses in essential principle, and supporters of the policy which is scourging the borough as severely as the empire. Pledged to nothing save bondage to party and faction; openly exempted from obedience to the sentiments of their constituents; and convinced that such obedience will rather injure than benefit them at a future election, they act in Parliament as though they had no constituents.

This is a specimen of the best of the open boroughs. Of all free ones we will say generally,

1. The more independent and intelligent burgesses make no effort to obtain proper representatives. They leave all to chance; if their old members be in the highest degree incompetent, they return them again, unless strangers make a voluntary offer; if these members resign, they remain passive, and retain any strangers who may spontaneously come in their way. They have it in their power to elect at least one townsman of excellent character and qualifications, but they will not attempt it.

2. If the other burgesses endeavour to prevail on an individual to offer himself, they make character and qualifications secondary matters. Their object is to serve their party animosity and personal cupidity, regardless of what he may be, and do, in Parliament.

3. Almost half their members must of necessity be incompetent, profligate men, from the system on which the lower classes of the electors vote.

4. In so far as they each return a Ministerialist and a Whig, they practically, in respect of leading state questions, deprive themselves of representatives, by causing them to neutralize each other. In so far as they return members of the same creed, they do it by accident, or on vicious grounds, consequently the members give no correct representation of their sentiments. Such members, to a large extent, hold the majority in the House of Commons; and from the reprehensible manner in which so many of them are chosen, they make this majority—that is, practically make the House itself—incompetent and profligate; instead of identifying this majority, and thereby Parliament, with the national majority, they place them in opposition.

But are there no pledges exacted and given on great state questions? There are such, but in general, they are exacted and given, solely for the benefit of party and faction; if they can be used to inflame and delude the electors to the guilty profit of the faction and the candidate, they are pompously put forward; if not, they are not mentioned. It is perceived that a certain set of candidates and their supporters may be served by the cry of "Cheap bread!" And it is therefore raised; a pledge is demanded from the candidates that they will vote for the abolition of the corn law. What is the real character of this pledge? Is it to bind them to act on the question according to fact and argument, the rights of one part of the community, and the weal of the whole? No. It is to bind them to do, in utter contempt of these things, what will rob, ruin, and starve half the population, to the unspeakable injury of the remainder.

Another pledge is for the abolition of Slavery in the West India Colonies. Do those who call for it understand the question? They are ignorant of it in the last degree. Is it that the abolition may be accomplished in the cautious, gradual manner called for even more by the interests of the slaves than by those of their proprietors? No; it is, that the abolition may be made in mad disregard of fact and circumstance to the ruin of both slaves and colonies, and the grievous loss of the empire.

A third pledge is for the reduction of taxes. Does it mean that such reduction shall proceed on dispasionate investigation, and be kept in harmony with public honesty and good? No; its meaning is, that the candidates shall do, what can only be done through the robbery of the public creditor, and the sacrifice of public interest.

These pledges, we say, are called for solely to inflame and delude the ignorant for the benefit of party and faction; and each involves the plunder, ruin, and misery of a large part of the population, and the infliction of vast loss and evil on the empire in the aggregate; each is calculated to swell the mass of bankruptcy and hunger, and destroy still farther the sources of national existence. Are they counterpoised by none of an opposite character? Do not independence and patriotism meet them with others, addressed to reason and integrity, and calculated to remove suffering, and restore prosperity?

Agriculture, the Shipping, and other Interests, are enduring great loss and distress—Is no pledge demanded on their behalf, of impartial enquiry touching cause and remedy?

The West India Colonies are in extreme suffering, which injures greatly the community at home—Is no pledge coupled with the slavery one, that their condition shall be dispassionately examined in order to administer relief?

The revenue is sinking—Is no pledge called for of full enquiry into the causes?

A vast portion of the working classes are enduring bitter want and wretchedness, from inability to procure a sufficiency of employment—Is no pledge here insisted on of honest enquiry and remedy?

Another vast portion of these classes are enduring such want and wretchedness, because the extreme of toil will not enable them to earn a sufficiency of necessaries—Is no pledge of enquiry and remedy here demanded?

The community generally is overwhelmed with grievous loss and distress—Is no pledge rigorously exacted here of searching investigation and adequate remedy?

These questions must be answered in the negative; party and faction have their pledge-grinders, but not the empire. Pledges abound to delude, but not to instruct—to destroy, but not to save—to take away bread, but not to bestow it—to overthrow the empire, but not to give it prosperity and happiness. The pledges imposed on the members are confined to the production of confiscation, beggary, hunger, nakedness, ignorance, barbarism, misery, crime, and public ruin. Were the counter ones we have named proposed, all sides, and especially those the most likely to benefit from them, would hoot and mob the proposers from the hustings.

Shall we be silent touching the elections of Scotland, which are fashioned and restricted in so exquisite a manner, that even party can raise no promising contest in them, fitness of candidate cannot force itself into their notice, and almost every elector can, directly or indirectly, find a market for his vote with the Ministry? Shame on the rulers who buy Scotch burghs by wholesale, and then disfranchise and inflict corporal punishment on the poor English burgess for receiving a few pounds for his plumper! If Mr Hume may be believed, independence and patriotism can only reach the odd five of the forty-five members; and if history may be looked at, talent and eloquence are kept in hopeless exclusion from the whole forty-five. On any question which is purely Scottish, and which frets the spirit of nationality in Scotland, they may shew tongue and mettle; but in regard to English questions, or those which belong to the empire generally, eight-ninths of them are the menials of government, and are separated from public feeling and interest.

And must we not speak of the Irish elections? Here we have, in proud contrast, sturdy freedom and independence in the elector; so fiercely independent is the latter, that he even spurns from him the fetters of his landlord. What are the fruits? In Ireland, above all other parts of the United Kingdom, the elector needs wise legislation to improve his condition; here we have want, wretchedness, barbarism, and evil habits almost without parallel, and which wholesome laws alone can remove; to the gifted legislator, here is the field which abounds beyond all others in legitimate employment for talent and eloquence. Surely, then, the electors can only be appealed to on grounds purely national—can only be won by professions to labour rationally and zealously for the bettering of their circumstances. Alas! woe to the candidate who may try to gain a seat from them on such grounds and professions! Here are the grand parties of Protestant and Catholic; to gather what may escape them, we have the grand ones of the Aristocracy and the Independents; and to prevent any gleanings, we have the grand ones of the landlords, and the combined demagogues and Catholic Priesthood. Of course, we have no real Irish party—no party for giving food and raiment, competence and prosperity, to the electors; there is not refuse left to form even the semblance of such a party.

The elections are naturally furiously contested; the "mad blood," as O'Connell calls it, of the electors, makes them a matter of bludgeon-work,—a war of physical strength, which must be decided by wounds and slaughter, as well as votes. The contests turn on the efforts of the Protestants and Catholics, the landlords and tenants, the general aristocracy, and the combined demagogues and priests, to triumph over each other, merely to return members of the same general creed, and equally regardless of Ireland's weal. The candidate of the Protestants, or the landlords, differs not in general from the one of the Catholics, or the peasantry; both will act alike in Parliament. To elect practically the same men—the same foes and betrayers—Protestants and Catholics tear each other to pieces; tenants provoke the iron grasp of the law, expulsion from home, and the most hopeless ruin, and the people maim and murder each other. On the hustings, the candidates scarcely profess to differ beyond the senseless animosities of their parties; and in Parliament, they form one harmonious whole, bartering Ireland, and every thing else, to the Ministry, for the means of gorging their extravagance and licentiousness.

The doctrine is threadbare enough that extremes meet. The extreme of restriction in Scotland, and that of freedom in Ireland, return members of the same character. The members here do not neutralize each other—almost all stand on one side to bear down the few exceptions on the other: But what are those who thus contribute so powerfully to form the majority of the House of Commons? They are menials of the Ministry—men who in general never look at public interest, national sentiment, or any thing save the Minister's will, from sordid selfishness.

Let us now look at the composition of the New House of Commons. In the first place, we have the two grand parties of the Ministerialists and the Whigs: the representatives who form them are elected on the principle of obeying their leaders only, in utter contempt of the weal and voice of the community; the personal interests of these leaders perpetually clash with those of the empire. The parties, to a great extent, neutralize each other; therefore, when they do not act to produce evil, the representatives they consist of are virtually nominal ones, who deprive their constituents of the elective franchise.

Next, we have the members returned by the East and West India bodies, and similar corporations; they, of course, are the instruments of these bodies, and have nothing to do with public interests and feelings.

Then we have the independent members. The system on which they are elected prohibits them, in a large degree, from being other than imbecile and ignorant, profligate and regardless of the country. Some of them buy their seats for corrupt purposes, and others are returned by the most corrupt means.

Looking at the balance between the two grand parties which practically forms the House of Commons, we find that it is composed, 1. Of English members who have been elected without regard to fitness, who are above the influence of their constituents, who are incapable and without principle, and who, if they have any bonds imposed on them in the shape of creed and pledge, have only such as will bind them to the production of evil. 2. Of Scotch members who cannot be reached by public feeling, and who have been elected to be the Ministry's mercenaries. And 3. Of Irish members who are regardless of constituents, and make themselves such mercenaries from corrupt motives. This balance comprehends a sprinkling of able, patriotic men; but they are in a minority, and powerless. It consists principally of such Scotch and Irish members as we have described, and, of course, they really form the House of Commons. For some time, the English members, as a whole, have been in the minority; and these Scotch and Irish ones have held the majority and ruled the empire.

No one can feel surprised if such a House of Commons do not work well; on the contrary, sensible people may exclaim—How can it be prevented from destroying the empire? We can only return this answer—It is so prevented by the tender mercies of the Ministerial and Whig leaders. If they become savage, they can cause it to devour the community; if they in late years had wished it to sweep away laws and institutions, prosperity and happiness, property, bread, clothes, and shelter, with infinitely more rapidity than it did, it would have been their instrument.

Now comes an admirable part of the matter. The new House of Commons assembles, and lo! the worthy electors are horror-struck at its conduct; they cannot sufficiently marvel at its ignorance and incapacity, its corruption and profligacy, its destitution of sympathy with public feeling, and its abandoned scorn of the public voice. They complain, and it laughs at them; they petition, and it covers them with insult. They get mightily angered, and make a display of virtuous, patriotic words, quite enchanting. The men who will not make the smallest effort to obtain proper representatives—those who will support none but servile tools of party—those who compel their dependents to vote for such tools—those who support the brainless, profligate candidate against the wise and virtuous one—those who bind their candidates to strip them of their possessions—the dolt who votes for the “Third Man,” no matter what he may be—the knave who uses the franchise only to extract the greatest portion of criminal gain from it—and the traitors who sell themselves in the lump, like a drove of cattle, to the highest bidder—all harmoniously join in vituperating the House, and calling for its Radical Reform.

Let Parliament be dissolved, and these fine, free, independent, and patriotic electors will all act precisely in the same manner at the election.

Remedy!—yes, for the sake of human nature, let it be granted! Reform—Radical Reform!—yes, for the salvation of our beloved country, let it be no longer delayed. But what Radical Reform? That of the electors—the Radical Reformers. Without this, the House of Commons, however it may be changed, will not be reformed. What—smite the corrupt boroughmonger, and spare the more corrupt supporter of the “Third Man?”—remove the impurities and criminalities of the close borough, and preserve the greater impurities and criminalities of the open one? Away with the folly! and let us hear something befitting statesmen to utter. Give us intelligent, virtuous, independent, patriotic electors; and we shall find in them a House of Commons of similar character. They will reform the House, not only in effect, but in construction; they will work the miracle of compelling it to reform itself. If this be denied us, we must make the best of a bad matter, and exclaim in the delirious merriment of a General Election—Hurrah! for a House of Commons incapable and corrupt; severed from the feelings of the community, and contemptuously hostile to its prayers!—HURRAH! FOR THE FALL OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE!

THE REGATTA.

I.

Ho ! hearty Steeple-chasers,
 Ho ! gallants of the Turf ;
 Come, see our Ocean-racers,
 Our leapers of the surf !—
 See the foil'd waves split and blazing,
 Round our bows untired and free,—
 Leave your wearied steeds a-grazing,
 And come with us to Sea.

II.

Ho ! Sporters of the Fancy,
 Leave—leave your bloody cheer,
 Your ring's compass unchancy,
 For that we're boxing here :
 Our Sea-champion, you'll find her Crossbuttocking the wave ;
 The wave will rise behind her,
 Nor feel the fall she gave.

III.

Blythe Brethren of the Angle,
 Leave trouting-pools, and come
 Where shoals, like rainbows, spangle
 The whale's and craken's home.
 Leave silken tackle tender,
 And rushlike rod, so fine,—
 Come feel a shoulder-bender,
 Tug at a ten-hook line !

IV.

Leave, Bucks, your dainty dresses,
 Uncurl your hair again ;
 Or bring your woman's tresses—
 Our spray will make you men !
 Come—leave that trick of toilet,
 The glove, upon the strand,
 Our tarr'd tackle would soil it—
 Come—men in heart and hand !

V.

Leave, Scholar, in thy study,
 The Ithacan to sail,
 The type-storm ne'er will ruddy,
 Like our breeze, thy cheek so pale.
 Leave—Doctors of Divinity,
 Leave—Doctors of the Law—
 The land a day in unity—
 Split seas instead of straws !

VI.

But whether Scholars zealous,
 Or Bucks, or Bloods, ye be,
 Leave—all who are Good Fellows—
 No jot of jollity !
 For wit, like wine-cups flowing,
 And manly mirth and glee,
 Set life at ten knots going—
 Then come with us to Sea !

WILD-FOWL SHOOTING.

PLEASURE in the way we like it—is a toast or prayer of an ancient date. Now, what think ye, most comfortable of subscribers, of being posted, for hours, by the side of a river, or anchored, half a night, among the chilling winds in a creek, watching for wild-fowl, perhaps up to the knees, or even elbows, in sludge, mud, and mire, or lying diffused thereon, motionless as a dead body left by the ebbing tide? The bare idea makes you shiver as you are voluptuously lolling all your lazy length on a sofa, imbedded in cushions, with Maga on your bosom. Yet such spirits as Colonel Hawker and Christopher North pursue such pastime with a passion that transcends that of the honeymoon. Cold! What the deuce can make a man cold who is in momentary expectation of a flight of wild-geese or swans wheeling over his head in the darkness, and then settling on a shoal within shot, some thousand strong? Not all the sleet that ever storm-driven bashed into a human face; not all the frost that ever transformed human whiskers into icicles; not all the winds that ever searched, not all the rains that ever soaked, can, in such a condition, chill a true sportsman's blood! There is a fire in his heart, and a fire in his brain—the two principal rooms in the Palace of the Soul. Hope, the instant the flame flags, flings in fresh fuel, and Desire sweeps away the ashes.

But think not from this, that when shooting wild-fowl by night, either Colonel Hawker or We are stark-naked, or even thinly clad. The reverse is the truth. It would do your heart good to see our water-boots. Placed beside them, the jack-boots of a French postilion would seem mere shadows—absolute spectres—wraiths. The Colonel purchases his—so do we after his example—ready made from Mr Cox in Poole, whose principal business is exportation of them to Newfoundland. Not that Mr Short of East Yarmouth is not also a miraculous water-bootmaker. Some of the fen sportsmen indeed call him the “Emperor of the bootmakers.” But we glory in Cox. So far from being hard to the feet—or heavy—why, they are the softest possible wear, and are very light. They come almost as far above our knees as our fork will admit; and ~~we~~ may well wonder, with Colonel Hawker, at the ignorance or infatuation of crack coachmen and guards, who in rain and snow are never seen in Coxes or Shorts, and consequently are all cut off in the prime of life, .

“Some sleeping kill’d—
All murder’d!”

For these life-preservers various dressings are recommended, though perhaps, as the Colonel says, any grease may answer. But the first and most effectual application should be tar, tallow, and bees’ wax melted, (not too warm—not too warm, mind ye,) and then poured into the boots, which, after having had this composition shaken into every part of them, should be hung up to let it run out. By this dressing, and the sacrifice (not ruinous to a man of moderate means) of the first pair of stockings that follows it, you, at least we, may walk in any river or sea with more comfort than a Bond Street lounge—in the articles he supposes and calls boots—could cross the street after a shower sufficient to lay the dust. But suppose your heel should get galled? Then, beware of the surgeon’s diachylon-plaster. In cold weather it curls up, and torments you so much in walking, that you soon become lame again, and then wish the doctor at Jericho. Go, then—we beseech you with Colonel Hawker—to Godfrey’s, or some other first-rate chemist, in order to get the sticking-plaster in perfection, as many a one, besides Editors, has poisoned his heels from want of a genuine article, and been forced to give up his work. Mind—let the plaster—before application—for a moment be heated by the fire as well as wetted—and then—provided it has been stamped by a wadding-punch—and that, when on and dry, you put over it a little cold cream, or any kind of grease—it will stick as fast, or faster than your own skin, and adhere to your heels when perhaps they have been deserted by all the whole world. Water-boots must always be worn—mind that—with an extra pair of coarse yarn stockings—and in very cold nights—instead of them, with thickest wads—over understockings of the warmest quality—such as Sanguhar hose—which the Colonel purchases from Mr Otley in Sidney's Alley. Over our boots we draw a pair of short, loose sailcloth trowsers—or if the thermometer be about Zero—of Flushing coating. We judge it needless to hint that we had previously cased our thighs in stout flannel-drawers, and that never but once in our lives—and the effect had nearly been fatal—did we omit the more than ceremony of pulling on a pair of the strongest breeches. With regard to farther covering for the body, over flannel and linen shirts—could he ensure not getting wet—the Colonel would prefer leather. But taking all weathers, a shag waistcoat—shag both before and behind—is best. Under this waistcoat should be worn a Flushing-frock, and over it a short jacket, of either drab-cloth or swanskin. Mr Lloyd, 13, Old Bond street, has invented an excellent, though simple, defender for the chest, which he calls an Anglesey; and a large shawl handkerchief should be worn over the collar. A pair of worsted wristbands, sold by the name of muffatics, should be worn with cloth gloves; and over gloves and all, a large and long pair of double swanskin cuffs, which are as warm as any muff, and may be drawn or shook off in an instant, when you want your right hand for the trigger. Now for our Surtout, by way of Dreadnought. It is made from a recipe given us by the Colonel, who rightly conceives it may be of great service to every class of the community, except tailors who might lose business by it, and their satellites the dandies, who would faint at the sight of it. Colonel Hawker nobly acknowledges that he was not the inventor of this Dreadnought. He got the recipe at Waterton, in Norfolk, from the factotum of all the wet-work, one Larry Rogers, who calls it his "Sou'-wester." In this dress—with water-boots and over-alls, every thing but a man's eyes, which t marks he may and his mouth may fortify at Messrs Friburg's, is as independent of rain as a Charley in his watch-box. Only think of it—it is so light and convenient for the arms, that you may walk, ride, run, or take any exercise whatever, without being heated as with other surtouts. But you will say—Pray describe this "Larry Rogers' Sou'-wester!" Be patient. Well, then, it is a loose over-all frock-coat of Russia-duck—with a hood or cap with a flap behind, like that of a coalheaver. Into the outside of the whole apparel is well worked with a clean paint-brush, the first coating of two quarts and a half of linseed oil, boiled down from three quarts in about three hours. Having dried the dreadnought in the air every dry day for a fortnight, John gives it a second coating; so that now, if held up, it would hold gallons of water, like a pail without a flaw. This garment, Colonel Hawker says—for we never used ours in that capacity—if made double-breasted, with buttons only on the right side, and none on the sleeves, which should be sewn close, is, without exception, the best he ever used for throwing a casting-net. The man—Lord Wellington excepted—who walks with an umbrella under his arm, or over his head, through the streets of a populous city, is a monster not fit to live; but a large old umbrella, fitted up with brown oiled holland, is the greatest possible comfort and shelter to men in a punt. Moreover, it makes a capital mizen-sail when going before the wind, and is a complete shield to you and your man from the shaking of a wet dog. The man, therefore, who, in such circumstances, does not use one, is not fit to die.—We had almost forgot our cap. It is of the same swanskin as our jacket, and under it we wear a Welsh wig. There we are in your mind's eye—and do not you think Christopher North must stand in this rig, to John Watson Gordon, for the next Exhibition of the Scottish Academy?

Colonel Hawker is one of the best shots in England, and his Instructions to Sportsmen,* the very best have on the subject. It has ugh many editions, and will gh many more; nor can we suppose the time when it shall be superseded by a superior work. It is rich in the fruits of long experience; and the Colonel perspicuously expresses his practice, with a disdain of all parade, rigmarole, quackery, or exaggeration. It would be impossible regularly to review a volume so full of minute details; but we shall select a few sections which may be made not a little interesting, we think, even to such of our readers as never let off a gun in their lives—even to our fair readers, who are prohibited by their sex from a knowledge of the difference between powder and shot. We have often observed that females are as much alarmed at the sight of a shot-belt as at that of a powder-flask. A musket ball lying far from the fire, some few of them can regard with tolerable composure; but No. 7 they expect to explode like nitre if they but touch it with the lustre of their eyes. Yet even they may read with interest a description of "Wild-Fowl Shooting," abridged by Kit from the Colonel. Formal extracts in small type are cumbrous in a composition of moderate length, and break the charm of continuity; so, as is our use and wont with able writers, like Lloyd and Hawker, we shall help ourselves to all the best things, and by breathing through the whole something of our own spirit and speech, probably produce a very superior article.

The Colonel laughs, like an old soldier, at the want of gumption exhibited by most persons who are desirous of slap-banging at wild-fowl. They usually drive to an inn on the coast, and call the waiter, who recommends an honest boatman, for whom Boots is instantly dispatched. On his arrival, being as much distinguished for sharp-sightedness as for integrity, he sees your feverish anxiety to be off, and screws you up to the highest sticking-place of price. He shews you thousands of birds, all jabbling, and dabbling, and paddling away in places where he well knows no boat built by man, or devil either, can ever get at them; that your reputation as a fowler may, on your return to Boniface's, burn bright, he accommodates you with a few of his own killing, the day, or perhaps the week before, charging a teal at a goose, a goose at a swan, and a swan at a respectable deposit in the bank—and to-day ends with your having bagged perhaps a couple of gulls, each nearly as large as yourself, and to-morrow begins with your somewhat sulkily discharging a ten-pound bill. Gentlemen-shooters, too, are generally averse to get covered all over with mud and mire—nay often will not go low enough for fear of dirtying their knees, and trust too much to their crack shooting at long distances—while your rustic red-reaver, whose knees are barked with sludge from January to December, crawls close upon the birds like a serpent.

The least scientific sort of wild-fowl shooting is called "FLIGHT-SHOOTING." Most wild-fowl keep constantly passing in small "trips" about the dusk of the evening; and after having collected in the night, they return in a few large flocks at or before the dawn of morning. Wait for them, then, judiciously, and even with a small gun you may sometimes commit great slaughter. Be motionless as a mummy, and in dress a Quaker, and stand in ambush, by bank or tree. Thus situated, you will be able, says the Colonel,—(ah! how often have we done so, half a century ago)—to distinguish the different sorts, long before they come within shot, and be struck with the wild retirement of the scene. You will note the whistle which announces the approach of the widgeon—the similitude to a storm of the rapid-flying dun-birds—the shrill-sounding pinions of the wild-ducks—and the mournful notes of the plover, with the roar of a bursting surge, and discordant screams of sea-fowl. If you have any imagination in you at all, you cannot but be affected, even poetically, in such an ambush; but poetry changes into fine, free, bold, and sonorous prose, when, on some boisterous night, beating up against the wind, and thereby obliged to keep in a crowd, a flight comes low on, right over your ambush! You may then keep two guns going faster than yourself and servant can load them, and, while loading, never look up, for the birds are there, and looking up can only serve to put your honour into a flurry. But, should the weather be clear, and the birds come in high, then conceal yourself in a canoe between the banks of some small creek, for they will lower their flight on reaching the mud, and probably give you as many fair shots as you can fire during the arrival, which may continue about half an hour. The flight proceeds over the fire, for on such occasions wild-fowl do not understand the manœuvre of a retreat. We daresay this mistaken advance is generally as conducive to safety as a retrograde movement could be under a very Massena.

Wild-fowl shooting is no joke, let us tell you, in a "HAMPSHIRE LAUNCHING-PUNT." Though very long, that punt is so light and narrow as just to hold one person, with a gun of about seventy pounds weight, six feet long in the barrel, fixed on a swivel, and resting in the prow. You row with your back to the gun till you see the fowl, then turn round on your face, and work along either with a loaded stick or with two paddles. For this sport, the prime place perhaps in all the world, is the vast tract of Ooze, near Lymington. As soon as the widgeons are pitched, or settled, then off the regular fowlers set, in tarpaulin dresses, black as so many chimney-sweeps, crawling on their knees, and shoving their punt before them along the mud. No matter whether light or dark—birds few or many—bang goes the gun—they pick up the dead—and off again, travelling in this way all night along the mud, and rowing across the creeks, similar to the march of an army of coots. This is the most laborious and the most filthy work in all the department of wild-fowl shooting; and breaks the haunt of the birds, without yielding suitable returns. A family, who are by far the best launchers in Hampshire, have been reduced, the Colonel tells us, to absolute distress for a livelihood. It is also pursued in perpetual peril. Even when firing from the dry mud, it is dangerous to the men, whose bad big guns often burst; and their punts are so crank, that they not unfrequently upset. Sometimes, too, the men are overtaken by a quick flood-tide, and drowned. There is another contrivance for traversing the oozes—simply a slight board with sides, somewhat in shape like the fore-end of a Hampshire punt sawed off, and a tail-board or bench put across it. The gunner first lays his hand-gun into this "mud-boat," and then kneeling on the bench with one knee, he kicks along with the other leg, and advances with a rapidity incredible; and when that leg is tired, he changes it, and away as before. Having got pretty near his birds, he lies down in his mud-boat, in which, if the mud be soft, he can work along with his feet; but if it be hard, he must "hold on," and shove this kind of sledge before him with severest toil. He lies close on his chest to fire, and has a stock cut away at the butt, which is filled with horse hair. This so much eases the recoil from his collar-bone, that unless in a short punt, where guns are apt to strike harder, he can fire half-a-pound of shot at a time. "Although," says Colonel Hawker, "I cannot suppose that the generality of sportsmen would ever think of adopting this method, yet I have given directions for it, because I am fond of any thing original." He illustrates it by a striking plate—for the Colonel draws spiritedly, and his sketches are well engraved on steel by H. Adlard.

The POOLE CANOE, again, is quite a different sort of concern, being sharp at both ends like a Greenland whale-boat, and drawing only two or three inches of water, and so light as sometimes to weigh only about 60 pounds. In this shallow you sit down on some straw or rushes, with your gun by your side, and a small Newfoundland dog in the stern. You keep rowing about till you see or hear a flock of wild-fowl on the mud; then in with oars, out with your stick or gunning-spread, with which you push along, completely hid by the mud-banks which stand above the little channels. Having come within reach, you either get aground at the side of the creek, or you steady your canoe by forcing each oar from between the throwls into the mud, otherwise the recoil of the gun will set her rocking, and you may be tilted out. Having made all fast—up and fire; if by day or moonlight, and the birds close, then directly at them; and if beyond forty yards, at their heads; in starlight, take your aim just on the top of the narrow black line, in which birds always appear to one who is low down; and should it be so dark that you cannot see your gun, present, as you think, about a foot over them, or you will most likely shoot a foot under them, and wound the mud. If successful, your ears will be regaled with the music of your cripples beating on the mud, before your dazzled eyes can perceive their gambols. Your man then puts on his mud-boards, taking the setting pole to support him, and assists the dog in collecting the killed and wounded. The gunner generally calculates on bringing home the half only of what he shoots—his winged birds, called cripples, often escaping, and those which fall out of boards, called droppers, being all lost. Within these very few years, however, Poole Harbour, as well as almost every other part of the English coast, has been ruined for all the poor hand-gunners, by the introduction of punt-guns, that carry from one to nearly two pounds of shot. The gunner's principal enemy is the curlew, which watchful sentinel often springs up from the edges of the creeks, and alarms a bank of birds.

The Colonel enters with great zest into his chapter of "General instructions for sea-coast wild-fowl shooting WHEN AFLOAT." For it is extremely rare, he observes, that one meets a gentleman who can, or a professional gunner who will, give any information on the subject. The art is therefore the least understood of any sport in existence. No man who had a large gun, and could earn five pounds in a day or night, would be bored with a gentleman for the sake of his five shillings, and, therefore, the only man likely to be hired at a good time for this sport, is some boatman who has little to recommend him beyond a local knowledge of the harbour, and who therefore requires some one to direct him how to manœuvre the birds.

The best time for this sport with a canoe and shoulder gun, provided it be low water or half ebb, while you are hid in the creeks, is a clear, frosty, moonlight night, when the wind happens to blow towards you as you face the moon. For the sense of smelling in wild-fowl is most acute, and they have also a good eye in their heads. At such times, being on the shining mud-banks, they appear quite black, all but the old cock widgeons, on the wings of which you may often see the white, as they all walk about beyond gun range. Much, however, may be done without a bright moon, nay, the old Poole men, among whom there were formerly some of the best shoulder gunners in the kingdom, prefer but little moon even for the mud. By constant habit, they can easily distinguish the black phalanx of widgeons from the shades on the places they frequent, and particularly if feeding among puddles which have been left by the tide. Your first concern is to ascertain that the black patch seen is a flock of birds, and that you will do by observing the occasional change of feature in the outside of it. This requires a practised eye, for the fluctuations in the form of the feeding mass, though frequent, indeed almost constant, is gradual and slight, and it was long before we could so depend upon our eyes as to feel justified in letting fly. The next lesson to learn is, not to be deceived as you approach, by their enormous masses and tremendous noise, into a belief that they are nearer than they really are, and thus be tempted to fire out of shot. Thirdly, be not too eager in collecting your dead birds; for often, in hard weather, the flock will again pitch down among the killed and wounded, particularly if some of the younger birds have been winged, which have not the cunning, like the old ones, to make off for a creek.

Night shooting, of late years, has chiefly been among the widgeon; for the geese seldom venture much in harbour by night, while the greater part of the ducks, teal, dun-birds, and "the rest," repair inland to the ponds and fresh springs, unless driven to the salt feeding ground by severe frost. A company of widgeons, when first collecting, may be heard at an immense distance, by the whistling of the cocks and the purring of the hens; but when they are quietly settled, and busy at feed, you sometimes can hear only the motion of their bills, which is similar to that of tame ducks. As they feed in thousands, the squatter-squatter makes mud-music delightful to the sportsman's ear. There, unless disturbed, they will remain as long as the tide allows them a place to stand on; and, as the mud begins to disappear, they will concentrate themselves on the last uncovered spot, where, as soon as the water begins, in gunner's phrase, to whiten the mud, vast multitudes are seen literally wedged together, and then so loath are they to fly, their greed and gluttony being at the height of their enjoyment, that they will seldom stir till the water actually sets them afloat. Now is your time! The unsuspecting mass of fowl appears, as you approach, like the indistinct view of an island. It grows blacker and blacker, till you see it is made of birds. Now comes the critical moment! Perhaps, unless you have "a good loom," that is, high black land to advance from, the moon suddenly comes forth too bright, and must give you pause. Perhaps some straggling bird gives the alarm, or some senseless goose of a man ruins all by firing a shot. Then, like a roar of thunder, uprises the close congregation of wings, and off to the open sea. How the human soul can outlive such an agony we know not; but in one case we believe we were finally restored to our senses, from a state of distraction bordering on insanity, partly by the influence of religion, and partly by a determination to shoot the fool, knave, thief, robber, villain, whose fire, like a spark falling on a barrel of gunpowder, set the living lump into explosion, while, at that moment, the whole earth seemed to us overwhelmed with disappointment and despair, deprived of all that made this life worth the love and longing of an immortal spirit. But the darkness of the night, and the sinner's conscious guilt, that kept his canoe motionless in the mud, unfortunately interposed between us and the performance of justifiable homicide. But if all go well,—ye gods, what joy! You and your boatman open your masked battery upon their black columns, and by first cutting a lane through them with a pound of the smallest duck shot, and then each of you discharging a large duck-gun, you may possibly secure a hundred widgeon, as fast as yourselves and dog can collect them on flood or mud. Colonel Hawker's man, James Read, on one occasion, with a common shoulder gun that carried only five ounces of shot, getting almost aboard of them before he let drive, out of thirty birds closely wedged together, killed and fairly bagged twenty. But now comes, if you be not cool, a chance of your being drowned, or at least suffocated. Many lives have been lost by both persons in the boat having quitted it at the same time to take prisoners. It may drift away, and leave you in the hands of that ugly customer the tide. Let one go out for the birds, with the setting-pole to support him, on his mud pattens, and with the fork at the end to pin down the wounded birds in the mud, and the other keep close to him in the boat, rowing or pushing with an oar, and killing all birds that are afloat. 'Tis hot work, we assure you; and you begin to sweat like devils at the coal-skuttle.

Bright star-light is the very best of all times for getting at birds, as the tide flows over the mud—especially if there be a cold black frost; fog, snow, or any other lazy weather, the worst. For then every thing on the water appears large and black, and all birds soon take alarm. The novice, he fancies just the reverse, and hazy himself perhaps, goes out in a haze. He does not know that a marsh or fen is one thing, and the sea another; for in the fens and marshes fog is often the best weather; on the sea never, but always the reverse. In white frosts widgeons are generally restless, and in very dark weather, they are suspicious, and more on the watch than in star-light. But if the wind blows fresh enough to drown the noise of a launching-punt, some heavy shots may now and then be made at that season, by sweeping the surface of the mud to the sound of the flock walking and feeding. In mild weather, again, widgeon are generally scattered about, like rooks, till after midnight, unless they become concentrated by the flow of the surrounding tide—whereas in cold weather, they always sit close together. But perhaps the first night or two of thaw, after a sharp frost, is the most blessed and bloodiest time for this sport. Then the passion of hunger makes them heedless as that of love, and 'tis glorious to send murder in among the millions of gluttons exposing themselves without fear and without shame on the mud-banks. The nick of time is when the birds are "on their last legs," just before the tide sets them afloat. The thicker the weather, the more silent is the widgeon when pitched. A shrill clear pipe denotes a single cock widgeon, a long loud "purre," a hen; but when the call of the cock is one short soft note, and not so often repeated, then you may expect to find a company, the gunner's phrase for a large flock. Then you will probably soon hear the birds, "all in a charm," that is in full concert (we should say in a charm.) When widgeon are in a charm, they are not minding you; but when they are quite silent, they are as likely as not suspecting an enemy. At the moment, you must keep still, till they open again, and so on till you see them; and then, in starlight, you are generally near enough, at all events for a large gun, to give them your royal salute. 'Tis a bad omen to hear, before the mud is covered, birds walking away, and neither feeding nor "speaking;" for it shews they have some suspicion of your "whereabouts," and are half inclined to be off to sea. When birds are about 100 yards off, you may hear them feeding; and at that distance, the noise at supper is like the gentle falling of water, and is often mistaken for it at ebb of tide. The Colonel, at the close of his enumeration of all the necessary requisites for night-shooting, declares that if well understood, and well managed, you are just about as sure of getting a fair shot, in a favourable time, at wildfowl, as you would be with a young partridge to a dead point in standing clover—and that is as sure as that Mr Goulburn is the poorest Chancellor of the Exchequer that ever opened a budget.

The Colonel is strong on "STANCHION OR PUNT-GUNS." He has found by practical experiment, that gunmakers have yet much to learn. In order to go in shallow water, the punt must be as light as possible; but if it be as light as possible, then he holds that the universal system of entirely confining the gun under the barrel, so that it cannot be relieved even one inch in the recoil, is very bad—for the sudden check, besides throwing the muzzle out of the proper direction, might occasion an upset. But the check at the moment of ignition injures the shooting of the gun in every respect. The Colonel gives us the result of an experiment made by himself and Elijah Buckle, one of the best stanchion-gunners in England. The gun was loaded with a pound of shot, and two ounces of Messrs Curtis and Harvey's best "gunning powder." The Colonel fired from the confined swivel, the fancy of the London gunmakers; in doing which, he levelled at least a foot over the object, and by this means, as the water and paper proved, shot perfectly accurate. Elijah then fired, having taken level at the centre of the object, from the swivel; and the whole charge went into the water, before it had gone ninety yards where the target was placed. The Colonel began forthwith to abuse Mr D'Ess, the maker, and said that he hoped that Buckle, an experienced gunner and engineer, (Elijah had been a long time in his Majesty's service,) was convinced of the badness of the gun. But the old tar said, that both the London gentleman and the Colonel had a little to learn yet, and saying, "Heave away that humbugging swivel," by means of a large bolster of sheep-wool, fired the gun from his shoulder, with the same charge as before, put in by the Colonel. He presented as usual, directing at the object, and made such a shot as the barrel had never before been known to make, both for strength and closeness. The Colonel then tried the same method, with about ten ounces of shot, levelling at instead of over the mark, and the shot were delivered with the greatest accuracy—the gun going with this charge from the recoil five inches under his arm. He then tried it with an equal charge from the swivel—aiming at the mark, and though the recoil was hardly perceptible, still the shot fell entirely under it. On the other extreme, the Colonel saw a gun fired by the owner of it, one Samuel Singer, at Poole, which weighs 141 pounds, on a swivel, and mounted very light forward; and he was obliged to present very far under the object, as his whole charge went over every thing. Sam, therefore, doused the swivel, and substituted a rope breeching. But a rope breeching is apt to break, and has often proved dangerous; for the gun, with a breeching, goes nearly as far back as the rope will stretch, say an inch or two, and then springs forward again for about a foot. Therefore the grand object is—how to take off the recoil? This object none of the London gunmakers have attained; but Colonel Hawker thinks he has; and as the Colonel, though enthusiastic, is the very reverse of a quack, we are willing to believe he has, although it is entirely out of our power to describe here the properties of his invention. The Colonel now has a GUN which he considers perfect. Before it was brought to that state, it went through the hands of Mr D'Ess, Mr Fullard, Mr Joseph Manton, Mr Westley Richards, Mr Parsons of Salisbury, Mr Long of Andover,—all Illustrissimi, besides journeymen in the Colonel's own employ; and as so many artificers have been separately occupied in completing it, he thinks he may safely defy any one of them to turn out such an article, until they have seen and had explained to them, in its finished state, the EDWARD IRVING, or, par excellence, THE GUN. It was the opinion of a distinguished officer in the navy, before whom the Colonel several times fired the Edward Irving, that his plan for easing the recoil would answer extremely well for the caronades in his Majesty's service. Should the Lords of the Admiralty honour Colonel Hawker so far as to make use of the principle on which Edward Irving is superior to all other great guns, in the navy, he recommends them to Mr Westley Richards of Birmingham, the mechanic who so ably manufactured Long Ned, as he is called familiarly, after the model and constructions sent by our author for the finishing of the phenomenon.

But the ingenious Colonel has not confined himself to the improvements of great guns alone, but likewise of punts themselves, and has had one constructed on his own scheme, which may be safely used with a sail in going over the flooded mud at spring-tides, and will set and row as well as any boat that can possibly be made to carry two hands with ease, comfort, and safety. In such a punt, wild-fowl shooting is peculiarly calculated for the amusement of a gentleman, as he may go out between breakfast and dinner; and in frosty weather, perhaps kill his twenty or thirty couple, followed by his companions, who may keep at a distance to enjoy the effect of the shot, and afterwards join in the "cripple chase." As to the ninnies who fancy punt-shooting such a very dangerous amusement, let them, if they can—but they are too ignorant on that and all other subjects to institute comparisons—let them, says the Colonel, compare the accidents that happen in it with those in fox-hunting, battu shooting, or any other sport, and see in which they most frequently occur, though this pursuit is generally followed by poor men who have the worst, the other by gentlemen who are provided with the best, of every thing. In Poole harbour, for example, where the channels at times are far more dangerous than in most other places, and where, at a rough guess, he says there may be a hundred canoes, yet for these last fifteen years, which is as long as he has known the place, he never heard but of one man being drowned, and he was not only subject to fits, but had left the shore when in liquor.

The Colonel having now got the gun and punt together perfectly to his mind, cannot help, in the joy of his heart, giving his fellow-creatures some farther instructions on wild-fowl shooting, essential to the comfort both of their bodies and their souls. For no man can keep his temper either in a professional business, or an unprofessional amusement, who feels that he knows nothing about the matter in hand; and when you lose your temper, you lose your happiness, and that is equivalent to the loss of your soul. The truth is, and must be let out, that there is more difficulty than people imagine, in shooting well into a large flock of wild-fowl. To kill partridges, at twenty, or even forty yards, right and left, fifty brace, without missing, is easy, and cannot be difficult, for it requires nothing else in all the wide world but a quick eye. In wild-fowl shooting, you have to make calculations without end, and to carry them into effect too, under the most difficult circumstances—from a boat, perhaps, rolling and pitching in a sea, and where one inch in aim, might make, in result, the difference between a great weight of widgeon, and not a single feather. We speak of partridges being wild. But what is their wildness to that of currees, or, in less provincial terms, all the various tribes of diving ducks?—Wildness is indeed but another name for sagacity, prudence, wisdom, and genius; for all of which currees are eminently distinguished, except at those times when they are reduced by hunger to the level of the rational creation. Then, one instinct overpowers all others, and they are circumvented as easily as if they were endowed with reason. But when each is in his usual way, a dunce must not dream of a diver. A duck is too much for him—far more than his match; and it requires a man who might write in Blackwood, successfully to paddle after currees in creeks, and suddenly popping on them in turning a corner, to scatter death through the air, and torment the mud with mortal flappings. True, that when currees are frost-driven from the ponds of gawky bird-fanciers, they fall an easy prey to the swivel. What glorious fun! By the discharge of your artillery, you stock the water with cripples, and then's the time for the percussion system! Well armed with little double detonators, you give scores the coup-de-grace, as they shrug themselves up into the size, apparently, of your hand, when wounded, to escape the final shot. One half of the currees will be off while you are killing the others, if you lose a moment; and therefore cartridges, and all other expeditious modes, are desirable, till after spouting fire, sans intermission, for an hour, and not a live curre remaining afloat or on the mud, you exchange your gun for a pocket-pistol, and take such a swig of Glenlivet, that Elijah lifts his wondering eyes to heaven, and laments that his master has drawn the charge to the last drop.

So much for currees—now for BRENT GESE, which, unless in very hard weather, are wild as zebras. In severe weather, as soon as the tide flows high enough to bear an enemy, they have the sense to leave the mud, and go off to sea. If it blow hard, so that they cannot weather it long enough outside harbour to feed, they then continue within it all day, but they will weather any thing, rather than trust themselves there at night. In mild weather you should follow a small flock in preference to a large one, for, as the Colonel observes, “recollect the more pairs of eyes the wilder the birds.” They feed greedily previous to leaving the harbour for the night, and therefore sunset is your time to sail round them, if possible, when they are all a-guzzle, as if supping at Ambrose's. Don't think, my good fellow, when you have hit a goose, that you have got him; for by far the greater part of those that are stopped by the shot, are well enough to swim and dive with the greatest agility, and they will all invariably make for the heaviest sea that is near. The boat which follows, therefore, should keep outside, armed with “cripple stoppers;” and turn the shattered ships, or geese, from going to sea. And attend to the Colonel—when you reach a wounded bird without a gun, take him horizontally across the neck with the edge of an oar, and don't keep thrashing away to no effect on his upper coverts of feathers as hard as nails, like a Johnny Raw at a thrashing floor, till you have splashed yourself from head to feet, and made yourselves ridiculous to the sea. In deep water, a dog can make no head against the divers; but in shallow water, a good one will do more in five minutes than a party of men could do in an hour.

So much for Brent Geese—now for HOOPERS or WILD-SWANS. About no other bird does the Colonel write so eloquently; for he always rises and falls with his subject—the golden rule. He observes, that when the winter advances, and the birds are driven from Holland and the Baltic to the more genial climate of the South, and then followed by severer weather to the refuge they have chosen, their last alternative is to leave the fens, ponds, and decoys, and take themselves to the sea-coast to shun starvation. Then, and then only it is, that all this diversion may be enjoyed in perfection, and without much trouble or difficulty. Then there is a variety of all kinds of wild-fowl, and sport for every shooter. Then only, continues the Colonel, can we expect to see the monarch of the tribe, the Hooper or Wild-Swan. In the year 1823, there was, he tells us, a fine specimen of all this on the Hampshire coast, the flats of which off Keyhaven and Pennington were, for some weeks, covered with ice and snow. Nothing could be more novel and beautiful than the appearance of the harbour, which was one solid region of ice, crowned with pyramids that had formed themselves on the drifted snow, and frozen like crystal —while, on the thaw, the harbour appeared like one huge floating island, as the ice which covered it was carried off by the fall of a high spring-tide. To see this huge body, says the Colonel, with the wild swans sitting upon it while it receded, and looking as if formed by nature for them, the only inhabitants of such a dreary region, gave the spectator more the idea of a voyage to the arctic circle, than the shore of a habitable country. The following morning, though it blew very hard, and poured with rain, every one was in arms for Seven Swans that again appeared, all anxiously hoping that they might swim or fly near enough for a shot. Having a punt that drew less water than those of the professional punters, the Colonel set off towards the Seven Swans. Covering himself and man with clean white linen, and white nightcaps, to seem snow, they floated down among the small flaws of white ice that were constantly drifting to seaward, and thus had a couple of hoopers in the boat, and another that afterwards dropped dead, on the arrival of the other punts.

Should you ever have the good fortune to come upon a wild-swan sitting, do not be flurried, for he will be obliged to keep beating the water for a good many yards and moments, in order to set his huge body on the wing, before he can rise above the level of your swivel. Take your time then, and he is slain. Wild-swans fly low, at least in harbour, or not far out at sea. Over mountains they soar a speck-like flight. Never shoot at a flying wild-swan till he has passed you, so as to shoot under his feathers, for otherwise you may as well shoot at a woolpack, or the woolsock. If a wild-swan rises out of shot, where he is likely to go entirely away, the Colonel tells us to present our small gun very far before and over him, as by firing so, we may sometimes make him "haul his wind," as the sailors call it, and come across, a fair shot for our large gun.

It is a pleasant mistake to make with one's eyes open—a tame for a wild swan. In hard weather, the common swans are sometimes driven from the ponds in gentlemen's "policies," or from the large swanneries, such as that at Abbotsbury in Dorsetshire. Congregating in flocks on the sea-shore, they get so shot at and driven about by all manner of poaching-punters, that they get as wild as any hoopers. The Colonel says, it is difficult to distinguish the one from the other till you hear the bird hoop; but, begging his pardon, surely the tame swan is in general far larger than the wild one; and likewise, in general, or rather always, of a purer white. True, that under two years of age, the hoopers, like other cygnets, are not white, but more or less of a dull fawn-colour; and then it is difficult to distinguish the two tribes. But not so with full-grown swans. But it is still easy to mistake them, even after inspecting their heads, and seeing that the naked skin above the bill on the tame swan is as black as my hat,—indeed much blacker, for my hat at present is brown; and in the wild swan a bright yellow, like Leigh Hunt's breeches.

We should love of all things in the sporting world to sail in the same boat with Colonel Hawker a-wild-fowl-shooting, "OUTSIDE HARBOUR." To venture after fowl at sea, you must have a large boat, with good bearings, and that will carry plenty of canvass. When it blows fresh, a fast-sailing boat may often run in upon geese, and sometimes other birds, before they can take wing; and after a coast has been for some time harassed by the gunning punts, the Colonel has seen more birds killed under sail from a common boat, than by any other manner of day-shooting. But to do the business well, you must have a stanchion-gun fixed in the boat, contrived so as to go back with the recoil, or you run the risk of staving your boat, and of forthwith finding yourself in the arms of Davy Jones, the devil. Always set sail for this sport with the wind off the land, and the tide flowing; for your boat, though full of bearings as possible, must have little keel, that she may take you at times within shot of the mud and sands, and also run through the shallows at spring tides without getting aground; and you have then no danger of filling your boat with the hollow sea off a lee-shore, or running her aground where you may stick till the death of your grandmother. Keep, if you can, always to windward of geese, that you may hear down on them at pleasure; and whenever they rise out of shot against the wind, then luff up directly, and try to head them for a cross shot. As the stanchion-gun, when on one tack, is in the way of the jib, the man who works the jib-sheets must look sharp to haul the weather one to windward, but not till the very moment you are going to fire, else you deaden the boat's way. You don't wish, my dear Cockney, (be not offended, for affection, you know, whimsically chooses, for terms of endearment, names, in their common sense, most odious,) to be drowned? Then, since for wild-fowl shooting in a boat outside of harbour, the more wind sometimes the more sport, never go with less than three good hands over and above yourself; and if you make fast the mainsheet, (if you do so in squally weather, says the Colonel, but if you do so in any weather say we,) then you deserve to be damned—that is all—and in all human probability will be so, after having been suffocated before you die with mouthful after mouthful of salt-water. Colliers will not use safety-lamps, and sailors will belay the mainsheet; and the consequence is, that, one day or other, the dare-devils are choked below with foul air, and sometimes, on inland lakes, such as Loch Lomond and Windermere, with fresh water.

The frontispiece to the Colonel's volume represents the sport we have now, chiefly in his own words, been describing—and it shews a scene in which we have often been partakers. There is the seaport, and inner harbour, with ships at anchor; we are in the offing, in a cutter bearing the Colonel's flag—there go the punters slap bang—the air is darkened with fowl-flights—the wounded and dying are tumbling down in all directions, or wading, plowtering, or diving,—curses, curlews, geese, and swans—"altogether just perfectly glorious." The plate is entitled—"Commencement of a Cripple-Chase, after firing 2 lbs. of shot into a skein of brent geese and two wild swans." The Colonel imagines some critical ninny finding fault with it interrogatively, and sets him right, by shewing, as is usual in all such cases, that his objections are founded in utter ignorance. "Why put all your wounded geese swimming one way?"—"Because geese

(and one would think you might have known that) when wounded, always make for the heaviest sea."—"Oh! but, why have you made birds falling when no gun is fired?"—"Because in wild-fowl shooting, one-third of the birds that are mortally wounded fly off apparently unhurt, and drop suddenly from the flock, perhaps stone-dead."—"Hem! But why is your wounded curlew on his legs, and the goose unable to dive, while the winged hoopoe is able to swim?"—"Give me your ear (aside—Heaven, what a length!) because the mud being convex in some places, the water that flows over it is only about three inches deep there, while it may be nearly a foot deep a few yards farther; and the web-footed bird always makes for the deep, while the wader seeks the shallow water. Pray, are you satisfied?"—"No; not quite. Who is the man taking the passing shot?"—"Why, Buckle with his punt, to be sure—Who else might it be, but the incomparable Buckle?"—"But what are they about in that yawl?"—"Why, that is the shooting-party, Christopher North, Tickler, and your humble servant Colonel Hawker—bearing down with our swivel in obedience to the punter's signal."—"Who is he—the fellow bellowing yonder?"—"The other man, to be sure, the other man, I say, standing on his mudboards, hallooing and swearing because he also cannot obey the signal to walk across and intercept the cripples."—"And why not?"—"Through fear of leaving two city gentlemen aground."—"What city-gentlemen?"—"Why, Tims and Stokes."—"Poor fellows, how frightened they look in their punt, with the waves dashing against its sides some inches high above the mud!"—"But see, their poodle-dog can contain himself no longer, and on hearing another shot, jumps overboard."—"That is a fine Newfoundland in the foreground! How he mouths!"—"Yes—he's sketched from a bitch of mine, imported from St John's—and I purpose sending the original down to Scotland to Christopher North, that she may bear a family of sons and daughters to O'Bronte, each of which will be a present fit for a prince—and the brightest black of the star-breasted shall be set aside for William the Fourth, our most gracious King!"

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

[It is somewhat strange that a class of men who can command such interesting, extensive, and instructive materials, as the experience of most members of the medical profession teems with, should have hitherto made so few contributions to the stock of polite and popular literature. The bar, the church, the army, the navy, and the stage, have all of them spread the volumes of their secret history to the prying gaze of the public; while that of the medical profession has remained hitherto—with scarcely an exception—a sealed book. And yet there are no members of society whose pursuits lead them to listen more frequently to what has been exquisitely termed the “still sad music of humanity.” What instances of noble, though unostentatious heroism—of calm and patient fortitude under the most intolerable anguish which can wring and torture these poor bodies of ours—what appalling combinations of moral and physical wretchedness, laying prostrate the proudest energies of humanity—what diversified manifestations of character—what singular and touching passages of domestic history—must have come under the notice of the intelligent practitioner of physic? And are none of these calculated to furnish both instruction and amusement to the public? With the exception of one solitary paper, which appeared in a contemporaneous Magazine* some months ago, and which professed to be the first of a series—what periodical has sunk a shaft into this rich mine of incident and sentiment?

Considerations such as these have led to the publication of the present series of extracts from a late physician's diary—and in a Magazine, which was the first to present papers of this class to the public. Whether the subject and writer of the ensuing pages is dead or alive, can be a matter of very little consequence, it is apprehended, to the reader; and, therefore, no information on that point, for obvious reasons, will be communicated. In selecting from a very copious store of sketches, in every instance drawn from nature, warm and vivid with the colouring of reality, all possible care will be taken to avoid undue disclosures. Names, dates, and places, therefore, will be generally omitted—except when they can be inserted with perfect safety. It was thought that the modest and simple account of the commencement of his professional career, which immediately follows, would form a suitable introduction; and for the few remaining numbers—such “passages”—only, will be culled, as will appear likely to interest the readers of this Magazine, and the public generally.]

CHAP. I.

EARLY STRUGGLES.

* * * Can any thing be conceived more dreary and disheartening, than the prospect before a young London physician, who, without friends or fortune, yet with high aspirations after professional eminence, is striving to weave around him what is technically called—“a connexion?” Such was my case. After having exhausted the slender finances allotted me from the funds of a poor but somewhat ambitious family, in passing through the usual routine of a college and medical education, I found myself, about my twenty-sixth year, in London—possessed of about L.100 in cash, a few books, a tolerable wardrobe, an inexhaustible fund of animal spirits, and a wife—a lovely young creature whom I had been absurd enough, some few weeks before, to marry, merely because we loved each other. She was the only daughter of a very worthy fellow-townsmen of mine, a widower; whose fortunes, alas, had decayed long before their possessor. Emily was the glory of his age, and, need I add, the pride of my youth; and after having assiduously attended her father through his last illness, the sole and rich return was his daughter's heart.

I must own, that when we found ourselves fairly housed in the mighty metropolis of England, with so poor an exchequer, and the means of replenishing it so remote and contingent, we were somewhat startled at the boldness of the step we had taken. "Nothing venture, nothing have," however, was my maxim; and I felt supported by that unaccountable conviction which clings to all in such circumstances as mine, up to the very pinching moment, but no longer—that there must be thousands of ways of getting a livelihood, to which we can turn at a moment's warning. And then the swelling thought of being the architect of one's own fortune!—As, however, daily drafts began to diminish my L.100, my spirits faltered a little. I discovered that I might indeed as well —"lie pack'd in mine own grave,"

as continue in London without money, or the means of getting it; and after resolving endless schemes, the only conceivable mode of doing so seemed by calling in the generous assistance of the Jews. My father had fortunately effected a policy on my life for L.2000, at an early period, on which some fourteen premiums had been paid; and this available security, added to the powerful influence of a young nobleman to whom I had rendered some service at college, enabled me to succeed in wringing a loan from old Amos L—, of L.3000, at the trifling interest of fifteen per cent, payable by way of redeemable annuity. It was with fear and trembling that I called myself master of this large sum, and with the utmost diffidence that I could bring myself to exercise what the lawyers would call acts of ownership on it. As, however, there was no time to lose, I took a respectable house in C— Street, West—furnished it neatly and respectably—fortunately enough let the first floor to a rich old East India bachelor—beheld—"Dr —" glisten conspicuously on my door—and then dropped my little line into the great waters of London, resolved to abide the issue with patience.

Blessed with buoyant and sanguine spirits, I did not lay it much to heart, that my only occupation during the first six months, was—abroad, to practise the pardonable solecism of hurrying haud passibus æquis through the streets, as if in attendance on numerous patients; and at home, to ponder pleasantly over my books, and enjoy the company of my cheerful and affectionate wife. But when I had numbered twelve months, almost without feeling a pulse or receiving a fee, and was reminded by old L—, that the second half-yearly instalment of L.225 was due, I began to look forward with some apprehension to the overcast future. Of the L.3000, for the use of which I was paying so cruel and exorbitant a premium, little more than half remained—and this, notwithstanding we had practised the most rigid economy in our household expenditure, and devoted as little to dress as was compatible with maintaining a respectable exterior. To my sorrow, I found myself unavoidably contracting debts, which, with the interest due to old L—, I found it would be impossible to discharge. If matters went on as they seemed to threaten, what was to become of me in a year or two? Putting every thing else out of the question, where was I to find funds to meet old L—'s annual demand of L.450? Relying on my prospects of professional success, I had bound myself to return the L.3000 within five years of the time of borrowing it; and now, I thought I must have been mad to do so. If my profession failed me, I had nothing else to look to. I had no family resources—for my father had died since I came to London, very much embarrassed in his circumstances; and my mother, who was aged and infirm, had gone to reside with some relatives, who were few and poor. My wife, as I have stated, was in like plight. I do not think she had a relative in England (for her father and all his family were Germans,) except —"him, whose brightest joy,

Was that he call'd her—wife."

Lord —, the nobleman 'before mentioned, who I am sure would have rejoiced in assisting me, either by pecuniary advances or professional introductions, had been on the continent ever since I commenced practice. Being of studious habits, and a very bashful and reserved disposition while at Cambridge, I could number but few college friends—none of whom I knew where to find in London. Neither my wife nor I knew more than five people, besides our India lodger; for, to tell the truth, we were, like many a fond and foolish couple before us, all the world to one another, and cared little for scraping together promiscuous acquaintances. If we had even been inclined to visiting, our straitened circumstances would have forbid our incurring the expenses attached to it. What then was to be done?—My wife would say, “Pho, love, we shall contrive to get on as well as our neighbours;” but the simple fact was, we were not getting on like our neighbours—nor did I see any prospect of our ever doing so. I began, therefore, to pass sleepless nights and days of despondency—casting about in every direction for any employment consistent with my profession, and redoubling my fruitless efforts to obtain practice.

It is almost laughable to say that our only receipts were a few paltry guineas sent at long intervals from old Asperne, the proprietor of the European Magazine, as remuneration for a sort of monthly medical summary—and a trifle or two from Mr Nicholls of the Gentleman's Magazine, as an acknowledgment for several sweet sonnets sent by my wife. Knowing the success which often attended professional authorship, as tending to acquire for the writer a reputation for skill in the subject of which he treated, and introduce him to the notice of the higher members of his own profession, I determined to turn my attention that way. For several months I was up early and late, at a work on Diseases of the Lungs. I bestowed incredible pains on it; and my toil was sweetened by my wife, who would sit by me in the long summer evenings like an angel, consoling and encouraging me with predictions of success. She lightened my labour by undertaking the transcription of the manuscript; and I thought that two or three hundred sheets of fair and regular handwriting were heavily purchased by the impaired eyesight of the beloved amanuensis. When at length it was completed, having been read and revised twenty times, so that there was not a comma wanted, I hurried, full of fluttering hopes and fears, to a well-known medical bookseller, expecting he would at once purchase the copyright. Fifty pounds I had fixed in my own mind as the minimum of what I would accept; and I had already appropriated part of it towards buying a handsome silk dress for my wife. Alas! even in this branch of my profession, my hopes were doomed to meet with disappointment. The bookseller received me with great civility; listened to every word I had to say, seemed to take some interest in the new views of the disease treated of, which I explained to him, and repeated, and ventured to assure him that they would certainly attract public attention. My heart leaped for joy as I saw his business-like eye settled upon me with an expression of attentive interest. After having almost talked myself hoarse, and flushed myself all over with excitement, he removed his spectacles, and politely assured me of his approbation of the work; but that he had determined never to publish any more medical works on his own account. I have the most vivid recollection of my almost turning sick with chagrin. With a faltering voice I asked him if that was his unalterable determination? He replied, it was; for he had “lost too much by speculations of that sort.” I tied up the manuscript, and withdrew. As soon as I left his shop, I let fall a scorching tear of mingled sorrow and mortification. I could almost have wept aloud. At that moment, whom should I meet but my dear wife; for we had both been talking all night long, and all breakfast time, about the probable result of my interview with the bookseller; and her anxious affection would not permit her to wait my return. She had been pacing to and fro on the other side of the street—and flew to me on my leaving the shop. I could not speak to her; I felt almost choked. At last her continued expressions of tenderness and sympathy soothed me into a more equable frame of mind, and we returned to dinner. In the afternoon I offered it to another bookseller, who, John Trot like, told me at once he never did that sort of thing. I offered it subsequently to every medical bookseller I could find—with like success. One fat fellow actually whiffled out, “if he might make so bold,” he would advise me to leave off book-making, and stick to my practice. Another assured me he had got two similar works then in the press; and the last I consulted, told me I was too young, he thought, to have seen enough of practice for writing “a book of that nature,” as his words were. “Publish it on your own account, love,” said my wife. That, however, was out of the question, whatever might be the merits of the work—for I had no friends; and a kind-hearted bookseller, to whom I mentioned the project, assured me that if I went to press, my work would fall from it still-born. When I returned home from making this last attempt, I flung myself into a chair by the fireside, opposite my wife, without speaking. There was an anxious smile of sweet solicitude in her face. My agitated and mortified air convinced her that I was finally disappointed, and that six months’ hard labour were thrown away. In a fit of uncontrollable pique and passion, I flung the manuscript on the fire, but Emily suddenly snatched it from the flames, gazed at me with a look such as none but a fond and devoted wife could give—threw her arms round my neck, and kissed me back to calmness, if not happiness. I laid the MSS. in question on a shelf in my study; and it was my first and last attempt at medical book-making.

From ~~what~~ cause, or combination of causes, I know not, but I seemed marked out for failure in my profession. Though my name shone on my door, and the respectable neighbourhood could not but have noticed the regularity and decorum of my habits and manners, yet none ever thought of calling me in! Had I been able to exhibit a line of carriages at my door—or to open my house for the reception of company—or to dash about town in an elegant equipage—or be seen at the opera and theatres—had I been able to do this, the case might have been different. In candour I must acknowledge, that another probable cause of my ill-success was a somewhat insignificant person, and unprepossessing countenance. I could not wear such an eternal smirk of conceited complacency, or keep my head perpetually bowing mandarin-like, as many of my professional brothers; still there were thousands to whom these deficiencies proved no serious obstacles. The great misfortune in my case was, undoubtedly, the want of introductions. There was a man of considerable rank and great wealth, who was a sort of fiftieth cousin of mine, resided in one of the fashionable squares not far from me, and on whom I had called to claim kindred, and solicit his patronage; but after having sent up my name and address, I was suffered to wait so long in an anteroom, that, what with the noise of servants bustling past with insolent familiarity, I quite forgot the relationship, and left the house, wondering what had brought me there. I never felt inclined to go near it again; so there was an end of all prospects of introduction from that quarter. I was left, therefore, to rely exclusively on my own efforts, and trust to chance for patients. It is true, that in the time I have mentioned, I was twice called in at an instant’s warning; but in both cases, the objects of my visits had expired before my arrival, probably before a messenger could be dispatched for me; and the manner in which my fees were proffered, convinced me that I should be cursed for a mercenary wretch if I accepted them. I was, therefore, induced in each case to decline the guinea, though it would have purchased me a week’s happiness! I was, also, on several occasions called in to visit the inferior members of families in the neighbourhood—servants, housekeepers, porters, &c.; and of all the trying, the mortifying occurrences in the life of a young physician, such occasions as these are the most irritating. You go to the house—a large one probably—and are instructed not to knock at the front door, but to go down by the area to your patient! I think it was about this time that I was summoned in haste to young Sir Charles F—, who resided near Mayfair. Delighted at the prospect of securing so dis-tingulated a patient, I hurried to his house, resolved to do my utmost to give satisfaction. When I entered the room, I found the sprig of fashion enveloped in a crimson silk dressing-gown, sitting conceitedly on the sofa, and sipping a cup of coffee, from which he desisted a moment to examine me through his eyeglass, and then direct me to inspect the swelled foot of a favourite pointer! Darting a look of anger at the insulting coxcomb, I instantly withdrew without uttering a word. Five years afterwards, did that young man make use of the most strenuous efforts to oust me from the confidence of a family of distinction, to which he was distantly related.*

A more mortifying incident occurred shortly afterwards. I had the misfortune to be called on a sudden emergency into consultation with the late celebrated Dr ——. It was the first consultational visit that I had ever paid; and I was, of course, very anxious to acquit myself creditably. Shall I ever forget or forgive the air of insolent condescension with which he received me, or the remark he made in the presence of several individuals, professional as well as unprofessional—"I assure you, Dr —, there is really some difference between apoplexy and epilepsy, at least there was when I was a young man!" He accompanied these words with a look of supercilious commiseration, directed to the lady, whose husband was our patient; and I need not add, that my future services were dispensed with. My heart ached to think that such a fellow as this should have it in his power, as it were, to take the bread out of the mouth of an unpretending, and almost spirit-broken, professional brother; but I had no remedy. I am happy to have it in my power to say how much the tone of consulting physicians is now (1824) lowered towards their brethren who may happen to be of a few years' less standing, and, consequently, less firmly fixed in the confidence of their patients. It was by a few similar incidents to those above related, that my spirit began to be soured; and had it not been for the unvarying sweetness and cheerfulness of my incomparable wife, existence would not have been tolerable. My professional efforts were paralyzed; failure attended every attempt; my ruin seemed sealed. My resources were rapidly melting away—my expenditure, moderate as it was, was counterbalanced by no incomes. A prison and starvation scowled before me.

Despairing of finding any better source of emolument, I was induced to send an advertisement to one of the daily papers, stating, that "a graduate of Cambridge University, having a little spare time at his disposal, was willing to give private instructions in the classics, in the evenings, to gentlemen preparing for college—or to others!" After about a week's interval, I received one solitary communication. It was from a young man holding some subordinate situation under Government, and residing at Pimlico. This person offered me two guineas a-month, if I would attend him at his own house, for two hours on the evenings of Monday, Wednesday, and Friday! With these hard terms was I obliged to comply—yes, a gentleman, and a member of an English University, was driven so low as to attend, for these terms, an ignorant underling, and endeavour to instil a few drops of classic lore into the turbid and shallow waters of his understanding. I had hardly given him a month's attendance, before this fellow assured me, with a flippant air, that as he had now acquired "a practical knowledge of the classics," he would dispense with my further services! Dull dunce—he could not, in Latin, be brought to comprehend the difference between a neuter and an active verb: while, as for Greek, it was an absolute choke-pear; so he nibbled on to τμή—and then gave it up. Bitter but unavailing were my regrets, as I returned from paying my last visit to this promising scholar, that I had not entered the army, and gone to America, or even betaken myself to some subordinate commercial situation. A thousand and a thousand times did I curse the ambition which brought me up to London, and the egregious vanity which led me to rely so implicitly on my talents for success. Had I but been content with the humbler sphere of a general practitioner, I might have laid out my dearly bought L.3000 with a reasonable prospect of soon repaying it, and acquiring a respectable livelihood. But all these soberer thoughts, as is usual, came only time enough to enhance the mortification of failure.

* This anecdote calls to my mind one told me by the late Dr Hamilton. He was sent for once in great haste by Lady P——, to see—absolutely a little favourite monkey, which was almost suffocated with its morning feed. When the doctor entered the room, he saw only her ladyship, her young son, (a lad of ten years old, who was most absurdly dressed,) and his patient. Looking at each of the two latter, he said coolly to Lady P——, "My Lady, which is the monkey?"

* * * * *

About L.300 was now the miserable remnant of the money borrowed from the Jew; and half a year's interest, (L.225,) together with my rent, was due in about a fortnight's time. I was, besides, indebted to many tradesmen—who were becoming every day more querulous—for articles of food, clothing, and furniture. My poor Emily was in daily expectation of her accouchement; and my own health was sensibly sinking under the combined pressure of anxiety and excessive parsimony. What was to be done? Despair was clinging to me, and shedding blight and mildew over all my faculties. Every avenue was closed against me. I never knew what it was to have more than one or two hours' sleep at night, and that so heavy, so troubled, and interrupted, that I woke each morning more dead than alive. I lay tossing in bed, revolving all conceivable schemes and fancies in my tortured brain, till at length, from mere iteration, they began to assume a feasible aspect; but, alas! they would none of them bear the blush of daylight—but faded away as extravagant and absurd. I would endeavour to set afloat a popular Medical Journal—to give lectures on diseases of the lungs—(a department with which I was familiar)—I would advertise for a small medical partnership as a general practitioner—I would do a thousand things of the sort; but where was my capital to set out with? I had L.300 in the world, and L.450 yearly to pay to an extortionating old miser; that was the simple fact; and it almost drove me to despair to advert to it for one instant. Wretched, however, as I was, and almost every instant loathing my existence, the idea of suicide was never entertained for a moment. If the fiend would occasionally flit across the dreary chamber of my heart—a strong, an unceasing confidence in the goodness and power of my Maker always repelled the fearful visitant. Even yet, rapidly as I seemed approaching the precipice of ruin, I could not avoid cherishing a feeble hope that some unexpected avenue would open to better fortune; and the thought of it would for a time soothe my troubled breast, and nerve it to bear up against the inroads of my present misfortunes.

I recollect sitting down one day in St James's Park on one of the benches, weary with wandering the whole morning I knew not whither. I felt faint and ill, and more than usually depressed in mind. I had that morning paid one of my tradesmen's bills, amounting to L.10; and the fellow told my servant, that as he had so much trouble in getting his money, he did not want the honour of my custom any longer. The thought that my credit was failing in the neighbourhood, was insupportable. Ruin and disgrace would then be accelerated; and being unable to meet my creditors, I should be proclaimed little less than a swindler, and shaken like a viper from the lap of society. Fearful as were such thoughts, I had not enough of energy of feeling left to suffer much agitation from them. I folded my arms on my breast in sullen apathy, and wished only that, whatever might be my fate, certainty might be substituted for suspense.

While indulging in thoughts like these, a glittering troop of soldiers passed by me, preceded by their band, playing a merry air. How the sounds jarred on the broken strings of my heart! And many a bright face, dressed in smiles of gaiety and happiness, thronged past, attracted by the music—little thinking of the wretchedness of him who was sitting by. I could not prevent the tears of anguish from gushing forth. I thought of Emily—of her delicate and interesting, but to me, melancholy situation. I could not bear the thought of returning home to encounter her affectionate looks,—her meek and gentle resignation to her bitter fortunes. Why had I married her, without first having considered whether I could support her? Passionately fond of me as I well knew she was, could she avoid frequently recurring to the days of our courtship, when I reiteratedly assured her of my certainty of professional success as soon as I could get settled in London? Where now were all the fair and flourishing scenes to which my childish enthusiasm had taught me to look forward? Would not the bitter contrast she was now experiencing, and seemed doomed long yet to experience, alienate from me a portion of her affections, and induce feelings of anger and contempt? Could I blame her for all this? If the goodly superstructure of my fortunes fell, was it not I that had loosened and destroyed the foundation?—Reflections like these were harassing and scourging me, when an elderly gentleman, evidently an invalid, tottered slowly to the bench where I was sitting, and sat down beside me. He seemed a man of wealth and consideration; for his servant, on whose arm he had been leaning, stood behind the bench on which he was sitting. He was almost shaken to pieces by an asthmatic cough, and was besides suffering from another severe disorder, which need not be more particularly named. He looked at me once or twice, in a manner which seemed to say that he would not take it rudely if I addressed him. I did so. I said, "I am afraid you are in great pain from that cough, sir?"—"Yes," he gasped faintly; "and I don't know how to get rid of it. I am an old man, you see, sir; and methinks my summons to the grave might have been less loud and painful." After a little pause, I ventured to ask him how long he had been subject to the cough which now harassed him? He said, more or less, for the last ten years; but that latterly it had increased so much upon him, that he could not derive any benefit from medical advice. "I should think, sir, the more violent symptoms of your disorder might be mitigated," said I; and proceeded to question him minutely as to the origin and progress of the complaints which now afflicted him. He answered all my questions with civility; and as I went on, seemed to be roused into something like curiosity and interest. I need not say more, than that I discovered he had not been in the hands of a skilful practitioner; and that I assured him very few and simple means would give him great relief from at least the more violent symptoms. He, of course, perceived I was in the medical profession; and after some apparent hesitation, evidently as to whether or not I should feel hurt, tendered me a guinea. I refused it promptly and decidedly, and assured him that he was quite welcome to the very trifling advice I had rendered him. At that moment, a young man of fashionable appearance walked up, and told him their carriage was waiting at the corner of the Stable-yard. This last gentleman, who seemed to be either the son or nephew of the old gentleman, eyed me, I thought, with a certain superciliousness, which was not lessened when the invalid told him I had given him some excellent advice, for which he could not prevail on me to receive a fee. "We are vastly obliged to you, sir; but are going home to the family physician," said the young man, haughtily; and placing the invalid's arm in his, led him slowly away. He was addressed several times by the servant as "Sir," something, Wilton or William, I think; but I could not distinctly catch it, so that it was evidently a person of some rank that I had been addressing. How many there are, thought I, that, with a more plausible and insinuating address than mine is, would have contrived to have got into the confidence of this gentleman, and become his medical attendant! How foolish was I not to give him my card when he proffered me a fee, and thus, in all probability, be sent for the next morning to pay a regular professional visit! and to what lucrative introductions might not that have led! A thousand times I cursed my absurd diffidence—my sensitiveness as to professional etiquette—and my inability to seize the advantages occasionally offered by a fortunate conjuncture of circumstances.

I was fitter, I thought, for La Trappe than the bustling world of business. I deserved my ill fortune; and professional failure was the natural consequence of the mauvaise honte which has injured so many. As the day, however, was far advancing, I left the seat, and turned my steps towards my cheerless home.

As was generally the case, I found Emily busily engaged in painting little fire-screens and other ornamental toys, which, when completed, I was in the habit of carrying to a kind of private bazaar in Oxford-street, where I was not known, and where, with an aching heart, I disposed of the delicate and beautiful productions of my poor wife, for a trifle hardly worth taking home. Could any man, pretending to the slightest feeling, contemplate his young wife—far advanced in pregnancy, in a critical state of health, and requiring air, exercise, and cheerful company—tolling, in the manner I have related, from morning to night, and for a miserably inadequate remuneration? She submitted, however, to our misfortunes with infinitely more firmness and equanimity than I could pretend to; and her uniform cheerfulness of demeanour, together with the passionate fervour of her fondness for me, contributed to fling a few rays of trembling and evanescent lustre over the gloomy prospects of the future. Still, however, the dreadful question incessantly presented itself—What, in God's name, is to become of us? I cannot say that we were at this time in absolute literal want; though our parsimonious fare hardly deserved the name of food, especially such as my wife's delicate situation required. It was the hopelessness of all prospective resources that kept us in perpetual thralldom. With infinite effort, we might contrive to hold on to a given period—say till the next half-yearly demand of old L——; and then we must sink altogether, unless a miracle intervened to save us. Had I been alone in the world, I might have braved the worst—have turned my hands to a thousand things—have accommodated myself to almost any circumstances—and borne the extreme privations with fortitude. But my darling—my meek, smiling, gentle Emily!—my heart bled for her.

•Not to leave any stone unturned, seeing an advertisement addressed “To Medical Men,” I applied for the situation of assistant to a general practitioner, though I had but little skill in the practical part of compounding medicines. I applied personally to the advertiser, a fat, red-faced, vulgar fellow, who had contrived to gain a very large practice, by what means God only knows. His terms were—and these named in the most offensive contemptuousness of manner—L.80 a-year, board and lodge out, and give all my time in the day to my employer! Absurd as was the idea of acceding to terms like these, I thought I might still consider them. I pressed hard for L.100 a-year, and told him I was married—

“Married!” said he, with a loud laugh—“No, no, sir—you're not the man for my money—so I wish you good morning.”*

Thus was I baffled in every attempt to obtain a permanent source of support from my profession. It brought me about L.40 per annum; I gained, by occasional contributions to magazines, an average sum annually of about L.25; my wife earned about that sum by her pencil: and these were all the funds I had to meet the enormous interest due half-yearly to old L——, to discharge my rent, and the various other expenses of housekeeping, &c. Might I not well despair? I did—and God's goodness only preserved me from the frightful calamity which has suddenly terminated the earthly miseries of thousands in similar circumstances.

And is it possible, I often thought, with all the tormenting incredulosity of a man half-stupified with his misfortunes—is it possible that, in the very heart of this metropolis of splendour, wealth, and extravagance, a gentleman and a scholar, who has laboured long in the honourable toil of acquiring professional knowledge, cannot contrive to scrape together even a competent subsistence?—and that, too, while ignorance and infamy are wallowing in wealth—while charlatanry and quackery of all kinds are bloated with success! Full of such thoughts as these, how often have I slunk stealthily along the streets of London, on cold and dreary winter evenings, almost fainting with long abstinence, yet reluctant to return home and incur the expense of an ordinary family dinner, while my wife's situation required the most rigorous economy to enable us to meet, even in a poor and small way, the exigencies of her approaching accouchement! How often—aye, hundreds of times—have I envied the coarse and filthy fare of the minor eating-houses, and been content to interrupt a twelve hours' fast with a bun or biscuit, and a draught of water or turbid table-beer, under the wretched pretence of being in too great a hurry to go home to dinner! I have often gazed with envy—once, I recollect, in particular—on dogs eating their huge daily slice of boiled horse's flesh, and envied their contented and satiated looks! With what anguish of heart have I seen carriages setting down company at the door of a house, illuminated by the glare of a hundred tapers, where were ladies dressed in the extreme of fashion, whose cast-off clothes would have enabled me to acquire a tolerably respectable livelihood!—O! ye sons and daughters of luxury and extravagance, how many thousands of needy and deserving families would rejoice to eat of the crumbs which fall from your tables, and they may not!

I have stood many a time at my parlour window, and envied the kitchen fare of the servants of my wealthy opposite neighbour; while I protest I have been ashamed to look our own servant in the face, as she, day after day, served up for two what was little more than sufficient for one: and yet, bitter mockery! I was to support abroad the farce of a cheerful and respectable professional exterior!

* * * * *

Two days after the occurrence in St James's Park, above related, I was, as usual, reading the columns of advertisements in one of the daily papers, when my eyes lit on the following:—

"The professional gentleman, who, a day or two ago, had some conversation on the subject of asthma with an invalid, on one of the benches in St James's Park, is particularly requested to forward his name and address to W. J. care of Messrs —."

I almost let the paper fall from my hands with delighted surprise. That I was the "professional gentleman" alluded to, was clear; and on the slender foundation of this advertisement, I had in a few moments built a large and splendid superstructure of good fortune. I had hardly calmed enough to call my wife, who was engaged with some small household matters, for the purpose of communicating the good news to her. I need hardly say with what eagerness I complied with the requisitions of the advertisement. Half an hour beheld my name and address in an envelope, with the superscription, "W. T.," lying at Messrs —'s, who were stationers. After passing a most anxious and sleepless night, agitated by all kinds of hopes and fears, my wife and I were sitting at breakfast, when a livery-servant knocked at the door; and after enquiring whether "Dr —" was at home, left a letter. It was an envelope containing the card of address of Sir William —, No. 26, — Street, accompanied with the following note:—

"Sir William —'s compliments to Dr —, and will feel obliged by his looking in in the course of the morning."

"Now, be calm, my dear —," said Emily, as she saw my fluttering excitement of manner. But, alas! that was impossible. I was impatient for the hour of twelve: and precisely as the clock struck, I sallied forth to visit my titled patient. All the way I went, I was taxing my ingenuity for palliatives, remedies for asthma; I would new-regulate his diet and plan of life—in short, I would do wonders!

Sir William, who was sitting gasping by the fireside, received me with great courtesy; and after motioning his niece, a charming young woman, to retire, told me he had been so much interested by my remarks the other day, in the Park, that he felt inclined to follow my advice, and put himself under my care altogether. He then entered on a history of his complaints. I found his constitution was entirely broken up, and that in a very little it would fall to pieces. I told him, however, that if he would adhere strictly to the regimen I proposed, I could promise him great, if not permanent relief. He listened to what I said with the utmost interest. "Do you think you could prolong my life, Doctor, for two years?" said he, with emotion. I told him I certainly could not pretend to promise him so much. "My only reason for asking the question," he replied, "is my beloved niece, that young lady, who has just left us. If I cannot live for two years or eighteen months longer, it will be a bitter thing for her!"—He sighed deeply—and added abruptly—"but of that more hereafter. I hope to see you to-morrow, Doctor." He insisted on my accepting five guineas in return for the two visits he said he had received—and I took my departure. I felt altogether a new man as I walked home. My spirits were more light and buoyant than they had been for many a long month: for I could not help thinking that I had now a fair chance of introduction into respectable practice. My wife shared my joy; and we were as happy for the rest of that day, as if we had already surmounted the heavy difficulties which oppressed us.

I attended Sir William every day that week, and received a fee of two guineas for each visit. On Sunday, I met the family physician, Dr —, who had just been released from attendance on one of the royal family. He was a polite but haughty man, and seemed inclined to be much displeased with Sir William for calling me in. When I entered, Sir William introduced me to him as "Dr —." "Dr —, of — Square?" enquired the other physician, carelessly. I told him where I lived. He affected to be reflecting where the street was; it was the one next to that in which he himself resided. There is nothing in the world so easy, as for the eminent members of our profession to take the bread out of the mouths of their younger brethren, with the best grace in the world. So Sir — contrived in the present case. He assured Sir William that nothing was calculated to do him so much good as change of air—of course I could not but assent;—the sooner, he said, Sir William left town, the better; Sir William asked me if I concurred in that opinion?—Certainly. He set off for Worthing two days after—and I lost the best—and almost the only patient I had then ever had; for Sir William died after three weeks' residence at Worthing.

This circumstance occasioned me great depression of spirits. Nothing that I touched seemed to prosper; and the transient glimpses I occasionally obtained of good fortune, seemed given only to tantalize me, and enhance the bitterness of the contrast. My store of money was reduced at last from L.3000 to L.25 in cash; my debts amounted to upwards of L.100; and in six months another L.225 would be due to old L——! My wife, too, had been confined, and there was another source of expense; for both she and my little daughter were in a very feeble state of health. Still, secretly wishful to accommodate herself to one lowered in circumstances, she almost broke my heart with the proposal of dismissing our servant, the whole of whose labour my sweet Emily herself undertook to perform! No, no—this was too much; the tears of agony gushed from my eyes, as I folded her delicate frame in my arms, and assured her that Providence would never permit so much virtue and gentleness to be degraded into such humiliating servitude. I said this; but my heart heavily misgave me, that a more wretched prospect was before her!

I have often sate by my small, solitary parlour fire, and pondered over my misery and misfortunes till I have been almost frenzied with the violence of my emotions. Where was I to look for relief? What earthly remedy was there? Oh, my God! thou alone knowest what this poor heart of mine suffered in such times as these—not on my own account—but for those beloved beings whose ruin was implicated in mine!—What, however, was to be done at the present crisis, seeing, at Christmas, old L—— would come upon me for his interest, and my other creditors would insist on payment? A dewy mist came over my mind's eye whenever I attempted to look steadily forward into futurity. I had written several times to my kind and condescending friend Lord —, who still continued abroad; but as I knew not to what part of the continent to direct, and the servants of his family pretended they knew not, I left my letters at his town-house, to be forwarded with his quarterly packages. I suppose my letters must have been opened and burnt, as little other than pestering, begging letters: for I never heard from him.

I had often heard from my father, that we had a sort of fiftieth cousin in London, a baronet of great wealth, who had married a distant relation of our family, on account solely of her beauty; but that he was one of the most haughty and arrogant men breathing—had in the most insolent manner disavowed the relationship, and treated my father, on one occasion, very contumeliously. Since I had been in London, and suffered from the pressure of accumulated misfortunes, the idea of applying to this man, and stating my circumstances, had presented itself a thousand times. As one is easily induced to believe what one wishes to be true, I could not help thinking, that surely he must in some degree relent, if informed of our utter misery: but my heart always failed when I took my pen in hand to write to him. I was at a loss for terms in which to state our distress most feelingly, and in a manner best calculated to arrest his attention. I had, however, after infinite reluctance, addressed a letter of this sort to his lady—who, I am sorry to say, shared all Sir —'s hauteur; and received an answer from a fashionable watering-place, where her ladyship was spending the summer months. This is it:—

"Lady —'s compliments to Dr —, and having received his letter, and given it her best consideration, is happy in being able to request Dr —'s acceptance of the enclosed—which, however, owing to Sir —'s temporary embarrassment in pecuniary matters, she has had some difficulty in sending. She is, therefore, under the painful necessity of requesting Dr — to abstain from future applications of this sort. As to Dr —'s offer of his medical services to Lady —'s family, when in town, Lady — must beg to decline them, as the present physician has attended the family for years, and neither Lady — nor Sir — see any reason for changing.

"W —, to Dr H —

The enclosure was L.10, which I was on the point of returning in a blank envelope, indignant at the cold and unfeeling letter which accompanied it; but I thought of my wife—and retained it.—To return. Recollecting the reception of this application, my heart was frozen at the very idea of a similar one to Sir —. To what, however, will not misfortune compel a man! I determined, at length, to call upon Sir —; to insist upon being shewn to him. I set out for this purpose, without telling my errand to my wife, who, as I have before stated, was confined to her bed, and in a very feeble state of health. It was a fine sunny morning, or rather noon; all that I passed seemed happy and contented; their spirits exhilarated by the genial weather, and sustained by the successful prosecution of business. My heart, however, was fluttering feebly beneath the pressure of anticipated disappointment. I was going in the spirit of a forlorn hope; with a dogged determination to make the attempt; to know that even this door was shut against me. My knees trembled beneath me as I entered P.

I and saw elegant equipages standing at the doors of most of the gloomy, but magnificent houses, which seemed to frown off such insignificant and wretched individuals as myself. How could I ever muster resolution enough—I thought—to ascend the steps, and knock and ring in a sufficiently authoritative manner to be attended to? It is laughable to relate—but I could not refrain from stepping back into a by street, and getting a small glass of some cordial spirit to give me a little firmness. Although I ventured again into — Place, and found Sir —'s house, on the opposite side, there was no one to be seen but some men-servants in undress, loolling indolently at the dining-room window, and making their remarks on passers by. I dreaded these fellows as much as their master!—It was no use, however, indulging in thoughts of that kind; so I crossed over, and lifting the huge knocker, made a tolerably decided application of it, and pulled the bell with what I fancied was a sudden and imperative jerk. The summons was instantly answered by the corpulent porter, who, seeing nothing but a plain pedestrian, kept hold of the door, and leaning against the door-post, asked me familiarly what were my commands.

“Is Sir —— at home?”

“He is,” said the fellow, in a supercilious tone, “and what then, sir?”

“Can he be spoken to?”

“I think he can’t, for he wasn’t home till six o’clock this morning from the Duchess of ——’s.”

“Can I wait for him; and will you shew him this card,” said I, tendering it to him—“and say I have particular business?”

“You couldn’t look in again at four, could you?” enquired he, in the same tone of vulgar assurance.

“No, sir;” I replied, kindling with indignation, “my business is urgent,—I shall wait now.”

He opened the door for me, and called to a servant to shew me into the antechamber, saying, I must make up my mind to wait an hour or two, as Sir —— was then only just getting up, and would be an hour at least at his breakfast. He then left me, saying he would send my card up to his master. My spirits were somewhat ruffled and agitated with having forced my way so far through the frozen island of English aristocracy, and I sat down determined to wait patiently, till I was summoned up to Sir ——.

I could hear several equipages dashing up to the door, and the visitors they brought were always shewn up immediately. I rung the bell, and asked a servant why I was suffered to wait so long, as Sir —— was clearly visible now.

“Pon honour, I don’t know, indeed,” said the fellow, coolly, shutting the door.

Boiling with indignation, I resumed my seat, then walked to and fro, and then sat down again. Presently, I heard the French valet ordering the carriage to be in readiness in half an hour. I rung again; the same servant answered. He walked into the room, and standing near me, asked, in a familiar tone, what I wanted. “Shew me up to Sir ——, for I shall wait no longer,” said I, sternly.

“Can’t, sir, indeed,” he replied, with a smirk in his face.

“Has my card been shewn to Sir ——?” I enquired, struggling to preserve my temper.

“I’ll ask the porter if he gave it to Sir ——’s valet,” he replied, and shut the door.

About ten minutes afterwards a carriage drove up; there was a bustle on the stairs, and in the hall. I heard a voice saying, “if Lord —— calls, tell him I am gone to his house;” in a few moments, the steps of the carriage were let down—the carriage drove off—and all was quiet. Once more I rung.

“Is Sir —— now at liberty?”

“Oh, he’s gone out, sir,” said the same servant, who had twice before answered my summons. The valet then entered. I asked him, with lips quivering with indignation, why I had not seen Sir ——? I was given to understand that my card had been shewn the Baronet—that he said, “I’ve no time to attend to this person,” or words to that effect—and had left his house without deigning to notice me! Without uttering more, than “Shew me the door, sir,” to the servant, I took my departure, determining to perish rather than make a second application. To anticipate my narrative a little, I may state, that ten years afterwards, Sir ——, who had become dreadfully addicted to gambling, lost all his property, and died suddenly of an apoplectic seizure, brought on by a paroxysm of fury! Thus did Providence reward this selfish and unfeeling man.

I walked about the town for several hours, endeavouring to wear off that air of chagrin and sorrow which had been occasioned by my reception at Sir ——’s. Something must be done—and that immediately; for absolute starvation was now before us. I could think of but two other quarters where I could apply for a little temporary relief. I resolved to write a note to a very celebrated and successful brother practitioner, stating my necessities—acquainting him candidly with my whole circumstances, and soliciting the favour of a temporary accommodation of a few pounds—twenty was the sum I ventured to name. I wrote the letter at a coffee-house, and returned home. I spent all that evening in attempting to picture to myself the reception it would meet with. I tried to put myself in the place of him I had written to, and fancy the feelings with which I should receive a similar application. I need not, however, tantalize the reader. After nearly a fortnight's suspense, I received the following reply to my letter. I shall give it verbatim—after premising that the writer of it was at that time making about L. 10,000 or L. 12,000 a year. “— encloses a trifle (one guinea) to Dr —, wishes it may be serviceable, but must say, that when young men attempt a station in life without competent funds to meet it, they cannot wonder if they fail.

“— Square.”

The other quarter was old Mr G—, our Indian lodger. Though an eccentric and reserved man, shunning all company except that of a favourite black servant, I thought he might yet be liberal. As he was something of a character, I must be allowed a word or two about him, in passing. Though he occupied the whole of the first floor of my house, I seldom saw him. In truth, he was little else than a bronze fireside fixture, all day long, summer and winter,—protected from the intrusion of draughts and visitors, which equally annoyed him, by a huge folding screen. Swathed, mummy-like, in flannel and furs,—squalling incessant execrations against the chilly English climate,—and solacing himself, alternately, with sleep, caudle, and curry. He would sit for hours listening to a strange clattering, (I know no word but this that can give any thing like an idea of it,) and most melancholy noise, uttered by his black grizzle-headed servant—which I was given to understand was a species of Indian song—evinced his satisfaction by a face curiously puckered together, and small beady black eyes, glittering with the light of vertical suns: thus, I say, he would sit till both dropt asleep. He was very fond of this servant, (whose name was Clinquabor, or something of that sort,) and yet would kick and strike him with great violence on the slightest occasions.

Without being self-interested, I candidly acknowledge, that on receiving him into our house, and submitting to divers inconveniences from his strange foreign fancies, I had calculated on his proving a lucrative lodger. I was, however, very much mistaken. He uniformly discouraged my visits, by evincing the utmost restlessness and even trepidation, whenever I approached. He was more tolerant to my wife's visits; but even to her could not help intimating, in pretty plain terms, on more occasions than one, that he had no idea of being “drugged to death by his landlord.” On one occasion, however, his servant came stuttering with agitation into my room, that “lib massa wis to see—a doctor.” I found him suffering from the heart-burn; submitted to his asthmatic querulousness for nearly half an hour; prescribed the usual remedies—and received in return—a guinea? No, a curious, ugly, and perfectly useless cane, with which (to enhance its value) he assured me he had once kept a large snake at bay! On another occasion, in return for similar professional assistance, he dismissed me without tendering me a fee, or any thing instead of it; but sent for my wife, in the course of the afternoon, and presented her with a hideous little cracked china teapot, the lid fastened with a dingy silver chain, and the lip of the spout bearing evident marks of an ancient compound fracture. He was singularly exact in every thing he did: he paid his rent, for instance, at ten o'clock in the morning every quarter day, as long as he lived with me.

Such was the man whose assistance I had at last determined to ask. With infinite hesitation and embarrassment, I stated my circumstances. He fidgeted sadly, till I concluded, almost inarticulate with agitation, by soliciting the loan of L. 300—offering, at the same time, to deposit with him the lease of my house, as a collateral security for what he might advance me.

“My God!” he exclaimed, falling back in his chair, and elevating his hands.

"Would you favour me with this sum, Mr G——?" I enquired in a respectful tone.

"Do you take me, doctor, for a money-lender?"

"No, indeed, sir—but for an obliging friend as well as lodger—if you will allow me the liberty."

"Ha—you think me a rich old hunk come from India to fling his gold at every one he sees?"

"May I beg an answer, sir?" said I, after a pause.

"I cannot lend it you, doctor," he replied calmly, and bowed me to the door. I rushed down stairs almost gnashing my teeth with fury. The Deity seemed to have marked me with a curse. No one would listen to me!

The next day my rent was due; which, with Mr G——'s rent, and the savings of excruciating parsimony, I contrived to meet. Then came old L——! Good God! what were my feelings when I saw him hobble up to my door. I civilly assured him, with a quaking heart, and ashy cheeks, but with the calmness of despair, that though it was not convenient to-day, he should have it on the morning of the next day. His greedy, black Jewish eye seemed to dart into my very soul. He retired apparently satisfied, and I almost fell down and blessed him on my knees, for his forbearance.

It was on Wednesday, two days after Christmas, that my dear Emily came down stairs after her confinement. Though pale and languid, she looked very lovely, and her fondness for me seemed redoubled. By way of honouring the season, and welcoming my dear wife down stairs, in spite of my fearful embarrassments, I expended my last guinea in providing a tolerably comfortable dinner, such as I had not sat down to for many a long week. I was determined to cast care aside for one day at least. The little table was set; the small but savoury roast beef was on—and I was just drawing the cork of a solitary bottle of port, when a heavy knock was heard at the street-door. I almost fainted at the sound—I knew not why. The servant answered the door, and two men entered the very parlour, holding a thin slip of parchment in their hands.

"In God's name, who are you?"

What brings you here?" while my wife sat silent, trembling, and looking very faint.

"Are you the gentleman that is named here?" enquired one of the men, in a civil and even compassionate tone—showing me a writ issued against me by old L——, for the money I owed him! My poor wife saw my agitation, and the servant arrived just in time to preserve her from falling, for she had fainted. I had her carried to bed, and was permitted to wait by her bedside for a few moments; when, more dead than alive, I surrendered myself into the hands of the officers. I shall never forget that half hour, if I were to live a thousand years. I felt as if I were stepping into my grave. My heart was utterly withered within me.

A few hours beheld me the sullen and despairing occupant of the back attic of a sponging-house near Leicester Square. The weather was bitterly inclement, yet no fire was allowed one who had not a farthing in his pocket. Had it not been for my poor Emily and my child, I think I should have put an end to my miserable existence; for to prison I must go—there was no miracle to save me—and what was to become of Emily and her little one? Jewels she had none to pawn—my books had nearly all disappeared—the scanty remnants of our furniture were not worth selling. Great God, I was nearly frantic when I thought of all this! I sat up the whole night without fire or candle, (for the brutal wretch in whose custody I was, suspected I had money with me and would not part with it,) till nearly seven o'clock in the morning, when I sunk, in a state of stupor, on the bed, and fell asleep. How long I continued so, I know not; for I was roused from a dreary dream by some one embracing me, and reiteratedly kissing my lips and forehead. It was my poor Emily! who, at the imminent risk of her life, having found out where I was, had hurried to bring me the news of release; for she had succeeded in obtaining the sum of L.300 from our lodger, which I had in vain solicited. We returned home immediately. I hastened up stairs to our lodger to express the most enthusiastic thanks. He listened without interruption, and then coldly replied—"I would rather have your note of hand, sir!" Almost choked with mortification at receiving such an unfeeling rebuff, I gave him what he asked, expecting nothing more than that he would presently act the part of old L——. He did not, however, trouble me.

The few pounds above what was due to our relentless creditor L——, sufficed to meet some of our more pressing exigencies; but as they gradually disappeared, my prospects became darker than ever. The agitation and distress which recent occurrences had occasioned, threw my wife into a low, nervous, hysterical state, which added to my misfortunes; and her little infant was sensibly pining away, as if in unconscious sympathy with its wretched parents. Where now were we to look for help? We had a new creditor, to a serious amount, in Mr G——, our lodger; whatever, therefore, might be the extremity of our distress, applying to him was out of the question; nay, it would be well if he proved a lenient creditor. The hateful annuity was again becoming due. It pressed like an incubus upon us. The form of old L——, flitted incessantly around us, as though it were a fiend, goading us on to destruction. I am sure I must often have raved frightfully in my sleep; for more than once I was woken by my wife clinging to me, and exclaiming, in terrified accents, "Oh, hush, hush, ——, don't, for Heaven's sake, say so!"

To add to my misery, she and the infant began to keep their bed; and our lodger, whose constitution had been long ago broken up, began to fail rapidly. I was in daily attendance, but, of course, could not expect a fee, as I was already his debtor to a large amount. I had three patients who paid me regularly, but only one was a daily patient; and I was obliged to lay by, out of these small incomings, a cruel portion to meet my rent, and L——'s annuity. Surely my situation was now like that of the fabled scorpion, surrounded with fiery destruction! Every one in the house, and my few acquaintances without, expressed surprise and commiseration at my wretched appearance. I was worn almost to a skeleton; and when I looked suddenly in the glass, my worn and hollow looks startled me.

My fears magnified the illness of my wife; the whole world seemed melting away from me into gloom and darkness.

My thoughts—I well recollect—seemed to be perpetually occupied with the dreary image of a desolate churchyard, wet and cold with the sleets and storms of winter. O, that I, and my wife and child, I have sometimes madly thought, were sleeping peacefully in our long home! Why were we brought into the world?—why did my nature prompt me to seek my present station in society?—merely for the purpose of reducing me to the dreadful condition of him of old, whose only consolation from his friends was—curse God and die! What had I done—what had our forefathers done—that Providence should thus come upon us, and thwart us in every thing we attempted?

Fortune, however, at last seemed tired of persecuting me; and my affairs took a favourable turn when most they needed it, and when least I expected it. On what small and insignificant things do our fates depend! Truly—

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

About eight o'clock one evening in the month of March, I was walking down the Haymarket, as usual, in a very disconsolate mood, in search of some shop where I might execute a small commission for my wife. The whole neighbourhood in front of the Opera-house door, exhibited the usual scene of uproar arising from clashing carriages and quarrelsome coachmen. I was standing at the box-door, and watching the company descend from their carriages, when a cry was heard from the very centre of the crowd of coaches—"Run for a doctor!" I rushed instantly to the spot, at the peril of my life, announcing my profession. I soon made my way up to the open door of a carriage, from which issued the moanings of a female, evidently in great agony. The accident was this: A young lady had suddenly stretched her arm through the open window of the carriage conveying her to the opera, for the purpose of pointing out to one of her companions a brilliant illumination of one of the opposite houses.

At that instant their coachman, dashing forward to gain the open space opposite the box-door, shot with great velocity, and within a hairs-breadth distance, past a retiring carriage. The consequence was inevitable: A sudden shriek announced the dislocation of the young lady's shoulder, and the shocking laceration of the fore-arm and hand. When I arrived at the carriage door, the unfortunate sufferer was lying motionless in the arms of an elderly gentleman and a young lady, both of them, as might be expected, dreadfully agitated. It was the Earl of — and his two daughters. Having entered the carriage, I placed my fair patient in such a position as would prevent her suffering more than was necessary from the motion of the carriage—dispatched one of the servants for Mr Cline, to meet us on our arrival home, and then the coachman was ordered to drive home as fast as possible. I need not say more, than that by Mr Cline's skill the dislocation was quickly reduced, and the wounded hand and arm duly dressed. I then prescribed what medicines were necessary—received a check for ten guineas from the Earl, accompanied with fervent thanks for my prompt attentions, and was requested to call as early as possible the next morning.

As soon as I had left his lordship's door, I shot homeward like an arrow. My good fortune, (truly it is an ill wind that blows nobody any good,) was almost too much for me. I could scarce repress the violence of my emotions, but felt a continual inclination to relieve myself, by singing, shouting, or committing some other such extravagance. I arrived at home in a very few minutes, and rushed breathless up stairs, joy glittering in my eyes, to communicate my good fortune to my wife, and congratulate ourselves that the door of professional success was at last opened to us. How tenderly she tried to calm my excitement, and moderate my expectations, without at the same time depressing my spirits! I did certainly feel somewhat damped, when I recollected the little incident of my introduction to Sir William —, and its abrupt and unexpected termination. This, however, differed from that—and the event proved that my expectations were not ill founded.

I continued in constant attendance on my fair patient, who was really a very lovely girl; and by my unremitting and anxious attentions, so conciliated the favour of the Earl, and the rest of his family, that the countess, who had long been an invalid, was committed to my care, jointly with that of the family physician. I need hardly say, that my poor services were most nobly remunerated; and more than this—having succeeded in securing the confidence of the family, it was not many weeks before I had the honour of visiting one or two other families of high rank; and I felt conscious that I was laying the foundation of a fashionable and lucrative practice. With joy unutterable, I contrived to be ready for our half-yearly tormentor, old L—; and somewhat surprised him, by asking with an easy air, when he wished for a return of his principal. Of course, he was not desirous of losing such interest as I was paying!

I had seen too much of the bitterness of adversity, to suffer the dawn of good fortune to elate me into too great confidence. I now husbanded my resources with rigorous economy—and had, in return, the inexpressible satisfaction of being able to pay my way, and stand fair with all my creditors. My beloved Emily appeared in that society which she was born to ornament; and we numbered several families of high respectability among our visiting friends. As is usual, whenever accident threw me in the way of those who formerly scowled upon me contemptuously, I was received with an excess of civility. The very physician who sent me the munificent donation of a guinea, I met in consultation, and made his cheeks tingle, by returning him the loan he had advanced me!

In four years' time from the occurrence at the Haymarket, I contrived to repay old L—— his L.3000, (though he did not live a month after signing the receipt,) and thus escaped for ever from the fangs of the money-lenders. A word or two, also, about our Indian lodger. He died about eighteen months after the accident I have been relating. His sole heir was a young lieutenant in the navy; and very much to my surprise and gratification, in a codicil to old Mr G——'s will, I was left a legacy of L.2000, including the L.300 he had lent me, saying it was some return for the many attentions he had received from us, since he had been our lodger, and as a mark of his approbation of the honourable and virtuous principles by which, he said, he had always perceived our conduct to be actuated.

Twelve years from this period, my income amounted to between L.3000 and L.4000 a-year; and as my family was increasing, I thought my means warranted a more extensive establishment. I therefore removed into a large and elegant house, and set up my carriage. The recollection of past times has taught me at least one useful lesson—whether my life be long or short—to bear success with moderation, and never to turn a deaf ear to applications from the younger and less successful members of my profession.

“Sweet are the uses of adversity;
Which, like a toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.”

ON THE SUPPLY AND EXCHANGEABLE VALUE OF THE PRECIOUS METALS.

WRITERS ON CURRENCY seem, in general, to assume that the rise which has been gradually taking place in the price of provisions, or, what is the same thing, the fall which has taken place in the exchangeable value of money, arises from the increased influx of the precious metals poured into Europe since the discovery of America. Gold has been considered like those streams, which, flowing into a vast river, enlarge its volume; and the value of this metal, compared to that of corn, is supposed to have fallen in exact proportion to the quantity which has been put into circulation. Hence it has been argued, that gold and corn, relatively to each other, depend upon the respective quantities of each existing in the world. Supposing there were one million of ounces of gold in the world, and one million of quarters of corn grown annually, it is contended, that as each of these commodities bears a certain relation in point of exchangeable value one to the other, if the quantity of gold were to be increased, that its value, compared with corn, would fall; and, e contra, that if the quantity of gold were to be diminished, its value, compared to corn, would rise. Hence the elaborate disquisitions which have been recently written on the productiveness of the American mines: it is argued, that these mines, either from political or social causes, do not now furnish for the general market of the world as much of the precious metals as formerly; and that this is the main, if not the sole, cause of the rise which is acknowledged to have taken place in the value of money in this country.

The writers who support this doctrine, exonerate the government of this country from all blame on account of those changes in our monetary system which have unhinged all the pecuniary relations of private life; and which, by altering the standard of value, have enriched one half of the community at the expense of the ruin of the other half,—reducing to poverty and wretchedness thousands, nay, millions, of industrious and affluent subjects. The projectors and advocates of these momentous changes admit, that these consequences have resulted from the alteration which has taken place in the value of money. They admit that they have not only embarrassed, but actually ruined, one half of the community, while they have unduly and unjustly enriched the other half: but they deny that these effects flow from their projects and measures; they ascribe them to natural causes, which render the produce of the Transatlantic mines less abundant, or, what is practically the same thing, to those political convulsions which have had the effect of diverting the industry of South America from the working of these mines.

But the reasons thus put forward to shift the responsibility which would otherwise rest on the authors of the changes which have recently taken place in the monetary system of this country, do not appear to us to be well founded. That the value of gold and corn relatively to each other, should depend upon the respective quantities of each of these commodities existing either in the market of any particular country, or in the general market of the world, we conceive to be a position which is both false in theory, and actually disproved by numerous facts open to the observation of the least attentive enquirer. There are many reasons and facts which lead us to suspect, that the exchangeable value of the precious metals depends much more upon the direction and intensity of human industry, together with the rapid circulation of money, necessarily connected with the habits of an industrious community, than upon the productiveness of the mines which yield gold and silver, or the relative quantity of these metals which exist in the general market of the world. We conceive it even probable, that the quantity of gold existing in any country might have received an annual accession, and, at the end of a century, existed in a hundred-fold greater amount, without altering the original proportion between the value of a given weight of gold, and a given quantity of corn, provided the state of society likewise remained the same.

In every community the exchangeable value of the precious metals appears to fall concurrently with, and in proportion to, its progress in industry and civilisation. In France—a country backward in most of the arts of industry compared to England—corn is at least one-third cheaper. In Spain and Italy, the price of corn is still lower; although in some parts of the latter country—the Roman States—the population is literally starving. In Russia, although there be no want of provisions, but where manufacturing industry is in its infancy, the money price of provisions is extremely low. The case is the same in Turkey; and in Persia, to which Nadir Schah transported a part of the treasures of the East, but which is less industrious, it is lower still: and from the account which Turner has given of his Embassy to Thibet, we find, that in the north of India, where the greatest distress prevails, the price of provisions is incredibly low; and he remarks, that this is not the only instance in which the low price of provisions is accompanied with extreme misery among the people, arising from their utter inability to purchase food.

But it becomes at once apparent, that a wide distinction exists between the money price, and real price of food. Gold is, or may be, the money price of food, but labour is its real price. In India, when the money price is low, the people die of famine; in England, where it is high, they fare generally better than in any other country in the world. History shews the same difference between the value of gold and provisions, compared to what they are at the present time, to have taken place in our own country: it proves that the exchangeable value of gold has sunk, by slow gradations certainly, but in exact proportion to the increasing industry and civilisation of the people. In the time of the Saxons, it is computed that provisions were at about one-thirtieth of their present money price; and that from the time of Elizabeth to about 1780, their price increased only fourfold. How is this to be accounted for? Is it by the theory of those who consider the precious metals merely in their capacity of currency, and look upon them as a great river swelled by the supplies from South America, which has overflowed its former boundaries? If so, why did money prices sink before the existence of America was even suspected? If that depreciation rose solely from the increased quantity which had been derived from a regular supply; and if it operated with an accelerated force on the discovery of America, why did it operate in England more than in any other country? Why did it raise the price of provisions high in a country possessing no mines of gold and silver, and at a time when the precious metals had long ceased to be accumulated either in the treasures of the State, or as a favourite article of splendour and show among the people? And why has Spain, into which the wealth of the new world flowed, whose altars groan beneath the costly offerings of superstition, and where a taste for the precious metals long prevailed among the higher orders—why has Spain seen her people sunk in poverty and ignorance? The answer to these questions is, we think, obvious. Gold has fallen in value in those countries, in which, from the progress of freedom and civilisation, industry has been encouraged and made to flourish.

It seems to excite great alarm among the manufacturing and commercial classes, that the money price of corn is generally higher in this than in any other country. They conceive that this circumstance will enable foreign rivals to undersell them in the general market of the world. But nothing can, in truth, be more visionary than this fear. The high price of corn, or, what is the same thing, the comparative low value of the precious metals, which has filled the minds of our traders with so much groundless apprehension, is the sure sign and necessary result of national prosperity; and so far is this fact from impeding the sale of our manufactured goods in foreign countries, that it is only when they sell, and sell with profit to the fabricator, that the high money price of corn can be maintained. The moment the demand for wrought commodities—for the products of industry, relaxes, the means of the purchasers of agricultural produce will diminish, and the money price of corn will necessarily fall. We might as well quarrel with the thermometer for rising, when we increase the temperature of our room, as with that high money price of corn—that measure of its value by gold—which proves that, in England, industry is rated higher, and commands a greater profit, than in any other country in the world.

If, then, the high money price of corn be in fact the result of our commercial prosperity, and a proof of the superior value of our industry, and consequently of the corn which supports it, compared to the industry and corn of other nations; if, in fact, it merely shew that the relative worth which gold, as an article of merchandise, bears to our manufactured goods, is lower than it is to the productions of other countries, whose manufacturing industry is at a lower pitch, why should it create more uneasiness than the cheapness of any other article which we may happen to import? If we want gold, we can command more of it than any other country, and at a less sacrifice. If we choose to employ gold, not only as a metal useful for the purposes of art, but also as a measure of value, we must submit to make use of it, not as a perfect, but as an imperfect instrument. It must be recollected, that the measure itself varies at particular periods, and in particular places; and it is incumbent upon us to bend our theory to facts, and not to misrepresent facts to suit our theory. The consequences of such a delusion may be dangerous. Gold is, as a merchandise, subject to all the fluctuations of value to which other commodities are liable, although in a less degree. So far is even this metal from being a universal and unvarying measure of value, that such a measure cannot be pointed out in theory, much less found for practical purposes. Corn and labour approach, perhaps, the nearest to an unfluctuating standard; but these differ so widely in value in different places, and under different circumstances; in times of peace compared with those of war; of plenty contrasted with famine; in fertile and barren districts; that, as the measure of the value of other commodities over these first and essential components of wealth, they cannot operate steadily and uniformly.

But although we have chosen gold as the metal composing the standard by which we measure value, few will undertake to maintain that some other commodity might not answer the same purpose. In Africa, which carries on a trade in gold dust, the inhabitants estimate the value of their merchandise, not in gold, but in iron. Mungo Park tells us, that the African merchants compare the value of all other goods to that of a certain weight of iron called a bar: hence a certain quantity of tobacco is called a bar of tobacco; a gallon of rum a bar of rum; and that Europeans who trade in this country reckon a bar at about two shillings, and compute, that a slave which exchanges for one hundred and fifty bars is worth fifteen pounds in Sterling money. Our political economists have never attempted to rouse the country, slumbering in a delusive dream of riches and prosperity, and dispel the pleasant vision, by shewing us, that the same piece of iron which, in this country, is only equivalent to one bushel of wheat, would, in Africa, actually exchange for four bushels of the same grain. It thus appears that we pay for our bread four times as much iron as the Foulis and Mandingoes. What a terrible fact! It is, we think, quite as alarming as the analogous misfortune, that we are compelled to pay for our food four times as much gold as the enslaved Pole or Russian. But this argument, which, if applied to Africa and iron, would be treated with ridicule, when put into the mouth of the President of the Board of Trade, with relation to England and gold, is lauded as the highest effort of the human understanding, and received as the dictate of transcendent wisdom.

In order to put in a clear light the effect which a high money price of corn is calculated to produce upon the operations of foreign trade, let us suppose that an English merchant went to Arabia to purchase gums, and that he carried out cotton shawls to be disposed of in that country, which had cost him five shillings each in the home market; suppose farther, that the Arabs, instead of gold, made use of tobacco as the measure of value, (and at one time tobacco was unknown in Europe, or at least not sought for in the market,) would the merchant be disposed to take a quantity of tobacco, either unsaleable, or worth but a small part of five shillings, in the European market, in exchange for his shawl, which he estimated at that sum? Certainly not. But if he ascertained that tobacco was the money of the Arabs, and that he could buy as much gum as he wanted if he had tobacco to pay for it, he would then proceed to find out how much gum the quantity of tobacco offered for his shawl, worth five shillings, would purchase. If, on enquiry, he discovered that he could get gum worth ten shillings in the market to which he meant to convey it, and he knew that this would be sufficient to defray the cost of transport and secure a fair mercantile profit, he would rest satisfied with the transaction. The real value of the tobacco would appear to him perfectly immaterial; he would consider it only as a measure of value.

The same thing might occur if an English merchant took a tea-pot, worth five shillings, to China, and there found he could only exchange it for a quantity of silver equal to two shillings and sixpence. He would not receive the silver for the purpose of bringing it home; but if, with that two shillings and sixpence worth of silver he could purchase tea, which he knew, from experience, would sell in England for ten shillings, and ensure a fair mercantile profit, he would readily receive the silver, which he would consider only as a measure of value. This is so true, that the case actually occurred a few years back, at the German fairs, where English goods were found to sell for a money price which was below prime cost. Our alarmists then observed, "Our trade is ruined if we cannot sell our goods at their original cost in the foreign market." To this it was replied, that the effect arose only from a change in the value of the currency, and need cause no alarm. Our merchants sold their goods cheap when measured by their money price; but then they purchased foreign goods at an equally low rate. The relative price was unaltered; and when the foreign goods were imported into England, and sold, the commercial profit remained the same. This circumstance must be familiar to every experienced merchant: when a cargo of cotton goods is exported to Turkey, for instance, the owner does not so much consider the money price at which it will sell there, as the money price at which the equivalent commodities, brought home from Turkey, will sell in our own market. Our wrought cotton goods may sell at Smyrna for no more than half the money price which they cost at Manchester; and yet, if the proceeds be laid out in purchasing a return cargo of oranges or figs, these commodities, when disposed of in the British market, may yield a money price which will give the adventurer a fair mercantile return upon his capital.

Those who, in speaking of price, consider gold currency, as it is generally called, as distinct from gold, as a merchandise, are clearly in error. The very word itself, if taken in its right sense, expresses a quality, and not a separate existence. It implies the act of motion, or passing from hand to hand. But the dog which runs at one moment, and lies down at another, is still one and the same dog. Gold coin is nothing but gold stamped to ascertain its weight and fineness; and it is well known, that no lower regulation can permanently prevent its bearing the same exchangeable value to other commodities in both of these states; and that the mint and market price of gold always have a tendency to approximate. A certain weight of gold, in the shape of a coin or piece of money, cannot be taken as an unit of a given value all over the world; it cannot be considered as a fractional division of one great whole, invariable in its nature, and unalterable by time or place. It is not the unerring standard by which the cheapness or dearness of commodities, in different countries, and at different periods, can be ascertained. And admitting that fact to be true, which is allowed on all hands, that a great depreciation of the precious metals took place subsequently to the discovery of America, those who conceive that depreciation to arise solely from their greater abundance, and consider them as an accurate measure of value all over the world, must acknowledge, that their having been depreciated more rapidly and constantly in particular countries than in others is a circumstance at variance with their own theory. To suppose that the high money price of corn arises solely from the increased quantity of the precious metals, it must be supposed that the quantity of corn produced has not increased in the same ratio; for it is acknowledged, that the value of gold, compared to wrought goods, is greater now than formerly, and that, notwithstanding the increased quantity of gold, the same weight of that metal will exchange for a greater quantity of manufactured articles, from the still more abundant supply of the latter which is now brought to market; while, on the other hand, the same weight of gold will exchange for less corn. This is ascribed to the quantity of corn not having increased in the same proportion as gold. Here, however, a remarkable contradiction manifests itself, since we find that it is in England, where cultivation has been so much extended, and where each individual consumes more food, and of a better quality, than the inhabitants of any other part of the world, that the money price of corn is highest. But when we advert to the fact, that gold is a merchandise, bearing a different value in different countries, these apparent contradictions are reconciled.

Although gold has been depreciated in a more rapid degree, from the date of the discovery of America, it is by no means a necessary consequence, that the increased supply from the mines should be the main, much less the sole cause of that depreciation. Various other causes to which, collectively, we venture to ascribe the depreciation of gold relatively to corn, or that high money price of provisions of which the trading and mercantile classes complain, date also from the same epoch. At that period the old feudal system began to break up; the monarchical power all over Europe acquired greater firmness and stability; and, under the protection of the tranquillity and good order thus created, industry began to flourish. The mercantile body and the inhabitants of the towns, shielded by the policy of the sovereigns against the tyranny of the nobles, increased in wealth and importance. Governments began to feel the importance of trade, and to attend to its interests. New castes and new habits sprung up with a different state of society.

Those who conceive that the cheapness or dearness of corn to a community can be ascertained by its money price, clearly labour under a vulgar and unphilosophical error. All those circumstances which affect and stamp the relative price of gold when compared with corn or labour, must be taken into consideration before a knowledge of the real price of corn, namely, the portion of labour exchanged for subsistence can be ascertained. If from the freedom of our government, the security of property and the stability of our institutions, gold is not sought for in England in order to be buried or concealed, and is held but in small estimation as the means of security: if from the perfection of our manufacturing industry, the labour of our artisans can command large supplies of gold, or its equivalents in foreign markets, that metal must be lower in value, because more abundant in England than elsewhere. Corn, although more abundant in England in proportion to its actual population than in any other part of Europe, is dearer compared to gold:

and it can only become otherwise by equalizing the value of gold in England to that which it bears in other countries: an object which can be accomplished only in one of two ways; either by ruining our manufactures and commerce, or by forcing those who have invested their capital in agriculture to receive less than their fair share of profits.

Those who imagine that our commercial prosperity, or the cheapness of our wrought commodities, depends on the lower price of corn, labour unquestionably under an egregious mistake; for actual experience shews that we can supply even India, where the Hindoo subsists on a little rice, purchased at a low money price, and who is said to earn about twopence per day, with muslins fabricated by the most thriving and best paid of our manufacturers, and actually undersell the poor native in his own market! Manufacturing wages do not even bear an exact proportion to the price of corn. They outrun that price: for although the price of corn follows the increasing profits of manufacturing industry, it still lags heavily behind. From the high exchangeable value of his labour, the manufacturer daily advances in luxury and refinement, and obtains a greater share of comforts and enjoyments. He earns them, and no doubt deserves them;—such is the naked fact: but if on every manufactured article sent to market a nice estimate were to be made of the cost of its produce—if it were asked how much was expended on the purchase of the raw material, perhaps foreign, how much paid in injudicious taxes, how much in defraying the necessary profit of capital, how much for the luxuries of the manufacturer, and how much for his bread—we are convinced that the amount of the latter item would be so small a proportion to the whole, as to render the outcry which is raised about it quite ridiculous.

The persons who clamour for cheap bread inform us, that we cannot compete in foreign markets with foreign manufacturers, because our corn sells so dear, and the wages of labour are so high, that we cannot afford to dispose of our wrought commodities at as cheap a rate as the manufacturers of other countries.

We are therefore exhorted to purchase cheap bread, give low wages, and furnish cheap goods, in order to relieve the country now labouring under an immense debt, and a heavy burden of taxes. Now, what is this, but saying that the corn, the labour, and the manufactures of Great Britain, shall be estimated at only half their usual amount? But do those who appear so anxious to relieve the country, and propose to effect it in the manner just stated, recollect that Government, in the shape of taxes, puts its hand on a certain portion of the corn, and labour, and manufactures of the country, which it applies to the service of the state? Whether that portion be represented by one piece of gold or another, is of no vital importance: but if the value of all commodities compared to gold be lessened one half, and taxes to the same nominal amount in a metallic currency be still raised, it becomes evident that Government exacts from the country a tribute twice as heavy as it did previously. The current expenses of the state might no doubt be so modified as to meet the expenses of the day; but with respect to the interest of the national debt, such a reduction is scarcely practicable. Even the reduction of our current expenses in proportion to the altered value of money does not appear quite so much a matter of course as an honest man might expect to find it. The recent alteration which enhanced the value of the pound sterling in this country somewhere between 40 and 50 per cent, has already compelled the great body of the landowners to lower their rents, and of the capitalists to lower their profits, in that proportion: but we have not yet heard that a similar movement has been made by the numerous band of placemen and pensioners whom we have the pleasure of supporting. Although the price of commodities has fallen nearly 50 per cent, from the change effected in our monetary system, we have not yet been able to discover that any members of this fortunate class have remitted one shilling of the salaries or pensions which they draw from the public purse. We are not disposed to recommend niggardliness in rewarding statesmen, nor to curtail unfairly those pensions which have been granted as a compensation for valuable public services. But we conceive it neither niggardly nor unjust that all salaries and pensions should be reduced in exact proportion to the enhanced value of the currency in which they are for the future to be paid.

It appears indeed quite certain that the high money-price of bread, if not caused by scarcity, is both the measure and proof of the wealth of society : a gratifying truth which never should be lost sight of by the labouring classes in England, where it is always found impossible, for any length of time, to keep down the price of the quartern loaf. Although our Ministers, misled and deluded by the political economists, have made the most ruinous experiments, tampering with the currency, with commerce, and the trade of the country; still, no sooner are these severe shocks in some measure got over, and the productive classes begin to breathe again, than bread rises in price, and those very persons begin to eat the quartern loaf at a shilling, who were all but starving while it remained at sixpence.

If, indeed, it were practicable to form an exact scale of the money-price of bread in all the countries in the world, and we were then to compare it with the quantity of food and manufactured articles, together with the comforts and luxuries, enjoyed by each of their inhabitants, it would uniformly be found, that the money-price of bread bears an exact proportion to the wealth and comfort of each community : wherever the money-price of bread, on an average of years, is high, the community is prosperous and wealthy ; wherever, on the contrary, the money-price of that necessary of life is low, the inhabitants will be found steeped in poverty and wretchedness. To this proposition neither experience nor history can furnish an exception. When the money-price of bread is low, the food consumed by each individual is both less in quantity and worse in quality. The Pole lives on black bread, the Frenchman chiefly on soup maigre and vegetables. It is a subject of constant and pathetic lamentation, that the common people of England are not, as their predecessors used to be, content with brown bread. Compare the fare of these different nations to that of Englishmen, who live upon white bread, meat, cheese, and butter, and who enjoy, in addition, many foreign luxuries, such as tea, sugar, and coffee. Their persevering industry is that which enables them to pay the price of this extraordinary supply of human sustenance. The high money-price of bread, of which with short-sighted ignorance we complain, unmindful of the blessings of which it constitutes an unceasing proof, is not only an evidence of commercial prosperity, and of the general ease and comfort of society ; but as these depend upon greater or less degrees of mitigation and freedom, it is a test by which we can estimate the advances of both, and of man himself to a more perfect state of social happiness. This is not mere theory, unsupported by evidence drawn from experience ; it is, on the contrary, a deduction which must force itself on the mind of every person who will be at the pains of examining the actual condition of various parts of the world, and reflect upon the causes which act upon the comforts and wealth of society. "Everywhere," observes an intelligent writer on this subject, "I have found the low money-price of provisions accompanied with wretchedness in the great bulk of the people ; and I have never seen any individual offer the food necessary for human subsistence, or its more luxurious gratifications, for a mere trifle in money, without a painful conviction of the scanty recompense which the labour of the same individual could command. I have seen a fine turkey sold in the southern part of Russia, in the capital of the Don Cossacks, for eightpence ; why ? because few possessed eightpence which they could afford to part with to purchase it. I have seen wine in France at threepence a-bottle, in a district in which it is not produced, but imported, where the great bulk of the inhabitants drink water ; because wine, even at that price, is too dear for their scanty means. But it is not in Russia, where the cultivators of the soil are slaves to their lords, who, if they allow them to exercise any industry on their own account, do it on the condition of receiving a tax out of the earnings of their bondmen,—a tax uncertain and arbitrary,—depending on the increasing profits of the slave, and the insatiable avarice of the master; it is not in such a country that the people can possess the usual incitements to industry, or reap its rewards. They cannot acquire wealth, and it therefore becomes impossible that they should offer it in any shape, either in gold or produce, whose value is measured by gold, in exchange for their food. Neither can the French peasant, who lives in those provinces of France where few manufactures exist, afford to drink the wine which appears to Englishmen so incredibly cheap. But change the situation of the people inhabiting these countries; give freedom to their exertions and a spur to their industry, and in an instant their labour will become valuable, and the bread exchanged for that labour will bear a high money-price."

"It must be remarked," says Mr Robertson, in his Rural Recollections, "that during the period in which agriculture has made the greatest progress, even to the extent of making the land produce more than double its former store, the price of corn has also been gradually on the advance, though not to the same extent as the rate of labour. This is indeed a curious fact, that a greater supply in the market should be followed by a greater dearth in the price. But the solution is easy. There has been nearly an equal increase in the population, and also money has fallen in value. The same piece of silver or of gold does not purchase so much as it was wont to do, whether it be of clothing, of furniture, or of provisions, but more especially of labour. Dating from about the year 1745, a period from which the commencement of agricultural improvement in Scotland is very generally traced, there has been a gradual advance in the price of land produce, slowly at first, but ultimately increasing more rapidly, till at last it has advanced in the present times more than sixty per cent, at an average of the different species of bread corn; that is, from the year 1745 to crop 1827. But, in the same time, the rate of wages, from the greater demand for labour, has increased upwards of one hundred per cent on the average of these years; and which, in the last twenty or thirty years, has risen two hundred per cent, or three times the rate in former times, immediately preceding the year 1745. This greater advance in the rate of wages applies to all labourers in husbandry, and to every description of mechanics, whether in town or country; so that the never-ceasing outcry against the corn-laws, as being adverse to the industrious part of the community, is in direct opposition to fact. Every thing, in the course of the latter period, from 1745 to 1827, in consequence of the fall in the price of money, has become nominally dearer, yet nobody is poorer on that account; that is, no class in the community, well-employed, is less able to support its wonted rank in society. Even the common labourer is richer than formerly. He can afford to live better, and actually does live better. He has better food, better clothing, and better lodging than in olden times."

If we carry our thoughts back to that period of time when manufacturing industry did not exist, and when the possessor of land commanded the whole labour of society, and enjoyed the whole produce of the soil, after affording a coarse and scanty nourishment to his vassals, the truth of the above observations will appear still more evident. While such a state of things exists, how can the inferior classes give gold, or any thing which can be exchanged in the market for gold, as the price of food? It is impossible; money, if in such a state of things it circulates at all in the shape of coin, must be composed of the least valuable of the metals. Thus, the first money of the Romans was copper; and it is a remarkable fact, that at this very day, in one of the departments of France, corn, owing to the poverty of the people, is used as the instrument of exchange, and money composed of coin is seldom seen. However strange this fact may sound in the ears of mercantile men, it is fully confirmed by an account of Corsica, published by M. de Beaumont, a public functionary lately residing in that island. He describes it as mountainous and barren, and the population uncivilized, fierce, and ignorant, as devoid of habits of industry. In that island, the poverty of which cannot be a matter open to doubt, corn not only does not bear a high money-price, but money itself is almost unknown.

Upon the whole, it appears quite clear that gold is not a general measure by which the real cheapness of corn can be estimated. The persons who tell us that we may get our corn cheaper from other countries than it can be grown in England, do not consider that we measure that cheapness by a merchandise which is worth more in one country than it is in another. Adam Smith very properly adverts to this circumstance when he distinguishes between real and money price, and states distinctly that silver, as a measure of value, varies more from century to century than corn; and adds, that money is the best measure of value at the same time and place—but at the same time and place only. Gold may be cheap, and is cheap, in England, from the superior industry and skill of its population. This circumstance brings a greater quantity of gold into the country for the purpose of measuring the value of corn and labour; it likewise increases to a very great degree the rapidity with which coin circulates, and passes from one hand to another; which in itself very materially contributes to diminish the exchangeable value of the metal of which the current coin is composed. But corn may be cheap relatively to labour, although gold be cheap relatively to both.

In every country, the exchangeable value of gold or silver money depends upon the productive industry of the inhabitants. It varies, therefore, not only at distant periods, and in distant countries, but it may differ materially at periods touching upon each other, and in countries separated by a mere line of demarcation. This is a well-known truth, practically familiar to every capitalist. No rational individual, who in the course of the last century accepted a fixed annuity, expected that the same nominal sum of money would command as great a share of the labour of society, at the end of a period of twenty or thirty years, as it did when the bargain was made; but as he had found the decrease in the value of money to be gradual, he preferred that disadvantage to the risks of business, or the smaller returns of landed property. We speak here, of course, of that natural depreciation which was constantly going on in the value of commodities, when measured in metallic money; and not of that artificial depreciation which resulted from the use of a paper currency, not convertible into cash at the will of the holder. The one kind of depreciation had no necessary connexion with, or dependence upon, the other. The depreciation of the exchangeable value of gold, arising from the development of national industry, would have equally taken place if the Bank of England had never been authorized to suspend cash payments. The sole object of our present enquiry is, therefore, not the depreciation of paper-money, but of the precious metals when actually used as the current coin. Every person at all acquainted with the variation of prices at different times, and in different countries, must be well aware, that money goes farther in France, and all over the continent, than in Great Britain: that the same weight of gold or silver commands a larger quantity of food, and more of the labour of society, abroad, than in England. But does this shew that land on the continent is more fertile than the soil of England? or that the working classes abroad are better off, or that they either possess or consume more corn, than the more industrious inhabitants of this island?

We therefore beg to repeat, that bread itself, when measured by labour—the only standard with which the workman, who earns his subsistence by labour, has a concern—may be cheap, while its price, measured by money, may be high; and that the high money-price of bread, when it is not produced by actual scarcity, is the natural and inevitable result of manufacturing and commercial prosperity. The principles involved in a just theory of price, tend to shew what has been fully confirmed by experience, that the high money-value of provisions, when occasioned, not by a deficient supply, but by an active demand, cannot be the cause of poverty and distress. That great rise in the money-price of bread—or rather that depreciation of gold—that lowering of its exchangeable value—which took place with such remarkable rapidity between the close of the American war and the year 1813, was, in point of fact, the result of that extraordinary manufacturing and commercial prosperity, which naturally and necessarily accompanied the increasing energy of our national industry. In other countries, where the same cause was not called into operation, the exchangeable value of gold remained unaffected—whenever that prosperity, which caused the depreciation of the precious metals begins to retrograde, gold also will begin to recede towards its ancient standard of exchangeable value.

Whenever our industry, our manufactures, and our commerce, shall decay, the price of bread will fall, and fall low enough; and if ever the moment should arrive, when the price of bread shall, upon an average of years, be lower in England than in the other countries of Europe, the knell of British greatness will have tolled.

We warn our countrymen, therefore, not to let themselves be misled and deluded by the clamours which are too frequently set up on the subject of the price of bread. These clamours are raised by two classes of individuals—by a class which is too ignorant to perceive the causes which truly affect the money-price of provisions; or by a class of men, who, although they perceive these causes, are still base and wicked enough, either for factious or selfish purposes, to strain every nerve to lead the credulous multitude astray. The first class of clamourers for cheap bread err through ignorance; they consist chiefly of ill-informed persons who have embarked their capital in manufacturing and commercial speculations; who conceive that a fall in the money-price of bread would enable them to lower wages, and by that means realize increased profits. But no such advantage would result to them from a reduction in the average money-price of bread; it is, no doubt, true, that it would enable them to reduce the nominal amount of wages; but then a proportionate fall would inevitably take place in the money-price of the manufactured article, and the ratio of profits to capital would retain its accustomed level. Another numerous, and at the same time persevering, body of clamourers for cheap bread, consists of persons who raise this cry either for factious or selfish purposes. No man who watches the operations of the press in this country can be ignorant of the mortifying fact, that many of the writers who possess the fairest opportunities of giving a sound direction to public opinion on important questions of national policy, labour with wicked industry to foster the ignorant prejudices of the multitude; it would, no doubt, redound much to their honour to endeavour to lead the productive classes to a right way of thinking on this subject; but they consider it more profitable to act as panders to the baser passions of mankind. In their clamours on the subject of the price of bread, they are joined by many of those persons who are not engaged in any species of productive industry, but subsist upon the interest of money lent either to the state or private individuals. Those persons, who live upon the interest of money, together with those who draw pensions and salaries out of the public purse, form, in truth, the only class who can reap any advantage from a permanent reduction in the money-price of corn; such a fall, no doubt, enriches them: it enables them to acquire a greater command over the labour of the community, and to appropriate to their own use a larger share of the productions of national industry; but in proportion to their gain from the low money-price of corn, is the loss sustained by the rest of the community; these are, in truth, the drones of the social hive; and the low price of corn always puts it in their power to profit at the expense of the working bees. No wonder, therefore, that this class—this drone class—which consumes the sweets of the hive without replacing a single particle, should vociferate for cheap bread; but we do wonder that the productive classes—the manufacturers, the merchants, and the artisans of this country, whose prosperity has invariably been found to bear an exact proportion to the rise which takes place in the money-price of bread, when that rise is not occasioned by actual scarcity, should be prevailed upon to join in this ignorant and besotted clamour. It is manifestly the interest of all the productive classes; of all the manufacturers, and working labourers of every name and craft, that the money-price of corn should, on an average of years, be high. The experience of all times, as well as of all countries, has proved that, whenever this is the case, the manufacturing and commercial classes invariably realize large profits; while the labourers and artisans of the country enjoy constant work, and earn high wages. Their means of purchasing provisions, derived from increasing profits, regular employment, and higher wages, more than keep pace with any general rise which may take place in the money-price of corn. This is borne out by circumstances which must be still fresh in the recollection of the working classes in this country. At no period of the history of Great Britain was the reward of industry more liberal, more constant, and more certain, than during the interval between the close of the American war and the year 1815; while the money-price of bread was, upon an average of years, much higher than it has been ever previously known in the home market; but, although the British labourer had to pay more for his bread than his foreign competitor, this was much more than counterbalanced by the extra wages which a regular and eager demand for his services enabled him to earn. And in this general prosperity of the working classes, the capitalists, who gave them employment, fully participated. While bread was high, the manufacturers and merchants of England were realizing ample profits, and the whole body of workmen earning ample wages; no sooner, however, did the economists commence their operations for the purpose of reducing the price of bread, than the prosperity of both these classes began to decline. The quartern loaf fell, it is true, nearly one half in price; but then the profits of the capitalist, and the wages of the labourer, have been diminished in a still larger proportion. It is therefore the interest of all the productive classes in this country, that the money-price of bread should be high; when this results not from a scarcity—not from a deficient supply of grain—but from a brisk demand for food on the part of an industrious and well-employed community, it is a symptom and a proof of the prosperous condition of all those classes who are engaged in production; it furnishes the most unequivocal evidence, that there is a steady demand for their industry, and for the produce of that industry.

The mischievous changes which have recently taken place in our commercial and internal policy, have produced a most unfavourable effect upon our national industry. The flood-gates of foreign rivalry have been foolishly opened upon our manufacturers. The circulating medium has been put under unwise and unnecessary restrictions; and the consequence has been, a serious check upon our accustomed prosperity. We are really inclined to suspect, that the discouragement to native industry resulting from the alterations which have been recently effected in our commercial relations with other countries, has operated upon the price of agricultural produce to a greater extent than the change which has been made in the standard of value. We are by no means disposed to overlook or underrate the effect of this latter cause; but the effect of the former cause we are certainly disposed to consider of greater magnitude and importance. Many able men, we are well aware, hold the opinion, that if the supply of the precious metals derived from the American mines could be restored to its usual amount, the recent rise in the exchangeable value of money would disappear, and that an abundant currency would bring about the return of our former prosperity. Now we cannot fully coincide in this opinion. It appears to us, that without a renovation of our relaxed industry, no additional supply of the precious metals, however abundant or cheaply procured, could, of itself, restore the fallen prosperity of Britain. This happy result depends, fortunately, not upon the American mines, but upon the full and unimpeded development of our national industry. On this point, we think Mr Hume, in his Essay on Money, has fallen into an error. "We find," observes that writer, in a passage which has been often quoted, "that into every kingdom into which money begins to flow in greater abundance than formerly, every thing takes a new face: labour and industry gain life—the merchant becomes more enterprising, the manufacturer more diligent and skilful, and even the farmer follows his plough with greater alacrity and attention. On the other hand, when gold and silver are diminishing, the workman has not the same employment from the manufacturer and the merchant—the farmer cannot dispose of his corn and his cattle, though he must pay the same rent to his landlord. The poverty, and beggary, and sloth, which must ensue, are easily foreseen.” He seems to consider the more abundant flow of the precious metals into any country as the cause which sets the industry of its inhabitants in motion. This is not by any means so clear as many writers on currency seem to imagine. We strongly suspect, that in this instance, the effect is mistaken for the cause. We believe, that in every country, an increased supply of the precious metals will always be found to follow in the train of more active industry, but never of itself to act as a cause exciting to industry. In every kingdom things assume a new face, not because money begins to flow in greater abundance than formerly; but, on the contrary, money flows in greater abundance than formerly, because things put on a new face. Because labour and industry gain life, “the merchant is more enterprising, the manufacturer more diligent and skilful, and even the farmer follows his plough with greater alacrity and attention.” This view of the matter is corroborated by the effect which the discovery of America produced on the internal condition of Spain. After that event, the precious metals found their way into Spain in much greater abundance than previously; but we have no evidence to shew, that in Spain, every thing took a new face, or that labour and industry gained new life. On the contrary, the precious metals were introduced merely as mercantile commodities, to be exported to other countries, and not to be used as a measure of value circulating rapidly from hand to hand among a numerous and industrious population.

We are thus of opinion, that more stress has been laid upon the supply of the precious metals now derived from the American mines, than the matter really deserves. It must, no doubt, be admitted, that this diminution in the usual amount of the supply has had some share in the rise which has recently taken place in the value of money. It is, however, we think, indisputable that this will only account for a small portion of that rise. The greater portion of it must be ascribed to the discouragement, and consequent relaxation, of our native industry, arising from the impolitic admission of foreign rivalry. We are confirmed in this opinion by the well-known fact, that the rise which has recently taken place in the value of money, is much greater in England than in any other country in Europe. If this rise had been solely the consequence of a diminution in the usual supply of the precious metals, it would necessarily have taken place in an equal proportion all over Europe. This is manifestly not the case. The writers who trace our present embarrassments to natural or political causes which render the American mines less productive than usual, labour clearly under an erroneous impression. Our difficulties do not spring from this source, but from the false measures which have crippled the energy of our national industry.

STEM AND STERN.—TOM CRINGLE AND THE DEVIL.

To Commodore Christopher North.

DEAR WORTHY OLD GENTLEMAN,

BLESS you, man, your chief devil has got me into a — of a mess by a misprint—confound my cramp fist—in “Davy Jones,” in the number for July.

I perceive in this the hoof of the same fiend, who, in the “Scene off Bermuda,” in September last, sent old Kelson, the carpenter, a gowk’s errand into the fore-top, to see what the “fore-yawl,” instead of the wounded “fore-yard,” would carry, as if men-of-war had bun-boats at their mast-heads! But to the matter. In the very offset of “Davy Jones,” he makes me say standing on the bow-sprit, that “the spray from the stern was flashing over me, as it roared through the waste of sparkling and hissing waters.” Now I don’t dispute the roaring of sterns—in season. But, — me, if you or any other man shall make Tom Cringle’s stern roar, out of season, on compulsion. I wrote STEM, the cutwater of the ship, the coulter as it were—the head of her, not the tail, as the devil would have it. And again, when the privateer hauls his wind suddenly, to let the Torch shoot past him, and thereby gain the weather gage, when old Splinter should sing out, as it was written—but, confound the fist once more—“Give her the stem”—that is, run her down and sink her, the stem being the strongest part, as the stern is the weakest, he, Belzebub, judging, I presume, of the respective strength of the two ends from his own comparative anatomy, makes him say, “Give her the stern,” as if he were going to let drive at her with that end. “Poo, nonsense—it don’t signify.” But it does signify, old man. Only fancy, had I, when I asked you to give your countenance to my “humble efforts,” as the block-heads whom you scarify say, beseeched you to give your but-end to them, would this not have signified, would it not have been imprecating the very fate of the aforesaid block-heads?

To touch you more near—you yourself have been known to get fou and pugnacious on great occasions—the visit of royalty, for instance—it is on record. A mountain foreigner from Ross-shire engages you, for some unknown insult, in single combat, and, leagued with John Barley-corn, (let us imagine an impossibility,) floors you by a peg on the gnomon—the wound is in the front—your snout is broken, but your honour is whole. Would it be so, were the Gael to allege, that “her nainsel had coupit the Giant of the North py a pig kick on her preach?” By all the gods, he of the laconic garment, the “thousand hill man,” would have been careering on a cloud after his “freen” Ossian, with the moon shining through him, within that very hour.

Still I would rather have fought Peter than bothered you; but I know his Most Gracious Majesty King William, God bless him! (who can forget poor Burns’s “Tarry Breeks?”) either has noticed it, or will notice it, the instant he comes to that part of the Magazine. Now this, without explanation, is inconvenient, trousers being likely to come as high up now as pantaloons, and I have some claim on him, seeing that my father, Job Cringle, some five-and forty years ago, at Jamaica, in the town of Port-Royal, had his head-rails smashed, the neb of his nose (stem) bitten off by a bungo, and the end of his spine (stern-post), that mysterious point, where man ends, and monkey begins, grievously shaken in a spree at Kitty Finuans, in Prince William Henry’s company.

“Poo, nonsense.” Indeed!—Why, the very devil himself, the author of the evil, shall be convinced that there is much peril in the transposition of ends. I will ask him—“What is a sternutation?”—(words being his weapons)—“What is a sternutation?” He shall answer learnedly by the card—“A sneeze,” the nose or stem being the organ. Then he shall ask Jem Sparkle “What is a sternutation?” You laugh, old gentleman; but your devil’s “mistack” looks every inch as queer to a sailor as our topman’s answer would sound to you.

Yours with all cordiality,

THOMAS CRINGLE.

COAST BLOCKADE, Station 3194,
17th July, 1890.

FERDINAND THE BELOVED; OR, ROYAL GRATITUDE.

The proclamation concluded by declaring the CORTES to be dissolved; and ordaining that all opposing the execution of this decree should suffer DEATH!!!

ANNALS OF THE PENINSULAR CAMPAIGNS.

AFTER AN arduous service of six years in Portugal and Spain, during the whole of the interesting campaigns in these countries, I was at length indulged with permission to revisit England, on the short leave of absence of two months. Anxious to behold the gratifying spectacle of an idolized monarch reascending the throne of his ancestors, amidst the acclamations and blessings of his devoted people, after so many years of vicissitude in the fortune of war, I waved my original intention of embarking in the British packet from Cadiz, and determined on a journey to Madrid; having found a ready companion for the voyage in my friend, (a merchant of the former city,) at whose establishment, at Xeres de la Frontera, I had been passing some pleasant weeks.

Our preparations were immediately commenced. Knowing by experience how sadly destitute the houses of public accommodation on our route were of those conveniences, which are to be found, with a greater or less degree of comfort, in other parts of the European continent; I stored my ample canteens, (capable of furnishing a breakfast and dinner service for four persons,) with an abundant stock of tea, coffee, chocolate, sugars, liqueurs, and a gallon of old "King's own" rum, (which had not seen the light for five years;) nor did I omit (although no smoker myself) to fill a canister with a few dozen of prime Havannah cigars, of such a superior quality, that my fuming friends bestowed on them the name of "sugar-plums."

Money, or liquor, no doubt, will have their influence in all countries; but to a Spaniard, a more tempting bribe could not be offered to quicken the movements of every man on the road, from the Director-general of Posts in his gaudy coat, down to the humble driver in his sheep-skin jacket, than a good cigar! It has been even known to mollify the heart of the rude bandit, and cause him, whilst rifling his victim, to utter an apologetic—"Pardon me, sir, for this little liberty!"

We discovered a chariot of ancient fashion for sale, which had been built, Heaven knows when, or where; but it had the advantages of being strong and roomy, with luggage wells, which were easily converted into a deposit for my canteens; a strong net-work bag was fitted up behind, for the reception of the luggage, &c., which is called the Zagal, a name which is also borne by the man who sits in charge of it, and who has the additional duty to perform, of running between the leaders of the mule-team through towns, or narrow passes, holding the head of each at arms-length, whilst he, scarcely touching the ground, seems almost to fly, as he guides the team at a galloping pace. In this reticulated sack our trunks were stowed, and over them the bed-ding. My companion had provided regular mattress, bolster, &c. My preparations in that respect were few and simple—a canvass bag, six feet by two, a pillow, and a blanket, sufficed for all my wants; this bag was each night filled with fresh straw, (an ever-ready convenience,) and being laid on the well-swept floor, with the luxury of a pillow, I formed as comfortable a resting-place as I could desire, infinitely preferable to a berth on these (almost-living) bedsteads, on which the unwary traveller is invited to repose at the Posado. In various parts of the interior of the carriage were secret pockets, so artfully concealed, as to set discovery at defiance, except by a general ripping open of the lining, an experiment frequently resorted to by practised banditti, when the plunder of their victims proves inadequate to their rank and appearance.

We engaged a tiro, or team, of six capital mules, for the entire journey to Madrid, for four hundred dollars, in which sum were included the payment for the services of the mayoral, or coachman, his zagal, and also the feeding, stabling, shoeing, &c., of the team; an amount not exceeding that at which an equal length of road could be performed in England with four horses.

Even with such a powerful tiro, (to which the mayoral always attaches a spare mule on his own account in case of accidents,) we could not calculate on daily journeys of more than from ten to twelve Spanish leagues (four British miles each) per day. The usual rate of travelling of the cochés colleroes, or stage coaches, is forty miles per day with the same number of horses or mules, (generally the former,) and they halt every fourth day.

All being ready for the journey, we took our departure from the house of my companion de voyage at Xeres, on the 20th April, 1814, attended by one servant only, an Irish boy, who had served me upwards of three years, and who possessed all the characteristic shrewdness and vivacity of his country, with a sufficient smattering of the Spanish language to render him equal to the expression of his own, or our ordinary wants, without the aid of our interpretation.

He sat perched beside the mayoral on the fore-boot, converted into a driving seat, of the comforts of which we could form but a mean opinion, from the imploring looks the poor fellow occasionally threw upon us, as turning his head to make a mute appeal to our pity; meanwhile the carriage rattled over the long, rough, and stony streets of this straggling town, at the very top of the mules' speed; with the exception of the wheelers, the animals were strangers to the restraint of bit or rein, guided solely by the voice of the noisy driver, who, after the zagal resigned his office, scolded or encouraged each mule by name, and in terms which the brutes, by the quick motion of their lengthy ears, really appeared to understand.

My fellow traveller, although he had passed upwards of thirty years in Spain, had never been more than a few leagues beyond the purlieus of Cadiz and Xeres; he was, notwithstanding, a man of the most extensive information on all subjects relating to the country of his adoption—a scholar of the first order—a linguist of almost universal capacity—a Catholic of the purest faith—and, to crown all, an idolatrous admirer of the Spanish constitution, then in the third year of its rickety existence!—In his enthusiastic dreams, he was perpetually drawing on futurity for the realization of those blessings which, in the fervency of his imagination, he saw hovering, on angel-wings, over regenerated Spain, and which (next to Hibernia, the land of his birth) he adored with all a lover's fondness, frequently exclaiming, "You will see, my dear sir, what this country will be in another hundred years!"

There was scarcely a village or town through which we passed, to which his information and historical recollections did not impart an interest. Although bred to the mercantile profession in its most rigid forms, his mind had ever thirsted after every useful knowledge; and it may seem strange, that I, who had passed my days in garrisons and camps, should supinely sit for two hours, half dozing, in our halted carriage at Baylen, while he pursued, with untired steps, under the rays of a scorching sun, the strides of a village guide, while pointing out the scene of Castaños' triumph and Dupont's defeat, exultingly exploring the field of battle, where eighteen thousand troops of the flower of the French army ingloriously grounded their arms to the raw and half-disciplined levies of the army of Spain, the self-assembled conscripts of an insulted and invaded nation! It has been well observed by the intelligent and accomplished author of the Annals of the Peninsular Campaigns, that the "chivalry of France never received a deeper tarnish than in the surrender at Baylen."

At Cordova, the "once proud capital of the Omniade Caliph," all my early feelings of romance revived; and accompanied by my friend, I devoted an entire day to view the various wonders of that celebrated mosque, now a Christian cathedral, which, in all its pristine freshness of architectural ornament, adorns that renowned city.

Nor was my mind less excited by delightful reflections on our next day's journey, while threading the mazes of the Sierra Moreno, by the remembrance that we then traversed the very ground which the inimitable

Cervantes has immortalized by making it the scene of the exploits of the heroic Quixote. Every hill, and dell, and mountain stream, seemed familiar to my eye and mind. Here the goatherd, clad in his rude dress made of the skins of the animals he tended, gazed in idle amazement at our equipage, while his startled flock cast up their bearded faces to bestow on us a momentary glance, then fled to the towering cliffs, tinkling their bells in secure defiance of pursuit. Again a troop of Arrieros,* clad and armed as in days of yore, would cross our path at some sudden turn of our tortuous track, escorting their well-laden mules decked in their crimson, deep-fringed housings, (which possibly adorned their great-great-grandfathers,) plodding in low and solemn pace to the deep-toned sound of the neck-bell of their leader. Now and then a Manchego† from the plains, dressed in his black and braided chaleco, Montero cap, and nicely sandaled feet, appeared, cheering on his little mule with the sprightly seguidilla of the Mancha; while, on each side of the animal, a dark and shining boracho hung glistening in the sun-beam, full, almost to bursting, of the delicious wine of the Val de Pénas! Nothing appeared altered since the days of chivalry. It only wanted the presence of the renowned Knight and his faithful Sancho to complete the romantic scene.

It was at a short distance from the village of Cardena, (the scene of so much fanciful adventure,) where we had halted during the heat of the day, that we met a Cabinet courier on his way to Cadiz, from whom we were destined first to hear that important intelligence which soon rung through the world with wonder—the abdication of the throne of France by the GREAT NAPOLEON! The noise of our approaching carriage awoke this man of dispatch, who was quietly dozing his siesta on the saddle, though travelling at the rate of ten miles an hour. This may appear an extraorinary assertion, but it is nevertheless true.† From him we received the proclamation of Louis the XVIIIth, issued at Paris on the 11th of that month on his restoration to the throne of his fathers, and also the gratifying news of the total cessation of hostilities. Elated by this intelligence, we pushed forward. Having the advantage of a bright moon, we prolonged our daily journey to the latest hour the mules could be kept to their pace, and on the night of the 30th April reached Madrid in safety.

Taking up our quarters in the Posado, called the Fontano de Oro, (at the Puerto del Sol,) we were early the next morning visited by several Members of Cortes, by the Minister of War, Don Tomas Moreno; the Inspector General of Infantry, Don Juan O'Donoju; the Inquisitor General (!); and last, though not least in my esteem, the brave Brigadier-General, Sir John Downie. Not the slightest suspicion of the king's hostility to the Cortes appeared to exist in the public mind at that period, when all parties seemed confident in his Majesty's acceptance of the constitution.

The 2d of May was appointed for the affecting ceremony of the exhumation of the remains of the martyred patriots, Daloiz and Velarde; who gloriously fell in the last desperate struggle to maintain the arsenal at Madrid, during Murat's massacre of the 2d May, 1808. On this solemn occasion, the Regency, the Cortes, the military of all ranks, and the public functionaries of the capital, emulously pressed forward to assist, and by their presence confirmed the patriotic feeling, which never appeared more intensely or nobly excited. The bones of these departed heroes were raised from their place of sepulchre, and deposited in a sarcophagus, under a discharge of one hundred salvoes of artillery.

The troops of the latter corps, to which these gallant men belonged, claimed the honour of bearing the

* Carriers.

† Native of Mancha.

‡ In this courier, my friend instantly recognised the same individual who brought the first intelligence of the peace of Amiens to Cadiz, in 1802, having performed the journey, direct from Paris, (without quitting the saddle one hour in the four and twenty,) in the incredibly short space of seven days, the distance about 7200 miles! His speed was rewarded by the merchants of Cadiz and Seville with a purse of one thousand dollars.

sarcophagus to the church of St Domingos; the procession, headed by the Regency, and including all that was of rank and honour in Madrid, extended more than one mile in length. "Honour to the memory of the departed heroes!" "Death to the enemies of Spain!" "Long live Ferdinand, our beloved King!" and "Long live the Constitution!" were the shouts from thousands and tens of thousands, as the cypress and the laurel waved their united branches over all that remained of the first victims of French perfidy! How soon, alas! were these exchanged for sounds of discord, and for deeds of horror; for the dungeon and the dagger's point! for proscription and exile! Fickle, inconstant people, deeply have you paid the penalty of your vacillation!

From the contents of confidential letters received from certain of the deputies, who, with the President of the Cortes, had proceeded to Valencia to do homage to their restored sovereign, whispers were already circulated of royal treachery. In the meantime, the minions of the Court had received their instructions; the emissaries of the enemies of the Cortes scattered themselves among the people, and working on the weakness of minds unprepared for the glorious boon of political freedom, soon turned the scale of popular feeling; the Cortes were represented as desirous of stripping their beloved King of his regal rights; trampling on their holy religion; and establishing an infidel republic! The manifesto issued by Ferdinand at Valencia, on the 4th of May, (from which the motto of this article was extracted,) was placarded in every part of the city. The Cortes, thus denounced as traitors, became, from that moment, the objects of popular vengeance. Soldiers were allowed to parade the streets with drawn sabres or bayonets, shouting, "Death to the Cortes!" "Death to the Constitution!"

The Alcalde Mayor, Montezuma, (a Peruvian, boasting his descent from the Incas,) himself a member of the Cortes, had joined the royal cause, but found his civic authority (if indeed sincere in his attempts to enforce it) unequal to stem the tide of this alarming ferment. The military were under no sort of control; the Regency tacitly laid down their functions which, it required no stretch of sagacity to foresee, would, ere many days, be wrested from their feeble hands. Thus Madrid, from the 9th to the 12th of May, (the day on which it was announced that the Beloved Ferdinand would make his grand entry,) was a prey to the unbridled licentiousness of an inflamed and debauched soldiery: the jails were emptied, and hordes of desperate ruffians were let loose upon the people, to work out their eventual freedom by the exercise of terror, and the vengeance of the knife upon all who yet appeared favourable to the constitution; the dregs of the female population, infuriate with liquor, rushed in crowds through the streets, crying out, "BLOOD, BLOOD for our insulted Sovereign!!!"

During these days of terror, the few English then in Madrid passed not only unmolested through the mob, but were even loudly cheered and caressed by the furious rabble; the dissolution of the Cortes, now universally known, having been attributed to the countenance and advice of the British ambassador, who joined the King at Valencia the day preceding that on which the President of the Cortes and a deputation of its members presented themselves at the feet of their monarch. "I shall decline entering into a discussion on the correctness of this opinion; certain it is, however, that a loan of money to a considerable amount was, at that critical moment, granted; and, to the strength thus afforded to the despotic King, his sudden and unexpected manifesto against the Cortes and Constitution was not unaptly attributed. Fortified with the means of corruption and intimidation, the new ABSOLUTE KING pursued his march in triumph to his capital, accompanied by the representative of British majesty, surrounded by four thousand cavalry, with British sabres in their hands, commanded by the British General Whittingham, and cheered by the homage of one hundred thousand willing slaves!!!"

The night of the 12th was one of horrors; several of the unfortunate deputies, of the liberal side, (denounced by their political opponents the Serviles,) were seized, even in the bosom of their families, and, loaded with chains, dragged off to the filthy dungeons of the Inquisition. Many others, who foresaw the impending storm, had providently fled from the capital in various disguises; whilst others, trusting to the fidelity of some lowly dependant, were secreted in wretched hovels or in cellars, anxiously watching the favourable moment for escape. But, alas! whither were they to fly? From their places of concealment these unhappy men could hear the wild shouts of their pursuers, thirsting for their blood!

The stone which had been erected in the Grand Plaza, commemorative of the Constitution, and before which (only a few weeks since) the people bowed in reverential joy, was now torn from its pedestal, the inscription defaced, and broken to pieces; the maddened populace contending for the fragments, which were dragged in savage triumph through the public streets, amidst shouts of "Long live the Absolute King!" "Death to the Constitution!" Those who took no active part in these proceedings were compelled to uncover the head and join in the cry, in order to protect themselves against the assassin's knife or the soldier's sabre.

I dined at the Ambassador's that day, where, in the absence of his Excellency, his secretary, Mr Charles Vaughan, presided. The most marked reserve on the dreadful scenes then passing under every eye was preserved. Of all subjects, that which occupied every mind, and agitated every heart, was not once mentioned, even while the frantic cries from without seemed to make our glasses vibrate on the table; but such is the characteristic mystery of diplomacy. Sir Henry Wellesley arrived, in the course of the evening, with the information, that the King would not enter Madrid until the morning of the 14th.

On descending from the portico into the street, I found myself at once surrounded by thousands, whose wild uproar was suddenly checked by the first toll of the vesper bell. In an instant every tongue was mute, every head uncovered; the most profound silence reigned for some moments, interrupted only by the whispering prayers of this devout (yet murderous!) mob!

During the last few days, my friend had never quitted the Posado, except for an hour in the morning, when he skulked out to snatch a hasty mass; and I could only prevail on him to venture with me to the ambassador's, on the 14th, by representing his danger if left unprotected at the inn during the excitement which the entry of the King would cause among the populace.

The morning was passed in feverish anxiety on the part of the swelling population, augmented every hour by the thousands pouring in from all the towns and villages within ten leagues of Madrid; oftentimes, in the course of the forenoon, the whole Prado appeared like a sea of moving heads, as the false intelligence of, "Here comes the King!" agitated the dense mass.

Bodies of troops continued to arrive every hour from Aranjuez, at which royal residence his majesty had slept and breakfasted. Amongst these many had, for the first time, appeared in their new and splendid uniforms. The King's regiment of hussars, dressed in embroidered scarlet jackets, with pelisses hanging to their shoulder, of sky-blue, lined with lamb-skin in fleece, and mustering upwards of six hundred strong, (armed and equipped at the expense of John Bull,) caracoled about, shewing off their finery, like jays in borrowed plumes. And then the ancient carabineros, looking as stiff and warlike as jack-boots, buff, and buckram could make them, smiled through their black and bushy whiskers, while on their tall and lanky long-tailed stallions they gently forced a passage through the receding crowd; meanwhile their Birmingham swords glittering in the bright rays of a Madrid midsummer sun, proved to the astonished Spaniards the superabundant wealth of England, and her generous interest in the cause of Freedom!

The evening had already commenced before the King reached his capital; having to pass up the Calle Alcalá, a better situation for seeing the procession than the balcony of the Hotel of Embassy, could not have been chosen. The company was numerous; and we had just concluded dinner, when the trumpets announced the entrance of the royal cavalcade into our street. Its progress was so slow, that we were nearly half an hour waiting, handkerchief in hand, before his Majesty approached near enough to receive our welcome. The mules of the clumsy state-coach, of which there had been several teams employed during the day, were as often unharnessed; and the people yoked themselves by hundreds to the carriage, for the last forty leagues of his Majesty's route; triumphal arches were erected in every town; while the whole female population, clothed in white, and decked with wreaths, marched before, strewing the roads with flowers, and distributing garlands. Thousands had kissed the royal hand, which was held out to all who sought that honour; and the familiarity with which the Life-Guardsmen (all of whom rank as subaltern officers) lolled into the royal carriage at every momentary halt, conversing with their monarch, formed a strange contrast to our ideas of courtly etiquette. When his Majesty arrived opposite the hotel of Sir Henry Wellesley, he himself gave the signal for a halt, and stretching out his hand, kissed it several times to the Ambassador, and the English party, which we, of course, returned with cheers, waving of handkerchiefs, and cries of "VIVA EL REY!" "VIVA ESPAÑA!" The King himself distinctly shouted "Viva Inglaterra!" more than once, (as well he might!) The carriage then proceeded on its route, drawn by women alone! to the amount of at least five hundred, who had attached ornamented ropes to the carriage, and displaced the men!

This sight was death to the hopes of my Constitutional friend, Don Alonzo, whose handkerchief absolutely fell from his hand, as with feeble effort he tried to wave it—to me alone his mental misery was perceptible. Spain! his adored, heroic, regenerated Spain, licking the feet of the anti-constitutional monarch, the Beloved—the Absolute Ferdinand! As soon as coffee had been served, he hurried off to the hotel, leaving me to undergo the degradation (as he termed it) of kissing the hand of the despotic king on my presentation that evening. I had that honour about seven o'clock, when the marked attention which his Majesty bestowed on all persons presented by the British Ambassador, proved the closeness of the amity which then prevailed between the two governments. Having been favoured with a few words from the King on my presentation, I had a full opportunity of observing his Catholic Majesty's person and manner. The courtesies of a king are said to operate like magic over the strongest minds—mine was not an exception to this almost general rule—when I beheld him smiling on all around, caressing this grandee, and embracing that; familiarly calling another towards him by the kind word "Tocayo," (or name-sake); bestowing grades of rank or titles of honour on his faithful officers; I almost wished to forget the Cortes and the Constitution, and cry out with the rest, "Long live the Absolute King!"—candour requires me to say so much. His Majesty was dressed in the uniform of his foot-guards, with the embroidery which distinguishes the rank of a captain-general on the cuffs—a scarlet silk sash, with massive tassels of gold; he wore the riband and collar of the order of Carlos Tercero. In his full black eye, then beaming with the delight of gratified power and absolute monarchy, there lurked the tiger's fierceness, which all his smiles could not conceal! His next brother, the Infant Don Carlos, stood on his right, and his imbecile old uncle, Don Antonio, on his left. I quitted the courtly circle at eight, hardly knowing at the moment whether to excuse or condemn the monarch's late proceeding.

On my return at night, I found my worthy Andalusian friend in a state of affliction, which I could in no other way account for, than his apprehension of some dreadful personal outrage; and it was not until after a quarter of an hour's entreaty to relieve my anxiety that he disclosed to me that his bosom friend, Don Tomas * * * *, an Andalusian deputy, was that day condemned to death in council, as the most guilty of the senate; having proposed in the Cortes at the last sitting, that on the refusal of Ferdinand to swear fidelity to the Constitution, he should be declared as having "ceased to reign!" I endeavoured to comfort my friend, by urging that it was a vain threat; as Don Tomas must then be far beyond the reach of his persecutors; having disappeared some days before.—“O! no, no!” replied my agonized companion; “he is not only still in Madrid, but his present hiding-place cannot afford him shelter beyond to-morrow’s dawn—A price is on his head—his escape seems impossible. He has found means to communicate with me through an old woman, who is now in this house, imploring our assistance to aid his escape; but how is it to be accomplished? Although I would give all I possess on earth to secure his life, any attempt to do so in the present dreadful state of Madrid, would bring destruction on those who would move for his relief.” I demanded to see the old woman, who was brought forth from an inner chamber. On seeing me full dressed as I had been to court, she imagined herself already in the hands of vengeful justice, and gave herself up for lost; a little explanation appeased her fears, and after throwing off my dress coat, and putting on my pelisse, I desired her to lead the way.

We sallied forth; and whilst closely following her wary steps, I passed through some turbulent crowds, respounding, with apparent zeal, their horrid shouts. My white feather, and British appearance altogether, proved my safe passport. Having, after many windings, through streets and lanes, uncheered by the light of one solitary lamp, at length arrived in front of a mean building, my guide, taking me by the hand, drew me to the entrance, pronouncing the words, “Follow me, and fear not!” We descended two distinct flights of cellar stairs, at the bottom of which she left me to my reflections in the horrid gloom. I unsheathed a long Turkish dagger, which I always carried at night, in a belt inside my pelisse, (it was a deadly weapon,) and groping for the wall, firmly fixed my back against it, ready for any attack. It is impossible to describe the current of thoughts and feelings that pressed on my agitated mind during this brief but awful period. At length the scarcely articulated sound—“His, yu, his, yu,” (the national mode of calling attention,) broke faintly on my ear, to which I softly answered—“Aqui, aqui,” (“here, here.”) Guided by my voice, the beldam approached, and grasping my outstretched and unarmed hand—while, prepared for any event, I firmly held my dagger in the other,—she led me along what I considered a passage, at the end of which I was refreshed with a rush of cool air, and a momentary glimpse of the few stars which lit the firmament. Crossing this opening, still under her guidance, towards another part of the building, I felt myself suddenly stopped, but with expressions of courtesy, by two men; one of whom took from beneath his cloak a dimly burning lamp, which he held up on a level with my face; in an instant my dagger was raised, and as instantly dropped, when I beheld the taller of the two make the genuine sign of a MASTER MASON!!! I sheathed the weapon, and holding out my hand, bestowed the fraternal grip, which my masonic brother returned with fervency; and in a low whisper, directed the other to bring forward his friend. The glimmering light for a moment disappeared, and in less than a minute the unfortunate patriot came forth from an inner cellar, almost fainting under the conflict of his hopes and fears. He expected to have seen his old friend Don Alonzo, and his feelings on beholding me, with whom he had but a slight acquaintance, came to his relief, at such a place, at such an hour, and under such circumstances, so unmanned him, that a flood of tears alone saved him from sinking on the damp floor of this dungeon. After a mental struggle, he gained his self-possession; and when asking me to help him to liberty, added, “Not to preserve my life by base flight, but to die with arms in my hand, in defence of the liberties of my afflicted country, instead of being butchered in the dungeons of the Inquisition!” My brief and unconsoling reply was,—“Resistance is now useless—Spanish liberty is already strangled in its infancy—Of your friends, none remain to assist you; some, it is stated, have perished in secret—all your supporters are doomed to death, or ignominious exile—your cause is lost!—One chance alone presents itself to save your life—~~fly this night—this instant, if possible; with these faithful friends~~ who have hitherto protected you, mix with the crowds who are even now returning into the adjacent villages, tired and satiated with the day's festivities, and who are allowed to pass through the gates in crowds, unquestioned by the guard; conceal yourself during the few hours of darkness in the Olive-wood, about a league from the Puerto St Vicente, through which, one hour after day-break to-morrow, my carriage shall slowly pass; and I SWEAR, come what may, to aid your escape.—Adieu!"

On reaching the outer door, to which I ascended, leaning on the arm of my brother mason, at the moment of our separation, he revealed himself to me as a Captain of the Spanish Guards, a native of the Havannah, with whom, in the preceding year, I had sat in Lodge at Cadiz.* I plunged once more into the dreary street, preceded by my former guide, whose footsteps I followed in silence, while she flitted before me like a dark phantom, until we arrived once more at the low still and empty Puerto del Sol, where she took her leave with "Bendita sea sus obras!"† There was not a moment to lose—it was already past ten; I turned down the Calle Alcala, (in which was the Ambassador's hotel,) and found his party at supper. After an apology for troubling his Excellency at that late hour, I requested my passports that night, as it was my intention to start at daybreak next morning, on my route to Paris. It became necessary, to meet my plans, that two servants instead of one (as stated in my former passport) should be named, and also to insert the nation to which the second servant belonged. I mentioned France at the instant, as I recollected that Don Tomas spoke with fluency the language of that country. Whether the Ambassador entertained any suspicions of an indefinite nature, from my impatience to obtain my passports at that late hour, I know not; but he forbore to press the request he at first had made for my delay till ten the next morning, by which time he could prepare letters for his illustrious brother, then on his route from Paris to Madrid; my papers were therefore instantly dispatched.

I had for years been honoured with the kindest attention and the friendship of that truly amiable man; and in the few moments' private conversation which I had with him, previously to taking my final leave, I felt convinced that he suspected my additional servant was some proscribed individual. Whatever were his thoughts, he confined them to his own breast; contenting himself with one sentence of kind advice, which deeply impressed itself on my mind, although it could not shake my purpose. "Take care how you commit yourself; should this French valet of yours be discovered to be an improper subject, or one obnoxious to this government, you will place yourself and me in a painful situation." My only answer was, "Sir, I shall be cautious." My respectful attachment to him was too powerful to suffer me to deceive him by assurances, which probably a few weeks would falsify; and he was of a nature too noble and generous to extort any confession from me. Hurrying off to the Posado, I found my unhappy friend still overwhelmed with affliction. My long absence had excited his alarm; and when I detailed my adventures, and the arrangements I had in view for the attempt, at least, to rescue the unfortunate Don Tomas from his threatened fate, it required my utmost powers of persuasion to reconcile him to risk his share in the enterprise. He condemned the plan as impracticable; and, resigning himself to despair, threw himself on his mattress in an agony of grief; not that he was either morally or physically a coward; but he had lived too long under a despotic government, where the will of power was the law, not to tremble with appre-

* Although the crime of being a freemason was, in itself, sufficient to consign any man discovered to belong to that society, to the scaffold or the galleys, I have met at Lodge the Minister of War, the Intendente General of Finance, the Inspectors General of Cavalry and Infantry, two Admirals, several of the secular clergy, and more than a dozen military officers, of superior rank in the Spanish service; the Earl of Elio was one of our most active and worthy Brethren.

hension at the dangers of detection in such an attempt. Leaving him to seek such repose as his sorrows admitted, and trusting to my own address to conquer all his scruples by the ensuing morning, I employed myself until midnight, with my servant's aid, in packing up all our luggage. I then snatched a few hours' sleep, after a day of great excitement, and a night of great anxiety.

As early as four in the morning, the rumbling noise of our carriage, and the ginging of our mule bells, broke my sound and refreshing slumbers. Before five our luggage was stowed away, and my reluctant friend suffering himself to be led into the carriage with a heavy and a doubting heart, another quarter of an hour found us halted at the barrier. Thrusting half my body through the carriage-window, I held out my passport, a couple of cigars, and a dollar to the officer of the gate, the moment I perceived he was but a sergeant. Waving the paper on his approach, I touched his ready palm, and cried, "Inglez, Inglez! Senor CAPITAN."—"Bueno, Bueno," cried the guardian of the gate, without looking at the passport, (which he probably could not have read, if he had.) "Vaye vuestra senoria con Dios!"—"Andar," ("go on,") to the mayoral, and we passed through the gate at a gallop! During this short parley, my fellow passenger was in Purgatory; and when I exultingly asked him, "What do you think of that? We are out of Madrid, you see, with our heads on!" He faintly smiled for a moment, and then again sank into his corner. The first and greatest difficulty having been happily got over, our next object was to account to our mayoral for the no small addition of weight with which his tiro would so shortly be burdened; and for which he would, no doubt, require extra remuneration. He was the same we had brought from Andalusia, and although we could reckon on his fidelity, we might not be so perfectly secure of his discretion, or of that of the zagal. My own servant, whose shrewdness it was impossible to deceive, and whose fidelity was incorruptible, was partly acquainted with our plan; but knew not the object for whom we were interested. It became necessary, therefore, to repose entire confidence in him. When arrived at the Olive Wood I dismounted, and, taking him aside, explained all; then placed him on the look-out. A thick exhalation hung over the surface of the earth, which obscured distant objects; but through the haze I discovered three figures, which I concluded were those of the persons we sought. Time was precious. The masonic clap of the hand was given, and that mystical signal, immediately repeated, satisfied me that our friend was near. He approached, supported by those I had seen the night before. A hasty embrace of gratitude, bestowed by the agitated Don Tomas, repaid those noble-hearted men for the dangers they had risked; and in another minute we were off; the mules once more in full gallop!

Our new traveller took his seat beside the mayoral; while my servant shared the zagal with his assistant. A mode of travelling so unusual soon shook the frame of the unfortunate deputy to an excruciating degree, who, though hastily instructed not to speak a word, except in the French language, involuntarily broke out in unmeasured curses in his vernacular tongue on the horrid road. "Hay! C—jo! Malditos sea esta Camino!" and then suddenly recollecting himself, would utter an odd "sacre—" or two, and grin with pain. By the time we arrived at Buitrago, (nearly fifty miles from Madrid,) which stage we reached by four o'clock, Don Tomas was scarcely able to crawl up the flight of steps at the entrance of the post-house, where we were destined to pass the night, huddled together in a sorry apartment over the kitchen. My lad helped him along, and laying him at full length on a mattress, in that general sleeping room, proceeded to exercise his talents as cook, to prepare our dinner. The mayoral and his mate had been informed that the new passenger was a Frenchman, who, in order to escape out of Spain in safety, had entered into my service; and they were earnestly tioned not to talk of him in any other capacity than that of a servant. The promise of an additional hundred dollars the first day he arrived in safety on the French territory, was to be the reward of their secrecy.

While assembled round the charcoal fire, each trying his hand at some kind of cookery, we were assailed by showers of questions from the post-master—his wife—and an ultra Royalist friar, on the proceedings in Madrid the previous day,—to all of which, we gave the highest colouring; concluding with our opinion, that not a single Cortes' man, or Constitutionalist, could have survived the slaughter of the night! This exaggerated picture, so far from inspiring feelings of horror, diffused the utmost joy, and caused mutual congratulations. The woman, starting up in a frenzy, brandished her knife, and uttered a fervent wish that she had one of the Constitutionalists then within her grasp, that she might "sheath the weapon in his heart!" A piteous moan broke from poor Don Tomas, in the room above, who could hear every word of our discourse, and who did not at that moment consider his life worth half an hour's purchase. "Who is that pale-faced animal above stairs?" continued the fury; "if I thought he was for the Constitution, I would soon have his liver in the frying-pan!" On my informing her that he was a Frenchman who had deserted from the vile invaders, and come over to the British, she mollified, and becoming once more a woman, said, "Poversto!"* and instantly sent my lad to him with a plate of soup. But far beyond food, the agonized Deputy yearned for his cigar, and would rather have gone to the scaffold with one in his mouth, than linger out another day without one; such indulgence, however, if observed, would betray him. There are two tests by which one genuine Spaniard could discover another, however artfully disguised. The first is, the pronunciation of a certain vulgar expletive; the second, by his mode of holding in his mouth, and smoking his cigar! It was the boast of Count O'Reilly, that he was the only foreigner who was ever known to pass this double ordeal without detection, and to which he owed the safety of his life; when seized, in the disguise of a chimney-sweep, at one of the gates of Madrid, during an insurrectionary movement of the populace against him, when governor, he escaped entirely by his powers of imitation of the lower classes of Madrileños.

It was not until long after dinner, when we removed to the upper apartment, that the poor prisoner could claim the privilege of a smoke; in which he was then allowed to indulge ad libitum; according to the admitted license of that country, where master and man, lady and gentleman, gentle and simple, are frequently lodged in the same apartment; with no other partitions than the doubtful decency of a threadbare curtain, or perhaps a garment, hung up to act as a moral screen.

The next day, before we departed, proclamations, which had been sent forward by express from Madrid, were already posted throughout the town, offering large rewards to those who would apprehend certain prescribed Deputies; the descriptions of whose persons were given with tolerable accuracy. Amongst the rest, that of the unfortunate Don Tomas, now Monsieur Francois le Brune, who, by abandoning his spectacles and cutting off his hair, had so completely altered his usual appearance, as to render it difficult for even an acquaintance to recognise him. While the merchant and myself regaled in the kitchen with the family, sharing our English breakfast with them, Don Tomas, (respectfully and kindly attended by my boy,) enjoyed his repast and cigar above stairs in security. Just as we were taking our departure, two English gentlemen, the Messrs Spurrier of Poole, in Dorsetshire, dashed up to the post-house, their avant courier cracking his whip in the usual tones of announcement. In an instant, the senior Mr S. (who passed some months in Andalusia) recognised my friend and me; and politeness required us to delay our departure a few minutes. Fixing his eyes with earnestness on the trembling Don Tomas, he gave me a look which implied much; but I put him on his guard by saying, "Here is a poor Frenchman who has placed himself under our protection; utter not one word of his country or condition, or his LIFE must be the forfeit!" That was enough. We all met ten days after at Bourdeaux, and could then talk in safety of our flight.

Nothing occurred to alarm us or shake our security, until our arrival at Burgos—the last post where any rigid search was enforced. While seated at our late dinner, after night-fall, the Town-Major was announced as having waited on me to request my attendance, and that of my suite, at the Hall of the Plaza, in order that all parties might undergo the personal examination of the Governor.

We had all been sitting at the same table. The third plate with the unfinished viands upon it, would have betrayed an intimacy not quite consistent with the rank of the parties. In an instant, Don Tomas was behind the chair of my friend, as in attendance, and while I rushed to the door to pour my compliments on our unwelcome visitor, my sharp servant, with the quickness of thought, had swept off the table all vestiges of the third cover, and dragged the now unoccupied chair forward with great bustle to seat the Town-Major. We plied him with a goblet or two of rum-punch, and while lost in his admiration of my canteens, of my "Ponche de Rom," and delicious cigar, he half forgot his duty. On his entrance we had ordered the servants out of the room. After half an hour's conversation, the Major reminded us of the purpose of his visit, and said, "His Excellency, the Governor, will expect you, with your party, by this time, in order that their persons may undergo inspection, and comparison with the descriptions sent us from Madrid." My little Hibernian, with Don Tomas, had laid their ears to the door; and it may be supposed what an awful moment this must have been to the latter. I instantly called aloud for the servants, when in a few minutes, this ready-witted boy appeared without coat or waistcoat, his feet bare, and a nightcap on his head, saying, "Mounseer le Brown, sir, is gone fast asleep." I appealed to the kind feelings of the Major in behalf of the poor domestics, and girding on my sword, offered to accompany him to his Excellency the Governor, with my fellow traveller, and account to him for the non-attendance of the fatigued servants, both of whom he had seen.

On coming into the Plaza, I perceived the arms of a regiment piled, and the men walking about prepared to fall in at the tap of the drum. We were soon introduced to the Governor, an old, white-headed, pompous mariscal del campo, who received, with the most perfect confidence, the account I gave him of our route, our party, and destination, and admitted my apology for the non-appearance of the servants, adding, that to an English officer alone, would he wave the execution of any particle of his instructions, which were to see all travellers. I pulled out my cigar-skin, and requested he would honour me by his acceptance of it, and its contents, as a proof of my respect for his country, his adored king, and my abhorrence of the traitorous constitutionalists. "Ah! Cavalero Inglis," said the gratified Governor in reply, "the English are indeed entire men!" This is the most delicate translation I can give to a compliment, which, however flatteringly intended, was certainly not the most choice in point of terms.

The remainder of our journey was pursued in security: we no longer felt it necessary to cloak our intimacy under the characters of master and servant, before the mayoral and his assistants. They already partook of all the interest we felt for the safety of the poor refugee, who, in future, took his seat inside, and, completely released from his terrors, once more mounted his spectacles, and smoked his cigar from morn till night.

Arrived at the bank of the Bidasoa, he sprang from the carriage, and casting a long lingering look on the frowning summits of the ~~cloud-capt~~ Pyrenees, he threw himself, for the last time in his life, on the land of his birth, and kissed it with fervency; then snatching up a handful of the earth, he placed it next his heart, exclaiming, with a gush of tears,

"ADIOS! PATRIA INFELIX!"

COLMAN'S RANDOM RECORDS.*

WE know not whether we are glad or sorry to find proved, beyond all contradiction or doubt, by these Random Records, a fact which we had all along shrewdly suspected, to wit, that George Colman the Younger is, intus et in cutem one of the very poorest of all possible creatures. We suppose we must some where and some when or other, have either read, or seen acted, some of his trashy plays; but we cannot just now, by any effort of recollection, charge our memory with the names of any one of them, except it be Octavian, a farce, which it was the whim of John Kemble, Black John, the well-beloved, to ge up as a tragedy, wherein he enacted the principal character with a certain grave humour, to our minds far more amusing than the drollest face-fun of the Cockney idol, Liston. For John, in his own way, was a sad wag. We have frequently heard old George Colman, junior, (for he was always younger than his father,) spoken of in town as an almost insupportably funny fellow, nay as a fellow "of rare mirth, and most excellent fancy," quite a Yorick; and Byron thought, or at least said, something to this effect, that at the genial board, as it is called, Colman was the wit of all wits, and that he scattered his pearls, we shall not say before whom, so profusely, that the multitude became oblivious to vulgar viands, in the divine enjoyment of that celestial food. Byron's authority in such matters, we presume, a high one; and we wish the ancient buffoon to have the full benefit of it. But, then, Byron, when in a good humour, which fell upon him in fits, seemed, from some amiable constitutional weakness or another, to have been liable to be charmed by the most commonplace conversational powers that ever were suffered to drivel; and so indiscriminate, at such seasons, was his relish, that he swallowed alternately, with equal zest, the impertinencies of Leigh Hunt and the genialities of Scrope Davies. His Lordship, too, at such times, was much taken with certain sorts of wit in which the aged "Junior" is, we believe, esteemed a proficient, among the most obscene "facile princeps"—such, for example, as are displayed in those somewhat filthy facetiæ, which, in his own coterie, were the glory of his manhood, and out of it one of the bugbears of the Society for the Suppression of Vice—BROADGRINS. We do not mean to insinuate that the table-talk of this indecent scoffer, now notoriously in his table-dotage, was equally distinguished by its grossness with the writings in which he wallowed, or that the poetry (poetry!!!) of his ripe, may not be beastlier than the prose of his rotten, age; but we mean to assert, if on no other foundation, even on the sole ground of these wretched "Random Records," that he is now, and always must have been, a low, vulgar, coarse, and shallow person, with some small chaff, perhaps, of the birth, but not one single grain of the breeding, of a gentleman. Indeed we are altogether at a loss to conjecture how he should ever have contrived to acquire, even in the company he kept, the fame of being so much as low-farcical; for his humour lies solely in a few pustulated expressions, which do not seem even to have been native to his constitution, but to have been inoculated into him skin-deep by a series of quacks with whom, from his boyish days, he had been familiar, "even to the very moment that they bade him tell it." There is something unhealthily fetid in all his jokes; in their nastiness his jeers absolutely stink in the nostrils; his sneers have all a rankest smell; and in reading his lucubrations—we know not how it may be with his body corporate in a room—we instinctively—though not given to be squeamish—rise and open the window, that the fresh air may be let in upon our sickness. Such company is far from being pleasant to the senses; and one is entitled to complain of it, we think, without any violation of good manners. It is not that we are disgusted, in the "Records," with much that is very immoral, but with all that is most mean. We cannot, perhaps, except in a grave mood, hate, but in every mood we must despise, the diseased driveller;—remember, we speak of him throughout as the author of Broad Grins,—and being, as it is well known, exceedingly humane, we should often pity him, did he not always claim our contempt. The only thing about him that occasionally wins our momentary liking, is an appearance of an easy and unfretful temper; but it does not seem ever to have been much tried, while it does seem to have been constantly coddled by a nursing and old-womanish vanity, and fed perpetually on pap. Still such a temper is not discreditable to him, though bordering on the silly; and we are satisfied with a shallow puddle, however foul it may be, for not presuming to be ruffled. Such a person might have been a fit hero for Hayley's Triumphs of Temper, if written on a somewhat different scheme. As a man, he is difficult to swallow, and impossible to stomach; but as a manager he was easy, and as a play-wright, he went down with gaping audiences, whose digestion is proverbial, and who sweetly swallow camels without sourly straining at gnats. He speaks, from the first page to the last, like a creature born, and bred, and buried, on the boards—the theatre of the world is with him all one with some paltry “wooden O;” and with a mouthing mockery of versatility, he plays the parts of his own scene-shifter, candle-snuffer, prompter, and trumpeter, presuming by a mere change of dress, to pass himself off as a separate personage in each of these dignified characters,—yet visibly hugging himself in them all,—so strong is his love of his own dear identity, and so weak his power of imitating even what is worthless. Every man, we have heard it said, has some particular talent—could you but find it out—in which he is strong; but George is an exception to that general rule, for he teasingly tries many a poor talent, and miserably fails in all; sometimes approaching, but never touching, the lowest level of the clever,—being not even so much as brisk, but, at his very best, like a bottle of small beer, which a butler sets himself to uncork in an obstinate attitude, for fear of being blown up to the ceiling, and is much more alarmed, on the performance of the achievement, to find the liquor as dead as mud or mutton. The party at table cannot retain their gravity; and the manager, discomfited, retires to the sideboard to hide his blushes. There, the parallel does not hold good; for Colman's face is too brazen to blush, and on drawing the cork of a flat jest, he pretends that he was only ~~bawling~~, and then, flapping his wings, chuckles into a lamentable crow. And this person—in London—is reckoned a—Wit! puffed by Henry Colburn—and buttered by John Bull—and—now basted by Christopher North! Not a drama can be damned, it seems, without his special license—the Cockneys by him are told at what they must laugh or weep; under his revision are now brought the manners and morals of the stage; that they may be filtered into purification through strainers in which all the mud is deposited—and Tragedy, with sable stole, must come sweeping by, before this effete Mr Merryman, ere she be allowed to drug the bowl or the dagger, a sovereign supplicating a slave.

We are sorry to speak scornfully of any thing alive—threescore and ten. Yet what merit is there in merely becoming a holy old woman out of a graceless middle-aged or elderly man, which Colman was when he degraded manhood by his Grins? We feel no reverence even for the head of a bishop, merely because it happens, without having been shaved for wig-wear, to be bald; and why, then, should we feel any for the shape ~~seem~~ of a superannuated buffoon? There is only the first syllable of humanity in pretending to respect the few grey hairs of an obsolete Pantaloon who can scarcely shuffle. He, who in the prime of life, as a writer, was, at the best, but a hawdy block-head, must not be coaxed and cajoled in his latter days into a belief that he is the remains of an Admirable Crichton. He must be taught to see, by a stern “Know thyself!” that while he thought himself a star, he was nothing but a jelly; and that now he stinks where he lies. George Colman, junior, when he must, we think, have been about fifty years old, and not absolutely starving, published a volume of verses, which at the first sight seem to be filthy, at the second foul, and at the third hideous,—almost unnaturally so, polluted as nature is;—and, incredible! he is now sowerdior, with a salary, at the theatres, and lives by castrating pigs-plays! There seems to be nothing more sacred in the light of his setting, than in that of his rising, sun. Would you believe it—that he who lived all his life on the smell of the lamps, sneers at tallow-chandlers! Himself notorious only as a Jack-pudding, he speaks insultingly of “sleek pudding-faced sons of commerce! and persons of that kidney form the majority of mankind in our metropolis and trading towns!” As if the shabbiest unsalaried foundling that ever swept a warehouse were not a more useful and respectable character than any bastard’s son that ever with rubbish choked a stage! In a kindred spirit of abject servility to the powers that be, he still stoops, as of yore, his anointed—perhaps his powdered head; the lacer of the letcher is yet in the rheum of the dim eyes of tottering Sir Tooley O’Whack; and a certain gentleman in a sable suit regards, with “grins broader” than his own, the sanctified and hypocritical phiz of the unlicensed and licentious licenser! We are no satirists,—but with all our horror of personality, we must speak the truth—even though it be a libel. It is of George Colman the Younger, as an author, with his head in papers, that we treat; and we tax him but with a tithe of his revolting obscenities, to his gums, if not to his teeth. For the sake of the young—and the middle-aged, which he was when he committed those flagrant delinquencies, and not for his own, we now use the knout; follies may be forgotten, but such foulnesses as the Grins are ineffaceable; those meet with ready pardon, but these are under everlasting ban; and it is salutary and sanative to those who may err from passion, to see raked up from oblivion, and set dimly and distantly—for close contact would be deadly—before their averted eyes, the disgusting and inextinguishable perpetrations in which an insolent sinner, overtaken at last by drivelling dotage, in the morn and meridian of life was once base and brutal enough to glory, and at the same time so deludedly stupid as to believe himself Apollo, while he was but impotently acting Priapus.

THE IRON SHROUD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF “FIRST AND LAST.”

THE castle of the Prince of Tolfi was built on the summit of the towering and precipitous rock of Scylla, and commanded a magnificent view of Sicily in all its grandeur. Here, during the wars of the middle ages, when the fertile plains of Italy were devastated by hostile factions, those prisoners were confined, for whose ransom a costly price was demanded. Here, too, in a dungeon, excavated deep in the solid rock, the miserable victim was immured, whom revenge pursued,—the dark, fierce, and un pitying revenge of an Italian heart.

VIVENZIO—the noble and the generous, the fearless in battle, and the pride of Naples in her sunny hours of peace—the young, the brave, the proud, Vivenzio fell beneath this subtle and remorseless spirit. He was the prisoner of Tolfi, and he languished in that rock-encircled dungeon, which stood alone, and whose portals never opened twice upon a living captive.

It had the semblance of a vast cage, for the roof, and floor, and sides, were of iron, solidly wrought, and spaciouly constructed. High above there ran a range of seven grated windows, guarded with massy bars of the same metal, which admitted light and air. Save these, and the tall folding doors beneath them, which occupied the centre, no chink, or chasm, or projection, broke the smooth black surface of the walls. An iron bedstead, littered with straw, stood in one corner: and beside it, a vessel with water, and a coarse dish filled with coarser food.

Even the intrepid soul of Vivenzio shrank with dismay as he entered this abode, and heard the ponderous doors triple-locked by the silent ruffians who conducted him to it. Their silence seemed prophetic of his fate, of the living grave that had been prepared for him. His menaces and his entreaties, his indignant appeals for justice, and his impatient questioning of their intentions, were alike vain. They listened, but spoke not: Fit ministers of a crime that should have no tongue!

How dismal was the sound of their retiring steps! And, as their faint echoes died along the winding passages, a fearful presage grew within him, that never more the face, or voice, or tread, of man, would greet his senses. He had seen human beings for the last time! And he had looked his last upon the bright sky, and upon the smiling earth, and upon a beautiful world he loved, and whose minion he had been! Here he was to end his life—a life he had just begun to revel in! And by ~~what~~ means? By secret poison? or by murderous assault? No—for then it had been needless to bring him thither. Famine perhaps—a thousand deaths in one! It was terrible to think of it—but it was yet more terrible to picture long, long years of captivity, in a solitude so appalling, a loneliness so dreary, that thought, for want of fellowship, would lose itself in madness, or tagnate into idiocy.

He could not hope to escape, unless he had the power, with his bare hands, of rending asunder the solid iron walls of his prison. He could not hope for liberty from the relenting mercies of his enemy. His instant death, under any form of refined cruelty, was not the object of Tolfi, for he might have inflicted it, and he had not. It was too evident, therefore, he was reserved for some premeditated scheme of subtle vengeance; and what vengeance could transcend in fiendish malice, either the slow death of famine, or the still slower one of solitary incarceration, till the last lingering spark of life expired, or till reason fled, and nothing should remain to perish but the brute functions of the body?

It was evening when Vivenzio entered his dungeon, and the approaching shades of night wrapped it in total darkness, as he paced up and down, revolving in his mind these horrible forebodings. No tolling bell from the castle, or from any neighbouring church or convent, struck upon his ear to tell how the hours passed. Frequently he would stop and listen for some sound that might betoken the vicinity of man; but the solitude of the desert, the silence of the tomb, are not so still and deep, as the oppressive desolation by which he was encompassed. His heart sunk within him, and he threw himself dejectedly upon his couch of straw. Here sleep gradually obliterated the consciousness of misery, and bland dreams wafted his delighted spirit to scenes which were once glowing realities for him, in whose ravishing illusions he soon lost the remembrance that he was Tolfi's prisoner.

When he awoke, it was daylight; but how long he had slept he knew not. It might be early morning, or it might be sultry noon, for he could measure time by no other note of its progress than light and darkness. He had been so happy in his sleep, amid friends who loved him, and the sweeter endearments of those who loved him as friends could not, that in the first moments of waking, his startled mind seemed to admit the knowledge of his situation, as if it had burst upon it for the first time, fresh in all its appalling horrors. He gazed round with an air of doubt and amazement, and took up a handful of the straw upon which he lay, as though he would ask himself what it meant. But memory, too faithful to her office, soon unveiled the melancholy past, while reason, shuddering at the task, flashed before his eyes the tremendous future. The contrast overpowered him. He remained for some time lamenting, like a truth, the bright visions that had vanished; and recoiling from the present, which clung to him as a poisoned garment.

When he grew more calm, he surveyed his gloomy dungeon. Alas! the stronger light of day only served to confirm what the gloomy indistinctness of the preceding evening had partially disclosed, the utter impossibility of escape. As, however, his eyes wandered round and round, and from place to place, he noticed two circumstances which excited his surprise and curiosity. The one, he thought, might be fancy; but the other, was positive. His picher of water, and the dish which contained his food, had been removed from his side while he slept, and now stood near the door. Were he even inclined to doubt this, by supposing he had mistaken the spot where he saw them over night; he could not, for the picher now in his dungeon was neither of the same form nor colour as the other, while the food was changed for some other of better quality. He had been visited therefore during the night. But how had the person obtained entrance? Could he have slept so soundly, that the unlocking and opening of those ponderous portals were effected without waking him? He would have said this was not possible, but that in doing so, he must admit a greater difficulty, an entrance by other means, of which he was convinced there existed none. It was not intended, then, that he should be left to perish from hunger. But the secret and mysterious mode of supplying him with food, seemed to indicate he was to have no opportunity of communicating with a human being.

The other circumstance which had attracted his notice, was the disappearance, as he believed, of one of the seven grated windows that ran along the top of his prison. He felt confident that he had observed and counted them; for he was rather surprised at their number, and there was something peculiar in their form, as well as in the manner of their arrangement, at unequal distances. It was so much easier, however, to suppose he was mistaken, than that a portion of the solid iron, which formed the walls, could have escaped from its position, that he soon dismissed the thought from his mind.

Vivenzio partook of the food that was before him, without apprehension. It might be poisoned; but if it were, he knew he could not escape death, should such be the design of Tolfi, and the quickest death would be the speediest release.

The day passed wearily and gloomily; though not without a faint hope that, by keeping watch at night, he might observe when the person came again to bring him food, which he supposed he would do in the same way as before. The mere thought of being approached by a living creature, and the opportunity it might present of learning the doom prepared, or preparing, for him, imparted some comfort. Besides, if he came alone, might he not in a furious onset overpower him? Or he might be accessible to pity, or the influence of such munificent rewards as he could bestow, if once more at liberty and master of himself. Say he were armed. The worst that could befall, if nor bribe, nor prayers, nor force prevailed, was a faithful blow, which, though dealt in a damned cause, might work a desired end. There was no chance so desperate, but it looked lovely in Vivenzio's eyes, compared with the idea of being totally abandoned.

The night came, and Vivenzio watched. Morning came, and Vivenzio was confounded! He must have slumbered without knowing it. Sleep must have stolen over him when exhausted by fatigue, and in that interval of feverish repose, he had been baffled; for there stood his replenished pitcher of water, and there his day's meal! Nor was this all. Casting his looks towards the windows of his dungeon, he counted but FIVE! Here was no deception; and he was now convinced there had been none the day before. But what did all this portend? Into what strange and mysterious den had he been cast? He gazed till his eyes ached; he could discover nothing to explain the mystery. That it was so, he knew. Why it was so, he racked his imagination in vain to conjecture. He examined the doors. A simple circumstance convinced him they had not been opened.

A wisp of straw, which he had carelessly thrown against them the preceding day, as he paced to and fro, remained where he had cast it, though it must have been displaced by the slightest motion of either of the doors. This was evidence that could not be disputed; and it followed there must be some secret machinery in the walls by which a person could enter. He inspected them closely. They appeared to him one solid and compact mass of iron; or joined, if joined they were, with such nice art, that no mark of division was perceptible. Again and again he surveyed them—and the floor—and the roof—and that range of visionary windows, as he was now almost tempted to consider them: he could discover nothing, absolutely nothing, to relieve his doubts or satisfy his curiosity. Sometimes he fancied that altogether the dungeon had a more contracted appearance—that it looked smaller; but this he ascribed to fancy, and the impression naturally produced upon his mind by the undeniable disappearance of two of the windows.

With intense anxiety, Vivenzio looked forward to the return of night; and as it approached, he resolved that no treacherous sleep should again betray him. Instead of seeking his bed of straw, he continued to walk up and down his dungeon till daylight, straining his eyes in every direction through the darkness, to watch for any appearances that might explain these mysteries. While thus engaged, and as nearly as he could judge, (by the time that afterwards elapsed before the morning came in,) about two o'clock, there was a slight, tremulous motion of the floors. He stooped. The motion lasted nearly a minute; but it was so extremely gentle, that he almost doubted whether it was real, or only imaginary. He listened. Not a sound could be heard. Presently, however, he felt a rush of cold air blow upon him; and dashing towards the quarter whence it seemed to proceed, he stumbled over something which he judged to be the water cwer. The rush of cold air was no longer perceptible; and as Vivenzio stretched out his hands, he found himself close to the walls. He remained motionless for a considerable time; but nothing occurred during the remainder of the night to excite his attention, though he continued to watch with unabated vigilance.

The first approaches of the morning were visible through the grated windows, breaking, with faint divisions of light, the darkness that still pervaded every other part, long before Vivenzio was enabled to distinguish any object in his dungeon. Instinctively and fearfully he turned his eyes, hot and inflamed with watching, towards them. There were four! He could see only four: but it might be that some intervening object prevented the fifth from becoming perceptible; and he waited impatiently to ascertain if it were so. As the light strengthened, however, and penetrated every corner of the cell, other objects of amazement struck his sight. On the ground lay the broken fragments of the pitcher he had used the day before, and at a small distance from them, nearer to the wall, stood the one he had noticed the first night. It was filled with water, and beside it was his food. He was now certain, that, by some mechanical contrivance, an opening was obtained through the iron wall, and that through this opening the current of air had found entrance. But how noiseless! For had a feather almost waved at the time, he must have heard it. Again he examined that part of the wall; but both to sight and touch it appeared one even and uniform surface, while to repeated and violent blows, there was no reverberating sound indicative of hollowness.

This perplexing mystery had for a time withdrawn his thoughts from the windows; but now, directing his eyes again towards them, he saw that the fifth had disappeared in the same manner as the preceding two, without the least distinguishable alteration of external appearances. The remaining four looked as the seven had originally looked; that is, occupying, at irregular distances, the top of the wall on that side of the dungeon. The tall folding door, too, still seemed to stand beneath, in the centre of these four, as it had at first stood in the centre of the seven. But he could no longer doubt, what, on the preceding day, he fancied might be the effect of visual deception. The dungeon was smaller. The roof had lowered—and the opposite ends had contracted the intermediate distance by a space equal, he thought, to that over which the three windows had extended. He was bewildered in vain imaginings to account for these things. Some frightful purpose—some devilish torture of mind or body—some unheard-of device for producing exquisite misery, lurked, he was sure, in what had taken place.

Oppressed with this belief, and distracted more by the dreadful uncertainty of whatever fate impended, than he could be dismayed, he thought, by the knowledge of the worst, he sat ruminating, hour after hour, yielding his fears in succession to every haggard fancy. At last a horrible suspicion flashed suddenly across his mind, and he started up with a frantic air. "Yes!" he exclaimed, looking wildly round his dungeon, and shuddering as he spoke—"Yes! it must be so! I see it!—I feel the maddening truth like scorching flames upon my brain! Eternal God!—support me! it must be so! —Yes, yes, that is to be my fate! Yon roof will descend!—these walls will hem me round—and slowly, slowly, crush me in their iron arms! Lord God! look down upon me, and in mercy strike me with instant death! Oh, fiend—oh, devil—is this your revenge?"

He dashed himself upon the ground in agony;—tears burst from him, and the sweat stood in large drops upon his face—he sobbed aloud—he tore his hair—he rolled about like one suffering intolerable anguish of body, and would have bitten the iron floor beneath him; he breathed fearful curses upon Tolfi, and the next moment passionate prayers to heaven for immediate death. Then the violence of his grief became exhausted, and he lay still, weeping as a child would weep. The twilight of departing day shed its gloom around him ere he arose from that posture of utter and hopeless sorrow. He had taken no food. Not one drop of water had cooled the fever of his parched lips. Sleep had not visited his eyes for six and thirty hours. He was faint with hunger; weary with watching, and with the excess of his emotions. He tasted of his food; he drank with avidity of the water; and reeling like a drunken man to his straw, cast himself upon it to b~~lood~~ again over the appalling image that had fastened itself upon his almost frenzied thoughts.

He slept. But his slumbers were not tranquil. He resisted, as long as he could, their approach; and when, at last, enfeebled nature yielded to their influence, he found no oblivion from his cares. Terrible dreams haunted him—ghastly visions harrowed up his imagination—he shouted and screamed, as if he already felt the dungeon's ponderous roof descending on him—he breathed hard and thick, as though writhing between its iron walls. Then would he spring up—stare wildly about him—stretch forth his hands, to be sure he yet had space enough to live—and, muttering some incoherent words, sink down again, to pass through the same fierce vicissitudes of delirious sleep.

The morning of the fourth day dawned upon Vivenzio. But it was high noon before his mind shook off its stupor, or he awoke to a full consciousness of his situation. And what a fixed energy of despair sat upon his pale features, as he cast his eyes upwards, and gazed upon the THREE windows that now alone remained! The three!—there were no more!—and they seemed to number his own allotted days. Slowly and calmly he next surveyed the top and sides, and comprehended all the meaning of the diminished height of the former, as well as of the gradual approximation of the latter. The contracted dimensions of his mysterious prison were now too gross and palpable to be the juggle of his heated imagination. Still lost in wonder at the means, Vivenzio could put no cheat upon his reason, as to the end. By what horrible ingenuity it was contrived, that walls, and roof, and windows, should thus silently and imperceptibly, without noise, and without motion almost, fold, as it were, within each other, he knew not. He only knew they did so; and he vainly strove to persuade himself it was the intention of the contriver, to rack the miserable wretch who might be immured there, with anticipation, merely, of a fate, from which in the very crisis of his agony, he was to be reprieved.

Gladly would he have clung even to this possibility, if his heart would have let him; but he felt a dreadful assurance of its fallacy. And what matchless inhumanity it was to doom the sufferer to such lingering torments—to lead him day by day to so appalling a death, unsupported by the consolations of religion, unvisited by any human being, abandoned to himself, deserted of all, and denied even the sad privilege of knowing that his cruel destiny would awaken pity! Alone he was to perish!—alone he was to wait a slow coming torture, whose most exquisite pangs would be inflicted by that very solitude and that tardy coming!

"It is not death I fear," he exclaimed, "but the death I must prepare for! Methinks, too, I could meet even that—all horrible and revolting as it is—if it might overtake me now. But where shall I find fortitude to tarry till it come? How can I outlive the three long days and nights I have to live? There is no power within me to bid the hideous spectre hence—none to make it familiar to my thoughts; or myself, patient of its errand. My thoughts, rather, will flee from me, and I grow mad in looking at it. Oh! for a deep sleep to fall upon me! That so, in death's likeness, I might embrace death itself, and drink no more of the cup that is presented to me, than my fainting spirit has already tasted!"

In the midst of these lamentations, Vivenzio noticed that his accustomed meal, with the pitcher of water, had been conveyed, as before, into his dungeon. But this circumstance no longer excited his surprise. His mind was overwhelmed with others of a far greater magnitude. It suggested, however, a feeble hope of deliverance; and there is no hope so feeble as not to yield some support to a heart bending under despair. He resolved to watch, during the ensuing night, for the signs he had before observed; and should he again feel the gentle, tremulous motion of the floor, or the current of air, to seize that moment for giving audible expression to his misery. Some person must be near him, and within reach of his voice, at the instant when his food was supplied;—one, perhaps, susceptible of pity. Or if not, to be told even that his apprehensions were just, and that his fate was to be what he foreboded, would be preferable to a suspense which hung upon the possibility of his worst fears being visionary.

The night came; and as the hour approached when Vivenzio imagined he might expect the signs, he stood fixed and silent as a statue. He feared to breathe, almost, lest he might lose any sound, which would warn him of their coming. While thus listening, with every faculty of mind and body strained to an agony of attention, it occurred to him he should be more sensible of the motion, probably, if he stretched himself along the iron floor. He accordingly laid himself softly down, and had not been long in that position when—yes—he was certain of it—the floor moved under him! He sprang up, and in a voice suffocated nearly with emotion, called aloud. He paused—the motion ceased—he felt no stream of air—all was hushed—no voice answered to his—he burst into tears; and as he sunk to the ground, in renewed anguish, exclaimed,—“Oh, my God! my God! You alone have power to save me now, or strengthen me for the trial you permit.”

Another morning dawned upon the wretched captive, and the fatal index of his doom met his eyes. Two windows!—and two days—and all would be over! Fresh food—fresh water! The mysterious visit had been paid, though he had implored it in vain. But how awfully was his prayer answered in what he now saw! The roof of the dungeon was within a foot of his head. The two ends were so near, that in six paces he trod the space between them. Vivenzio shuddered as he gazed, and as his steps traversed the narrowed area. But his feelings no longer vented themselves in frantic wailings. With folded arms, and clenched teeth, with eyes that were blood-shot from much watching, and fixed with a vacant glare upon the ground, with a hard quick breathing, and a hurried walk, he strode backwards and forwards in silent musing for several hours. What mind shall conceive, what tongue utter, or what pen describe the dark and terrible character of his thoughts? Like the fate that moulded them, they had no similitude in the wide range of this world's agony for man. Suddenly he stopped, and his eyes were riveted upon that part of the wall which was over his bed of straw. Words are inscribed there! A human language, traced by a human hand! He rushes towards them; but his blood freezes as he reads:—

“I, Ludovico Sforza, tempted by the gold of the Prince of Tolfi, spent three years in contriving and executing this accursed triumph of my art. When it was completed, the perfidious Tolfi, more devil than man, who conducted me hither one morning, to be witness, as he said, of its perfection, doomed me to be the first victim of my own pernicious skill; lest, as he declared, I should divulge the secret, or repeat the effort of my ingenuity. May God pardon him, as I hope he will me, that ministered to his unhallowed purpose! Miserable wretch, whoe'er thou art, that readest these lines, fall on thy knees, and invoke, as I have done, His sustaining mercy, who alone can nerve thee to meet the vengeance of Tolfi, armed with his tremendous engine which, in a few hours, must crush you, as it will the needy wretch who made it."

A deep groan burst from Vivenzio. He stood, like one transfixed, with dilated eyes, expanded nostrils, and quivering lips, gazing at this fatal inscription. It was as if a voice from the sepulchre had sounded in his ears, "Prepare!" Hope forsook him. There was his sentence, recorded in those dismal words. The future stood unveiled before him, ghastly and appalling. His brain already feels the descending horror,—his bones seem to crack and crumble in the mighty grasp of the iron walls! Unknowing what it is he does, he fumbles in his garment for some weapon of self-destruction. He clenches his throat in his convulsive gripe, as though he would strangle himself at once. He stares upon the walls, and his war-ringing spirit demands, "Will they not anticipate their office if I dash my head against them?" An hysterical laugh chokes him as he exclaims, "Why should I? He was but a man who died first in their fierce embrace; and I should be less than man not to do as much!"

The evening sun was descending, and Vivenzio beheld its golden beams streaming through one of the windows. What a thrill of joy shot through his soul at the sight! It was a precious link, that united him, for the moment, with the world beyond. There was ecstasy in the thought. As he gazed, long and earnestly, it seemed as if the windows had lowered sufficiently for him to reach them. With one bound he was beneath them—with one wild spring he clung to the bars. Whether it was so contrived, purposely to madden with delight the wretch who looked, he knew not; but, at the extremity of a long vista, cut through the solid rocks, the ocean, the sky, the setting sun, olive groves, shady walks, and, in the farthest distance, delicious glimpses of magnificent Sicily, burst upon his sight. How exquisite was the cool breeze as it swept across his cheek, loaded with fragrance! He inhaled it as though it were the breath of continued life. And there was a freshness in the landscape, and in the rippling of the calm green sea, that fell upon his withering heart like dew upon the parched earth. How he gazed, and panted, and still clung to his hold! sometimes hanging by one hand, sometimes by the other, and then grasping the bars with both, as loath to quit the smiling paradise outstretched before him; till exhausted, and his hands swollen and benumbed, he dropped helpless down, and lay stunned for a considerable time by the fall.

When he recovered, the glorious vision had vanished. He was in darkness. He doubted whether it was not a dream that had passed before his sleeping fancy; but gradually his scattered thoughts returned, and with them came remembrance. Yes! he had looked once again upon the gorgeous splendour of nature! Once again his eyes had trembled beneath their veiled lids, at the sun's radiance, and sought repose in the soft verdure of the olive-tree, or the gentle swell of undulating waves. Oh, that he were a mariner, exposed upon those waves to the worst fury of storm and tempest; or a very wretch, loathsome with disease, plague-stricken, and his body one leprous contagion from crown to sole, hunted forth to gasp out the remnant of infectious life beneath those verdant trees, so he might shun the destiny upon whose edge he tottered!

Vain thoughts like these would steal over his mind from time to time, in spite of himself; but they scarcely moved it from that stupor into which it had sunk, and which kept him, during the whole night, like one who had been drugged with opium. He was equally insensible to the calls of hunger and of thirst, though the third day was now commencing since even a drop of water had passed his lips. He remained on the ground, sometimes sitting, sometimes lying; at intervals, sleeping heavily; and when not sleeping, silently brooding over what was to come, or talking aloud, in disordered speech, of his wrongs, of his friends, of his home, and of those he loved, with a confused mingling of all.

In this pitiable condition, the sixth and last morning dawned upon Vivenzio, if dawn it might be called—the dim, obscure light which faintly struggled through the ONE SOLITARY window of his dungeon. He could hardly be said to notice the melancholy token. And yet he did notice it; for as he raised his eyes and saw the portentous sign, there was a slight convulsive distortion of his countenance. But what did attract his notice, and at the sight of which his agitation was excessive, was the change his iron bed had undergone. It was a bed no longer. It stood before him, the visible semblance of a funeral couch or bier! When he beheld this, he started from the ground; and, in raising himself, suddenly struck his head against the roof, which was now so low that he could no longer stand upright. "God's will be done!" was all he said, as he crouched his body, and placed his hand upon the bier; for such it was. The iron bedstead had been so contrived, by the mechanical art of Ludovico Sforza, that as the advancing walls came in contact with its head and feet, a pressure was produced upon concealed springs, which, when made to play, set in motion a very simple though ingeniously contrived machinery, that effected the transmutation. The object was, of course, to heighten, in the closing scene of this horrible drama, all the feelings of despair and anguish, which the preceding ones had aroused. For the same reason, the last window was so made as to admit only a shadowy kind of gloom rather than light, that the wretched captive might be surrounded, as it were, with every seeming preparation for approaching death.

Vivenzio seated himself on his bier. Then he knelt and prayed fervently; and sometimes tears would gush from him. The air seemed thick, and he breathed with difficulty; or it might be that he fancied it was so, from the hot and narrow limits of his dungeon, which were now so diminished that he could neither stand up nor lie down at his full length. But his wasted spirits and oppressed mind no longer struggled within him. He was past hope, and fear shook him no more. Happy if thus revenge had struck its final blow; for he would have fallen beneath it almost unconscious of a pang. But such a lethargy of the soul, after such an excitement of its fiercest passions, had entered into the diabolical calculations of Tolfi; and the fell artificer of his designs had imagined a counteracting device.

The tolling of an enormous bell struck upon the ears of Vivenzio! He started. It beat but once. The sound was so close and stunning, that it seemed to shatter his very brain, while it echoed through the rocky passages like reverberating peals of thunder. This was followed by a sudden crash of the roof and walls, as if they were about to fall upon and close around him at once. Vivenzio screamed, and instinctively spread forth his arms, as though he had a giant's strength to hold them back. They had moved nearer to him, and were now motionless. Vivenzio looked up, and saw the roof almost touching his head, even as he sat cowering beneath it; and he felt that a farther contraction of but a few inches only must commence the frightful operation. Roused as he had been, he now gasped for breath. His body shook violently—he was bent nearly double. His hands rested upon either wall, and his feet were drawn under him to avoid the pressure in front. Thus he remained for more than an hour, when that deafening bell beat again, and again there came the crash of horrid death. But the concussion was now so great that it struck Vivenzio down. As he lay gathered up in lessened bulk, the bell beat loud and frequent—crash succeeded crash—and on, and on, and on came the mysterious engine of death, till Vivenzio's smothered groans were heard no more! He was horribly crushed by the ponderous roof and collapsing sides—and the flattened bier was his Iron Shroud.

M.

CLARK ON CLIMATE.*

MR JEFFREY ingeniously and philosophically informed the world, a year or two ago, in the opening sentence of a critique in the Edinburgh Review, on Professor M'Culloch's Elements of Political Economy, of a fact of which, till that time, she had been ignorant, that man consists of two parts—a body and a soul. Not a few persons had previously suspected that they had bodies, and a few, perhaps, that they had souls; but none knew that they had both bodies and souls blended together in mysterious and inscrutable union. From the public announcement of this great discovery, which was, we believe, made by Mr Jeffrey a good while before he gave the world the benefit of it, we lament to say, that all the advantages have not yet accrued to our race that might have been reasonably hoped to follow its promulgation. Our knowledge, it is true, now comprehends the fact, that there are bodies and souls; but of the nature of either, people, in general, continue as ignorant as they were before the publication of that number of that celebrated periodical.

Any little knowledge there may be of the soul is thinly scattered over a number of rather unreadable metaphysical works; of the body, we never met one individual who knew any thing, except a few doctors, and they usually contrive to wrap it up in guinea-pills, which it is often as difficult to purchase as to swallow. People in the hands of a physician are, indeed—patients. They deliver up their bodies to him, if not in as saving, yet in as superstitious a faith as that in which the best of Catholics surrender their souls to the priest. They gulp the prescriptions of both in the same trembling trust in their divine efficacy; and, on recovery or amendment, continue to pursue the self-same career that carried them to consultation or confession. In due time their bodies go to the grave or Dr Knox; and their souls to a place and a person which it would not be proper to mention before the “ears polite,” belonging to the readers of this Magazine.

It is hard to say whether it be more amusing or melaancholy to see so many millions of creatures carrying about with them souls and bodies, often without any apparent suspicion of the existence, and almost always without any real knowledge of the nature, of either,—of their health or their disease. Nor are the writings of physicians, in general, calculated to mend the matter with our bodies, more than those of metaphysicians with our souls. Both are alike unintelligible to the meanest, or in other words, the commonest capacities; and the bare fact discovered and divulged by our Dean of Faculty will, we fear, unless doctors of all degrees change their style, remain a caput mortuum till the end of time.

Yet a few streaks of light on the horizon seem to announce the dawn of a better day to the body at least, if not to the soul. A few physicians and some surgeons there now are among us, who are above making a greater mystery of what they know about our bodies than they can help, and who are sworn foes to tude. Ours is not, strictly speaking, a medical Journal, though it contains many recipes for a long life and a merry one,—prescriptions of which the taste, so far from being nauseous, wooes both palate and stomach with sweet solicitation—yes, sweet alike in the mouth and in the belly, and soothingly preventive of civil war among the members. Yet, though Maga is neither a physician nor a surgeon, nor yet an accoucheur—(though frequently she is Fancy's midwife)—she does not regard with blind eye and deaf ear the medical and the surgical world. She is aware of the worth of a Clark and a Christison, a Liston and a Brodie, and meditates analyses of their works. Of Dr Christison's great work on poisons, by far the best on medical jurisprudence in our language, and on the same level with the larger, but not better, work of Orfila, we shall speak

* “The Influence of Climate,” &c. By James Clark, M.D. Second Edition. Underwood. London, 1830.

fully in an early number; but this article we devote to Dr Clark on Climate,—a book that ought to be in the hands, not only of all practitioners, and in the hands of most of them, indeed, it must be already, but also in those of all men and women who “Wish to be strong,

And hope to live long,”

and be the happy fathers and mothers of large or small families.

Dr Clark is the beau ideal of an anti-quack. Fudge, flam, bam, humbug, fly at his approach. With an unperplexing and benign face he stands beside the sick-bed, and spectral fears and horrors fade away behind the curtains. Hope attends him on his visits to his patients; and he knows too well the beatings of the human heart, which he has so often counted when almost still, or at full gallop, ever to suffer despair to force the door of the chamber. Sick men will think, but need not be reminded, of death, except when they have neglected to make their will; and then, indeed, a hint that it is wicked to leave their earthly affairs at sixes and sevens, when a wife is likely to become a widow, and children orphans, may escape his lips, on that solemn subject no more sealed, to warn not to agitate, to “Cleanse the foul bosom of that perilous stuff

That weighs upon the heart.”

The immediate and remote consequences of such conduct and character have been, and will be, to Dr Clark himself, a prodigious increase of practice—already, though he is but in the prime of life, great in the great City of London, and eke the West End of the Town,—to his numerous patients recoveries from diseases, under less thoughtful care fatal, and a sensible diminution in the still sufficient incomes of undertakers and sextons.

Often, as our friends perceive, while we are contributing to our Miscellany, “Drops a sad serious tear upon our playful pen.”

True, that at our monthly concerts we like to play the first fiddle—to lead. But though the compositions we select are most often of a cheerful character, we sometimes draw from the strings a strain of the pathetic—or a solemn air; which, if they do not touch to tears—and there is no use in needlessly widening the sphere of weeping in this weary world—dispose to pensive meditation. Now this article shall be of that character. It shall be a good article; for in truth we shall be but amanuenses to Dr Clark, abridging his Treatise as we write down his words, and giving in our pages some small part of the wisdom that unostentatiously breathes over his own. Invalids—valetudinarians—may thus purchase the advice of an eminent physician for half-a-crown, and along with it, a few other prescriptions for various complaints, by one who confines himself chiefly to private practice, and visits poor people unfee’d—Christopher North, who has been a D.D. for upwards of half a century, has attended consultations with Drs Heberden and Hunter—and was brought up at the knees of those Galen and Hippocrates, the MURDOCHS.

Adaptation of climate to disease? Ay—know that—and man may outlive the crow! To lay down rules on that, is the great aim and object of Dr Clark in this admirable work. He has collected here all his own experiences, during long and wide travel through many climes, and many of the experiences of his medical friends, who, like him, have studied and observed in many countries, and under many skies. He has disposed his materials in the distinctest order; and his style is distinguished by simplicity and perspicuity, which makes the book not only easy but pleasant reading to all—whether sick or sound—whether they read for information or amusement. But to whom may not the knowledge it contains be of great avail, perhaps in a week, in a day?

“Consumption, silent cheater of the eye,” may, well as we now think ourselves, be beginning its insidious work—and thou who art now devouring Maga, may be—ere next number sees the light—thyself devoured—may be, even while busy at a Noctes,

“A rosy spectre smiling to the tomb!”

Buy “Clark on Climate”—nay, even read this article—and not only may thy life be prolonged—but, bachelor or spinster no more, ere the fall of the leaf thou mayest be wheeling along to the Lakes in a roomy chaise, luxuriously cushioned for the occasion with a pale orange, to enjoy the honey and harvest-moon—deuce take the “Childe’s” sneer, “treacle”—among the Lakes—beginning and ending with matchless Windermere.

The work is divided into two parts. In the first, Dr Clark has endeavoured to determine the general physical characters of the milder climate of England, and of the south of Europe,—to point out the manner in which the climate of different places resorted to by individuals is modified by local circumstances, and to compare those places relatively to their influence on disease. In the second, he has given some account of the principal diseases which are benefited by a mild climate. This he found to be unavoidable; it being impossible, otherwise, to give precise directions for the application of particular climates to the cure of particular diseases, and much more so to their varieties and complications. The diseases on which he has dwelt longest, are the two of the greatest importance, and of extreme frequency in this country, Consumption, and disorders of the Digestive Organs.

In treating of consumption, he has directed his enquiries chiefly to the causes and origin of that fatal disease, with the view of establishing rules for its prevention; for Dr Clark is satisfied that it is only by a knowledge of the causes which lead to it, and by directing our efforts to counteract them, that we shall be able to diminish the ravages of consumption. He is convinced that by adopting such a system of management, from early infancy, as he has laid down, a great improvement might be effected in the general health of many among the higher and middle classes of society in this country. The children of delicate, nay of diseased parents, might, by proper care, be reared so as to overcome, in a large proportion of cases, their hereditary disposition to disease. And how many diseases, when the history of families can be looked into, are found to be hereditary! Consumption is to many a bright and blooming girl and boy, an heritage, though it is not in the title-deeds of those estates which, in transitory succession, they for a few glimpses of sunshine enjoy.*

Dr Clark hopes,—and he is well entitled to do so,—that from the minute manner in which he has described the characters of the different climates frequented by invalids, and the care with which he has indicated the nature of the diseases benefited by them, that he has gone far to correct many of the erroneous opinions which have hitherto existed on these subjects; and anticipates, at least, this good effect from his labours, that, for the future, those patients only will be sent abroad, whose cases afford a reasonable prospect of benefit from such a measure, and that the practice of hurrying out of their own country a class of invalids whose sufferings can only be thereby increased, and their lives shortened, will no longer be sanctioned; but that such persons may be allowed, henceforth, to die in peace in the bosom of their own families.

Let us, in the first place, endeavour to state the sum and substance of Dr Clark’s enquiries into the nature of consumption,—and in the second, to abridge some of the information he has given us respecting the adaptation of certain climates to certain diseases.

It is now clearly ascertained by pathologists, that the immediate cause of pulmonary consumption, or that which constitutes its essential character, is the existence, in the lungs, of certain substances called tubercles. Therefore, till we arrive at a knowledge of the state of the system which leads to the formation of these bodies, and of the circumstances which induce that state, we cannot hope to establish rules for the prevention of consumption upon any sound principles. Now, tubercles,

* Dr Clark notices in his Preface the kind and liberal assistance which he received from many friends, while engaged in collecting materials for his work. Professor de Mathis of Rome, Dr Lanza of Naples, Dr Mejon of Genoa, Professor Grotanelli of Sienna, Drs Heineker and Renton of Madeira, Dr Skirving of Nice, Dr Peebles of Rome, Dr Playfair of Florence, Dr Forbes of Chichester, (to whom the work is affectionately and proudly dedicated,) Dr Langens of Newport, Dr Down of Southampton, and, above all others, Dr Tod of Brighton.

when not very numerous, may exist in the lungs, without producing much inconvenience, for many years; and if the general health is improved, and those causes which are known to excite irritation or inflammation in the respiratory organs, are avoided, they may not, for aught we know, shorten materially the life of the individual. But this is the most favourable, and by much the rarer result of the case. Tubercles, in the vast majority of instances, advance rapidly, destroy that portion of the lungs in which they are imbedded, and cause death. Expectoration sometimes leads to a cure of the disease, and, indeed, it is the opinion of some of the best pathologists of the day, that this is the only way in which a cure of tuberculous consumption is effected. That tubercles are ever absorbed, we have no proof. The next step in the research, therefore, leads us to enquire into the proximate cause of tubercles. Morbid anatomy has discovered that they may be formed without even the slightest symptoms of inflammation; while, on the other hand, inflammation, in all its degrees, is of frequent occurrence without giving rise to tubercles. Nothing is more common than to find them in numerous organs of the body at the same time; and it is often in that organ only in which they had longest existed, (commonly the lungs,) that traces of inflammation are to be found—the tubercles being frequently deposited in the unchanged, healthy chambers of the parts. They are often most insidious in their formation and increase; and it is easily to be conceived that they should render any organ more prone to inflammation; and that inflammation should accelerate the progress of the tubercles through their different stages. But Dr Clark cannot admit that simple inflammation should be capable of producing such extensive alterations, without its existence being discoverable during life by any of the usual signs, or any traces of it being detected after death, as some pathologists believe. He is of opinion, then, that tubercles are not generally the result of inflammation, though sometimes they are; and the question arises, Whence is it that the same morbid action gives origin to tubercles in one instance, and not in the other? In a healthy subject, he believes they are never the result of inflammation, and that, when they appear to be so, it will be found to be inflammation occurring in, and modified by, a disordered state of the system, of a peculiar kind. To that disordered state of the system, then, it behoves the physician to direct his chief attention,—for by correcting it, he may prevent the formation of tubercles, or, in other words, of consumption.

The immediate process by which tubercles are produced, is involved in much obscurity. It may be the peculiar action of the extreme vessels totally unconnected with inflammation, or even with increased action; nay, it is just as likely that they may be the result of a morbid diminution of action. In persons, however, strongly predisposed to tubercular disease, the frequent occurrence of catarrh, or of pulmonary inflammation, may, by keeping up a degree of congestion and irritation of the lungs, give rise to the formation of tubercles at an earlier period than would otherwise have happened, or even, in nicely balanced cases, determine their occurrence. Dr Clark thinks with Dr Todd, and some other pathologists, that the real cause of tubercles is a morbid condition of the general system, hereditary in some, and, in others, induced by a series of functional derangements, ultimately affecting the whole animal economy.

Having advanced thus far, Dr Clark proceeds to point out some of the leading symptoms by which this state is characterised,—premising, that it is more easily recognised than described; for the affection being a progressive one, its signs are more or less manifest according to the degree in which it exists.

First, the countenance is generally paler than natural, though at different times, and without any apparent reason, it is, in this respect, subject to striking changes. These are very remarkable where there is much colour. Now, there is a general paleness, with a sunk, faded appearance of the countenance,—now, an irregular mixture of white and red. In place of the natural gradations in which these colours pass into each other in health, they terminate by distinct and abrupt lines, giving the face a blotched or spotted appearance. Sallow complexions assume a peculiarly unhealthy aspect, exhibiting a dull, leaden hue, diffused over a general pallid ground, and there is paleness on the lips. The eyes have generally a pearly, glassy appearance, and the whole countenance has commonly a sunk and languid aspect. At first they are transitory,—but though, during the progress of the disease, and on to its close, variable, yet evident to the most cursory observer. The skin of the patient is either harsh and dry, or that state will be found to alternate with a moist, clammy, and relaxed one. The colour, too, is often changed to a sallow, and, in some cases, to a dirty yellowish hue; and except on the cheeks, there is always a deficiency of red vessels. In some hereditary cases, particularly in females of a fair and delicate complexion, the skin assumes a semi-transparent appearance, resembling wax-work, and the veins may be seen distinctly through it. Poets ought not to describe the hands of their imaginary mistresses as transparent, except when they are conducting them, not to their bridal beds, but to their graves. 'Tis a bad sign of a young lady's health when you can see through her hand as easily as her heart; and, instead of a parson, you should call in a physician.

Secondly, the digestive organs are very generally more or less deranged. Look at the tongue, and it is furred towards the base, the extremity and edges being pale and flabby. Or, with the base furred, the point and margin are redder than natural, and often studded with papillæ of a still brighter hue. The former state of the tongue is a more frequent accompaniment of that form of disease which originates chiefly in hereditary predisposition; the latter, of that which is principally or entirely acquired, and in which an irritated state of the stomach attends the disorder from the beginning, and often precedes it. In a third class of cases, of much rarer occurrence, the tongue is clean and natural in its appearance, and the digestive organs pretty regularly perform their functions. This happens chiefly, Dr Clark thinks, in females in whom the disease has been mainly owing to hereditary predisposition. Such patients bear, and even require, a fuller and stronger diet; with the others it is the reverse.

Thirdly, In consumptions the circulation is subject to great variety; in hereditary cases, the powers of the heart, Dr Clark thinks, are commonly under the ordinary standard, while the frequency of the pulse is generally above it, and palpitation is not an unfrequent symptom. Indeed, he thinks that a small feeble heart is a strong predisposing cause of consumption.

Fourthly, The nervous system partakes of the general derangement. Sleep is unsound, being either disturbed, or unnaturally heavy and unrefreshing. The mind, sympathizing with the body, loses its energy; and the temper is often remarkably changed. In the purer and less complicated cases of hereditary consumption, there is generally great serenity of mind; the spirits are often of surprising buoyancy, and hope brings its cheering influence with the last sufferings of the patient. That beauty is the worst of all to be borne by the living spectator of the dying one. But such a state of mind is far seldomer an attendant on consumption than is generally believed, especially in those cases in which disorder of the digestive organs leads to the morbid condition of the system. Then the poor patient is seen dying day by day, in despondency and in despair; nor can there be a more trying death to the most religious of God's creatures.

Under the general term, Consumption, then, are comprehended three different forms or stages of disease—1st, General disorder of the health—2d, Tubercular cachexy—3d, Consumption, properly so called. These different stages may, in general, be distinctly recognised; but it is only in proportion to the physician's powers and habits of minute and careful observation that the symptoms of the first stage will be remarked, or in other words, that he will be able to detect the approach of the first tubercular disease. But this is the time, by proper applications, to prevent consumption. If it be allowed to pass by, as it is in many million cases, then

"The trot becomes a gallop soon,
In spite of curb or rein."

Having thus spoken of the symptoms, let us now speak of the causes, of consumption—and, first, let us attend, with Dr Clark, to the hereditary nature of the disease.

By hereditary predisposition, a term in the application of which there has been some confusion, Dr Clark understands a peculiar condition of the system, depending upon its original conformation and organization, and derived from the parents, which renders the individual more susceptible, or more liable to lapse into certain diseases, than other persons endowed originally with a more healthy organization. Now, it does not follow, as a necessary consequence, that a child born with a predisposition to a disease, must be attacked by that disease; but it will be more easily induced, unless the condition of the system which constitutes the hereditary predisposition be corrected by proper management in early life. In some families, the hereditary predisposition seems so strong, that, without any cognizable cause, the regular actions of the economy become deranged, and the system lapses into the morbid state, which terminates eventually in consumption. Indeed, in some rare instances, the infant at birth has been found to be labouring under tubercular disease. On the other hand, so weak is the hereditary predisposition in many individuals, that a complication of powerful causes long applied is necessary to induce the disease. Between these two extremes there exists every variety of shade in the disposition to consumption. A disposition to consumption and to scrofula is sometimes often transmitted from parents to children, by the deteriorating influence of other diseases in the parents on the physical condition of their offspring. Thus, the children of dyspeptic, of gouty, and of cachectic parents, are very liable to scrofula and consumption; and this, though a more remote, Dr Clark thinks is probably the original source of scrofulous and tuberculous diseases.

But the predisposition to consumption is very often acquired without any hereditary taint; no person, however healthful may have been his original organization, can be considered totally exempt from the liability to consumption. It is met with in early infancy, and occasionally proves fatal to the octogenarian. All causes predispose to it which lower the tone of the bodily health—sedentary occupations—abuse of strong spirituous or fermented liquors—unwholesome diet. In humid and cold situations, all diseases which induce what is called "a bad habit of body." Mental depression accelerates the evil, and in constitutions labouring under tubercular disease, its destructive influence is most conspicuous.

But the origin of the constitutional disorder which Dr Clark describes as tending ultimately to consumption, is very often to be traced, he says, to the mismanagement of children. The seeds of disease, which are to ripen at a later period of life, are frequently sown during infancy and childhood—in the first case by imperfect suckling, or the entire substitution of artificial food for the natural and only proper nourishment of infants; and in the second, by improper, and often over-stimulating, food; and a hundred other causes connected with early education. The education of girls is too often such—especially in boarding-schools—it is needless to describe it here—as to comprehend all the causes of consumption; or, if any be wanting, they are soon supplied by a fashionable life. On this part of the subject, Dr Clark dwells with much feeling; but we have not room to follow him, and must now go on to consider a change to a milder climate as a remedy for that deranged state of the health from which consumption springs.

Before such a change is resorted to, the disordered functions of the body—particularly the digestive organs—must be corrected; and that must be done, not by any violent means, but by slow, gradual, and cautious treatment of local congestion and irritation, often combined with general debility, a pathological state which it requires great judgment and sagacity to manage. This being done, then the sooner the patient removes to a milder climate the better; for the great utility of such a climate consists in no "hidden magic," but in enabling the patient to pursue the restorative system through the whole year.

The misfortune is, that the period of the functional disease is too often permitted to pass, before any danger is feared; and that relations are not alarmed till symptoms of irritation, or impeded function in the lungs, appear, of tubercular disease established there, and fast leading to the third and last stage of consumption. Even then, removal to a mild climate, especially if effected by means of a sea voyage, under very favourable circumstances, may still be useful—but merely as a means of improving the general health, and of preventing inflammatory affections of the lungs and bronchia. But when consumption is fully established—that is, when the character of the cough and expectoration, the hectic fever and emaciation, give every reason to believe the existence of tuberculous cavities in the lungs, and still more, when the presence of these is ascertained by auscultation—he thinks that no benefit is to be expected from change of climate. Under such circumstances, the patient should try the most favourable residences of his own country, or even wait the result—it is needless to say what it will be—amid the comforts of home and watchful care of friends. It is indeed natural for the relations of such a patient to cling to that which seems to afford even a ray of hope. But did they but know, says Dr Clark, the discomfort, the fatigue, the exposure, and the irritation, necessarily attendant on a long journey in the advanced period of consumption, they would shrink from such a measure! Nor will the experienced medical adviser, when he reflects upon all the accidents to which the poor patient must be liable, condemn him to the additional evil of expatriation. Alas! such unfortunate patients often sink a prey to their disease long before they reach the place of destination. Almost all—nay all the rest—through pain and suffering, find, in a distant country, an untimely grave.

But there are chronic cases of consumption, in which the disease of the lungs, even though arrived at its last stage, may derive benefit by a removal to a mild climate—those in which the disease has been induced in persons little disposed to it constitutionally, and in whom it usually occurs later in life than when hereditary. The tuberculous affection in such persons is occasionally confined to a small portion of the lungs, and the system sympathizes with the local disease. Residence in a mild climate, by strengthening the system, may save the patient. In those fortunate, but rare cases, too, where the progress of disease in the lungs has been arrested by nature, but in which a long period must elapse before the work of reparation is completed, a mild climate has often been of great avail. In nicely balanced cases, life may be preserved for many years by constant residence in a warm climate—nor would there probably be any consumption at all, if, with the cuckoo, we could make

"Our annual voyage round the globe, Companion of the spring."

Supposing a removal to a mild climate to be decided on, which is the best climate? No one climate or situation is the best in all cases. In the first part of his book, Dr Clark, as we have said, gives the character of the climate of all the different places resorted to by invalids, and has endeavoured to draw a comparative view of their respective merits. It was our declared intention to enrich our pages with much of that most valuable information; but this article has already grown to such a length, that we must reserve it for our next Number. Meanwhile, it may be remarked of the climates of the south of France and Italy, that for consumptive invalids, in whom there exists much sensibility to frost and keen winds, and more especially, if the immediate vicinity of the sea is known to disagree with them, Rome and Pisa are the best situations for a winter residence. When, on the contrary, the patient labours under a languid or oppressed circulation, with a relaxed habit, and a disposition to congestion or to hæmorrhage, rather than to inflammation, and more especially when the sea-air is known by experience to agree with the individual, Nice deserves the preference. But in cases complicated with gastric irritation, Nice is an improper residence. Indeed, Dr Clark is of opinion, that where this state of the stomach exists, no climate which disagrees with it, can do the patient good, whatever be his other ailments, and however favourable to them the climate may be.

The climate which of all others he thinks the best suited to consumptive patients, generally, is that of Madeira—for reasons assigned by him—and next to it, that of Teneriffe.

The profession are divided on the question, whether the preference is to be given to a seaside or an inland situation. Dr Clark, from all he has been enabled to learn and observe, thinks that consumption, ceteris paribus, is more frequent on the sea-coast than in the interior; but still, that the greater mildness of many maritime places, as of those on the south and south-west coasts of England, may more than compensate for this difference, especially when they are resorted to only for a part of the year. But of two climates, the physical character of which being alike favourable, the one on the sea shore, and the other inland, he would certainly prefer the latter as a residence for a consumptive patient. There was once a foolish idea prevalent even in the profession, that the air of a marshy country was beneficial in consumption; but scrofula and consumption are more frequent in many aguish countries, than in others of a different character, and an attack of ague is surely more likely to prove the occasion of consumption than to prevent it. Thus, in the province of Frise, in the Netherlands, agues abound; and it appears by a statistical table sent to our author by Dr Lombard, that consumption is more frequent there than in Edinburgh. A humid atmosphere in a cold climate is indeed one of the most powerful causes of consumption.

Is a sea voyage to be recommended or not, in cases of consumption? Dr Clark is decidedly of opinion that a sea voyage is beneficial in its early stages, and most of all, when the disease is accompanied with hæmoptysis. He agrees with Dr Gregory, who expresses this opinion in his celebrated Conspectus, that the unceasing motion of a ship, and the constant exercise which it produces, are principal agents in the cure, while it seems also to act in a particular manner on the nervous system. Many striking instances of the beneficial effects of sea voyages in consumption are authenticated. They are also much preferable to land journeys, in all consumptive cases which are complicated with palpitation, or increased action of the heart, whether functional or depending upon organic disease. But there may exist complications, on the other hand, which would render a sea voyage unadvisable—as, when there is much nervous sensibility, a strong disposition to headach, and an irritable state of the stomach; a sea voyage, it is plain, must either do much good or much evil to an invalid, for it works strongly, for life or for death. Dr Clark recommends a cruise—and not in the Mediterranean, but in the Atlantic.

In place of sending consumptive patients to pass the winter in a milder climate, it has been proposed to keep them in rooms artificially heated, and maintained at a regular temperature. What says Dr Clark to this proposal? He says what seems to be most rational, that with the advocates of such a measure, the state of the lungs appears to be the only consideration; whereas, it need not be told, that without improving the general health, which cannot be done without exercise in the open air, all measures, directed to the local disease, will be fruitless. By such means, undoubtedly, the inflammatory action in these organs may be kept down; but they all favour the very condition of the system which led to the disease, and the removal of which condition can alone afford the patient a hope of recovery. Therefore, in the incipient stages of consumption, he holds justly such a measure to be generally most improper; but in the advanced stages, when all hopes of recovery have vanished, and when removal to a distant climate is totally useless, life may be prolonged, in many cases, by keeping the invalids in apartments, the temperature of which is regulated in such a manner as to maintain the air in the purest possible state. Females, from their habits, bear such a system of confinement better than males—and both sexes, at the more advanced periods of life. In cases of inflammation of the lungs, also, which have occurred during the winter, such a measure is good; but the patient ought certainly, if possible, to pass the following winter in a climate where confinement will not be necessary, that his general health may be improved by exercise in the open air. Comparing, then, the benefits likely to result to consumptive patients from a mild climate, and confinement to rooms regulated to an agreeable temperature, there can be no question of the decided superiority of the former. But when circumstances preclude the possibility of changing the climate, then confinement to apartments of a proper and equable temperature, is the best measure that can be adopted to avoid the injurious effects of our cold, damp, and variable climate during the winter season.

Can any general rule be given with respect to the length of time which a consumptive invalid may be required to pass in a mild climate, in order to overcome the disposition to the disease? No. When it is had recourse to for the removal of the disordered health which precedes tubercular cachexy, a single winter may be all that may be necessary—when tubercular cachexy is established, and still more, when there is reason to suspect the presence of tubercles in the lungs, several years may be requisite. In consumption, properly so called, Dr Clark, throughout the whole work, expresses his belief that climate, with rarest exceptions, will be of little or no service.

When the disease is cured, the patient should never forget that it may, and indeed will, recur, should he expose himself to the influence of any of its chief causes. And in recovering from a very bad case, he ought to remain long—perhaps for years—in the climate which wrought the cure. Perhaps he may never again be able to live in any other—never again be the man he once was—and infatuated will he be, if he lives as a strong man might, and ever forgets that both his feet were once on the edge of the grave.

In conclusion, Dr Clark submits the following corollaries as a summary of his views regarding the nature and causes of consumption, and its treatment, more especially as connected with the effects of climate.

1st, That tubercles in the lungs constitute the essential character and immediate cause of consumption.

2d, That tubercles originate in a morbid condition of the general system.

3d, That such a state of system frequently has for its cause hereditary predisposition; in other instances being induced by various functional disorders; while in a third class of cases, perhaps the most numerous, it arises from the conjoint effects of both these causes.

4th, That consumption is to be prevented only by adopting such means as shall counteract the hereditary predisposition, where it exists, and maintain a healthy condition of the various functions from infancy to the full development of the body.

5th, That in the general disorder of the health which leads to tubercular cachexy, or in tubercular cachexy itself, and even when tubercles are formed in the lungs, unattended with much constitutional disturbance, a residence in a mild climate will prove beneficial; and also in cases of chronic consumption, at any stage, where the lungs are not extensively implicated in tubercular disease, and where the system does not sympathize much with the local disorder.

6th, That in cases of confirmed consumption, in which the lungs are extensively diseased, and where hectic fever, emaciation, and the other symptoms which characterise its advanced stages, are present, change of climate can be of no service, and may even accelerate the progress of the disease.

7th, That climate, to be effectual in any case, requires to be continued for a considerable time—in most cases for years.

We have now given, as we said we should do, the sum and substance of Dr Clark's opinions on consumption. They are, like all true views, simple; there is nothing startling about them, for sagacity never hunts after novelty, and wisdom seeks not for what is strange. He is perfectly justified in his anticipations that his book will be perused by many persons not of the profession, but who are yet deeply interested in the subject of climate, in relation to its effects on disease. His wish was to express himself in as plain language as possible, that he might make himself intelligible to the generality of readers, without at all diminishing the utility of the work to the members of his own profession. He has completely succeeded; and we hope that other physicians will lay aside the stilts and the veil; and when speaking about diseases which in one sense may be said to be "their bread and other men's poison," will walk on the same sort of feet, and wear the same sort of face, and use the same sort of tongue—as far as may be—with ordinary mortals. And thus will man come, in due time, to know something about that part of him called the Body—while, if priests and philosophers will do their duty too, he will likewise be acquiring some knowledge of his other part, called the Soul. And thus will he live long on earth, and then go to heaven.

LETTER FROM THE AUTHOR OF "ANNALS OF THE PENINSULAR CAMPAIGNS,"

TO THE EDITOR OF BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

SIR,

ON my return from the Continent, about a fortnight ago, I for the first time learned, that a letter bearing the respectable signature of Major-General Stirling, had appeared in your Magazine, impeaching the accuracy of a passage in the "Annals of the Peninsular Campaigns," relative to the conduct of the 42d regiment in the battle of Corunna. This passage it may be better to quote. It is as follows:—

"In the meanwhile, from some misapprehension, the 42d had retired, and the enemy being reinforced, took advantage of this circumstance to renew the conflict. Elvina became again the scene of struggle; the 42d, after a brief but animating address from the General, returned to the attack, and the Guards being brought up to their support, the enemy retired."

In opposition to the above statement, General Stirling, in his letter, has thought proper to assert, 1st, that the 42d regiment never did retire till ordered to do so, when night had put a stop to the engagement; 2dly, that, with the exception of the words, "Highlanders, remember Egypt!" which accompanied the first order to advance, the regiment received no address from Sir John Moore. In vindication of my own accuracy, therefore, I feel called on to produce the authorities on which my statement is founded, leaving it to Major-General Stirling to deal with these as he may deem most conducive to the credit of the distinguished regiment so long under his command.

The following extract is from the work of James Moore, brother to the General, which has passed through various editions, and is, confessedly, of the very highest authority:—

"The General now proceeded to the 42d. 'Highlanders,' said he, 'remember Egypt!' They rushed on and drove the French before them, till they were stopped by a wall. Sir John accompanied them in this charge. He now sent Captain Hardinge to order up a battalion of the Guards to the left flank of the 42d. The officer commanding the Light Infantry conceived at this that they were about to be relieved by the Guards, because their ammunition was nearly expended, and he began to fall back. The General, discovering the mistake, said to them, 'My brave Forty-second, join your comrades; ammunition is coming up, and you have your bayonets.' Upon this they instantly moved forward, &c."—p. 350-1. 3d edition.

The same account is given, nearly verbatim, by Mr Southey, (vol. i. p. 801.)

It is also repeated in the "Annual Register" of the year; in the "Military Chronicle" (Sup. to vol. i. p. 71); in the "Journal of a Soldier of the 71st Regiment;" and in many other works, to which, as I am deprived of access to my military books, I cannot at this moment more particularly refer. If further corroboration, however, be required, I imagine it will be amply afforded by the following passage from the History of Colonel Napier, the accuracy of whose information, on every thing connected with the campaign of Sir John Moore, has never been disputed. Colonel Napier narrates the circumstances connected with the 42d regiment in the following manner:—

“Meanwhile the General, bringing up a battalion of the brigade of Guards to fill the space in the line left vacant by these two regiments, (50th and 42d,) the 42d mistook his intention, and retired, and at that moment the enemy, being reinforced, renewed the fight beyond the village; the officer commanding the 50th was wounded and made prisoner, and Elvina became the scene of a second struggle; this being observed by the Commander-in-Chief, who directed in person the operations of Baird's division, he addressed a few animating words to the 42d, and caused it to return to the attack.”
—Napier, vol. i. p. —.

Were further evidence wanting in this matter, it would be easy to procure it; and if General Stirling is not aware of the fact, that the authorities already quoted have not only commanded the public belief in this country, but have likewise been corroborated and confirmed by foreign military authors, he may become so by consulting the Histories of Riegel and Venturini, Rocca's “Account of the War in Spain,” the “Biographie Universelle,” (art. Sir John Moore,) and other works to which, should he wish it, it will give me pleasure to direct his attention.

In the meanwhile, I believe I have demonstrated beyond question that the passage in the “Annals of the Peninsular Campaigns,” stigmatized as “very inaccurate,” is supported, in every particular, by the uniform stream of authorities, from the period of the action till the appearance of General Stirling's letter in your Magazine. Let it be remembered, too, that the statements quoted, relative to the conduct of the 42d regiment, in the battle of Corunna, have been successively put forth by military writers of the highest popularity and distinction, and that it is only after an interval of twenty-one years, that a contradiction, addressed to one of the most obscure and least authoritative of their number, has at length been hazarded. How to account for this circumstance, I confess I know not. That the statements alluded to should never, during so long a period, have fallen within the observation of those able and interested to correct them, if erroneous, it is difficult to conceive; yet had General Stirling not been ignorant of all that I have in this letter obtruded, perhaps somewhat unpleasantly, on his notice, I am sure his candour would have led him to accompany his charge of inaccuracy with a confession that a narrative of facts, substantially the same with that objected to in the “Annals,” had been given, in almost every history that had previously appeared, without contradiction, either from himself or any other officer present in the engagement.

I have now done. Whether the statement of General Stirling, put forth after so long and unaccountable a silence, or that given by the authorities already quoted, may be held most entitled to credit, is to me matter of the most perfect indifference. It is enough for my complete vindication, that at the period when my history was written, the accuracy of the accounts on which I founded had remained unquestioned for nearly a quarter of a century; nay, at this very moment have received no public contradiction. I have now only to assure General Stirling that he has my best wishes in the task he has thus tardily undertaken, of vindicating even from the possibility of reflection the reputation of a regiment whose conduct upon all occasions is universally acknowledged to have been very creditable. General Stirling, however, deceives himself, if he supposes that such authorities as those I have quoted, whose accounts have long since become part of the Military History of Europe, are to be answered by a few sentences in a Magazine, however extensive its circulation.

PRESENT—*MESSRS BLACKWOOD, NORTH, CRAIGELLACHIE, SEWARD, SHEPHERD, JAMES BALLANTYNE, BULLER, SANDY BALLANTYNE, ROBERT HOWIE, ARCHITECT HAMILTON, ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER, MODERN PYTHAGOREAN, DELTA, MULLION, JOHN WATSON GORDON, LAWRENCE MACDONALD, TICKLER, ROBERT GIBB, JOHN GREENSHIELDS, Assistant Chaplains, REV. JOHN KNOX, and SAMUEL SOUTH, and "the Rest."

(PICARDY, MON. CADET, KING PEPIN, SIR DAVID GAM, TAPPIETOURIE, SQUINTUM, BANDY, and the PECH, in attendance, in the act of depositing the dessert.)

SHEPHERD (holding up his hands.)

What'n frutes !

NORTH.

Watson Gordon, my dear fellow, study the Shepherd. That's the FACT !
JOHN WATSON GORDON (smiling.)

I have it.

TICKLER.

In the attitude of prayer, like a Covenanter on a hill side.

ASSISTANT CHAPLAIN KNOX (austerely.)

Denouncing wrath against old sinners. Mr Tickler, remember, sir, where you are, and no sneers, however slight, at the ordinances of religion.

TICKLER.

Poo—poo—Jack—times are changed since those of your old fierce Progenitor. You must learn, sir, to accommodate your zeal to the spirit of the age. No human ears, however long, ever heard Timothy Tickler sneer, however slightly, at any religious ordinance. When any bigot says so, " I tell him, if a clergyman, he lies."

ASSISTANT CHAPLAIN KNOX.

Sir, your cloth protects you. Crack that nut.

SHEPHERD.

Pity me the day, what's a' this? You twa fechtin' afore the frute ! and sic a flush o' frute as never was set doon afore mortal man syne the Fa' ! Thae prickly peeramids ye ca' pineapples ? O, sirs ! but thae hae a sweet scent, just like that o' a lassie's breath, sittin' wi' her love-locks inside o' a bodie's plaid on the breezy brae.

NORTH.

A fragrant simile, James.

SHEPHERD.

And what orangers! yellower nor bloom or whuns, gouden ba's indeed, drapped frae trees in the Hesperides. Grapes and grozets gloriously glowin', "in linked sweetness lang drawn out," a' roun' the Oval, and tastily interspersed wi' what can be naething else but peaches and neetrings, wi' here and there a bonny basket o' plooms and cherries, alternatin' wi' blushin' banks o' strawberries—and as if spring and owtumn had melted into ane, the entire table beautified wi' a boundless prodigality o' flowers! The hail Botanic and Experimental Gardens—baith—maun hae been roopit to furnish forth that unparalleled yepergne. You micht dream that some angel had crushed the arc o' the rainbow thegither into a ba', and lettin' fa' doon, in the midst o' our festivities, frae the showery heavens!

MR LAWRENCE MAC DONALD.

Beautiful!

SHEPHERD.

Chaplains—nae sic dessert was ever devoord in Paradise. Think you 't was on the left or the richt bank o' the Euphrates?

ASSISTANT CHAPLAIN SOUTH.

Milton says,

"Southward through Eden ran a river large."

SHEPHERD.

And hoo got Adam and Eve across? There were nae brigs in thae days—but aiblins they cou'd haith swoom and flie. For licht, licht, sir, maun their bodies as weel as their sowles hae been, afore they were clogged wi' sin. They needed neither fins nor wings then—their frames in specific gravity less dense nor the living elements. But the "taste o' that mortal frute brocht death into the warld, and a' our woe,"—although there's nae use in yawmmerin' about it noo—sae, Mr De Quinshy, I'd thank ye, sir, to rax me ower an apple.

ENGLISH OPIH-EATLER.

In the juice of the apple, in rind equally with core, there is lodged, Mr Hogg, a mysterious power of affecting the human tooth, so as to produce, if not a painful, yet an uneasy sensation, of a very peculiar and indescribable kind, vulgarly called—

SHEPHERD.

Settin' your teeth on edge. It's no sae bad's keeping a body's mooth waterin'. Fling me ower the great big muckle red-cheeked aue, that seems hotchin' half-a-dizzen lesser anes aff its gawcey shouthers.—Weel bowled and weel keppt! You and me, sir, would mak twa gran' cricketers. Noo, freens, crack awa—for I'm no gaun till speak—till I've sookit the seeds.

MR BLACKWOOD (to MR NORTH.)

My dear sir, should we not have toasts?

NORTH.

No, Bailie, if you please, not till the time-piece chimes—Ten. Meanwhile, gentlemen, this is Liberty-Hall. Mr Blackwood and I—President and Vice-President of the United States—

SHEPHERD.

Sittin' in your arm-chairs, wi' red, stuffed, leather backs and bottoms, when a' the lave o' us hae our hurdies on the hard timmer, nae support ava' for our spines, and nae ither for our elbows but the edge o' the aik-table! And that's liberty and equality! But afore a's dune, pride may get a fa'. I hae an ee to North's chair about cock-craw. There hae been some auld lines floating about the Forest—for some thoosan years—that may be modernized thus—prophesying—in my interpretation be richt—that I was born to be an usurper.

TICKLER.

Hogg's head brought to the block for having dethroned our Sovereign Lord the King!

SHEPHERD.

The Seabellin' leaves daurkly hint sae,—an' I wou'd wish to hear my auld cronie Edward Irving—mony a jug hae we twa durned thegither, though a' in a dounce sober way, and never aneuch to produce either an apocalypse or an apoplexy—try his haun' at its interpretation. The close o't's no camy, like the wutches warmin' to Macbeth.

“Much I long, yet fear to try,
The long-forgotten prophecy.”

NORTH.

Sing out, James.

SHEPHERD.

When Bawdrons, wi' her mousin paw,
Dechts her face, the rains wull fa'
As they wou'd ding down roof and wa',
Tour and turret, rocks and a',
In Yarrow droonin' Newark-ha'.
An' when the Hoggie frae his stye,
Sees hoo the wund blaws in the sky,
Snoking wi' his snout on high,
Grunts to man, “’tis all my eye,”
Foreseeing some strange destiny.
When the Big Bore rushes forth,
Like a man o' war and worth,
Bearin' doon upo' the North,
Where rules the king o' a' the earth,
Whom a' the natives serve wi' mirth.
Then that Sovran frae his chair,
Prouder than the Prince o' Air,
Aneath the deas, wi' lady fair,
Ane Mawga, proudly seated there,
By men yeclyped—Christopher,
At the wee sma' hour will snore,
And by that Beast be couped ower,
Senseless on the holy floor.

Swinkum—Sauctum—Swiggamore!

The Big Boar then his body busks
Wi' bristles, and his snout wi' tusks.
And scornin' mair to feed on husks
Fearsomely his pig-tail whusks!
Trummlin' to be turn lith and limb,
The Leddy Mawga looks at him;
The Gracefu' gazin' on the Grim,

Wi' dewy een in smiles that swim,
On misty nights like starnies dim,
And sings a sang that's like a hymn,
Frae ane o' heaven's ain seraphim!
Then a' at aince, the Big Boar grows
Until a man wi' bauld brent brows,
A Shepherd singing sweet verse-vows,
Wha in his plaid the Leddy rows!
People! sure 'tis strange to see
The 'Twa seated on that settee—
Where the Cross-Bearer used to be,
Conspicuous far owre land and sea,
The steadfast pole-star o' the free!
Set him up to rug him doon!
What think ye o't, my bonny moon!
Shinin' abune the heech Auld Tounne,
To see a lord in mortal swoon,
Aneath a limmer and a loon?
Set him up to rug him doon!
But be it late or be it soon,
The timmer turns to siller spoon,
The leather brogue to velvet shoon.
Sure sign the times are out o' tune,
When an August dry as June,
Foretold by him who reads the lune,
In seasons a', bricht, black or broon,
That Gaelic seer, baith blythe and boon,
Though deaf as ony auld deer-houn,)
At Forty-Five, in gran' Saloon,
Shall see a Shepherd wear a croon.—
'Thus endeth the prophetic crune!

TICKLER.

Copies must be sent to Coleridge, Irving, Frere, Cunninghame, Faber, Stone, and all the other great interpreters of prophecy—that we may sleep in peace.—Oh! North grows pale,

“Uneasy sit the brows that wear a crown.”

NORTH.

“Lights—lights—lights!”

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

“You have displaced the mirth, broke the good meeting with most admired disorder!”

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

'Tis a Saloon of singularly simple elegance—nay, grandeur. Except in some of Piranesi's dreamy designs, I remember to have seen nothing, in the whole range of architecture, within the same bounds, so magnificent. Said I the same bounds? Yet, I feel how difficult—nay, impossible it would be—to pronounce its dimensions:—For so exquisite are the proportions, that it seems to grow upon the eye, the longer you gaze on walls and roof, still expanding around and above, till this table, though of no insignificant size (witness the perfect freedom afforded to the elbows of this multitudinous assemblage) finally seems in the centre, even like a gorgeous flower-plot in the green lawn of some fairy garden. Of whose genius is it the creation?

MR BLACKWOOD.

The gentleman at your left hand, sir. Allow me to introduce you to one another. Mr Hamilton—Mr De Quincy. [They bow and shake hands.]

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

The names of Hamilton, Burn, and Playfair, have long been familiar to fame. No wonder Edinburgh is such a city. There is something sublime, Mr North, to my imagination, in its midsummer solitude. Still almost as a city of the dead, yet serene as a city of the living. The great stream of human existence, one feels is not dried up, but only diverted into other channels. One hears a thousand rills, rivulets, and rivers, cheerfully flowing along rural valleys, and the heart is touched to think how, far remote though they be, they all owe their being to this matchless metropolis. In shade or sunshine alike, it seemeth to me, that the whole week is a Sabbath. Gentlemen, I envy the stranger within your gates. The dullest wight—as Coleridge says of commonplace people reading Shakspeare, or in dreams—must become a poet beneath your Castle Rock—sublimier, sir—believe me—than the Acropolis: Though pardon me for hinting, that I am scarcely sensible of the propriety of the term—when self-applied to the ingenious and learned inhabitants—Modern Athenians.

SHEPHERD.

Nor me either—my apple's dune—and it's hanged nonsense. Whare's Pericles? No the Provost—perfek gentleman though in a' things he be—and I houp sune to return fra Lonnun a baronet. Whare's Eskluss, You-rippidays, and Suffoclaes? No surely Sir Walter himsell, wi' his Doom o' Devorgoil, greatest o' a' Scotsmen though he be, that ever leev'd, or ever wull leeve—nor yet Wullison Glass, though he sings Prince Charlie, and some folk sillily swears he wrote it—but that's a' ma ec—nor yet—nane o' your lauchin', you cunnin' chiel wi' the mild een—no, nor you either, Mr Triangular Delta, though for truth and tenderness o' natural feelin', and purity and brichtness o' diction, when describin' the beauties o' natur either on sea or shore, but mair particularly the sweet sadness o' spring, when first she walks outower the braes wi' a garland o' primroses round her sunny hair, and is playing like a wean among the lambs, I ken na among our poets the match o' my freen Mr Moir o' Musselburgh, surgeon though he be,—and fearsome to think o'! in the way o' his profession, during his college days doobtless a dissector o' dead bodies!

NORTH.

Yes, James. But not of him—"gentle lover of nature,"—could it be said, as of some that shall now be nameless, in the language of Wordsworth,—

"We murder to dissect!"

SHEPHERD.

Na, faith,—he wou'd na, gin he cou'd help it, brush the gold or silver dust aff the wings o' a butterflee,—accep, maybe, gin it were an unco rare ane,—an unique in the red and broon mottledness o' its striped and starry beauty, sic as that Prince o' the Air, the Emperor o' Morocco. And then, ablins, Delta might bring his heart to shy his beaver at it, for the sake o' sceence, Jamie Wulson, and the College Museum. An' there's just sic another, the very like's o' him in genius and humanity, the Modern Pythagorean, owre by yonner—dinna blush, sirs—take a lesson frae me, and no be sae blate—wha wou'dna grudge gettin' out o' his warm bed at the mirkest hour o' a snaw-drivin' midnight—and thinkin' nae mair o' the fees than the flakes—to dive doon into the cellar, or munt up to the garret o' some lane wi' a laigh vulgar name, to prolong, if possible, the wee bit peepin' life o' a span-lang bairn, or that o' some auld bed-ridden granny wi' a crinklin' cough, in the last stage o' natur's consumption. And mind ma words, sirs;—the doctors that's no deaf to the cry o' the puir, when wrastlin' wi' death in an auld clay-biggin, will be among the verra first to be ca'd in till the rich man's best bedrooms, in houses in fashionable squares, for does na ae God regn over all, and whare's the difference in the heart's pulsations atween that o' any twa meeserable mortal creatures?—But the wine's stannin' wi' me—there—that's garrin't spin!—(The Shepherd with great vehemence sends one of the cut-crystals off a-spinning, and there is a smash, as of icebergs clashing in the North Sea.)—Mercy me! I'm dumb-foundr'd,—what a stramash!

MR BLACKWOOD.

Never mind, my dearest James, that sentiment was worth a shiver.

(Enter PICARDY, in consternation with his Tail, and the fragments are removed, table swept, and decaners replaced, as if by magic.)

SHEPHERD.

I'm blin'.—But what's this? Was na there a split bombshell the noo blawn to flinders on the table? I surely hae na been sleepin' already; sae it caunna hae been a dream.

NORTH.

You really ought, James, at your time of life, to keep a tighter rein on your imagination.

SHEPHERD.

What? would you daur to tell me to my face, that there was nae broken bottles?

NORTH.

Not so much as the taperest wine-glass wire-woven into almost invisible attenuity. That comes of being a poet! You are all subject to strange delusions.

SHEPHERD.

Weel, weel, sir. Yet I thocht I baith saw and heard the battle o' the bottles, as distinctly as ever I saw and heard a flicht o' fairies alichtin' on a green knowe, aff their silver-ringing-reened horses, and a' dauncin', haun an' haun, in a ring, roun' their statelier queen.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

Mr Jeems Hogg—for that's your name, I understan'—there's no sic a place in a' Scotland for fairies, as the Mearns Muir.

SHEPHERD.

The Mearns Muir? Whare's that, sir? and wha, may I speer, may ye be yoursell?

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

You may ask that at Mr North. The Mearns Muir, gentlemen, lies half-way atween Glasgow and the Kingswells—and many's the time, Mr North, there, and me has louped owre its hags, and soomed owre its lochs. I ance saved his life—I glory in tell'n't—when some cursed kelpie had bund his legs wi' the cords o' the water-lilies, and naething was to be seen o' him, but something yellow aneath the water, and a heap o' bells frae his gurglin' mooth, as his head was ance—twice—thrice—coming up to the surface. Faith I rugged the rapas asunder like wunnlestraes, and brocht him to the side, by his lang yellow hair in my teeth, just as you may hae seen a Newfoundlander wi' a wild-awan. Had he been droon'd, there wou'd na hae been a dry ee in a' the parish.

SHEPHERD.

His lang yellow hair!! Lookin' at the bald pow o' him, beggin' your pardon, Mr Robert Howie, that does seem an unco lee-like story.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

These are hardly the manners, Mr Swine, that we're accustomed to about the Mearns Kirk. But his hair was yellow,—and hoo lang it was, ye may guess, when I tell you, that Meg Whitlaw used to say it reminded her o' the Northern Streamers.

SHEPHERD.

And wha was Meg Whitlaw?

NORTH.

Hush, James, hush! And beware how you quarrel with my old friend, Bob Howie.

SHEPHERD.

Here's to you, sir; ma faith, you're a buirdly chiel yet—but gin I hae ony skeel in feeshionomy, you wou'd rather offer an open haun than a close neif to the Etrick Shepherd.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

I never feared to offer either to the face-o'-clay. But I've clean gien owre the fechtin', syne I settled the hash o' Black Carey, the King o' the Gipsies.

SHEPHERD.

An' are ye the hero that did that gude job to the kintra? Here's to you again, sir—for Black King Carey was the terror, for years, o' a' the Borders, and gaed travellin' Scotland thorough, wi' his wives and cuddies, fastenin' quarrels on a' the strong men he met, even when on the way to the kirk on the Sabbath,—an unhappy man o' blows and blood; and you ken yoursell there was mair nor a sugh o' murder.

NORTH.

In six rounds, James, on the high-road, no need of seconds or bottle-holders, or umpires, or referees, Bob smote him on the midriff, before all the Fair; and all his life after, King Carey was but a walking shadow.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

Mr North, you could always beat me at the loupin', and generally at the rinnin'—the fechtin' we never tried—

NORTH.

There, my dear Bob, I played second fiddle.

MR ROBERT HOWIE (laughing.)

Aye, sir, that you did—and in mony a gey kittle concert. Do ye mind the four Paisley Butchers?

MR BLACKWOOD.

Mr Howie, perhaps ye will favour the company with a song.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

I will do my best—if Mr North wishes it.

NORTH.

Do, Bob. Give us Sandy Rodgers's masterpiece—to the air of "Good morrow to your nightcap."

MR ROBERT HOWIE (sings.)

"Behave yoursell before folk,
Behave yoursell before folk,
And dinna be sae rude to me,
As kiss me sae before folk.

"It wadna gie me meikle pain,
Gin we were seen and heard by nane,
To tak' a kiss, or grant you ane;
But, gudesake! no before folk.
Behave yoursell before folk,
Behave yoursell before folk;
Whate'er you do, when out o' view,
Be cautious aye before folk.

"Consider, lad, how folk will crack,
And what a great affair they'll mak'
O' naething but a simple smack,
That's gien or taen before folk.
Behave yoursell before folk,
Behave yoursell before folk;
Nor gie the tongue o' auld or young
Occasion to come o'er folk.

"It's no through hatred o' a kiss,
That I sae plainly tell you this,
But, loosh! I tak' it sair amiss
To be so teaz'd before folk.
Behave yoursell before folk,
Behave yoursell before folk;
When we're our lane ye may tak ane,
But fient a ane before folk.

" I'm sure wi' you I've been as free
 As ony modest lass should be ;
 But yet, it doesna do to see
 Sic freedom used before folk.
 Behave yoursell before folk,
 Behave yoursell before folk ;
 I'll ne'er submit again to it—
 So mind you that—before folk.

" Ye tell me that my face is fair ;
 It may be sae—I dinna care—
 But ne'er again gar't blush sae sair
 As ye hae done before folk.
 Behave yoursell before folk,
 Behave yoursell before folk ;
 No, heat my cheeks wi' your mad freaks,
 But aye be douce before folk.

" Ye tell me that my lips are sweet,
 Sic tales, I doubt, are a' deceit ;
 At ony rate, it's hardly meet
 To pric their sweets before folk.
 Behave yoursell before folk,
 Behave yoursell before folk ;
 Gin that's the case, there's time and place,
 But surely no before folk.

" But, gin ye really do insist
 That I should suffer to be kiss'd,
 Gae, get a license frae the priest,
 And mak' me yours before folk.
 Behave yoursell before folk,
 Behave yoursell before folk ;
 And when we're ane, baith flesh and bane,
 Ye may tak' ten—before folk."

SHEPHERD.

Faith, that's just a capital sang—and Mr Howie, for sic a burly carle, has an extraordinar sweet vice. Wha's he that Sandy Rodgers ?

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

Just a workin' man, sir—a Glasgow mechanic, and nae mair. Judgin' fra my ain experience—a gey wide ane amang a' sorts o' lassies—it's no without a spice o' netur.

NORTH.

It is admirable—equal to any thing of the kind in Burns. Yet it and others—some pieces, too, of no little merit, of a serious character—were written, Sandy has told us, not during hours of leisure, but amidst the bustle and turmoil, the din of the clanking steam-engine, and the deafening rattle of machinery, while the operation of committing them to paper was generally performed amidst the squalling and clamour of children around the hearth, now in the pet of childish quarrel, and now surrounded with mirth, and fun, and frolic. And Sandy is a sober and industrious man. So, too, is my ingenious friend Dugald Moore of Glasgow, whose poems—both volumes—are full of uncommon power—and frequently exhibit touches of true genius.

SHEPHERD.

And, therefore, nae members, either o' them, o' ony Temperance Society.

MR MULLION.

Temperance Society ! There is the topmost pitch of human folly ! A few folk with squeamish stomachs, to whom there would be a headach in a thimble-full—some sumphs who, in their stupidity, are all body and no spirit—misers who would grudge a doit to save their mother's life, or for a calker of Glenlivet—hypocrites who, in a public, would “curse the cup, nor pass it to the rest,” yet put the bottles to their heads in their own bedrooms, till they miss the couch and tumble on the carpet—and drunkards dreaming that they are reformed because palsy-stricken, bankrupt, and shamefully dismissed from a hundred services—to which add some score of snivelers a-snoke after singularity, and a sensible man or two mad upon this particular point, and you have the constituents of the club which common-sense hunts with derision from among all honest Christians, and packs off, with a flea in their ear, to swig saloop among the Cockneys.

OMNES.

Bravo, Mordecai!—Well said, Mullion! Bravo—bravo—bravo!

NORTH.

It seems now as if nothing could be done in this world but by—societies: societies for propagating Christian knowledge among the Heathen, and societies for putting down the heathenish habit of gin-drinking among Christians. I know a gentleman, who, having got an indigestion at an eating-house, is now setting on foot “a Society for the Suppression of Kidneys.”

SHEPHERD.

Haw—haw—haw!

NORTH.

I assure you, James, it is no laughing matter, when the treasurer comes for his subscription.

SHEPHERD.

Which ‘ll a’ gang—every plack o’t—like maist ither religious subscriptions—for eatin’ and drinkin’ to the Boards. The richteous overmuch are awfu’ guzzlers. For ma part, I think the maist effectual gate o’ propagating Christianity is, in a lawfu’ way, to propagate Christians.

TICKLER.

So many missionaries think, James; and the plan, I believe, has been very successful in the South-Sea Islands.

CHAPLAIN KNOX.

Of late years, sir, let me tell you, the abuses that had crept into that system have been in a great measure put an end to. There has been a reformation—and all our missionaries now take out wives. It now works well.

SHEPHERD.

Isa warrant it. Hae the birkies got manses and steepens? Ou ay—nae doot—their bits o’ bouries and their tythe o’ yams.

CHAPLAIN KNOX.

The labourer is worthy of his hire. Our missionaries are not monks. Protestantism obeys, sanctions, and strengthens the laws of nature—and the missionaries she sends to the uttermost parts of the earth

“Do vindicate the ways of God to man,”

by cultivating and encouraging, both by precept and example, the MATRIMONIAL AFFECTIONS, inclusive, as you know, James, of all that is “wisest, virtuous, discreetest, best,” in poor fallen, yet not utterly forsaken, and yet to be restored, human nature. And thus, even in some of those very South-Sea Islands, where Lust was wont to celebrate his foulest orgies, hath he been “driven among the bestial herds to dwell;” and nuptial love, christianized into chastity, there “waves his golden wings,” over silvan huts, where from the simple Islanders, savage no more, is heard

“The voice of psalms, the evening-song of praise.”

SHEPHERD.

Mr John Knox, you’re a fine fallow, a credit to your kin and your kintra. There—consider that we’ve sheuck hauns. Yon’s really a maist magnificent moniment on the wooded hill aside St Mungo’s Cathedral, that Glasgow has erected to your great progenitor. “It shines weel where it stauns.” Mr South, your Episcopawlian brither himsel’, admires Scotland’s root-and-branch Ecclesiastical Reformer.—Dinna ye, sir?

CHAPLAIN SAMUEL SOUTH.

I do, Shepherd. Reformation, in Church and in State, is always characterised by the character of the times, the people, and the prime agents whom Providence sends to consummate the work. A John Knox was needed—and a John Knox was sent—from heaven, James, as all good and great men are, who perform God's behests on earth.

SHEPHERD.

An' that's your creed? There—consider that we hae sheuck hauns.—What's the meanin' o' this seelence? The weig't o' the wee'st bool, trun-tled owre't by a wean, 'll break the first invisible veil o' ice let drap on't frae the finger o' frost on the blue breest o' a bit lochie, but, ere lang, the surface, solid as a stane-floor, wull, without ever gein a crack, support twa parishes at the curlin'. Let's hae a thaw.

TICKLER.

Nothing comes so near my imagination of the day of judgment, as a "sudden syncope and solemn pause" at an after-dinner table—when the company look as if they knew not whether they had lost or won—when the glib cannot even stammer—the stammerers become tongue-tied—and the tongue-tied stare as if they had been born dumb. The silence finally gets so intense, that it is absolutely louder than thunder.

SHEPHERD.

That's a maist insane solecism, Mr Tickler. That a negative quantity should hae the power o' the square rute o' an infinite series o' incalculable nummers!

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

I admire the rare intrepidity of the man, of whom, on such an awful occasion, the liberated and grateful company would say, with Coleridge, could they speak, "He is the first that dared to burst into that silent sea."

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

The idea that such silence is louder than thunder—so far from being, my beloved Shepherd, an insane solecism—(an expression, by the way, dark with the unintelligibility of true genius)—seems to me, Mr Tickler, rather to fall short than to transcend the feeling of such a moment, in itself a century. The thunder which such silence resembles is too loud for the ear of man to hear it except in the faintest degree—and finally becomes, I humbly think, more like the breathless hush that precedes the earthquake—when man and beast seem all insensate as mute statues, and the soul scarce conscious of its existence is felt as Death-in-Life.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

I believe, Doctor, that the use of opium is frequent among the working classes in manufacturing towns?

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

It is, sir.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Do you approve of it?

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

I should wish to speak with diffidence—with deference—in the presence of a man of distinguished genius, who is himself a living and an illustrious proof that opium, even when taken in quantities that, before the publication of the "Confessions," would have seemed, to physicians, in the country at least, incredible—of the effects of the distillation from the poppy. Yet, that these effects are always pernicious, and often fatal, when the use of opium has been carried to any excess, is—I speak humbly—in my opinion, the general rule, not weakened, perhaps, by one splendid exception. There are in the human constitution such extraordinary idiosyncrasies, that no physician will be so rash as to assert that some there may not be—and one such, sir, allow me to say, must be yours—with which opium takes kindly, and acts so as to induce over the mind, not weakness and obfuscation, but strength and brightness of all the intellectual powers. I should assuredly think so—reasoning either a priori—if, indeed, such reasoning can be applied pure in medical science—or from induction.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Allow me to say, sir, that the opinion you now express is entirely that which I should have expected from the author of the "Anatomy," one of the most ingenious and philosophical Treatises which have, in our days, been contributed to medical science.

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

A mere trifle—in my estimation—I assure you, sir,—nothing but a humble thesis.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Will you be so good, sir, as to inform me, from your own experience, whether you think opium or spirituous liquors, taken for the same purpose,—we shall suppose at present, intoxication,—be the more hurtful? I put the question, sir, in connexion with the subject introduced a few minutes ago by Mr North—and so very picturesquely painted by Mr Mullion—on Temperance Societies.

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

Let me confine myself, sir, first to the moral question. Spirituous liquors irritate the blood and the brain, and excite to wrath—rage—fury—and the most mortal quarrels. Thence many—most of the violent crimes that bring miserable men to the gallows. But, sir, no instance has come within my knowledge of an opium-eater—at least in Great Britain or Ireland—having been hanged.

SHEPHERD.

A capital argument—and quite unanswerable.

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

Again, opium, whether in pill or drop, is, I believe, in this country, almost always taken in secret, or in parties of two or three—at least I never knew or heard of any member of an Opium-Club. Drunkards congregate together—and thence by sympathy—intenser corruption. Thus disease and delinquency are brewed together—and what have you but a poisonous scum?

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Sir, you speak well and wisely—and therefore I ask, would not, in your opinion, opium be a safer substitute to the poor, for spirituous liquors?

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

From the premises I have laid down, I leave a gentleman of your logical powers, for yourself to draw the conclusion. But I can have no hesitation in saying, that by the use of opium, such as it is, to my knowledge, and I confine myself to that, in this country, less evil—far less—nay, comparatively little—is done to the morals of those among the lower classes who are addicted to that drug, than among the lower classes by spirituous liquors to drunkards. This is to be kept in mind, that the number of those who take opium to excess is comparatively small indeed—nay, among the poor, I never knew one such case—whereas drunkenness fatally is a national vice,—with us almost at once an Epidemical disease—a contagion—and an infection.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

But, my dear sir, may it not be, that the moderate use of opium among the working classes in manufacturing towns—and you seem to believe that there it is rarely immoderate—is, in a moral view, preferable to the use of spirituous liquors, which you rightly say is there so prevalently immoderate as to deserve the names you have now so eloquently inflicted upon it, and the fearful character you have drawn of its effects in your admirable little book?

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

This I will say, sir, that any means of making the wretched forget or endure their miseries, used in the shape of any other drug, must be better, and that none can be so bad as—spirituous liquors used to such an excess as to make men and women habitual drunkards. And this I say freely, without at all compromising my opinion, that, among the poor, the use of opium is an almost unmixed evil.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Pardon me, sir,—but in many cases—when taken medicinally—it may not be an evil at all; for mark my word—medicinally;—and who can say, when eighteen hours' toil out of the four-and-twenty have bowed down both soul and body to the dust, a few drops of laudanum may not be, in the best term, a blessing? It may not be what physicians—what even you, sir, in your enlightened humanity—would prescribe; but still, in the destitution of other, and perhaps better, medicine,—in the destitution of sustaining and restoring food, it may act as a charm—and not as a baneful charm—on those whose heart-strings are as weary as their backs, loins, and reins, and who are thus lulled into endurance or oblivion.

SHEPHERD.

You twa hae exhoused the subject. I never heard ony question mair ably argued on baith sides,—wi' mair caution, and, at the same time, mair sagacity; and the consequence is, that, while you're baith in the richt, and hae acquitted yourselves till admiration, you hae baith left it preceesely whare it was afore either o' you opened his mouth,—and, therefore, Mr De Qunshy, as there are about twenty bottles a' staunin afore you, and some o' them may be wanted, will ye set them a-march like a squadron o' the East Lothian Yeomanry Cavalry, passing in single files on Portobello sands, under the inspection o' Colonel Ross and the Staff o' the Fourth Dragoons?

MR BULLER.

I never saw better mounted troops in my life. Blood and bone absolutely fit for Leicestershire.

MR SEWARD.

'Pon honour, they wheeled into line like old uns. The Duke of Rutland's corps was reckoned, I believe, among the cracks, and I was not a little proud of my own troop, I assure you, gentlemen; yet in that last charge, I had my eye chiefly on the Edinburgh, and the Dalmahoy, I think ye call it—town and country—and, split my timbers, if I ever saw prettier lightning, or ever heard prettier thunder, since I knew a herd of cows from a squadron of cavalry. They were as compact as an electric cloud in a storm, and wheeled as simultaneously as a cloud in a change of wind; yet my excellent friend, Cornet Horne, tells me that they had been but a week on duty. Why, gentlemen, judging from what I saw on Saturday, confound me if you are not a nation of Centaurs.

MR BULLER.

The Edinburgh's mess-parties were quite bang-up to the mark. Tuesday's mess, in particular, was a gem. Lord Elcho made the best chairman I ever heard in my life; and for my own single self, why I do not scruple, among friends, to acknowledge that I was carried so rapidly, yet so imperceptibly, down the stream of wit, fun, and frolic, flowing from one end of the table to the other, that long ere midnight, I found myself on the shore of the sea of oblivion.

SHEPHERD.

Ma faith, Mr Buller, you and Mr Shooard speak weel for Englishmen.

MR BULLER.

You flatter us, my good fellow, but we both labour under the disadvantage of having as yet but imperfectly acquired the Scotch accent. Had we but a slight smack of yours, my dear Shepherd, with a tinge of your truly Doric dialect, we might, on our return to tongue-tied England, exhibit, if not a choice, a passable, specimen of the unrivalled eloquence of Scotchmen.

SHEPHERD.

That's cuttin'. You're twa qucer deevils; and though baith married noo, like mysell, just as blythe's whan we took a shot together at Dr Pawr's wig when travellin' through the Highlans that memorable owtumn wi' the TERT

MR SEWARD.

Aye, my dear bard, that wig is now out of frizzle—that skull is now emptied of all its Latin and all its Greek. The thousandth and one funeral inscription written by the Doctor was for the greatest scholar, in his eyes, he ever immortalized—himself—and all his erudition is now buried in the dust.

SHEPHERD.

What? Pat he never oot ony byeuks?

MR SEWARD.

Yes, James, his Remains are in seven large volumes.

SHEPHERD.

And a' buried i' the dust! That's ruefu'! But what else cou'd happen to a scholar great only in the deed tongues? Ony English I ever read o' his is sae like Latin, that I cou'd mak little way through't without Ainsworth's Dictionary. Yet I dinna ken hoo, the style seemed very gran', and to sown in my lugs—for it seldom got farrer—like the famous Dr Johnston's that wrot the Rammler.

MR BULLER.

Dr Parr, sir, wrote English, and good English too; but he liked a long stride, and therefore took to the stilts. But though strong in original composition—witness his Spital Sermon, and that on Education—his chief strength lay in his learning—he was a great scholar.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

A great Latin scholar, perhaps, Mr Buller—but, pardon me, sir, not a great Greek one. His knowledge of the Latin language was indeed great—but what proof have we of his Grecian lore? He who could speak sneeringly of Porson's "Metrical Conundrums" could not have been a finished Greek scholar—nor—

SHEPHERD.

Oh, ma deer freen', Mr De Qunshy—dinna be angry wi' me, sir—but I beseech ye no to spile a Noctes Ambrosianæ, on sic an occasion as this, wi' ony disputations about an auld pedant like Dr Pawr. I ca' on Mr Shooard for a sang; for I've gotten a sair throat mysell, and I'm no gaun to sing the night. Mr Shooard, man, sing a sang, sir—and put an end to the dispute—for I see by Mr Buller's een that he's castin' about in his mind for a rejinder, and o' Porson's Metrical Conundrums there'll be nae end, if the twa get intul gripps.

MR SEWARD.

I was so much delighted with a stave sung by Sergeant Scott t'other night, at the mess of the Edinborough, that I begged a copy from that incomparable yeoman, and shall attempt it, though a Southron, to please the Shepherd.—(Sings.)

"Let others talk of Elcho,
Of brave Lieutenant Hay,
Of Donald Horne, our Cornet,
Or our Staff-Sergeant gay:
Much as I love these heroes,
Their fame a speck appears
To the row, row, row, row, row,
Of Aitcheson's Car'bineers,

"Our troop contains some spoonies,
That shame their bonny nags,
And bump upon their saddles
Like to a miller's bags;
But these, our pride and glory,
Sit firm upon their rears,
'Mid the row, row, row, row, row,
Of Aitcheson's Car'bineers.

"Sir John himself doth wonder
When they recover ranks,
They come like claps of thunder,
Descending on our flanks;
In fact, they're more like Centaurs
Than common cavaliers—
O the row, row, row, row, row,
Of Aitcheson's Car'bineers!

"Some people in the charging
Are shy about the squeeze;
But these dress by their Sergeant,
And never mind their knees.
And from the carriage-windows
Look out the pretty dears,
For the row, row, row, row, row,
Of Aitcheson's Car'bineers.

"They show their taste, I reckon—
For slapping blades they be—
And I'll lay gold upon it,
Take captive many a she.
Edina's lovely goddesses
May well desert their spheres,
To pull caps for the bear skins
Of Aitcheson's Car'bineers.

"Then sure to Sergeant Aitcheson
A bumper now is due;
He drill'd our noble skirmishers,
He brought their worth to view.
May we all ride together
For many happy years,
To the row, row, row, row, row,
Of Aitcheson's Car'bineers!"

SHEPHERD (after great applause.)

Gude! What's your hicht, Mr Shooard?

MR SEWARD.

Six feet two.

SHEPHERD.

You're a strapper! Oh, man! but you're wonnerfully filled up sin' we were in the Highlands. Then you looked like the pole o' the Tent—now like the stem o' an aik tree. I was then really feared for consumption. At denner your appetite used to be brocht to a staun-still by a single groose and a cut o' sawmont—but the day, it wasna twa o' baith that wud hae slackened its pace; and I was as weel pleased as muckle astonished at the poor and vareety o' your stammack.

MR SEWARD.

Pretty well for a Southron.

SHEPHERD.

For a Southron, said ye, Mr Shooard? Oh, man, I was but jokin' yon time! Englishers are the wale o' the yirth. I never shall hae dune lamentin' that I was na yedicated at Oxford.

MR SEWARD.

A gentleman commoner of Christ-Church. You would have been a darling with Cyril Jackson, and taken a first-class degree, to a dead certainty, in Lit. Hum.

SHEPHERD.

Yet it micht hae deeden'd the sowle o' poetry within me—and I wud na hae lost the Queen's Wake for a mitre.

MR BULLER.

Why, my dear fellow, had you gone into our church, ere now you had been Archbishop of Canterbury. Howley is not your senior.

MR SEWARD.

And haply been—a rat.

MR BULLER.

Howley, Seward, was no rat.

MR SEWARD.

Yet he squeaked like one.

SHEPHERD.

It would hae made my father and my mother baith unco unhappy to hae seen me an English Yepisopawlian Archbishop. They wou'd hae thoct o' Sharpe and Magus Muir. The change frae Presbyterian intil Yepisopawlian would hae led me, perhaps, like the lave o' the bishops, or gae feck o' them, to become a Papish: and, in that case, I verily believe that either the faither that begat me, or the mither that bare me, would hae whatted a kail-gully on my heart.

MR SEWARD.

Pray, Mr Hogg, did you ever serve king and country in a military capacity?

SHEPHERD.

I was trumpeter tull the Selkirk Troop.

MR SEWARD.

And who, my bold bugle, taught you the points of war?

SHEPHERD.

You see, sir, when I was a callant, it happened that the banes o' some great, big, muckle, enormous beast, that maist likely had perished in the Flood, were dug up in a moss that the Dyeuck's folk were draining intil awrable—a Yelk—and my faither happened to get ane o' the horns. It was as soon's a saplin'—for moss, ye ken, 's an antiseptic. For years, simmer and wunter, I used to gang routin' about the braes by sunset, wi' my lang horn, and whan I grew up, havin' rather an ingenious mechanical turn, I contrived keys till 't; see that, afore lang, I astonished the knowte wi' "God save the King," and "Rule Britannia;" and by the time I left auld Mr Laidlaw's, I could accompany the lassies on't at ony air amaisht whatsomever, and a bonny accompaniment it was, sir, accepp, aiblin, noo and than, rather a hue owre loud. Whan the Selkirk corp was raised, a' een turned to me for the trumpeter, and I obey'd the ca' o' the kintra. After the great elk-horn, I made nae banes o' the sma' bugle, and burst about a dizen o' them wi' strecht-forrit blastin'—but the captain got ane cast on purpose for me o' the finest gold, and it's to the fore yet, to survive as an heir-loom in the family, without a flaw.

MR BULLER.

The country is indebted to my friend Lansdowne for the disbanding of the most truly constitutional and national force that ever guarded the internal peace of a great kingdom.

SHEPHERD.

Ay, and the cheapest too, sir. The verra horses in plough or harrow were indignant at that measure; and the meenister's cowte himsell, that used to carry the doctor as chaplain, though nane o' the skeigheest, had your friend the Markee offered to munt him, after his unpatriotic dissolution o' the Soor-Mulks, wud hae funk'd the Secretary for Home-Affairs outower the Carter.

MR BULLER.

By what other means can the martial spirit of a people be so invigorated, without, at the same time, being brutalized by any of that ferocity which almost always belongs perhaps to your regular troopers whose duty and delight is in foreign service?

SHEPHERD.

Then, sir, think what an effek it had upon the women folk? The wife lookin' on "our John," wi' his formidable fur cap, and braw regimentals on, and wi' swurd by his side, and naething wantin' but mustashies to mak him an even-doon reglar dragon, wou'd as sure hae taen their ain bill by the horns as hae dreamed o' hen-peckin' sic a fire-eater;—the lasses, whan they saw their sweethearts chargin' on the Hair-laugh Moss, as the leevin' whirlwund passed by, felt, ilka ane o' them, that the nicht afore, perhaps, her mou had been preed by a hero, wha, if the beacons bleezed, wou'd return to her arms, after havin' driven the French, wi' Bonaparte at their head, intil the sea. Love, sir, you ken, is aye "like a dizziness;" but in those days, it was a dizziness in which a' the world, and a' human life, spun roun' gloriously to the sound o' trumpets. Mony's the time I hae seen us Selkraig troopers, gallopin' to drill or inspection, frae a' pairts o' the Forest, ilka ane wi' a hizzie alint him, wi' her haun on his heart; while the hairy caps were aye turnin' roun', at every brae, for some kissing, that seemed to put fresh mettle intil the horses' heels, till we were a' at full speed, like a marriage pairty ridin' the double-brooz.

MR SEWARD.

Drill-husbandry.

SHEPHERD.

Come, Mr Buller, follow Mr Shooard's example, and gie us a sang.

MR BULLER.

I will chant my friend Lockhart's noble strain, "The Broadswords of old Scotland."

OMNES.

Hear—hear—hear!

MR BULLER (sings.)

"Now there's peace on the shore, now there's calm on the sea,
Fill a glass to the heroes whose swords kept us free,
Right descendants of Wallace, Montrose, and Dundee.
Oh! the broadswords of old Scotland!
And oh! the old Scottish broadswords!

"Old Sir Ralph Abercromby, the good and the brave!
Let him flee from our board, let him sleep with the slave,
Whose libation comes slow while we honour his grave.
Oh! the broadswords, &c.

"Though he died not like him amid victory's roar,
Though disaster and gloom wove his shroud on the shore,
Not the less we remember the spirit of Moore.
Oh! the broadswords, &c.

"Yea a place with the fallen the living shall claim,
We'll entwine in one wreath every glorious name,
The Gordon, the Ramsay, the Hope, and the Grahame.
All the broadswords, &c.

"Count the rocks of the Spey, count the groves of the Forth,
Count the stars in the clear cloudless heaven of the North,
Then go blazon their numbers, their names, and their worth.
All the broadswords, &c.

"The highest in splendour, the humblest in place,
Stand united in glory as kindred in race,
For the private is brother in blood to his Grace.
Oh! the broadswords, &c.

"Then sacred to each, and to all let it be,
Fill a glass to the heroes whose swords kept us free,
Right descendants of Wallace, Montrose, and Dundee.
Oh! the broadswords of old Scotland,
And oh! the old Scottish broadswords!"

OMNES.

Bravo—bravo—bravo!

SHEPHERD.

Lockhart's the best sang-writer at this preceese moment in Britain. His Spanish Ballants!

MR BULLER.

He ought to write poetry. He has all the nerve of Dryden.

SHEPHERD.

Ma faith—even his ain father-in-law micht staun in fear o' him, was he to set himsell to some great poem. But John's no ambitious in that line; and deil tak me gin I dinna think he lauchs in his sleeve at leeter are a'thegether, at the verra time that he's ane o' its brichtest ornaments.—But did ye twa Oxonians ever see a Dowg.

MR SEWARD.

Sir?

MR BULLER.

Sir?

SHEPHERD.

Did ye twa Oxonians, I say, ever see a Dowg? O'Bronte—O'Bronte—O'Bronte!

[O'BRONTE bursts open the door of the Sanctum, and, placing his paws on NORTH's shoulders, looks towards the Epergne.

There's a pictur! 'Twould be hard to say whilk fizzionomy's the mair sagawceous. It's a gude sign o' a dowg, sirs, when his face grows like his master's. It's a proof he's aye glowerin' up in his master's een, to discover what he's thinkin' on; and then, without the word or wave o' command, to be aff to execute the wull o' his silent thocht, whether it be to wear sheep or rug doon deer. Hector got sae like me, afore he dee'd, that I remember, when I was owre lazy to gang till the kirk, I used to send him to tak my place in the pew, and the minister never kent the difference. Indeed, he ance asked me neist day what I thocht o' the sermon; for he saw me wonnerfu' attentive amang a rather sleepy congregation. Hector and me gied ane anither sic a look, and I was feared Mr Paton wud hae observed it; but he was a simple, primitive, unsuspectin' auld man—a very Nathaniel without guile, and jaloused naething; though baith Hector and me was like to split, and the dowg, after lauchin' in his sleeve for mair nor a hundred yards, could staun't nae langer, but was obliged to loup awa owre a hedge into a potawtoe field, pretending to hae scented partridges.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

A Dowg indeed! How he wou'd rug doon the tinklers! Oh! Mr North—methinks I see our auld freen' Fro', (celebrated by you in "Christopher in his Sporting Jacket"—the best thing you ever wrote,) wha ance loupit doon, in a mistak, after a hawk, fra the tap o' the Mearns Castle, and sa far from breaking any of his bones, on recoverin' his feet, broke away after a poosie that his fa' had started fra her seat on the brae, and in sax minutes flung her owre his shoulder, like a moudiewart, without ever gie'in' her a turn! Only O'Bronte, as you ca' him, 's slae-black, and Fro was foam-white —but what difference does colour make, sir, atween either twa dogs or twa men, when baith are cast by natur' in the maist perfect moul' o' their specie, and are baith the world's wonder among worriers, and mair than a match for any tinkler or any tiger that ever infested the Mearns Muir or the deserts o' Africa?

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

The noblest animal, in the shape of a dog, I ever beheld, perhaps with the single exception of Sir Walter's Maida—and he, you know, Mr North, was a deer-hound, a gift from Glengarry—and a finer, a fleetier, or a fiercer, never swept, in the storm of chase, over the mountains of Badenoch or Lochaber.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

Is he dead?

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

He is, Mr Howie. And his stone image stands, with a Latin inscription, at the postern-gate of Abbotsford, which in life he guarded so well——

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

I'm sorry for't—for, by your account of him, the two would have made a gran' fecht.

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

Pardon me, Mr Howie—but they would—like you—and—pardon me, Mr North—our venerable Friend and Instructor—have fought on the same side. Never, till this moment, felt I the full force of that most Shakspearean line—Mr Howie—

“Dew-lapp'd like Thessalian bulls.”

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

No poet since Homer has ever made such noble use of that noble creature in poetry as Scott.

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

Never, sir.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Homer shewed that his judgment was equal to his genius—and in all minds of the highest order—as in your favourite Shakspeare's, Mr Ballantyne—these two faculties, in all their great achievements, march pari passu—or rather passibus equis—not else omnipotent and resistless; and, therefore, Homer, in his Odyssey—(and that it is not his Odyssey is a notion that could only have originated in the dunderhead of a German pedant)—it being, though myriad-minded, yet one Tale—he introduces but one dog, and that one dog, observe, sir, but on one occasion. But then, Mr Ballantyne, is there in the whole range of real or fictitious history (the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament always excepted) an incident so simply and sublimely pathetic? When the sea-soul-sick Wanderer had reached home at last, with face and form, though both still majestic, so bedimmed by winds and waves as to escape even faintest recognition by those human eyes and human hearts that yet loved their Ulysses well—when the old household nurse, who had tended him as the bright boy bounded out of the palace-gates of old—and even She on whose virgin bosom he had laid his head on the bridal night, knew not that he who stood there in beggar's weeds was in truth the long-lost and long-longed-for deliverer—then the poor, old, worn-out, faithful, and unforgetting dumb creature remembered its glorious master, and in a passion of joy crawled towards him, and died at his feet!

MR LAWRENCE MACDONALD.

Most beautiful! That subject is still reserved for statuary—and if the humble individual who now expresses his admiration of your description, sir, should succeed in “stamping on stone that triumph of the soul”—and who would deny to the dog that belonged to Ulysses, and was sung by Homer, a soul?—then yours, Mr De Quincey, be the praise; for the merit, whatever it may be, assuredly will not be mine, so strong do I feel the inspiration of your breathing and burning words.

SHEPHERD.

Weel said—my dear Lourie—faith you're the only statutory I ever ken't that can baith work in clay and in words. Dinna hurry ye—and you're, at times, nae less nor yeloquent in your discoorse;—and as for poetry, your verses, Mr Lowrence, though they may aiblins be sometimes a wee hue monotonous, frae your bein' sae fond o' the Spenserian stanza, hae aye a fine feelin' o' beauty about them—that's your ain darlin' word.—Faith, Mr Macdonald, ye haunle the pen anaist as weel's the mouldin'-stick,—though, fortunately, no quite sae weel either, for wi' the ae muse you're only toytin', and flirtin', and playin', as it were, for an hour's amusement; whereas, wi' the ither, you're payin' your addresses till her, sir, wi' the maist serious and honourable intentions o' makin' her your wife—Na,—you're married till her already,—and a' thae bonny statutes, what are they but your bairns? Your stanzas will mak' you respected while leevin', but your statutes, my der sir, will keep you immortal when you're dead!

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Whereas, Sir Walter Scott—being, by a prolific power, almost miraculous, the unexhausted sire of a Family of Tales, each, in its own peculiar character, breathing of the common origin, to which all of them, by their strong kindred resemblance, may, even by the most unobservant or indiscriminative, easily be referred—was not only at liberty, but say rather constrained by the all-comprehensive humanities of his nature, from which the more interesting animals of the inferior creation are not only not excluded, but, on the contrary, by a thousand finest and strongest affinities and associations, necessarily and in rerum natura, or rather ex necessitate, as it were attracted, and when attracted, by a gentle violence for ever and a day retained;—such a writer, I say, Mr Ballantyne, had a perfect freedom, not only to elect one of those creatures concerning whom has arisen our present discourse, into an active agent, or, I ought rather to say, a hero, in every one, without exception, of his most imaginative romances,—but he shewed no less his judgment and his genius in bringing each individual canine champion frequently before the eyes of the reader, in each story to play many parts, and those parts in general conducted to a successful issue,—though not unfrequently the final catastrophe be such as to purge the soul both by pity and terror,—according to the ordinance and legislation of the Stagyrite, whose poetics even yet are by far the most perfect model of philosophical criticism existing in any literature,—provided always every achievement of the animal be, as in Sir Walter's Novels they always eminently are, not only conducive to the progress of the plot, but in itself true to the laws that govern irrational life, and (which is of equal necessity) increasing in interest, perhaps in wonder, by an arithmetical ratio,—each achievement not only sustaining, but elevating the emotion excited by the one immediately preceding, so that on the violent death of the dog, be he deer-hound or of a lower grade, we are satisfied with the naturalness of his whole procedure from first to last, and convinced, I had almost said in foro conscientia, that the catastrophe would in nowise have been brought about better by unassisted human agency operating hand in hand with Fate or Fortune, in the final disposal of great characters and events: and thus Sir Walter has created, Mr Ballantyne, I verily believe, some dozen dogs, while each of them perhaps plays, on an average, a dozen parts; yet judging by my own feelings, not a single dog, nor yet a single act of an individual dog, could be sooner destroyed in the Fable, or from the beginning entirely left out, without great loss thereunto, possibly without diminution, or even demolition of all the tragic passion thereof, without which a Tale of Doing or of Suffering must be little better than a mere caput mortuum, unillustrative of any great principles either in human character or in human life.

SHEPHERD.

Do ye understaun that, Mr Jeems?

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

If I do not, James—my non-understanding must be set down to my own score, and not to that of Mr De Quincey;—for I have seldom—indeed I may say never—heard the philosophy of criticism so elaborately and felicitously applied, not to the elucidation, (for who would dream of intensifying the solar lustre?) of the character of Sir Walter's many imaginary Maidas

SHEPHERD.

That's gude. That expression collects the creturs a' intil ae pack o' glorious houn's and jowlers; and we think we see them bearin' awa' owre the mountains to some great forest or chase, wi' tents pitched in a glen for the King and a' his nobles.

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE (smiling graciously.)

—but to the faculties appealed to by the pictures of our great national animal painter, and to the moods of mind, Mr Hogg, in which those faculties thereby appealed to must work, before the perusers of the novels and romances can arrive at a perfect knowledge of the poetry of such pictures, which embody, along with the primal truths of the natural history of man's four-footed field and household friend—

SHEPHERD.

The dowe—

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

—also all the most interesting and impressive traits of his character and pursuits, which, unnoted by mere naturalists, are chronicled in the traditional experiences of shepherds and huntsmen, and in the memory of our illustrious friend himself, before whose eyes no dog, of any originality, ever threw his shadow, without, at the same time, impressing on that mastermind a distinct and ineffaceable image of his individual being.

SHEPHERD.

Mr Jeems Bannatyne, you're a very clever man, and I like till hear ye speak—and aiblins better still to read your writin's, mair especially on the Drama. You're the only gude drawmatic censor noo, I mean the best, no only in Embro', but in a' Scotland.

NORTH.

You once said the same thing of me, James, to my face.

SHEPHERD.

But now I see baith your faces, and I gie the preference to Jeems Bannatyne.

NORTH.

Right. I agree with you, James, in thinking Mr Ballantyne an admirable dramatic critic. So much the larger and more feathery is the crow I have to pluck with him, about Miss Fanny Kemble.

OMNES.

Miss Fanny Kemble—Miss Fanny Kemble—Miss Fanny Kemble!

NORTH.

A bumper, gentlemen, to the health, and happiness, and fame, of the promising young niece of glorious old Sarah! (It is drunk with enthusiasm.)

MR BULLER.

The Paid Press in Town placed the blushing girl on a pedestal from which her own native modesty (and when was youthful female genius ever unadorned by that charm?) would have been fain, with faltering steps, and confusion of face, to have hurriedly descended. She felt that such forced elevation was as unfeeling as it was unjust—coarsely cruel.

SHEPHERD.

After an hour's sittin', a' men get yeloquent at a Noctes. Wha wad hae expectit "Bletherin' Buller"—as we used to ca' him in the Tent—

MR BULLER.

Blether and Buller! What is the meaning of that, thou Cherokee?—Paid partly, I presume, in pounds, shillings, and pence; partly in victuals; and partly in free tickets—

MR SEWARD.

To accept which, under any circumstances, is, I opine, beneath the dignity of a gentleman.

SHEPHERD.

What! a Free Ticket?

MR SEWARD.

Yes, sir, a free ticket—admission all your life to a place of public amusement, without putting your hand in your pocket, and paying your own way, like other gentlemen. Demme, if I would be on any manager's pauper-list!

Were I so poor as not to be able to pay for the gratification of my passion for theatricals, for the indulgence of my "strong propensity for the dwama," as our matchless Mathews says, I should think it more honourable to steal than to beg, to pick a rich squire's pocket at the outside of the door, rather than a poor manager's within, and to run the chance of escaping the imputation of being a prig, rather than incur the certainty of being known to be a pauper.

SHEPHERD.

You're just twa prood fules.

MR SEWARD.

Mr Hogg, there is a greater difference than merely of one syllable—between humility and humiliation. The receiver of such charitable donations, my dear Shepherd, as he struts into pit or boxes, can have no perception either of the το καλον, or the το σεβειν. His proper place is—at half price—the one shilling gallery.

SHEPHERD.

But he wudna see there, sir.

MR SEWARD.

Let him smoke his cigar for supper in his garret in Grab Street.

SHEPHERD.

But what wou'd become o' a newspaper without a theatrical critic?

MR SEWARD.

Ha! I have Socratically brought you to the point, Jem. Let them get critiques written by gentlemen. Nothing ungentlemanly in living by one's wits. All professional men do so—and why not critics? If a critique on Miss Fanny Kemble's Juliet be worth a guinea to the proprietor of a newspaper, out of his fob with it, into the fob of the gentleman that does the article. And if a ticket to the boxes be worth a crown to gentlemen in general, let the said critic melt his guinea, and disburden his fob of a crown at the receipt of custom, like gentlemen in general; or, if not, then, that there may be no deception, let him, like a Blue-gown, wear a badge on his breast, inscribed, "Free admittance," and then, instead of being elbowed on a full night, by pauper-paper-puppies aping the airs of play and pay—we shall know the pensioners; and to prevent ourselves from being incommoded, shew them, with all appropriate ceremony, to the door.

SHEPHERD.

You're just baith o' you twa prood fules.

NORTH.

My dear Mr Ballantyne, your Journal is a jewel. But has Miss Kemble, or has she not, in tragedy, genius? Her attitudes—her whole personal demeanour—are beautiful. They are uniformly appropriate to the character and to the situation—and in exquisite appropriateness lies—Beauty—the poetical word—in one sense—for it has many—for—adaptation. But the power of such adaptation cannot be without a fine and profound feeling of that to which it lends outward and visible form; and that feeling, since it regards the impersonations of the highest poetry, can exist only in a mind that has been inspired by the breath of imagination. Now, like affects like; and therefore the actress who sits, stands, looks, smiles, sighs, shrieks, swoons, and dies—like Juliet—is a girl of genius—and that girl, were there not another such in the world, is the daughter of that accomplished actor, perfect gentleman, and excellent man, my friend Charles Kemble.

OMNES.

Hurra—hurra—hurra!

NORTH.

But not only are Miss Kemble's attitudes—I use that term to express her entire action—her appearance, her apparition—beautiful; they are also classical,—that is to say, the spirit of Art breathes in and over the spirit of Nature,—for both are alike divine, since they have one common origin,—and thus she often stands before our eyes, with all the glowing warmth of a living woman, inspired by some strong passion of love or hate; and, at the same time, idealized into a speaking statue, in which the "divine rage" is tempered and subdued down to the equable and permanent level of legiti-mate emotion; yes, of legitimate emotion, for the perfect truth of nature, as human nature is seen in this life enjoying or suffering, even in its loftiest or loftiest forms, would be bad painting, bad statuary, bad poetry, bad oratory—bad acting; in all these Arts, called, therefore, Fine, we must have shewn us the concentrated essence of passion, rectified and refined—pure from baser matter—and mysteriously etherealized;—and she, who, in her nineteenth year, and, however instructed by the best domestic tuition, a novice on the stage, does that, Mr Ballantyne, if not throughout the whole continuous course of any one character—yet I believe Miss Kemble in some characters effects that achievement—is a girl of genius, and well entitled to stand—not, most assuredly, on that pedestal on which, as Mr Buller rightly affirmed, the paid press had endeavoured to place her side by side with THE SIDMONS, with their heads at the same altitude, and shining in the same lustrous line of Immortals—but on a humbler seat along with the Inspired, from which no living actress may displace her, but which she herself will leave ere long, rising surely, and not slowly, from one place of honour to another, till, in the consummation of her skill, and the maturity of her powers, she shall place herself at last—listen all ye men to me, a prophet—I will not dare to say how near, or how far below, THE SIDMONS; for SHE—be it known to all men—is unapproachable in her sphere—but, in the same constellation, consisting of not many stars, but those how bright! of which Sarah will for ever be the central light, round which all the rest will continue to revolve, (forgive my astronomy,) and from “her golden urn draw light.”

SHEPHERD.

Hoo can them do that that never saw her?

NORTH.

That, James, is their look-out, and not mine. None of your hypercriticism. Then her voice, dear Mr Ballantyne, her voice. Its intonations, in tragedy—and the tragic is the test of spoken music—are touching in the extreme—silver-sweet and naturally mournful;—the simple sentences that Shakspeare, in their hour of agony, breathes from the lips of the Daughters of his brain, the Joys and the Grievs, flowing from her heart as if they were all native there,—in music remarried as it were to immortal verse,—never on my ear fell so simply as from Fanny Kemble.

SHEPHERD.

I wush I had said that! You're ay stealing ma best thochts—ye auld sinner!

NORTH.

What the devil do the blockheads mean by telling us (vulgar hounds!) that her organ is not yet very strong—and that her figure is not yet fully developed? Would they have a delicate girl of nineteen to “bawl for a boat across the ferry,” or to exhibit the proportions of a matron, the happy mother of ten children, all of whom she nursed, both on feeling and principle, at her own ample bosom, as is well seen upon her, to the horror of her husband and the astonishment of all the rest of mankind?

SHEPHERD.

Haw! haw! haw!

NORTH.

Miss Kemble's voice does not want volume—but then the volume of a young lady's voice, I humbly submit to this society, ought not to be in folio. Miss Kemble's figure is elegantly and gracefully moulded, and he who is not satisfied with her face, after having studied her eyes and forehead, but begins bothering you with vulgar and unintelligible stuff about her nose—as whether it be a little cocked or not a little cocked, or by what epithet you would finally, and, in “malice aforethought,” characterise it—or whether her mouth be shaped on this, that, or t'other model—as if there were not millions of indescribable mouths in this populous world, shaped on no model whatever, and yet very kissable mouths too, and when they speak, flowing, like the land of Canaan, with milk and honey—why, such a wincumpoop or ninnyhammer can excite in you no other idea or feeling save one of each—combined into a strong desire—to ascertain the shape of his own nose, not by observation, but experiment, and to set the much-agitated question respecting the amount of his own mouth for ever at rest, by tearing it with your two thumbs—somewhat after the fashion of an American gouger, with merely a change of feature—from ear to ear, which, as it would be monstrous to elongate, you have a good mind to crop.

SHEPHERD.

You auld savage!

NORTH.

'Tis indeed at once ludicrous and loathsome to hear such critical homunculi delivering final judgment on a young lady's mouth. They deliver it with a pompous trepidation, as if they had been sworn on a play-bill to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, to the best of their belief, as it shall not be asked of them, and as they shall answer to Mr Manager Murray, on the last night of Miss Kemble's performance—so help them, printer's devil!

MULLION.

Stop, stop, sir. Remember the Chaldee. You're getting a little impious.

SHEPHERD.

Remember the Chaldee? It was me that wrote the Chaldee.

MULLION.

HEM!!!

NORTH.

Now, my dear Mr James Ballantyne—

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE.

James, I told you that you were wrong.

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

Nay, brother! "that is the most unkindest cut of all." You did not say so, Sandy, till you read Sir Walter's letter.

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE.

But I thought so, lad.

SHEPHERD.

Brithers aye differs about a' matters baith o' taste and judgment—baith o' theory and practice—the affairs baith o' this warld and the next. I ken that weel by my ain experience. A' my brithers are gude honest fallows, and we would do a' we could, in a reasonable way, for ane anither; but in maist maitters o' opinion, frae the doctrine o' savin' grace doon to the best traps for mowdiwards, we're a' at daggers-drawing; and it's impossible to drink a gill wi' the doucest o' them, without finding him as dour at an argument as a wuddy.

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.

It cannot but be disheartening to me, gentlemen—and what, in common parlance, is called a "damper"—to know that I have broached an opinion on the genius of Miss Fanny Kemble in THE JOURNAL—(necessity alone could compel me, at a Noctes Ambrosianæ, to name so very humble a periodical—yet, though humble, I hope honourable)—which I have since learned is at variance with that of Christopher North and Sir Walter Scott. But though to such authorities I bow my head, here and thus—(bowing urbanely to Mr North)—I cannot, will not—even to them—surrender my judgment.—(Hear, hear!)—You, sir, have been so kind as to express a favourable opinion generally of my taste and feeling in theatrical criticism—and though I dare not believe that I deserve your eulogium, yet, knowing the honesty of my intentions, I confess that I heard it with pride. What heart, sir, could be insensible to the exquisite beauty of your most poetical and philosophical delineation of the genius of a true Tragic Actress? Assuredly not mine. But does that genius belong to Miss Fanny Kemble? I have said—No. Remembering her in her best character, I cannot recognise the Original in that Picture. That may be my misfortune—not that of the amiable and ingenious girl, whom in comedy I ventured to call already more than good, and to predict that ere long she would not be less than great. I fear not that in that judgment I shall be found mistaken; I hope that in the other I may. And happy indeed, gentlemen, will I be, if the daughter of Charles Kemble and the niece of Sarah Siddons exhibit, what, perhaps, never yet has been exhibited on any stage, the union in one lady of the highest power, both in Tragedy and in Comedy; and that Miss Fanny Kemble will be hailed by admiring audiences, on the same night, as Thalia and Melpomene.

OMNES.

Hear, hear hear!

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE—(to MR BLACKWOOD.)

James has spoken well, and has more than redeemed his lost credit.—Has he not, Mr North?

NORTH.

He has. My dear A. B., I am delighted to hear your voice. Believe me, when I say, that you do not sit below the salt in my esteem.

SHEPHERD.

The human heart is shaped very like this table—a sort o' oval, and thus freens can be accommodated in the ane, and at the ither, without ony body pretendin' to ony precedence, and to the prevention o' a' quarrels, on that pint, atween love and pride.

NORTH.

When last, my dear friend, at the Trows?

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE.

Let me see—do you know, sir, that I never remember—time.

NORTH.

Except, my dear Sandy, when your Cremona is at your heart, and then you never forget time. Ah! the tones of thy violin are indeed divine. They gradually steep the imagination in a dream of moonlight seas,—of the shadows of old glimmering forests,—and when they lend their aid to awaken to loftiest pitch some one of Handel's sacred harmonies, methinks, Sandy, that we then see into the very heart of heaven, and hear the instrumental anthems of angels.

SHEPHERD.

Poo! I just perfectly hate and abhorrr a concert. It souns to my lugs as if ilka ane o' aiblins a dizen chiefs, a' reckoned musicianers too, were tryin' to play louder and faster nor his neighbour, wha may be glowering thro' specs at the sam byueck, and a' playin', too, on different instruments, and, there wou'd be sina' danger in swearin', no abune twa o' them the same tune. Mr Alexander, for fifety roartatoryawes, I wou'd na gie ae cheep—o' your "bit whussle."

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE (susurrs to the SHEPHERD.)

Um.—My dear sir, the Trows, I am happy to say, are well—so is the Kerse. The fish?

NORTH.

Yes—yes—I received him, my dear Sandy, in a state of seraphic preservation—burnished silver without—and burnished gold within—for do you know, you salmon-striker, that his majesty the King of the Fins, is never so royal—nor am I ever so loyal—as when the red runs into yellow, like the lustre of a comet—a colour to which language in its poverty has no name,—for that which house-painters shew on bits of pasteboard as salmon-colour is more like that of the Shepherd's nose.

SHEPHERD.

Ma nose is nae mair sawmon-colour nor your ain, sir;—but indeed, it's no easy to ken what's the colour o' your neb, the hues o' your face are sae multifawrious. It wou'd require a proboscis as strong as a het poker to mak ony thing like a successfu' staun' again' the spats o' lowe flamin' in ominous circles on your brass cheeks. But this I ken, that if ever you gang intil a field whare there's a bill, you had better walk back-foremost, for that face will enrage a beast that canna thole red, mair than wou'd the hail body o' a mail-coach guard on the king's birthday.

NORTH.

James, the well-known and much-admired paleness of my face protects it from your sarcasms.

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE.

We boiled one, sir, "in his ain broo," that is, ye ken, in Tweed water—in "a wife's great big muckle black pat," as said a bit callanty frae the cottage where we borrowed it,—not an hour having elapsed between that anxious moment, when the Kerse unlooked him for me on a sand-shoal between the rocks—after a set-to of some twenty minutes, and no more—for my gut is always triple at the Trows, and would pull out a whale if I had room to play him—and that moment, free from all anxiety about any thing in heaven or on earth, when the first flake of crimson curdle—after, I fear, no grace—reposed between my tongue and palate—melting in a flavour, which, in richness and delicacy—a rare union in either fish, flesh, or fowl—did, Mr North, in truth and verity, I assure you, surpass that even of any salmon I ever swallowed in your society—in a dream.

NORTH.

Why dost thou never break the gloom of my solitude at the Lodge, by the light of thy countenance and thy cigar, now-a-days, my dear Smoker?

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE.

I understood, my good sir, that you were in Switzerland.

NORTH.

So I am.—You are a tame trout-fisher, Sandy—with a small fly, a dreamer of dreams. Last time I came up to you on the green sward of Cardrona mains, I could not but imagine that you must have dropped your wedding-ring in the water, you looked so meditative and woebegone; but by a Fish at the tail of your line, you are suddenly transfigured into an impersonation of all that is most active, scientific, and intrepid in this sublunary world. Your styles are different—but you belong to the same class as "The Kerse."

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE.

After such salmon as you have seen me kill, Mr North, all trouts are pairs.

SHEPHERD.

Pawrs mennons—and mennons expelled iktheology. To a bit body that fishes but for pawrs, or wha at least never gruppis naething else, like North there, sawmons, in his imagination, maun be like whawls,

"Wallowing unwieldy, enormous in their gait."

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE.

Mr North, James, is the best trout-angler with the fly in Europe.

NORTH.

I have tried the sport, my dear boy, in the best and worst streams in every quarter of the globe, and never yet by mortal man was outnumbered.

SHEPHERD.

But wecht, sir, wecht—what say ye till wecht? I have asked ye that a thoosan times, and never gotten ony satisfactory answer—naething but a haw, hoast, or a hum—what say yetill wecht?

MR ALEXANDER BALLANTYNE (in a low voice to the SHEPHERD.)

Every great man has his weaknesses, Mr Hogg. Venerate that grey head—hush—hush—hush!—Yes, Mr North, for weight too I'll back you against the world.

NORTH.

And I you, Sandy, at rod or bow.

SHEPHERD.

As I'm a Christian, there has that cretur been staumin on his hind legs, a' this time, ever syne he spanged out o' the Sanctum, wi' his forepaws on the back o' North's chair, wi' his head owre his left shoulder, cheek by jowl wi' him, just a joint-yeditor! O'Bronte, ma man, let yoursel' doon on a' fowres like ony other dowg—for in that posture you're gettin' fearsome, and ane thinks o' horrible stories o' Black Familiars.

NORTH.

Ambrose! (Enter AMBROSE.) A chair for O'Bronte. (MR AMBROSE places a chair for "THE DOWG," which he instantly occupies, between NORTH and CRAIGELLACHIE.)

SHEPHERD.

I've changed ma min'—ma soar throat's gane—and I'll gie ye a bit sang.

OMNES.

The Shepherd's song— Shepherd's song—the Shepherd's song!

SHEPHERD (sings.)

Frae royal Wull that wears the crown
 To Yarrow's lowliest shepherd-clown,
 Time wears unchancy mortals doun,
 I've mark'd it late and air.
 The souplest knee at length will crack,
 The lythest arm, the sturdiest back—
 And little siller Sampson lack
 For cuttin' o' his hair.

Myself for speed had not my marrow
 Thro' Teviot, Ettrick, Tweed, and Yarrow,
 Strang, straight, and swift like winged arrow,
 At market, tryst, or fair.
 But now I'm turn'd a hirplin' carle,
 My back its ta'en the cobbler's swirl,
 And deil a bodle I need birl
 For cuttin' o' my hair.

On Boswell's green was nane like me,
 My hough was firm, my foot was free,
 The locks that cluster'd owre my bree
 Cost many a hizzie sair.
 The days are come I'm no sae crouse—
 An' ingle cheek—a cogie douce,
 An' fash nae shears about the house
 Wi' cuttin' o' my hair.

It was an awfu' head I trow,
 It waur'd baith young and auld to cow,
 An burnin' red as heather-lowe,
 Gar'd neebours start and stare.
 The mair ye cut the mair it grew
 An' ay the fiercer flamed its hue—
 I in my time hae paid enew
 For cuttin' o' my hair.

But now there's scarce aneuch to grip—
 When last I brought it to the clip,
 It gied the shaver's skill the slip
 On haffets lank and bare.
 Henceforth to this resolve I'll cling,
 Whate'er its shape to let it hing,
 And keep the cash for ither thing
 Than cuttin' o' my hair.
 (The usual applause.)

MR SEWARD.

Admirable—incomparable—inimitable—my matchless Shepherd!

SHEPHERD.

What's the use o' a' thae substantives, sir? I ken it's a gude sang—and weel sung too—say that—and ye say aneuch.

MR SEWARD.

I beseech you for a copy—Jem, my jewel—

SHEPHERD.

What! wou'd you offer for to gang to sing't in any Christian company, wi' a great, rough, black, toozey head o' hair like that, man, that if thrawn intil the petrifyin' well at Barncluth, wou'd, in future ages, be thoct by antyquawrians to be the stane head o' Nimrod, or o' ane o' the giants that melled wi' the dochters o' man afore the Flood? Hoots—toots—keep to the Caribineers.—O' Bronte, gie's a sang.

O' BRONTE.

Bow—wow—wow—wow—bow—wow—wow—wow!

SHEPHERD.

Faldy aldy niddle noddle—bow—wow—wow! Sandy, man, canna ye accompany us on the “bit whussle?”

O’BRONTE.

Whew—whew—whew—whew—whew—whew!

SHEPHERD.

That’s pawthetic—Thank ye for your sang, O’Bronte. Now, creesh your craig.—That’s richt, North.

[Mr NORTH gives O’BRONTE a glass of brandy. He bows—bolts it—and licks his chops.

SHEPHERD.

Like maister, like dowg.—But we were promised some politics. Let’s have them noo—and I propose that nane speaks but Mr North, Mr Tickler, Mr Buller, Mr Shooard, and Me; and when we hae settled the affairs o’ the nation, then let us a’ begin speakin’ at ance through ither, and a’ as fast an’ loud’s we are able; no’ confinin’ oursell to ony partiklar soobjeck, but embracing the haill range o’ the awninal, vegetable, and stane creawtion.—Mr North, begin, and tell us something about the new king’s sons.

NORTH.

Eh?

SHEPHERD.

Say that I am ashamed to say, Mr North, that though the evening’s advancin’, we hae yet had nae usefu’ and impruvin’ conversation, but hae a’ been talkin’ great havers. We are, this night, like an army twenty thousand strang—sae, let’s hae some polectical information, sir, frae yoursell and Mr Tickler, and Mr Buller and Mr Shooard, wha maun hae brung plenty o’ t wi’ their frae Lunnun, whare it’s a’ brew’d. What kind o’ chaps are the new king’s sons?

NORTH.

The Fitzclarences are all fine fellows. The Colonel is an accomplished scholar, a zealous Orientalist, and a very clever writer of the English tongue. His “Hussar’s Letters,” in the United Service Journal, are, I think, about the very best of the many sketches on military doings produced in our time—truth, vigour, liveliness, and a great deal of right good fun.

SHEPHERD.

It’s a pity he’s no Prince o’ Wales—but his father maun mak a lord, if no a deuk, o’ him belyve; and if he comes doon wi’ the rest o’ them, od let’s gie him a denner at Awnrose’s. Whatfor no?

NORTH.

He deserves both distinctions, and shall have them. The days of dukedoms, indeed, are past and gone; but he will be an honour to the peerage.

MR BULLER.

He could not be a greater honour to it than his cousin of Richmond. There’s the man that should be premier of England.—I wish to God, Mr North, I could agree with you in the view that I know you take of affairs! But I am sorry to say I think it highly probable the Duke may succeed in what nobody can question to be his object—buying over, I mean, so many of the borough-mongering interests, both Whig and Tory (so called), as to avoid the necessity of closing with either the Whig or the Tory party. His purpose clearly is, to have a government of mere expediency: he is done the moment he is compelled to assert openly any one line of principle. There is as wide a difference between his system and that of a Pitt as there ever was or will be between tyranny and law in the abstract. In short, I do not believe we are so near the happy epoch of party and principle restored, as I know you sanguinely suppose.

MR SEWARD.

I agree with my friend Buller, that the Duke’s plan is to detach the great houses, one by one, from their hereditary principles and connexions, until he has chained to his chariot-wheels just as much vote-power as may suffice to drag the machine through. And upon my soul, sir, such have been the crawling baseness, the inefable cowardice, the slimy selfishness, exhibited in high places within the last three years, that I consider it as far from impossible he may achieve this magnificent object of heroic ambition!

SHEPHERD.

Capital!

NORTH.

Why, your sneer at the hero, Mr Seward, appeals to me rather misplaced. The Duke seems to be much of the same kidney with such of his predecessors in that line, as we know much about. At first sight, to be sure, one is melancholy contemplating the man whose great actions have filled the ear of Europe,—whose determined resolution, inexhaustible patience, and indomitable fire, were the appointed instruments of Providence for overthrowing a Napoleon,—one is vexed, and even feels a species of self-humiliation, in thinking of such a being as he is, spending what strength of mind and body may be left to him in the dirty tracasseries of petticoat politics, and the bargaining of boudoirs!

SHEPHERD.

Mr Jeems Scawrllett, whare are you?

TICKLER.

In the lowest depth of degradation in which ever Whig dived down into the dirt. There let him stick—and be bammed.

NORTH.

Faugh on the slave!—Good God! can Wellington—he that has breathed the breath of a hundred battles—that has struggled with the demigods—can he stoop to chaffer over uncertain votes with a Billy Holmes?—to arrange considerations with George Dawson?—to fawn on demireps?—to wheedle harridans? Faugh!—faugh!—faugh!

SHEPHERD.

Reenge your mouth, sir, wi' some speerits—od, ye look as if ye were pu-shioned—

NORTH.

Not a whit—I was only mentionlug what might, at first sight, or to a young man, be a not unnatural view of the subject. As for myself, I have no need to learn at this time of day, that a hero is not necessarily either an Alexander or a Cæsar. Marlborough, the night before Blenheim, could blow out a candle to save twopenceworth of wax—Frederick could spend the very morning after Rosbach in composing a lampoon upon Madame Pompadour—Bonaparte, most of us know how he occupied himself the evening the allies entered Paris—and all of us know that he, for some years of his life, made it his prime object to annoy Major-General Sir Hudson Lowe—and really, with these things in our recollection, I think we may spare our wonder on finding in the immortal Wellington, fifteen years after Waterloo—to speak civilly—rather more of the serpent than the eagle.

MR SEWARD.

Most potent senior, I was not quite so raw as to merit all these fusées de la rhétorique. Nobody can have attached less of the schoolboy notion of the heroic to his grace than myself. I have always considered him as the coolest and clearest headed of men,—a human being as devoid of nerves and feelings as his own Achilles,—and therefore understood easily enough why he should have baffled, one after another, a whole generation of bubble-brained Frenchmen. But I have also all along known something of his tricks,—his choice of aides-de-camp, for example—and was prepared to hear quite as composedly as yourself, that he who conquered in the field simply by the unrivalled simplicity of his tactics, might take the other tack in the cabinet, or, if you will, in the boudoir.

SHEPHERD.

Od, he's surely an unco pawky chield, that Dyeuck o' Wallinton. I'm sure, if he had either the Whigs or the Tories buckled to him, I think them baith sic gowks, that I have nae doubt he might gar them follow his fancy just amaisht as easy as thae puir worthless craturs that he's obliged to lippen to yenow.

MR BULLER.

His genius, sir, backed by his reputation, might have, under ordinary circumstances, secured him authority, enough to satisfy even his ambition, in a cabinet composed of materials of another stamp. But I suppose Seward thinks it is too late to try that experiment now.

MR TICKLER.

I know not what either Seward or Buller thinks, but I know what I think myself; and it is this:—Had Castlereagh lived, he would at this moment have been the honoured chief of a Tory cabinet, with the Duke for his alter ego. But that precious head and heart once removed, Wellington was left among all the elements of discord—burning jealousies, petty spleens, timidity, arrogance, the obstinacy of old age, the petulance of youth, the audacity of a rival genius, the suppleness of a predestined sneaker, the restlessness of a quack here, the moroseness of a gin-horse there. It was obvious that Lord Liverpool's premiership was no more than a name—and that the battle must be decided between the Wellington of Waterloo and the Wellington of the House of Commons. The war commenced soon, and went on with steady bitterness in privacy, until an unlooked-for event brought things at once to a point coram populo. It was then seen what heavy arrears of dirty rancour had been mutually accumulated by those to whom the blind nation had so long been trusting, as champions arrayed side by side in equal and honourable zeal for its service.

SHEPHERD.

Mr Tickler, I dinna understaun ye.

TICKLER.

How should you? Hold your tongue, James.—Universal disgust ensued—and the rivals were left to jostle each other as they might, amidst the scornful indifference of the deceived. From that fatal day, my hopes of seeing a cabinet worthy of the name were at an end. I perceived clearly that the charm of general confidence was broken—that the minor officials had for ever sacrificed themselves—and that, whichever of the contending chiefs should ultimately possess the reins, would hold them, not as a minister among ministers, but as a despot among slaves.

SHEPHERD.

The Dyenck o' Wallinton, for a' that, 's a great favourite wi' the nation—misca' him as you wull, Tickler.

TICKLER.

Pshaw!—It is impossible, Mr North, to deny that at this moment the Duke of Wellington is regarded with any thing but kindly feelings by the nation, or by any one class of the nation. But this is nothing to the bare contempt with which his colleagues and most of those who have been his colleagues, are universally looked to. And, in short, considering the temper of the man, I am satisfied, that after the experience he has had of the sweets of sitting in such a cabinet as the present—Præses unus et princeps—he would prefer quitting Downing-street altogether, to any arrangement which would leave him only the first among a set of honourable hands—men of rank, influence, real talent, information, and principle,—men to whom the nation would as necessarily look up, as they look down upon these subalterns.

NORTH.

I dare say, Tickler, the Duke will witness the result of the Election before he makes up his mind as to the ulteriora. But if that be such as I anticipate, I have no sort of doubt he, not being a fool, and being fond of place, and moreover having unquestionably not a little of that self-reliance to which the Shepherd adverted, will prefer alliance with the Tories, to the only alternatives then in his choice; to wit, alliance out and out, not with Whiggery, but with the Whigs, or another campaign at the head of the Incapables, with the certainty of being kicked out head and croup along with them in the course thereof. And I confess, I, for one, think the Tories, after all that has come and gone, ought to close with the Duke, rather than, by rejecting him, give the Whigs a grand chance of empire—for God knows how many years,—in other words, give the country the grandest of all chances to be utterly ruined. That's my feeling on this subject. I should never advise the Tories to resolve all into the question of Duke or no Duke? If he can under no circumstances make up his stomach to sit in the same cabinet with such people as the Richmonds, the Maunsfields, and so forth—let the world know where it sticks. Let it never be said that such men as these were unwilling, even at the eleventh hour, to make the expyriment of sitting in the same cabinet with him. Carnot obtained honour with all the world by putting faith in Bonaparte's promises, and undertaking the defence of Antwerp; and I consider that we ought all to make many sacrifices rather than behold a regular invasion of the Whigs.

TICKLER.

On the contrary, North, it has long been my opinion, that the only chance the Tories have of reuniting into their old structure of steadfastness, lies in the natural consequences to be expected from a Whig reign of some decent duration. I have been praying for their incoming these seven years—not doubting that in due season the toe would be called into requisition.

NORTH.

Well, I am no friend to any such experiments. And if by your toe you mean your pen, Timotheus, why, I think it very possible that Sir James Scarlett might reconcile it to his conscience to remain Attorney even under a pure Whig administration.

TICKLER.

No question—but would such an administration suffer him to remain?

NORTH.

Why, I dare say they would. Colonel Moustapha Soleau, I take it, is not unlikely to continue in charge of the fortifications of Algiers. To say the truth, the notion of any thing like a political conscience or character being necessary or desirable among the law-officers of the Crown, appears of late years to be getting considerably out of fashion.

MR SEWARD.

And would it not be very indecorous, my dear sir, for the man not to dress by his master? A pretty figure would a Sir Charles Wetherall make in the pay of such a cabinet as the present—no, no—nova tempora novos homines.

NORTH.

Why, in more senses than one we have now-a-days enough of novi homines—but I still hope to see the Duke—volentem volentem—at the head of a cabinet made up, to a fair extent, of persons of another cut. He might, after all, introduce half-a-dozen Effectives, without displacing a single ounce either of character, or talent, or any sort of influence whatever. Suppose him to make Peel a peer, and, if he must remain in the cabinet—for a time at least—privy-seal. Suppose Sir George Murray to stick at the Colonies, where, indeed, every body speaks well of him—and to assume the lead in the Commons, which I have no doubt he could now do very well—and suppose Lord Lyndhurst to be a fixture also for the present—I should like to know in what possible point of view the Duke could be a loser by sweeping out every other article of furniture in his present cabinet, Lord Melville, a man of talents and integrity, excepted. Old Bathurst, since he ratted and cut off his pigtail, is of no more consequence than that decanter of port. Herries and Goulburn have both stultified themselves now beyond all redemption, and, at any rate, must be cashiered—and as for Edward Lord Ellenborough—but I want patience for that carum caput.

MR BULLER.

Unless my old acquaintance, Ned Law, be much altered—I have not seen him for some years—he must be one of the best looking fellows in the Duke's pay—a tall, well-built swapper of a carcass—a bright eye, regular features, hair like another Antinous, and a strut like a peacock. By Jupiter, what do you want in a tame elephant?

NORTH.

Oh! mercy! I never saw him till I was in town this time twelvemonths, and upon my soul I am half inclined to agree with Lady Holland, that the mere spectacle of such a thing riding down Whitehall, and known to be a minister of the Crown, might be almost enough to justify a revolution.

MR BULLER.

That's un peu fort; but truly, truly, it's enough to make one's heart sick to think that the Duke's only official speaker in the Lords is this pert, pompous puppy of a parvenu. But for his ready impudence of chattering imbecility, and good-natured Lord Goderich's occasional Samaritanism, the great chief would have absolutely been left, on some of the most important nights of this Session, to oppose the best speakers now in England—tales quales—with the quick, gruff growls of his own imperatoria brevitās, and the awkward, uneasy, repulsive, hoarse hammerings of Lord Aberdeen.

NORTH.

A man, however, of unquestioned accomplishments, and of talents very far above any other non-combatant in the Duke's clique. In fact, Mr Buller, the foreign policy, on which alone our countryman could be expected to come forth, has been all along, since my friend Canning's exit, in such a condition, that the devil himself could have made little on't. But we need not waste time about this. The "travelled thane," I have always understood, owed his place in the Cabinet to the personal friendship of George IV.; and, that being so, it needs no witch to foretell his fate now. I should not wonder to see Lord Dudley re-established. He, at all events, must have seen enough, by this time, of the wisdom of going out as part of the tail of Squire Huskisson.

MR BULLER.

I long thought the Huskissons would have made it up with the Commander-in-chief somehow or other; but of late there seems to have been such a display of bitterness, that of all possible methods of escape from the present dilemma, such a conjunction must be now the most unlikely. Charles Grant, Robert Huskisson ipse, and, above all, Palmerston, have thrown away the scabbard.

NORTH.

Ah! had some of these lads exerted themselves when in place as they have done out of it, we should have seen different doings in more cases than one. Why, Lord Palmerston was considered as a mere outworn fashionable voluptuary, cold, careless, blasé all over—behold the spur is clapt to him, and he turns out both a declaimer and a debater of the most laudable acerbity—a very thorn in poor Peel's withers. As for Grant, every body knew his talents, but his indolence was beginning to be considered hopeless. Could he have got rid, some ten years ago, of lying a-bed in the mornings, he must have been at present the first, without a second, in every respect, in the House of Commons; but I fear he has allowed the golden opportunity to pass, and, in spite of these recent exertions, will find himself without even a place in the next Parliament. The Duke is backing M'Leod in Inverness-shire totis viribus—and they say Robert is also trembling for the boroughs. His Highness would very fain keep out people capable of such demonstrations,

"And where he makes a desert, call it peace."

But the plan cannot succeed in the general. In considering the fortunes of some of Wellington's political contemporaries, I am often reminded of Benedict XIV.'s description of a certain French statesman, "un fou avec beaucoup de l'esprit." Sir Walter Scott, in his Life of Napoleon, says, that neither he, nor his conqueror, owed any thing to genius—every thing to the possession of the every-day faculties in an extraordinary measure. I don't agree with Scott as to Bonaparte, who, on the contrary, was a complete specimen of the soarings and sinkings of unbalanced genius, who was, as his military allocutions and bulletins shew, an orator of the highest class, and who, I doubt not, had in him all the stuff of a Pindar as well;—but I quite coincide with him as to the Duke, who has no more genius than a forty-eight pounder, and appears indeed to be cast of the same material—and think few things can be more instructive than to observe the style in which he has managed courts, and cabinets, and senates, by the sheer strength of homely shrewdness and imperturbable will, in opposition to all the efforts of all the "fous avec beaucoup de l'esprit." It was not talent of any kind that could ever give him a check—that required genius; and it is my belief, that even Canning's genius would, in the upshot, have sunk before him, had it been spared to try conclusions.

TICKLER.

Very like; but had Canning's thread been spun out, the great Lord would have had pretty allies to lean on, compared to what either Canning had in his latter day, or he himself can boast of now. Had George Canning lived, the Duke would have fought him mordicus, at the head of the Protestant interest. Philpotts would have bottled off a score more sound anti-Catholic potions by this time; and Copley decanted them. Copplestone would not have been re-re-re-converted. Peel would have kept his character; and Bathurst his pigtail.

BULLER.

Well, it makes one sorry to think of some things. For what purpose, now, was all this mighty, this immeasurable evil done? Merely that the Catholic question might be carried a year and a half sooner. The solid immediate difficulty was, it is avowed on all hands, the trembling conscience of George IV.; and sympathy with his inward struggles was at the bottom, I can well believe, of at least half the popular indignation. How easily might all have been accomplished, had the Duke but waited till the accession of a Prince who had always been known to take a different view of that difficult question! There would have been a strong disposition to think favourably of a measure of grace proposed, bonâ-fide, from the throne, at the commencement of a new reign. The fact of the Monarch's being pro-catholically inclined, would have been an entirely new feature, giving a wholly new character, in the minds of many whole classes amongst us, of the matter in debate;—its occurrence would of itself have furnished a potent apology for the alteration of the minister's tactics. It was the universal feeling, indeed knowledge, that the Duke and his satellites were thrusting down their master's throat a pill which he, like many other people, fancied he could hardly swallow without a breach of the coronation oath; it was this feeling that gave the bitterness of personal resentment to political dissent; it was this that rallied the Tory magnates for the throne, against the contaminators of its steps; it was this that set the church in a flame too powerful to be poked out by croziers, or smothered down by mitres and aprons; in a word, it was this that disgusted and disheartened the loyal and true men so deeply, that I speak rather my wishes than my hopes, when I differ from you as to the existing chances of seeing things re-established.

TICKLER.

It is all very well to put out some bungling law affecting only the interests of some particular class, or profession, or colonies, and then, on seeing things have been carried too far, growl out, As you were! This sort of management may do very well as to questions of a financial or fiscal description,—a sugar bill, or a malt bill, or a stamp bill,—but it won't just do to apply it to national feelings and principles. The Duke may cry, As you were! till he is hoarse—the Tories won't fall into his ranks again.

TICKLER.

Well, I don't despair to see the House fly from the usurper ere long. Only let us hear that the Tories and Lord Grey have signed their concordat, and my word for it, there will be a sore scattering of both the rats and the mice.

SHEPHERD.

Eh! man! sic a coaleeshon as that wad open the mouths o' the public. I'm sure ye canna lay your hand on your breast and deny but what it wad be just as bad as Charley Fox's wi' Lord North, or Gordie Canning's wi' Lord Lansdowne. Na, na, I houp the true folk will never even themselves till sic a coaleeshon as yon.

TICKLER.

And why not, Broonie? Lord Grey has been speaking as sound Toryism for some time past as any man in the Upper House—and at any rate, things are come to that pass, that what he and our folks used in former days to fight about, are mere trifles in the scale. The Duke of Wellington will have himself to thank, if he finds the high Tories and the high Whigs united solemnly to rescue the Sovereign from thralldom, the Legislature from contempt, and the body of the people from intolerable misery; and if they do so combine, a pretty chance he will have against them, with the apostates, the low Whigs, and his worthy papists and radicals! Come, North, what say you to this affair?

NORTH.

Why, I don't give up the Duke of Wellington personally even yet. I still hope to see him rally the Tories round him, and relying on their strength alone. I could not endure really to see him heading the Liberals in deliberate war against us. It would be unnatural—it is impossible.

TICKLER.

It is natural, and it will be, say I. No human being can doubt, that the King and Royal Family will jump at any thing like a prospect of emancipation; and I venture to bet a pipe to a pint, that the Duke and all his crew tumble out within one fortnight after the next meeting of Parliament.

NORTH.

Every thing depends on the people. If they really choose to do their duty to themselves now, all is safe. The Duke will be compelled either to abdicate or to modify—and once more, I should prefer the latter alternative.

TICKLER.

And once more, so would not I. I give up the Protector. To the rear face quamprimum, old soldier! Proud, heartless, stubborn Don Cossack, that it is—he has insulted the Tories, and shame on them, if they forgive him while the poker's in his back! By Jupiter, I should think myself justified in coalescing with Brougham or Beelzebub, for the mere pleasure of seeing him crawl out of Downing Street!

NORTH.

Come, Tickler, let's have your programme of a government.

TICKLER.

With all my heart. First Lord of the Treasury, Earl Grey or the Duke of Newcastle; Foreign Office, the other of them; Colonies, the Duke of Richmond; President, John Earl of Eldon; Privy Seal, Earl of Mansfield; Home Office, Sir Richard Vyvyan; Board of Control, Sir Robert Inglis; Admiralty, Sir George Fitzclarence—with Sidney or Wyndham for Sec.; Woods and Forests, Lord Lowther; Chancellor, Sir Charles Wetherall; Attorney, Brougham! Solicitor, Pollock; Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Sir James Graham;—for the Colonies, (Twiss being expelled,) Lord Chandos; and for the Home Office, Lord Howick; Board of Trade, Michael Thomas Sadler; Horse Guards, Duke of Gordon, and Ordnance, Marquis of Londonderry. What say you, Buller?

BULLER.

That's not bad—Vyvyan to lead in the Commons, and Grey, virtually I presume, in the Lords. But if I were to trust Brougham at all, I would go farther than you propose, and make him Chancellor at once; and I must say, I should think it worth a vigorous effort to include Huskisson, who, supported by Sir Richard and Inglis, would manage the Commons better than it has been this many a day. Vyvyan has all the talent surely, but my old acquaintance has thirty years' experience; and, besides, he has been of late seeing through the worst of his errors. Take in Husky, pray.

TICKLER.

The first and foremost should be to begin Parliamentary reform—which if it be not done gradually, in which case it could do no harm, is sure to come like an armed man at midnight, slapdash, cap-a-pee, and put all the fat in the fire at a swoop. The most rotten part of all is Scotland—begin there, say I. Alter the ~~law~~ about our absurd paper votes—let the property be directly represented—let every man who has L.50 or L.100 a-year in land have a vote for his county member. Do this here, and give the franchise to Manchester—and all the rest will come in due season. The Government by doing this much, or rather this little, would found itself broad and firm in the hearts of the people of Britain. Give Ireland poor laws, and you will see what a difference there is between the grant of a solid just right and the concession of an idle unconstitutional claim—alter Peel and Co.'s worse than ridiculous currency system—establish banks like our Scotch ones all over England, and let them circulate as much paper as they please—regain the confidence of the West Indians, by shewing the sincere desire to give them the protection that is due to them on every principle of equity and honesty, (placing Chandos in the Colonial Office would of itself soften all the existing sores) REORGANIZE THE YEOMANRY ALL OVER THE LAND—(hear—hear—hear)—strike off the assessed taxes, and have a swapping property one instead—tax absentees to their very teeth—put an end to free trade in all cases where the freedom lies on one side only—do these things, and if Britain be not revived in every member before twelvemonths pass by, call me Quack. I believe I have alluded to no one measure of which Lord Grey has not more or less plainly intimated his approbation within this year or so—and as to foreign affairs, which I don't profess to understand so much about, why, I suppose it will be admitted generally, that they could not be managed worse than they have been ever since the death of Lord Castlereagh. The history of human bungling affords no specimens quite equal to the whole affairs of Portugal and Greece, in which, throughout, every possible phasis of dishonesty, imbecility, indecision, cowardice, meanness, crawling meanness, appears to have been exhibited, part under Canning, part under Goderich, and part under the powers that now be. I am persuaded, that to put all as far right again as is now in the nature of things, there needs nothing but half a handful of dispatches written by a man untrammelled to personal consequences among the outlanders, with a heart to feel for the honour of his own country, and a head not quite so muddled as to doubt that, give England any thing like fair play, she has resources equal to cast all that she has ever yet achieved, either in peace or in war, into the shade. It is this miserable ignorance of us and our concerns that has damaged—I mean damned—these people beyond all redemption; and I am persuaded, that if a set of honourable men, possessing character and confidence, had the concern in their hands for six months, we should look back on the fact, that a pigheaded dragoon, destitute of the simplest elements of any human science but his professional one, had been permitted to rule this nation for two or three mortal years, by means of a pack of brainless orderlies, picked up either in camps or in club-houses, as a grotesque invention of the father of dreams.

(Long-continued tumultuous applause.

SHEPHERD.

'That thunner's driven out o' my head a' that's been driven intil't for the last twa hours. But, Biley Blackwood, it's surely ten o'clock noo—and are we no gaun to hae some toasts?

TICKLER.

Ten o'clock, you gowk! Why, its two.

SHEPHERD.

Twa!

MR BLACKWOOD.

Why, my dear Mr Hogg, there has been no lack of conversation, and we have enjoyed the political discussions with which the Peers have favoured us, with much keener zest, I am sure, without the formality of toasts, or of standing speeches, which, even when most felicitously extemporaneous, have still some slight seeming of being set, whereas in this "feast of reason and flow of soul," we have been fed as with manna and dew direct from heaven.

SHEPHERD.

I've lang been yawp for manna and dew o' a different description, Biley—Deevils and draucht porter.

OMNES.

Devils and draught porter—devils and draught porter!

MR BLACKWOOD.

Mr North? Sir?

NORTH.

O'Bronte, bark on Picardy for the devil.

O'BRONTE.

'Bow—wow—wow!—whew—whew—whew!—ho—ho—ho!—whroo—hooweroo!

MR BULLER.

I may not imagine by "what conjuration, and what mighty magic," dinners and suppers come cherub-borne into the Saloon, or from what regions in heaven, air, sea, or earth!

MR BLACKWOOD.

There is a roomy kitchen, with all appurtenances——

MR JAMES BAILLANTYNE.

"And appliances to boot"——

MR BLACKWOOD.

—in the sunk story. We have a man-cook, once co-cook at Barry's, so he cannot but be skilful; and believe me, sir, that there is no extravagance in him—he comes in cheap—for he is likewise Ground Steward, and, at a salary of L.100 per annum, manages the department of the lower regions.

SHEPHERD,

At a sellery o' L.100 per annum! Mair nor that o' ony yeditor o' ony o' the new magazines lately set again, I'll swear.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Mr Ambrose, would you have the goodness to bring me a Pot of strong coffee?

(PICARDY places a silver coffee-pot before the ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.)

MR BLACKWOOD.

I hope you will pardon me, Mr De Quincey; but henceforth I trust you will consider that piece of plate your own. It is on a most ingenious principle, for which Mr Redpath, working jeweller, has obtained a patent. Coffee cannot cool in it; and 'twould be hot and hot, were it to stand there till next Noctes.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

A Patent Redpath! The intrinsic value of the gift, sir, is great; for the metal is massy, and much labour has been bestowed on the workmanship. But love, not labour, is the ground of all value, in the interchange of mutual good offices and affections between man and man. It were of great avail, indeed, to the progress of Politico-economical Science, were that distinction—certainly not a nice one—yet as certainly often undiscerned, to the miserable confusion of ideas polarly opposite—by future writers therein austere adhered to, as being in verity the foundation—or, at least, a foundation of the essential difference between Political Economy and Ethics—or, perhaps, I should rather say Moral Philosophy. Pardon me, Mr Blackwood, for what may appear, perhaps, to be a digression, but which is, if not the main matter itself, at least germain to it—inasmuch as that, in my eyes, this Patent Redpath would be valueless, as if it still lay unshaped and undug in the mine, mould-mixed and unfiltered ore, were it not stamped with a worth, above all value and above all price merely mercantile, by a die in the hand of friendship. Sir, you have my best thanks.

SHEPHERD.

Mercy on us! What a moovin' o' mooths! and crunchin' o' teeth! and smacking o' tongues! and lickin' o' lips! and dechtin' o' gabs wi' the rim o' the table-claith! I'm no sure if that last manœuvre be a'hegether legitimate; but tooils aye drap aff a body's knees, and ane's apt, in lootin' for them, to 'break their head again' the table, as it's re-ascendin' until the upper world; whereas, the rim o' the table-claith's aye ready at haun, sae there's really nae excuse for ony gentleman wi' a creeshy chin at a Noctes. What are ye devoerin, Mr John Knox?

CHAPLAIN KNOX.

Towdie.

SHEPHERD.

And you, Mr Samwel Sooth?

CHAPLAIN SMOOTH.

Turkey.

SHEPHERD.

These are the twa best things ye hae uttered the nicht.

NORTH.

Is it a true bill, James, that you have had Hydrophobia?

SHEPHERD.

A fearsome fit o' it, sir, no o' the mere feegurative sort, sic as reigns at a Noctes, but bonny feedy, bodily, flesh and blude, bane and sinny convulsions.

NORTH.

I did not believe, my dear James, there ever could have existed a dog in all this world so mad as to bite the Shepherd.

SHEPHERD.

A mad dowie does na ken a Hogg frae a hoolet. The optic nerves o' his een are a' diseased,—as ye may weel see, gin ye hae courage to examine sic pupils,—and they dootless distrack the cretur's sowl within him wi' hideous apparitions o' his ain maister, in the shape o' the deevil, wi' a pitchfork gaun to pin him up again' the barn-door.

MR SEWARD.

Buller, how picturesque!

MR BULLER.

The great Poet of Hydrophobia!—(Inspecting an empty pint-pot.) These pint-pots are deceivers ever—they fill the hand, but they baulk the mouth. Offley must really be written to—they a'n't full measure.

MR SEWARD.

If Offley's pots be pigmyfied—then there is no trust in man. An honest fellow breathes not vital air.

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE—(to BANDY, SQUINTUM, and PECH.)

"And be those juggling fiends no more believed,

That palter with us in a double sense,

That keep the word of promise to our ear,

And break it to our hope."

SHEPHERD.

The verra bit weans that used to ride on his back, wi' their arms roun' his neck, and sometimes kissin' the verra chowks o' him, seem then to the destracked dowie to be sae mony demons, a' glowerin' and girnnin' at him, wi' red hot pokers in their talons, threatenin' him wi' the death o' Edward the Second in Berkley Castle. Wee Jamie himself—though certes a bit angel o' licht—seemed to Hector's ain Oe, when he gaed mad, a verra imp o' hell. No wunner he tries to bite. But in the last stage o' the desease—he can only snap—snap—for his ummer jaw has amaist lost a' its poor,—his puir tongue's hingin' out,—his flew a' smeared wi' slaver,—his hide ouch and tawted, wi' a' the hair stannin' on end like the feathers o' a friesland,—his lugs like sere leeves, owre feeble even to flap,—his tail nae mair "hingin' owre his hurdies wi' a swirl,"—his unhappy hurdies—but mire-woven and a' draggled wi' dirt;—and there he gangs stoiterin' frae ae side o' the road to the tither,—and wae's me! aften stacherin' quite doited until the ditch,—noo and then emittin' a sort o' short smoke o' a sneevil frae his rimmin' nose,—for to bark noo has lang been beyont his abeilities, puir fellow! let him try't as he may,—though aince he could bark, walkin' about the house a' nicht on the watch for trampers stravin' through the kintra at untimous hours, after nae gude,—aye, could ance bark, O'Bronte, like your verra sell; and never, oh! never be his doom yours! A rueful spectacle, Mr North, to them that kent him when he was wice, and aneuch to break ony Christian heart that kens hoo he used to lie during the evenings on the hearth "beside the ingle blinkin' bonnily" in the midst o' the sma household, hearkenin' and unnerstaunin' a' that was said,—and hoo he used, God pity him, as regular as clock-work, to loup up upon the coverlet, on the wide chest-bed, and fa' into a watchfu' sleep at the bairns' feet!

MR JAMES BALLANTYNE (much affected.)

"And from mine eyelids wipe the tears

That sacred pity hath engender'd."

SHEPHERD.

A' the parish wi' pitchforks are at his heels. In the haunted glimmer o' his blindness, the puir possessed colley misses the brig, and the rinnin' stream seems to his red een a pool o' blude. He daurna—he canna—loup in to soom for his life—for the Hydrophobia is stronger than his dim dread o' his fellow-creturs, and shiverin', and shudderin', and yowlin', as if he had fa'n intil a bonfire or a biler o' bilin' water, he cowps owre, sticket and shotten wi' a hunder prongs and a thoosan bullets, in convulsions o' the dead-thraws. A' the while women and weans are seen tossin' their arms, and heard shriekin', frae hill-taps, and wundows o' houses wi' steeket doors, and the boughs o' trees—till Luath lies still at last, covered wi' a rickle o' cruel stanes, only a bit o' his skin here and there seen through,—and then, to be sure, there is a wallin' o' weans, baith callants and lassies, to think that colley should hae been killed, wha used to gang wi' them to the verra kirk on the Sabbaths, and, till God had allowed him till gang mad, had never offered to bite ony body but neerdoweels, a' his born days! Grown-up folk are a' feared to bury him—but—I'm tellin' a true story—wee Jamie and his feres, in their griet, ware nae sae couardly, and placing the dead body on a haun-barrow, they muved awa' wi't in funeral procession—heaven bless them—and haein' howkit a hole, buried their beloved Luath aneath a green brae, and laid a flat stane on him frae the channel o' the Yarrow, just as if he had been a Christian intewred in a kirkyard!

MULLION.

Now, Jamie, yourself in hydrophobia.

SHEPHERD.

Na. I shanna—for nae ither reason—just because—wi' that girnin' gab—you asked me—Moolyou. You've nae bizziness till be impident. In a' Mr North's banter—even when at the waurst—there's sic a visible and audible speerit o' amity and respect, that I can thole amaisit ony nonsense frae him—though my face, at chance times, wull grow a wee red—at least a wee het; but hoo daur ye preshume to imagine that I will thole a thim-mlefu' o' impertinence frae the likes o' you, wha, I aften think, are sairly out o' your ain place in a Noctes, and would be seen to far mair advantage in your natural sphere, your ain provision-warehouse, ye bardy body, in the Lawnmarket? As Joe says, "Tak your change out o' that!"

MULLION (aside to his next-chair neighbour.)

He's gettin' fou.

SHEPHERD.

What's that your sayin', sir? nane o' your whusperin'! The man that whuspers in company should be smothered—pitten intil a tea-chest, and sent aff to Doctor Knox. The maist disgustfu' est trick about a whusperer is, that a' the while he's whusperin' intil anither's ear something about you, the coof, though cunnin' and crafty aneuch for ordinar, forgets that ye may be observin' his mean motions, and senselessly keeps keekin' up at you, every noo and then, wi' the odious tail o' his ee, joggin' wi' his loathsome elbow him he's forcin' to commit a breach o' gude maners in listenin' for ae single instant to his sickenin' insinuations—till he is recalled to a sense o' the awkwardness o' his situation, and the enormity o' his sin, by a jug o' water just aff the bile, sent wi' a bash intil his face, and a blatter again' the wa' ahint him, and doevil tak him but he w ou'd hae been cheap o't, had he been brained! Faith—I'm rather ruffled—come, my dear Delta—for you are aye the gentleman—by some pleasant observation—as Milton, I think, says, or something like it—for I hate a correct quotation—

“Smooth the down o' my ravin' darkness till it smile.”

DELTA.

Let me feel your pulse, my dear sir.

(DELTA takes out his gold stop-watch, a keepsake from CHRISTOPHER—a memorial of friendship—and mark of gratitude to him, the Pain-reliever—presented to the Poet by NORTH at the termination of a fit of gout in the stomach, which, but for Mr Mow, had certainly proved fatal.)

A hundred and ten—a hundred—ninety—eighty—seventy-five—sixty-eight—Now—you will do—my dear James. The circulation is restored to its former currency.

SHEPHERD.

Faith—I'm glad to hear't. For Peel's Bill has been the ruin o' the kintra. I kenna what wou'd hae become o' Scotland had the government extended till it the expiration o' the sma' notes.

NORTH.

My dearest Delta, it has long delighted me to see you and our friend there, whom we have christened by the somewhat heathenish name of the Modern Pythagorean—strewn the paths, and adorning the pursuits, of your profession—in the olden time often so strewn and adorned—witness Garth, Armstrong, Arbuthnot, Akenside, Glyn, and many other men of poetical powers, or otherwise fine genius—with the flowers of literature.

DELTA.

I have long since dismissed from my mind, my dear sir, any misgivings on that subject. Your judgment, and that of other enlightened men, have confirmed my own, that such occasional relaxation, as the study of elegant literature affords, from the not unsevere and rarely intermitting labours of a profession, of which I conscientiously endeavour to discharge the duties, to the best of my skill and knowledge, so far from either incapacitating or disinclining my mind for such labours and such duties, does greatly strengthen both its moral and intellectual energies; and I am happy—heaven forefend I should say I were proud—to believe that in my own circle those occasional relaxations, so far from being disapproved, or their fruits despised, have been thought to add to the respectability of my character. My name in literature I know is humble—but such as my reputation is, I am satisfied with it. My ambition lies elsewhere—it is in my profession.

NORTH.

Your name in literature is not humble—it is high; and all who have heads to know, and hearts to feel, what true poetry is, acknowledge Mr Mow to be a poet. It is a delightful thought to me, sir, to think, that your fine native genius offered almost its first fruits to the Work which I occasionally overlook, and in which I now take an almost fatherly interest. It is now enriched with many gems of your ripened and matured imagination—and no Number can ever be unworthy of the name of Maga that is graced with the signature of Delta.

SHEPHERD.

The Triangular Bard—though I houp the nicht, that “round as a neep he'll gang toddlin' a-ne.”

NORTH.

Heavens! can any studies be idle in a physician—in a medical man—that inevitably lead to elevation of spirit, breathing into it tenderness and humanity? Will he be a less thoughtful visitant at the sick or dying bed, who from such studies has gathered knowledge of all the beatings of the human heart, and all the workings of the human imagination, at such times so wild and so bewildering, aye, often even beyond the range of poetry, in those delirious dreams?

SHEPHERD.

That's a truth. In the ancient warld, was na there but ae God for poetry, music, and medishin? and the ancients, tak ~~ma~~ word for't, saw far intill the mysterious connexions o' things in natur. Owre mony folk noo-a-days, forgets that the alliance atween sowle and body's stricker—though no unlike it—than that atween church and state. Let doctors learn a' they can o' baith—and hoo they are to do that without leeterature, philosophy, and poetry, as weel's anatomy and mere medishin, surpasses my comprehenshun. Some doctors practeeze by a sort o' natural rumblegumshun, without ony knowledge either o' leeterature or ony thing else; and that accoots for some itherwise unaccoontable kirkyards.

NORTH.

No persons of the slightest sense will for a moment suffer themselves to be misled into such a gross delusion. Your mere professional man—in the narrowest sense of that much-misused word—is a man utterly destitute of all knowledge that will not go into a pill-box. He is, in truth, little better than a practitioner on the purses of his patients. But such practitioners it is, and such patients, who would revile all literature as worse than idle or useless—as pernicious—in a follower of Galen, Hippocrates, or Esculapius. Are they, pray, the followers of these immortals? Much in the same way as a dung-cart drawn by a single horse, which might probably perform the distance from London to Edinburgh in a month, may be said to follow his Majesty's most gracious mail-coach, which now does it in about forty hours.

SHEPHERD.

Mr Blackwood, allow me to say, that I defy a' Scotland to hae produced another chairman as gude's yoursell'. You've lett'n the current o' conversation wind awa' intil a thoosan channels, without ostentatiously direckin't—you hae had a pleasant and polite word to say to every body about ye—your wits hae never for ae meenint gane a wool-gatherin' out o' the Saloon—you hae been ready wi' your smile, your lauch, and your guffaw—and instead o' wushin' to shew aff yoursell, hae been desirous to bring out ither, no dootin' that a' the kimpny would feel that you was in your delight doin' your duty, and to say naethin' about the gled's ee and the deacon's haun wi' which ye aye took care to push roun' the bottles, I'm sair mistaeu if I hinna drawn the pictur, wi' a few bauld strokes, o' the best o' a' possible landlords.

OMNES.

True—true—true—true—true—true!

MR BULLER. (Rising and turning to MR NORTH, and then to MR BLACKWOOD.)

Mr North—Gentlemen,

I rise to propose, with all the honours, the health of our worthy host, WILLIAM BLACKWOOD.—(Immense cheers.)—He, sir, it was—I know it from YOURSELF—that originally projected THE MAGAZINE. It was planted—it grew—and nations now are sheltered under its shade.—(Thunder.)—Let me call him—for there is magic in the name—OLD EBONY.—(A sound as of the sea.)—There was a time when all the bulls of Bashan—and some Stots—routed against him.—(laughter)—but he took them by the horns, or by the tail, and flung them down the Nor-Loch into the slaughter-house.—(Loud guffaws—especially from the Shepherd.)—There was a time when he was deserted—say rather, disavowed—insane desertion and infatuated disavowal!—by some to whom he had never deigned to extend the honour of his patronage—

“The weak—the vain—the vacillating Good,”

They imagined that they were rowing in the same boat—part of the crew—nay, some of them you have told me, sir, would fain have taken the helm. They were but passengers, and some of them had forgotten to pay for their berths—that was a trifle; but when they became sea-sick and sore afraid, why, our host threw the live lumber overboard—to sink or swim—and such of them as had not provided themselves with cork-jackets went to the bottom.—(Great applause.)—Then prophets arose. The old men saw visions, and the Seven Young Men dreamt dreams.—(Much laughter.)—

"Blackwood would be ruined!" Of his glorious success—Si MONUMENTUM REQUIRIS, CIRCUMSPICE!

*(The Noctes rise—and the Lustre trembles.
" Their rising all at once was as the sound Of thunder heard remote.")*

" Contributors! he unites in himself two—shall I say—three characters—such as were never before united in one man—PROPRIETOR—PUBLISHER—shall I add—North—(North smiles—blushes, and covers his face with his hands)—EDITOR of BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE! Sir, Gentlemen—far be it from me to seek initiation into the greater—the higher mysteries of the management of MAGA. It has ever been my sacred belief—and I declare it now—that that divine Spirit manages Himself;—(tremendous applause)—but William Blackwood's own hands—I seek to know no more—and to have done that is of itself sufficient for his fame—dug the grotto out of the living rock, in which Christopher North, like another Numa, receives the visits of his Egeria.—(The Saloon shakes to its foundation.)—But—as my glorious friend Wordsworth says on a similar occasion, let us

" Descend from these imaginative heights," and speak in a business-like way of this business-like world. The circulation of THE MAGAZINE is—how much owing to Mr Blackwood's talents and integrity I need not say—greater than that of all the other Magazines in Britain united.—(Hear, hear!)—In a mercantile light, this is much—in a philanthropical light—every thing.

" Our dream by night, our prayer by day," is the happiness of our species—

" To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,

And read our history in a nation's eyes."—(Applause.)

Alas! ours is a smiling land no more!

" Scotland, your auld respected mither," is now too truly in the situation in which Burns, in his pleasant fancies, amused himself with imagining her—while, these words—that to our ears once "went merry as a marriage-bell"—"merry England!" sound like the tolling at a funeral. But while there is life there is hope. While Maga, who indeed is the Majesty of the People, flourishes in high estate, there need be no fears for the Crown. Of the late Demise I may not now speak—

" Some natural tears we shed,

But wiped them soon."

Had our counsel been taken—and it was accordant with all the noblest thoughts and feelings of his noble heart—George the Fourth would have gone down to the tomb, and lived in history through all ages, the greatest of all Kings. But evil counsellors wearied out the ear of age and disease into one fatal measure, that at its close clouded the lustre of a glorious reign.—(Silent expression of deep sympathy with the speaker.)—Sir—Gentlemen—I say no more. I am proud of being an Englishman; but greater pride in nothing honourable that ever has been my lot in life, have I ever felt, than the pride I feel now, in being one of the contributors to the Work which is the glory of Scotland. I had the satisfaction, sir, of becoming, by a happy accident, a friend of Mr Blackwood, before I became yours; to him I owed the happiness of an introduction to Christopher North; and having spent one intellectual evening in the domestic circle at Newington with the Piso of Edina—(cheers)—I found myself on the next, with no little trepidation in my delight, I assure you, sir, in the Lodge, with the great Modern Philosopher of the Porch—(great cheering.) I feel deeply, gentlemen, how few and insignificant have been my contributions—(no, no, no)—to MAGA. But as I never presumptuously pestered her with my addresses, no, thank God, never have they been rejected—(loud cheers)—;—a passionate, but a reverent, suitor have I ever been,—

I wear her colours in my cap,

Her picture in my heart;

And he that bends not to her eye,

Shall rue it to his smart.—(Loud cheers.)

And now, sir, I sit down, or rather continue to stand up—(laughter)—while I propose, with all the honours, and long may he flourish—"The health of WILLIAM BLACKWOOD!"—(An earthquake.)

SHEPHERD (in a low kind voice.)

Diinna fent, sir, diinna fent—tak a drap o' Glenlevit—you maunna fent, sir—Delta, and Pythagoras, tell him no to fent.

MR BLACKWOOD (rising in the midst of profound silence, under manifest emotion.)

This moment—this moment—I beg your pardon, Mr North—Gentlemen—my dear Mr Buller—(loud cheers of encouragement)—this moment compensates a thousand times—it is indeed an "over-payment of delight"—all the toils, anxieties, terrors, agonies, of years—(expressions of the warmest sympathy.) Noble, generous, glorious Contributors all! and you, my venerated friend—(bowing, with much feeling, to Mr North, who returns the salutation with infinite suavity)—who,

"Like a reappearing star,

Like a glory from afar,

First did head the flock of war"—

(Tremendous cheers—during which NORTH sinks gradually down till his face is hidden on the table.)

Forgive, I beseech you, this my feeble expression of everlasting gratitude. Deserted? no, never! True, that in our first campaign—and it was one of long endurance—I was encircled by enemies,—by enemies who thirsted to destroy what was far dearer to me than life—yes, to murder my character. But all their poisoned arrows either fell short—or rebounded, blunt and pointless, from a breast mailed in conscious integrity;—(loud cheers)—and then indeed I felt that "thrice is he armed who has his quarrel just."—

• (Cheers, especially from MR JAMES BALLANTYNE.)—Gentlemen, I bore the brunt of the battle—did I not?—unflinchingly—and escaped without a wound, Scot-free.—(Laughter.)—I am almost ashamed to say, that—veteran as I am—I have not a single scar to shew for it—and am as sound in body and in limb—in soul, body, and estate—(loud cheers)—as if I had never stood any fire more formidable than from the Seven Young Men's pop-guns.—(Immense laughter.)—I am now—by your faithful adherence to The Cause in the "worst of times"—independent of all my enemies. But suffer me to correct myself—they have ceased to exist. The few among them who, though deluded, were sincere in their hostility—in their enmity to me and THE MAGAZINE,—have either become friends of us both, or exhibit, like the Scotsman, in the general bearing of their opposition, the spirit of open and honourable antagonists. In the same spirit shall they be opposed by Maga, the Fair and Fearless—if with them there must be war;—but has she not proclaimed to the whole world, with a voice like a silver trumpet, that she is a lover of peace?—(Loud cries of She has! she has! Queen of the Pacific!)—The storm has long been over—the sea is now smooth—that is as smooth as the sea ever ought to be—(cheers)—and lo! Maga

"Is like a ship on some bright day,

In sunshine sailing far away,

Some noble ship that hath the plain

Of ocean for her own domain!"

Mutineers there could be none in our crew. Not a single man has been pressed into the service—(cheers)—and if a couple of tailors—ashamed of their sex—did once contrive to smuggle themselves on board, in the disguise of bumboat-women—(roars of laughter)—why, surely it was more humane to send them ashore, to the tune of the Rogue's March, without that shameful exposure which must have attended the rigging of them out in breeches of their own handiwork—(continued roars of laughter)—with payment for past services—which were confined, I believe, to a vain attempt or two at removal of some stinking water-casks from the hold—(continued laughter)—payment, gentlemen, which, however ungratefully since complained of as penurious, was more than sufficient to have procured the quarter of a man and a fraction one meal a-day at least for a week, of nutritious parsnips.—(Peals.)—And thus was the good ship Maga saved the disgrace of seeing the poor miserable wretches, convicted of continual cabbaging, dangling at her yard-arm.—(Shouts.)—Gentlemen, once more, and for ever more, I beg you will accept these feeble expressions of my boundless gratitude. God bless you all!

(MR BLACKWOOD sits down in the hug of the SHEPHERD, and all for some minutes is glorious confusion and uproar—waving of handkerchiefs—smashing of glasses—and shivering of chairs—till the Saloon seems to reel like the cabin of a ship in a squall. At length, order being restored, Bruin, alias the Broonie, releases the Bailie from his embrace, and stands to his feet.)

SHEPHERD.

North, I volunteer a sang. A' the world 'll no prevent me frae singin' a sang. I kenna what it 'll be; but I tak this verra Saloon for a soobject—These verra premises—MAGA AT NO. 45.

OMNES.

Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!—Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!—Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!

MAGA AT NO. 45.

Forty-five, Forty-five,
For a blessing belyve,
I have set up my rest under you,
For aye, through this land,
With blood and with brand,
Thy name was engraven till now,
Forty-five,
Thy name was engraven till now.

The first time, I trow,
That I e'er heard of you,
It was long ere a Maga was born,
When the Border all rang
With war's terrible clang,
And the bugle at evening and morn,
Forty-five, &c.

And though then Ancrum Moor
Ran red with the gore
Of the Southron's inveterate host;
Yet war, waste, and death,
In vengeance and wrath,
Went on to our land's bitter cost,
Forty-five, &c.

The next time I heard
Of thy baleful award
To my country—How grievous the while,
When thousands of Scots
Cut each other's throats,
Under Baillie, Montrose, and Argyle,
Forty-five, &c.

Then in feud and in flame,
With Prince Charles you came,
Who like lightning the land overran;
How fraught with despair,
To the brave and the fair,
To the Prince, each bold Chief, and his clan,
Forty-five, &c.

Brave Printe, o'er thy urn,
Royal Maga must mourn,
As the last of her old Stuart name;

And to keep it alive,
Under THE Forty-five,
My country's free standard shall flame,
Royal race, &c.

I have heard of thy number,
Mid bother and cumber,
On the hill of old Ludgate confest;
But our rights to revive
Under this Forty-five,
Undaunted I set up my rest,
Forty-five, &c.

And each statesman shall know it,
Each critic and poet,
And guess from the days that are gone,
That at Forty-five,
While Maga's alive,
Respect of their persons is none,
Forty-five, &c.

If in honour they fail,
She will ring such a peal
Of reproach, that the world shall wonder,
And tremble and shrive,
When New Forty-five
Breaks out in her volleys of thunder,
Kit North, &c.

For she's firm as the Bass,
And her brow is of brass,
And her rapier of flame is the pen;
Yet more influence has she
O'er the land and the sea,
Than an hundred and ten thousand men,
Forty-five,
Than an hundred and ten thousand men.

Then hail my new dwelling,
All others excelling,
Thou throne of the bold and the free:
And here I proclaim,
In Old Christopher's name,
That my friends shall be welcome in thee,
Forty-five;
All my friends shall be welcome in thee.
[Enthusiastic chuckling and crowing.]

MR BLACKWOOD.

THE SHEPHERD—with all the honours.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

Stop. I'll drink that toast—standin' on my head. Mr North, we've baith o' us dune that trick in our youth—and mony a queer ane beside—haena we? (NORTH bows.) Do tak the time frae me, sirs.

[MR ROBERT HOWIE reverses the common order of nature—and at his special request, MR SEWARD places a brimming bumper on each of his soles, which stand there so steadily, that not a drop is spilt. The Hero of the Mearns raises his “hip—hip—hip”—like a Stentor—and the statue of GEORGE BUCHANAN trembles on its pedestal.]

SHEPHERD (rising.)

I canna speak on my legs—a single grain. A' my ideas, the moment I get up, flee out o' my head, like doos frae a doocot. If a sentence happens to get about twa lines lang, I'm as entirely bewildered as if I were in the Cretan Labareuth,—and as sune's I fin' mysel' enclosed in ony thing like a paranthesis, I gie mysel' up for lost.—(Cheers and laughter.)—I'M NAETHING AFF THE SCLATE.—(Here, during a pause in the Shepherd's oratory, MR NORTH explains to MESSRS BULLER and SEWARD, the Bard's uniform practice of poetizing on a slate, from which he transfers his inspiration to paper, in a fine Roman hand.)—Let me recover the threed o' my discoorse. Whare was I? Ou aye. I had written, sirs, twa sangs for this gran' occasion—but wee Jamie, God bless him, wushin' to amuse himsel' wi' makin' a pictur o' the Bonassus, wiped them awa yesterday forenoon into everlasting oblivion wi' the cuff o' his jacket.—(Much lamentation.)—But, Mr North, and Mr Blackwood, and gentlemen all, some thochts and feelings there are which I commit not to ony ither tablet but that o', I trust, an honest heart,—(shouts and peals,)—and, among these, I can solemnly say, if not first and foremost, (for I hae a wife and family,) yet, I declare to heeven, in the van, are them o' gratitude, affection, and respect for the stanch freens by whom I am now proud to see mysel' surrounded, and wha hae lang been the cherm and the glory o' my life.—(The most affectionate applause from eye, voice, and hand.)—Mawga's a queer deevil,—(much laughter,)—an' a set o' queer deevils she has got to deal wi'.—Preserve me, if Mr Hooie's no stannin' on his head yet—like ane o' the Antipodes!—(MR SEWARD dexterously removes the bumpers from MR HOWIE'S soles—the hero of the Mearns springs to his feet—empties them both to the SHEPHERD'S health—and resumes his seat with his usual gravity.) I dinna scruple to say that She's lang been as muckle obleeged to me—as ever I was to Her—and that's nae little; and I hae formed a very erroneous estimat o' Her heart, if She wou'd na be as sair pitten oot o' Her way by my death, as I wou'd be by Hers.—(Solemn silence.)—But why, indeed, speak o' deein'—if it bena, as Mr Wudsworth profoundly indites,

“That pleasant thochts

Bring sad thochts to the mind,”

I ken weel—and sae does She—something tells it till me—here I ken—(laying one hand on his forehead and the other on his heart)—that we are BATH IMMORTAL. (“Far flash the red artillery.”) I was a puir shepherd twa score years ago,—and I'm a puir shepherd yet,—but, to use the langage o' a bit herd lassie that I ance heard singin' to hersel' a fragment o' some auld sang that had a' faded awa but thae twa simple lines, I may say that Natur

“Did gie to me her music pipes,

And the sweet trumpin' strains,”

and aften hae I felt, sirs, and may feel it again, that come what micht o' sorrow or sufferin', I never wad be an object o' peety eithir to mysel' or ither, sae lang as nature continued to me the gift o' genie, and enabled me, at mine ain wull, to awauken a voice o' music within the regions o' mine ain heart and mine ain imagination, that made the ears o' my sowl deaf to the loudest storms o' fate and fortune.

[SHEPHERD sits down amidst cries from all sides of “Beautiful,”

“Glorious,” “Most true.” God bless you, JAMES—bless the SHEPHERD—THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD for ever!)

SHEPHERD.

Bless us, whare's Mr Shooard? Whare's Mr Shooard? If he's gane at sic an early hour, the lift'll fa' and smother the laverocks. Wull naebody tell me whare's Mr Shooard? He maun hae been a ghaist to hae melted away through thae thick wa's.—O'Bronte, gang intil the Sanctum, and see for Mr Shooard.

[O'BRONTE trots away into the Sanctum, and returns, leading MR SEWARD by the skirts.

MR SEWARD.

I ought to make many apologies, Mr Blackwood, for what must have seemed an unnecessarily long absence—but I felt myself inspired by Apollo—slightly indeed—but rather more so than by Bacchus, or even Mercury; and having jotted down a few lines, perhaps I may be permitted to chant them—to an old well-known air, which Mister Manager Murray sings to a miracle. Would that to my own voice—not so much amiss, I believe—I could add but a title of that admirable fellow's taste and feeling!

MR BLACKWOOD.

We shall be delighted to hear you, sir.

MR SEWARD (sings.)

A CHANT.

To the Tune of—"The Old Courtier and the New."

How happy is the state that THE OLD MAN doth possess,
Whom fortune, fame, and friendship, have all combined to bless,
And whom the daughters of our land delight to caress,
So that he holds his head above his brethren of the press,
Like a fine old stately Gentleman
Of the good olden time.

Who, daring to be honest in the most degen'rate days,
The crowd of renegades around indignantly surveys,
And dealing out in truth severe his censure and his praise,
As yet has never come to see the error of his ways,
Like an obstinate old Gentleman
Of the good olden time.

Who though he oft is quite as grave as well befits his age,
At other times he scruples not to lay aside the sage:
And Wit in all her thousand moods then sparkles in his page,
So that the hearts of old and young he thereby doth engage,
Like a versatile old Gentleman
Of the good olden time.

Whose manners are so bland, and whose smile it is so sweet—
Yet as tough a customer as any man need meet—
Whose bearing doth so well become the cavalier complete,
Who ne'er abused a victory, nor ever fear'd defeat,
Like a gallant brave old Gentleman
Of the good olden time.

God bless the good old Gentleman, and send him long to reign
Over the empire which he rules, and ne'er has ruled in vain;
And peace to all the ghosts of those his grey goose quill has slain,
And chiefly to the Cockney-crew whom he's put out of pain,
Like a good humane old Gentleman
Of the good olden time.

NORTH (rising amidst the subsiding applause.)

Gentlemen, I propose in one sentence—with all the honours—the health of THOMAS DE QUINCEY—a person of the highest Intellectual and Imaginative Powers—a Metaphysician, a Logician, and a Political Economist of the First Order—a profound and comprehensive Scholar—a perfect Gentleman—and one of the best of Men.

[The ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER's health is drunk with prodigious acclamation; but, after a long pause, MR DE QUINCEY still remains rooted to his seat.]

SHEPHERD (aside to the company.)

He seems perfectly stunned. My dear sir, is it ane o' the idiosyncrasies o' your constitution—(that lang-nebbed word I committed to memory the nicht frae the recitation o' the Modern Pythagorean)—to get ill at thunner? Whisht, weans—he's fistin' on his seat—as abbot to rise. Whisht—I hae lang desired to hear the Opium-Eater mak a speech. Neo for't—it'll be gran' Logic, elegant Rhetoric, and souu' Feeelosophy! Whisht, weans—whisht!

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

On this occasion, dear Sir Christopher—oldest, justest, most brilliant of friends!—let me unbosom to you my griefs. You know my position—an Englishman—domiciliated often in Scotland—always there in heart and affection. You I need not instruct that among Scotchmen (or, as for some unfathomable reason, they choose to be called, Scotsmen) are my earliest, dearest, and most honoured friends. Many of my countrymen adopt, as blindly as they do their religious faith, a reverence for Scotland: and it is well if a just sentiment be held, on whatsoever footing. But still a “reasonable service” is better: and my veneration for the Scottish land rests, as you know, Sir Christopher, on personal knowledge. Judge, therefore, of the pain I suffer in knowing, and being continually reminded, that amongst the majority even of well-educated Scotchmen resident in Scotland, the most humiliating (I will say—the most injurious) notions are current about us English. By the great body of the English, this is not so much as suspected. Running rapidly over Scotland in the summer and autumn as tourists, or as sportsmen, they see little of the population but those who are their inferiors and dependants; and at the half-dozen of dinner parties, which their Edinburgh introductions open to them, hospitality and politeness, of course, seal up the lips of the Scotch on that particular topic. Hence the ignorance of the English; and perhaps never before in this world was there such a body of hostile feeling so little known to its objects. The Scotch, resident in England, do not generally partake in those feelings; at least those of birth and station do not. But in Scotland, I believe that a feeling towards the English which may be called even malignity, a disposition to disparage them, and certain obstinate prejudices about their characteristic qualities, are, in some degree, universal. I readily grant that, regularly as you ascend in society, this state of feeling declines. In the lower classes, who know the English by little more than report, it exists rancorously. In the very highest, except as a feeling occasionally assumed for purposes of political influence, perhaps not at all. The peerage everywhere is of no country:

— “rarus enim sensus communis in illâ Fortunâ.”

For rarely are civic sympathies to be found in that rank. You know, Sir Christopher, real scholar as you are, that I here translate truly. But in the next class to that, the enlightened and accomplished society of Edinburgh—Advocates, &c.,—you will meet with it in some strength. The main distinctions here are, that in some it is a quiescent feeling, in others, powerfully active. And I need not say that, in this class, even where it is strongest, a thousand accidents of private connexions, polished manners, &c. arise to break or mitigate its expression. But it exists for all that, and is running below when you least suspect it. Here, dear Sir Kit, I think you smile—perhaps recalling that story of a government spy in 1795, who said—“Ah! as to Coleridge, I think little of him; he’s a chattering fellow, that says more in an hour than he’ll stand to in a month. That Wordsworth is the traitor; for you’ll never hear him open his mouth on politics from year’s end to year’s end.” But stop—hear me out: I shall illustrate a little.

The first point on which the Scotch undervalue the English is by comparison so much of a trifle, and moreover, is so little brought forward in the sort of society that it can be worth adverting to, that I shall be satisfied to state it, and leave it. They claim to be a superior nation physically. In particular, the claim, as it respects female beauty, is made in terms so extravagant by Mr Galt, in one of his very clever novels, that for his credit I shall not repeat it. Superiority in the characteristic excellencies of the other sex, is, I believe, much more generally an article of the national creed. Like other men, I have, perhaps, an opinion in this matter; but am not very anxious to express it. Meantime, I recollect that you, Sir Christopher, not seldom, when honouring the Carlisle wrestling with your presence, have pronounced the men of Cumberland and Westmoreland the finest specimens of the human animal, for all the qualities which belong to an athlete.

Upon this, as perhaps in part a courtesy, I do not insist : I willingly consent that a Scotchman shall believe his nation stronger—bigger—fleeter—lisher (as we say in Westmoreland,) than all the rest of Europe. But I mention it for this purpose : In a late History of the Rebellion of 1745, (a book in that class most amusingly written,) the English are not only so treated that a man must suppose the author to have persuaded himself that they are a nation of poltroons, but we are required to believe that, in the mere article of agility, so remarkably distinguishing the Cumbrian peasantry, awe-struck, hopeless admiration, or some such feeling, was the sentiment universally elicited by the Highland army. Now, upon that point at least, as it respects the Scotch inter se, I may express an opinion without offence : and I say therefore, and it is notorious, and no Scotchman who is free to speak the truth ever hesitates to say so too, that excepting the Highland gentlemen, (for reasons too well known,) the Celtic part of the Scottish population, in bodily powers and appearance, are greatly and noticeably below the Lowlanders of Scotland : as respects these last and the English, meaning the peasantry in both, if I have an opinion, I mean to keep it to myself. But, for the upper ranks, to talk of any prominent difference between them—is mere dotage. Walk up and down Prince's Street or the Parliament House, I defy any man to tell me, upon physical grounds, whether he looks upon a body of English gentlemen or Scotch gentlemen. Yet, but a few months ago, in an obscure paper in the first journal in the world, [Bowing to Sir Christopher North,] the writer, (obviously a Highlander,) who otherwise treats us poor English de haut en bas, and finds out that the nation of Lord Bacon, Shakspeare, Milton, Newton, &c., is constitutionally incapable of any thing intellectual,—declares that every child in Edinburgh knows an Englishman at first glance by his personal appearance. The same writer, by the way, positively advances these two propositions ; 1st, that the ingenuity of Manchester in the useful arts, is to be ascribed to its approach, in point of latitude, to the Scotch Highlands ; and 2dly, that English Poetry, except as a pretence, had no existence till the days of Lord Byron—who owed his supposed distinction of Founder, to his Highland mother ;—unfortunately Mrs Byron's rank in life making it certain that she was not Highland (i. e. of Celtic blood) in the exclusive sense intended.

But of this enough : nor would I have noticed it at all, were it not as marking the strength of the feeling against us, which omits nothing ; and that in this instance there is a peculiar contradiction to the generosity of the English,—who, if they assume on this point an ancient superiority to the French, (and really upon some warrant) do not towards others, but hold themselves open to the challenges of all nations, welcome them, and give them the most entire fair-play. Witness the case of Molyneux the black, though sent over expressly by the Yankees to humble our English pride.

Next, let me notice that aspersion under which chiefly I do really groan with mortification and shame. The notion of English sensuality—and in the most abject shape, sensuality in eating—prevails universally in Scotland, and nowhere else. Of this also, the English generally are perfectly unaware. I presume that the notion arose from the high feeding of English servants, and in former times (but not in these) of the English peasantry. More especially this is true of Yorkshire, one of the counties happening to lie nearest to Scotland. And it must be conceded that a base notion prevails amongst the lowest English, that poor living—so honourable morally, so beneficial intellectually—is a disgrace. With what execrable disdain do the luxurious populace of a great manufacturing town look down upon the oatmeal of Scotland (which, observe, is no less the oatmeal of two millions in England.) So far I admit the reproach, and grieve over it. But that the gentry of England, nay, that the bourgeoisie of England—if that be the thing meant—are at all more luxurious than the same ranks in Scotland, I have neither heard nor seen any reason to believe. Civic corporations, I presume, are everywhere luxurious. A baillie I suppose to be the likeliest thing in the whole world to an alderman ; the difference no more than (as Jekyll said to a lady asking the distinction between a solicitor and an attorney) very much like that between an alligator and a crocodile. I shall also not readily believe that one great trading town differs much in this matter from another; Glasgow, for example, from Manchester. The fact is, no nation is really distinguished in this disgraceful way, except the French at present, and the Romans formerly. The elaborate and extensive library of both on gastronomy, puts that beyond doubt. But I allow, that this hideous reproach is a just judgment upon the English of former ages, for their senseless scoffs at the Scottish diet. Would that it could strike the guilty, who, alas! are the only people insensible to it!

Next, upon our shares in the late wars: Had we English any share at all? I protest, that I never could understand how the Scotch Lowlanders, sixteen hundred thousand, I believe, out of twenty, settle accounts with the Highlanders, or they again with the Irish. For never yet could I find, in the writers upon the Catholic Question, that the army was recruited anywhere but in Ireland; or, indeed, the navy. On the other hand, in tours innumerable of Scottish parentage, &c. &c., I have ascertained that no charge was ever made, no position captured, no fortress stormed, except by a Highland regiment—in most cases, the very same regiment. And yet I find, that whilst army and navy demanded half a million of men at one time, the entire body of fighting men in the Scotch Highlands are not above 100,000, had all been levied; and of these, I have understood that no more than 3000 ever served at one time in the British army.

Sir Christopher, you will not suspect me of doing the very thing I complain of so bitterly in others; no man ever threw a doubt upon the behaviour of either Highlanders or Irish. But their exclusive pretensions are ridiculous in the eyes of all really brave men. Look, for example, at Colonel Napier's book. He knows of no such distinctions, which would throw into the shade the great body of the united people, viz. English and Scotch Lowlanders. You and I remember a time when our Theatres were deafened with bravuras about "British honour," and "British courage," and "British spirit," (this last, by the way, a dangerous experiment on our ears,) until cynics began to tell us that the earth was sick of our vanities, and mere shame, though taking perhaps its first impulse from hatred even to our just pretensions, drove us to a little modesty. Now, I would suggest to the proneurs of the Highland regiments, that the public mind is approaching to the same point on this case; and that a nation of gallant men are in the end almost as much injured in public feeling by such extravagancies for them, as if they came from themselves.

I might now come upon the ground of our Universities, and the obstinate prejudices about them; for instance, Mr Dugald Stewart's determination that Locke should be expelled from the University of Oxford, and expelled for his philosophy; or Mr Playfair's yet grosser mis-statements about both Universities. Or I might undertake the same prejudice, as it applied still more broadly to our intellectual differences in general. But what I have said is enough as instances; and I come now to the main point I had in view, viz. that sort of appeal which the case itself makes to the justice of the Scotch, when one or two points are properly cleared up. There is a notion prevalent, that, amongst the amiable characteristics of the English, (for some I suppose they have,) is generosity. I shall not allow myself to build too much on that assumption, merely because it is a Scotch writer who most frequently insists on it, viz. Sir Walter Scott. But certainly, the temper which grants fair play to an antagonist, does seem to me conspicuously exhibited in England. Grant her that benefit. Some time ago, I remember reading a book by a Frenchman, describing the circumstances of a visit to London. Knowing, as I did, the foundation which there really is for some of those feelings towards his countrymen, which he charged upon us as base prejudices, and although I saw in many cases that he mistook mere English reserve, or perhaps even mauvaise honte, for hauteur; yet, for the soul of me, I could not but sympathize with a man of honour, stung to the very heart by the caricatures and lampoons upon his nation, and make allowances even when a wounded spirit prompted him to adopt as a rule of conduct, that he would, as sailors say, "turn to" on behalf of his injured country, that he would freeze those who froze him, would bow as slightly as the proud English bowed to him, that he would answer carelessness by carelessness, and retort scorn for scorn. In reality, can he be himself an estimable man, who is willing that his country should be lightly esteemed; or ought a man to accept a regard offered to him as an exception to his countrymen? Yet I must think that the Scotch have less weighty ground against us, than we against the French, not to mention that we are as much misrepresented in France, and meet with as much injustice as they with us. This brings me to the point. You will say, Are not the Scotch liable to as deep injury from prejudice in England, and unfounded contempt, as the English, in the cases you have been stating? I say, No. Fuit Ilium. Such prejudices there were; at present they are banished to the vulgar. Those which now exist are all the other way. Sir Walter Scott has remarked, (Mal. Malagrowthier,) that in this day every Scotchman has his peculiar talent, if any thing, over-valued in England. In fact, there is a perfect superstition prevailing amongst the English in behalf of Scotch talent. But there are certain jokes outstanding against the Scotch? Doubtless; those, for example, of Dr Johnson, Churchill, &c.—no jokes, I grant, with them, but in the general use no more than those upon the medical body, upon lawyers, upon husbands, as liable to frontal honours, &c., which no man is so thin-skinned as to interpret gravely. At this moment I contend, that of all the prejudices ever started against the Scotch, one only keeps its ground in good society in England, viz.—that which ascribes to the Scotch, more than common “discretion,” (that is the term in India,) i. e. too keen a regard to their own interest, and too close a cohesion amongst each other in foreign lands. I know not how true this may be; but, as nations go, I think any nation well off that hears no worse of itself. Sir Christopher, the Scotch pride, noble in many points, in one is not so; it is gloomy and ferocious. When an affront is seen or fancied, nothing can propitiate it. Let me therefore suggest one little truth, having already suggested that at this moment the old affronts are obsolete, or have descended to the use of vulgar low-bred people. The little truth is this: You know, and I know, that a considerable number of worthy men, but for which of their merits neither of us knows, have been kicked out of Scotland. Now these people, one and all, betake themselves to the press, in various characters; in fact, three-fourths of the London newspaper press is in the hands of the Scotch. And these gentlemen it is—unnatural sons of Scotland—who chiefly sting her with insults. Yet, coming from London, they are all put down to us, generally speaking, innocent—English. Hence standing irritation in the public mind in Scotland, which, as occasions offer, is paid back on the wrong men. Now, Sir Christopher, after stating my firm determination to abscond, if your reply promises to be on the same scale as my speech, I conclude for the present.

(This address is listened to with the most profound silence. At its close, many contributors, of all nations, spring to their feet.)

NORTH.

No—no—no! Gentlemen, be seated. I insist upon it.—(The insurrection is quelled.)—A very few words, my dear sir, so you need not—must not—abscond. First, There are many vulgar idiots in all nations—shove them aside—English and Scotch—and thus we get rid, in a moment, of much senseless insolence towards both countries. That score is wiped off—and their base guilt is held to be equal. Secondly, From senseless idiots take one step up to the commonplace blockheads in each of the two nations. The Scotch commonplace blockheads sneer at the people of England for being sensual in their feeding. The English commonplace blockheads sneer at the people of Scotland for being starved. True or false, or partly true and partly false, the charge, as it is made, in both cases alike, on imperfect knowledge, and in a bad spirit, is disgraceful to both peoples, and I think that the disgrace is about equal. Thirdly, Take another step up to sensible persons, and among them, I think, you will still find, in both countries alike, much prejudice and ignorance about the character of each other, and without particularizing them, I think they are about equal. Fourthly, Ascend now into the ranks of literary men and philosophers—of higher or lower degree—and there, methinks, it would not be difficult to prove the superior candour, and freedom from national prejudice, on the part of the Scotch. Mention, my dear friend, the names of such insolent calumniators of all that is English, among equally celebrated Scotchmen, as those of Junius, Johnson, Churchill, Wilkes—men who have spared no insolent sarcasms and calumnies on our national character. I hope—I believe—you cannot. Fifthly, Have not, in later times, Gifford, Southey, Coleridge, Wordsworth, and YOURSELF, not unfrequently—and some of you bitterly—I will add foolishly—(not you, my excellent sir)—sneered in and out of their sleeves at almost all our national literature—at its most illustrious Authors? They have. Mention the names of such men in Scotland—if any such there be—who have written in the same spirit of the great English Authors. I do not believe you can. Lastly, You, my dear sir, are a man of very fine perceptions, and very delicate feelings, and of very courteous manners. You are, in the noblest sense of the term, a very sensitive person. For all that—and much more—I love and admire Mr De Quincey. Many things, both in mind and manner, will occur here, in Edinburgh, and in every other part of Scotland, which to you, an enlightened, liberal, and philosophic Englishman, must seem harsh and grating—coarse, vulgar, and low. You do not use such words—but I use them for you: and I join in your reprobation and disgust at all such exhibitions. But might not such a Scotchman as you are an Englishman be subjected in England to much of the same annoyance? I am not such a man. I admit cheerfully that in much I am your inferior. But not in courtesy, I hope, not in the dealing of a gentleman. And I declare to you, upon my honour, that I have often been disgusted, and perhaps irritated, by the same sort of undervaluing, or misrepresenting, or misconceiving, of the real character of my countrymen, in England, that has justly excited your scorn, when you have met with it, directed against your countrymen, in Scotland. I have, indeed, my dear De Quincey, a thousand times. Therefore, agreeing with you in most things, not all, that you have said so eloquently, against our national prejudices and bigotries, pardon me if I say, that most of it is equally applicable to yours,—I mean to those of your countrymen in the same rank of life with ourselves. And, to conclude, the whole subject, I opine, is yet to be discussed—by you and me, in separate essays—articles for Maga; in which there can be no doubt, that we shall utter truths most salutary to our compatriots.

SHEPHERD.

Wha was that speakin' the noo? I'm thinkin' I was a wee sleepy—did ony o' ye see me noddin'—for I cou'd hae sworn I heard the castin' o' a live o' bees! You're a' lookin' like aae mony statutes.

NORTH (rising with much animation.)

Statues! Yes, gentlemen—There is now present among us one of the First Sculptors in Britain. Need I mention his name?—(Hear, hear, hear!)—LAWRENCE MACDONALD.—(Inmense applause.)—Poetry, Painting, Sculpture—all work in the same world—the ideal world of the Imagination. We have all seen a beautiful or sublime scene reflected in water. How transcendently soft—or how transcendently austere—then seem the lineaments of nature! So seem they all in the reflection of the Fine Arts—more divine than in their earthly originals. But, in the reflection of the Fine Arts, Nature herself is—changed—essentially etherialized—and in none of them, perhaps, so much so as in Sculpture. Its creations all speak, it is true, to human affections and sympathies; but the highest of them to human affections and sympathies how far elevated above those of ordinary life! Abstract Ideas, carrying with them their kindred and congenial Emotions of Love, Power, Grace, Majesty, and Beauty—these are embodied, impersonated in the marble—and appeal to the loftiest, purest moods of the Reason, the Imagination, and the Heart. In the Head of the Phidian Jove, we see the Nod at which Olympus trembled; in the Form of the Medicean Venus, we feel the Essence of Female Loveliness purified from all taint of earthly passion; in the Apollo Belvidere, we behold the Godship of the Sun, as

“He walks th’ impalpable and burning sky,”

or, in celestial disdain, smites the monsters of this earth, without any disturbance of his celestial majesty; in the Laocoon, the soul is sublimed as it shudders at the everlasting Image of Parental and Filial Love, dreadfully and mysteriously dismayed, yet not utterly overcome, by the hideous horrors sent by an insulted and avenging divinity, against the very Priest when ministering at the altar; in the Dying Gladiator, while the soul sickens in a dream

“Of pomps of guilt, and theatres of blood,”

it yet is elevated by the grand endurance of One, now a slave—once, perhaps, a Barbaric king, “Struggling with death, and conquering agony.”

(Loud exclamations of delight.)

Our friend has studied nature in that School of Art whose works, dug out of the hidden gloom of earth, and the melancholy rubbish of fallen temples, have given us glorious glimpses of the divine spirit that floated of old over all the Grecian Clime. For their possession, kings and kingdoms have contended, and they have been included in treaties, by which peace was restored to a war-wearied world. Who has seen our Friend’s Ajax, and his Achilles, and feels not that our native Sculptor has a Greek soul?—(Loud cheers)—that it is familiar, in sleeping and waking dreams, with the heroes, gods, and demi-gods of that sublime Mythology?—(Hear, hear!)—But, among the remains of Ancient Art, which time and the hands of worse destroyers have spared to us, there are none, perhaps, that bear a more touching character, than the few, whether perfect or in fragments, on which the Sculptor has delighted to impress the soft grace of Youthful Beauty. On these our Beauty-worshipping Friend (smiles—hear—hear—hear!) has fed the Spirit of Beauty that abides within his imagination; and to what exquisite loveliness, arrayed in the sweet lustre of innocence and peace, has he moulded the pale, chaste, melancholy, and moonlight marble!—(The most cordial cheers.)

OMNES.

Hip, hip, hup, hurrah! Hip, hip, hip, hurrah! Hip, hip, hurrah!

MR LAWRENCE MACDONALD (rising.)

Yes, sir,—yes, gentlemen,—I glory in the name of a Beauty-Worshipper.—(Loud cheering.)—I have studied those beautiful relics of the divine creative spirit of Grecian Genius to which our Illustrious Friend has so eloquently and philosophically alluded,

“In thoughts that breathe, and words that burn.”

Alas!

“’Tis Greece, but living Greece no more!”

Yet all is not dead, while these survive—for in the Acts of Mind, the Forms of the Body are immortal, and that immortality has been conferred by her sculptors on the ideal beauties of Greece’s divine daughters, while the feet of slaves and despots, blind to all beauty but the sensual, now profane their insensate dust.—(Hear, hear, hear.)—Yes, sir, all the high works of sculpture, whether beautiful or sublime, appeal, as you have wisely hinted, to our instructed sympathies—instructed, sir, by the study of form, and by the study of the spirit enshrouded in form, which cannot be reproduced in marble without science in the sculptor, or understood, or felt, without knowledge in the spectator,—such knowledge, sir, as can only be acquired by those who are familiar with Beauty, while she “pitches her tent before them,” as Wordsworth says, and whose “quiet eye,” as the same great poet also says, “broods and sleeps on their own heart.” Sir, there reigns in the works of sculpture a high intellectual law. The sculpture of that people, among whom alone the art was perfect, bears on it, as you have so well said, the perpetual character of ideal beauty. We recognise in the works of the other arts, the ideal character; we recognise it in the sculpture of all other nations; and we recognise in all that remains to us of Greece—in her Poetry for example—the workings of their idealizing mind. But in their sculpture only—and only in theirs—is it a perpetual and overpowering character, which strikes in the first moment upon every eye, and holds every heart half-repelled by wonder mingling with its delight.—(Applause.)—My sole ambition in this life, is to gain from the feeling of beauty the power of expressing it; and as Sublimity and Beauty are kindred spirits, may I dare to hope—which I do as humbly as devoutly—that some of my future works, like those, sir, of the Forms of the Ajax and Achilles, which you, sir, have been pleased to admire, may not be altogether unimpressed by the character of the Ideal Heroic.

(MR MACDONALD sits down amidst great applause; and a very extraordinary reverberating echo is here discovered in the north-east angle of the Saloon.)

NORTH (rises.)

Gentlemen, fill a Tumbler-Bumper. We are to have a Double Number this month—now for a Double Toast—JOHN WATSON GORDON and ROBERT GIBB.—(A welcome to the welkin.)—John, my dear friend, hearken to the words of a friend,

“You have but one fault—but that is a thumper.”

In an age of pretension and puffery, you are too—modest. Yet, I love—I admire you—the more for that rare sin—not the sin, most assuredly, that in these days most easily besets men of merit. Perhaps, after all, gentlemen, our friend’s genius shines the more conspicuously through the only mists that ever approach its lustre, the thin transparent cloud of his own mild and gentlemanly manners.—(Loud acclamations.)—I may be no great judge, perhaps, of the Fine Arts;—(You are—you are—from all quarters.)—and I plead guilty, in this instance, gentlemen, to the partialities of personal affection for this distinguished artist. Be it so; yet I never, from my own experiences, have found that friendship for the artist either blinds the judgment, or betrays the feeling, of his critic. The same pure, calm, bright, deep, untroubled, and most unostentatious and unglaring colouring, which belongs to Mr Watson Gordon’s own character in domestic life, hangs over one and all of his most admirable pictures.—(Loud cheers.)—I dislike the epithet striking likeness; for, in the vocabulary of commonplace critics, it is synonymous with staring; but “commend me” to the similitudes that steal serenely from the canvass, breathing momentarily into fresher and brighter life. Such are his portraits, which grow upon you, to a more and more perfect expression of individual character, the longer you gaze upon them, till you finally feel as if you heard the very voice of the original, and could almost believe that he was there with you in the room. But our friend’s portraits have other and higher merits than even these. He is a master of all the principles of his art. That mastery enables him to embody his fine feeling of elegance and grace in faces and figures, which, without any impaired resemblance to the originals, are idealized in the true spirit of genius. With the highest opinion of the powers of those distinguished artists, Smith, Graham, and others, I do not hesitate to say, that we now drink to the health of the Best Portrait-Painter in Scotland.—(General acquiescence unequivocally expressed.)—And now I call upon—~~the~~ gentleman to hold up his head, while I proclaim his name with a loud voice—ROBERT GIBB!—(The crystal dance on the table.)—It is delightful, Mr Blackwood, to see how true genius, in every department of the art, steals its way—slowly, perhaps, for a while—a long while, as it seems to its possessor—but surely as fate—into due estimation at last.

His character as an artist has been stamped by the choice made of him along with the ingenious George, brother of the celebrated William Simpson, by the Directors of the prosperous Institution, Hill Street, who could not have selected two more effective masters. But I know the genius of Robert Gibb as an artist, and his worth as a man, better than all the directors of all academies in the world, with the Director-General—bless him—at their head.—(Much merriment.)—We have scaled together many a mountain-strata—his shoulder acting as another crutch ;—(laughter)—and looking at his exquisite sketches which fill a large port-folio that lies constantly on the sofa of my brown study, how pleasant, my dear Mr Gibb, to follow our own footsteps (none better, notwithstanding that unlucky sprain of your dexter ankle) across the fells—with our cheerful companions—and relive a week passed in that mountain paradise.—(The most cordial cheers.)

(All the powers on earth fail to force either MR WATSON GORDON, or MR GIBB to his legs. But they return thanks by an expression of countenance that speaks volumes—and that adds to the applause.)

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

Did ye gang up to see the fecht, sir, atween Simon Byrne and Sandy Mackay ?

NORTH.

No—Bob—I could not get away. 'Twas a bad fight—and an unfortunate business—but I trust the luckless issue of the affair will not eventually injure the ring.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

I'm glad to hear ye say sae, sir—for I'm told there has been an awfu' outcry against prize-fechtin' in the papers.

MR NORTH.

The whole argument, Bob, lies in a nutshell. The English are a pugilistic people. They decide their quarrels by the fist. It is the least dangerous—the least revengeful—the least rancorous mode of doing so that can exist among the common orders. It is manly, courageous, honest, and honourable—generally speaking—and therefore ought to be upheld by all men who esteem such qualities in national character. That cannot be done without professors of pugilism ; and professors of pugilism can establish their claim to that title, only by fighting publicly in a ring. The ring, then, is essential to the existence of pugilism, as the national mode of deciding and extinguishing all quarrels among the people. In the ring, out of many hundred fights, one occasionally proves fatal—and the fatality, when it occurs, is a subject of regret—but not of great and wide lamentation, nor worthy of a general mourning or fast.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

You speak weel, sir, on all subjects. What mair ?

MR NORTH.

Prize-Fights are, notwithstanding, illegal. They cannot well be otherwise ; but the Law has wisely winked at them—and some of the highest Judges in the Law have regarded them with no disfavour—but in the light of necessary and useful pastimes even, the support of Fair Play out of the Ring, and an encouragement given to all manliness in the settlement of quarrels and the satisfaction of insults. Such is the feeling of the vast majority of the educated classes in England. On the other hand, many persons of much worth, and fine sensibilities, are shocked by what they have been taught, or have taught themselves, to think brutal, ferocious, and cruel—and confining their attention solely to the spectacle of bloody and bruised faces and figures, without any consideration of all the collateral circumstances, and all the consequences, results, and effects, look on all such exhibitions as a disgrace to a civilized age. They are ninnies, Bob. But being good sort of people enough in their own way, I content myself with merely saying that they know nothing of the character of Englishmen. Some people, again, try all things by religion. Pugilism will not stand that test—nor indeed will any kind of warfare, either private or public—and if they must weep over Moulsey Hurst, they ought to die at the bare idea of Waterloo. But thousands and tens of thousands who brutally abuse Prize-Fighting, are themselves worse blackguards than any that ever entered a ring. Every word they utter against the ring is a lie—and they know it. No punishment is too much for such miscreants. They assert that they can see no difference between the accidental death sometimes befalling in the ring—in fair fighting—and the cutting of a man's throat at midnight in his bed, by a burglarious murderer. The law, say they, in a late case, ought to take its course—and Simon Byrne ought to be hanged! This is brutally wicked—and they who hold such language are not fit to live. Had they insults or injuries of their own to requite—how deadly would be their revenge! I think Simon will be acquitted.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

I wou'd like to hear the man that wou'd try to answer that—he wou'd soon shew himself a sump.

NORTH.

It was ludicrous, Bob, to hear the national exultation—I can call it by no other name—with which the people of Scotland looked forward to the triumph of their champion at Hanslope. Not a doubt was entertained that in a few rounds he would smash Simon, and then, it seems, poor Sandy was to have been—Champion of England! There was a clapping of wings and a crowing, all over hill and dale, village, town and city, Scotland thorough; not a single syllable spoken in any quarter about the barbarity, the brutality, or so forth, of a battle between these Big Ones. The Newspaper Editors and Correspondents were all up in the stirrups; and take up what Scotch Journal you might, it was like reading Bell's Life in London. The fight came off—and the Scottish champion was beaten off hand—was obstinate—and most unfortunately lost his life. Then what a hullabaloo! The abettors of, and the betters on, the battle, all set up a cry for blood! Mackay was hounded! And murdered! And all present at the perpetration of the horrid crime—as accessaries—richly deserved the gallows! Such is the consistency—honesty—humanity—decency—piety of the press-gang! As their previous exultations, Bob, were most ludicrous, were not their subsequent execrations most loathsome? One Glasgow vagabond wrote down all manner of lies from London to the respectable editor of a west-country newspaper, which that editor, though a gentleman, I understand, published; and George Cooper, as honest a fellow as lives, against whose character that scoundrel scrub of a scribe scrawled the most infamous and self-refuted falsehoods, since he scorns to prosecute the scamp, will, I hope, break a few of his bones, should the base sinner ever have the hardihood to avow himself the writer of those unprincipled calumnies.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

I'll do that mysell, sir, he may depend on't, gif ever he happens to watter his back at Robert Young's o' the Mearns' Kirk.

NORTH.

Poor Mackay's mother was well used among the Fancy in London, and made a very pretty penny, one way and another, by her trip; and I am glad to hear the old woman is as gay as a lark. No ruffian of the ring, as the above blackguard had the insolence to call such men as Crib, Spring, and Tom Belcher, whose quarter-boots he is unworthy to wipe, used Madam Turnpenny so ill as he did himself; for he made her a mare to hang libels on, on as generous and just, as brave and humane a gentleman as is in all Scotland—Captain Barclay—who backed Sandy at his own eager request, out of pure compassion, for some twenty-five pounds, merely to help to make up the stakes—and who had none but the most trifling bets on the battle. But so it ever is with that pseudo-humanity, that, in a hollow and hypocritical zeal for the upholding of the dignity of our nature, forsooth, scruples not to be foul its tongue with all stinking slanders. In a fair fight, a great, big, awkward, stupid, hulking fellow got pounded by a hard hitter, several stone under his weight, and unfortunately died of the beating; and up gets a base bagman to make that untoward event the occasion of vomiting unmeasured abuse on some of the best gentlemen in Britain. The slave ought to be choked with the foul sheets of his own slaving slander,

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

Let the leear alane for the noo. He shall get it yet, and ~~they~~ heides him, if they dinna keep a better tongue in their mouth.

NORTH.

Bob, more men lose their lives in "up-and-down" combats in Lancashire—to say nothing of the scores maimed for life, and ghastly disfigured—in one year, than are killed in pitched battles, in which ~~the~~ pugilism are observed, in all the rest of England. The judges on the North Circuit have often declared, that they will carry the utmost rigour of the law into effect against the first combatant in a mortal struggle of that kind, convicted of what does certainly often seem to be very little better than absolute murder. Yet in the very worst cases, the details of which have been most sickening and revolting, juries have uniformly brought in verdicts of manslaughter; and the convicts have scarcely ever been doomed to any other punishment but imprisonment, and that, too, but for a few months. And is it to be borne, that the pugilist who unluckily kills his man, in a fair fight, which thousands of the most humane and enlightened men have been proud to witness—proud of the character of their countrymen as therein displayed—is to be branded by a cowardly liar with the name of murderer? Pugilism is the preserver of life. Extinguish its spirit in England, where it has long flourished in all the counties, but a few that have adopted a most detestable and savage practice,—and you will extinguish it by extinguishing the prize-ring,—and for one life that is now lost in fair fighting, you will soon have twenty foul and dastardly murders.

MR ROBERT HOWIE.

That's as plain as ma nieve. Luk at it, sir. Compare fists.—(NORTH and Bon shew nawleys.)—Mine's the biggest—but ma faith, sir, yours is as bonny a bunch o' fives as ever was pitched into a bread-basket! Mr North—oh! but I'm a proud man the nicht. And see, sir—the Noctes are a' asleep. We hae finished them aff haun—and are we twa no what we ever was, regular out-and-outers? Let me alane, sir, and I'll play a fine plisky.

(MR ROBERT HOWIE takes out a brace of pocket-pistols—and fires one close at the sleeping SHEPHERD'S ear—and another at the lug of the somnolent Secretary MULLION. The Noctes start up in terror—and the Saloon is involved in the smoke and smell of sulphur.

MR MULLION.

Murder—murder—fire—fire!

MR SEWARD.

What the deuce is to do now?

SHEPHERD.

This is fearsome! I smell a gun-pooother plot! Ca' the Grun-Stewart! Some Guy Fawkes has gotten intil the cellarage—and ettles to blaw up the Peers! Oot wi' a' the rest o' the barrels—for twa only hae exploded—in til the street!

NORTH.

"The danger is past as soon as you have read that letter"—James.

(Flinging over to the SHEPHERD an invitation to a grand dinner at the Lodge.

BULLER.

I suspect a duel. Mr Howie, have you and North been settling an affair of honour?

(Enter PICARDY with a bunch of newspapers, which he deposits on the table.

MR AMBROSE.

I have just been at the Post-Office, sir. The Croal Comet broke down a few miles on this side of Wooler—which accounts for the late arrival of the London post.

SHEPHERD.

The late arrivell o' the London post! Are ye dreamin', Awmrose?

MR AMBROSE (consulting his chronometer.)

It is precisely three o'clock.

SHEPHERD.

In the afternoon o' next day! And we sat doon to denner yestreen at sax!

NORTH.

~~God save~~ to your feet. Let us sing, God save the King! A full chorus!

1.

Jehovah, King of Kings,
 Spread thy protecting wings
 O'er Britain's throne!
 Crown'd with thy grace immense,
 Long may King William thence Justice in love dispense—
 God save the King!

2.

Throned in his people's hearts,
 Despising faction's arts,
 May William reign!
 True son of George the Third
 Who axe and block prefer'd
 To forfeit of his holy word—
 God save the King!

3.

First Freeman of the Free,
 It is his right to be
 Like his blest sire,
 Who over all the land
 Did faith and love command,
 With him to fall or stand—
 God save the King!

4.

Oak-hearted royal Tar,
 Well tried in glorious war,
 Great Nelson's friend—
 He knows that British blood
 Creeps not in lazy flood,
 When peril grates the good—
 God save the King!

5.

God save our Sailor King—
 Great be his flourishing
 By land and sea—
 Audacious craft repulse!
 From all base bondage freed
 May he be King indeed—
 God save the King!

6.

Manly, and frank, and brave,
 This sinking land to save,
 God save our King!
 Be righteous judgment shewn
 In sinners overthrown;
 EMANCIPATE THE THRONE—
 God save the King!

[The Noctes vanish in a flood of day.]

LIFE OF RICHARD BENTLEY, D.D. BY J. H. MONK, D.D.*

MANY years ago, walking in the sequestered valleys of Cumberland, with an eminent author of the present day, we came to a long and desolate sort of gallery, through a wilderness of rocks, which, after rising and narrowing for about two miles, suddenly opened right and left into a little pastoral recess, within the very heart of the highest mountains. This verdant circus presented in its centre a beautiful but tiny lake, locally called a turn,† with a wild brook issuing from it through the road by which we had approached, a few quiet fields upon the margin of the lake, solemn hills looking down upon it from every side; and finally, a hamlet of seven cottages clustering together, as if for mutual support, in this lovely, but still awful, solitude. A solitude, indeed, so perfect we had never seen: nor had we supposed it possible that, in the midst of populous England, any little brotherhood of households could pitch their tents so far aloof from human society, from its noisy bustle, and (we ventured to hope) its angry passions. Though a valley, and fenced by barriers verdant indeed, but almost insuperable, this little chamber in the hills was yet far above the ordinary elevation of inhabited ground: road there was none, except the rude sort of sheep-track by which we had come: the nearest town, and that a small one, was at six miles' distance; and here, if anywhere, it seemed possible, that a world-wearied man should find a perfect rest. "Yes," said our distinguished guide, who had guessed our thoughts—"Yes, nature has done her part to create in this place an absolute and perpetual Sabbath. And doubtless, you conceive that, in those low-roofed dwellings, her intentions are seconded. Be undeceived then: lawsuits, and the passions of lawsuits, have carried fierce dissension into this hidden paradise of the hills; and it is a fact, that not one of those seven families will now speak to another." We turned away at these words with a pang of misanthropy, and for one moment assented to the king of Brobdingnag—that men are "the most pernicious race of little odious vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth."

Something of the same sentiment accompanied us at intervals through this Life of Bentley, and the records which it involves of Cambridge. Where upon this earth shall peace be found, if not within the cloistral solitudes of Oxford and Cambridge? Cities of Corinthian beauty and luxury; with endowments and patronage beyond the revenues of considerable nations; in libraries—pictures—cathedrals, surpassing the kings of the earth; and with the resources of capital cities, combining the deep tranquillity of silvan villages;—places so favoured by time, accident, and law, come nearer to the creations of Romance than any other known realities of Christendom. Yet in these privileged haunts of meditation, hallowed by the footsteps of Bacon and Milton, still echoing to those of Isaac Barrow, and Isaac Newton absolutely walking amongst them, did the leading society of Cambridge—with that man at their head, who, for scholarship, was confessedly “the foremost man of all this world”—through a period of forty years’ fight and struggle with so deadly an acharnement; sacrificed their time—energy—fortune—personal liberty, and conscience, to the prosecution of their immortal hatreds; vexed the very altars with their fierce dissensions; and went to their graves so perfectly unreconciled, that, had the classical usage of funeral cremation been restored, we might have looked for the old miracle of the Theban Brothers, and expected the very flames which consumed the hostile bodies to revolt asunder, and violently refuse to mingle. Some of the combatants were young men at the beginning of the quarrel; they were grey-headed, palsied, withered, doting, before it ended. Some had outlived all distinct memory, except of their imperishable hatreds. Many died during its progress; and sometimes their deaths, by disturbing the equilibrium of the factions, had the effect of kindling into fiercer activity those rabid passions, which, in a Christian community, they should naturally have disarmed or soothed.

Of feuds so deadly, so enduring, and which continue to interest at the distance of a century, every body will desire to know who, in a criminal sense, was the author. The usual way of settling such questions is to say, that there were “faults on both sides,”—which, however, is not always the case; nor, when it is, are the faults always equal. Dr Monk, who gives the fullest materials yet published for a just decision, leaves us to collect it for ourselves. Meantime, we suspect that his general award would be against Bentley; for, though disposed to be equitable, he is by no means indulgent to his hero; and he certainly thinks too highly of Colbatch, the most persevering of all Bentley’s enemies, and a malicious old toad. If that, however, be Dr Monk’s leaning, there are others (with avenues, perhaps as good, to secret information) whose bias was the other way. In particular, we find Dr Parr, about forty years after Bentley’s death, expressing his opinion thus to Dr Charles Burney: “I received great entertainment from your account of our Aristarchus; it is well written and well directed; for, in spite of vulgar prejudice, Bentley was eminently right, and the College infamously wrong.”—[Dr Parr’s Works, vol. vii., p. 389.] Our own belief sets in towards the same conclusion. But, if not, we would propose, that at this time of day Bentley should be pronounced right, and his enemies utterly in the wrong. Whilst living, indeed, or whilst surviving in the persons of his friends and relations, the meanest of little rascals has a right to rigorous justice. But when he and his are all bundled off to Hades, it is far better, and more considerate to the feelings of us Public, that a little dog should be sacrificed than a great one; for by this means, the current of one’s sympathy with an illustrious man is cleared of ugly obstructions, and enabled to flow unbroken, which might else be unpleasantly distracted, between his talents on the one hand and his knavery on the other. And one general remark we must make upon the conduct of this endless feud, no matter who began it, which will shew Bentley’s title to the benefit of the rule we have proposed. People, not nice in distinguishing, are apt to confound all the parties to a feud under one common sentence; and, whatever difference they might allow in the grounds of quarrel, as to temper, at least, and charity, where all were confessedly irritated and irritating, they allow of none. But, in fact, between Bentley and his antagonists, the differences were vital. Bentley had a good heart; generally speaking, his antagonists had not. Bentley was overbearing, impatient of opposition, insolent, sometimes tyrannical. He had, and deservedly, a very lofty opinion of himself; he either had, or affected, to mean a one of his antagonists. Sume superbiam quæsitum meritis, was the motto which he avowed. Coming to the government of a very important college, at a time when its discipline had been greatly relaxed, and the abuses were many, his reforms (of which some have been retained even to this day) were pushed with too high a hand; he was too negligent of any particular statute that stood in his way; shewed too harsh a disregard to the feelings of gentlemen; and too openly disdained the arts of conciliation. Yet this same man was placable in the highest degree; generous; and, at the first moment when his enemies would make an opening for him to be so, forgiving. His literary quarrels, which have left the impression that he was irritable or jealous, were (without one exception) upon his part mere retorts to the most insufferable provocations; and though it is true, that when once teased into rousing himself out of his lair, he did treat his man with rough play, left him ugly remembrances of his leonine power, and made himself merry with his distressed condition; yet on the other hand, in his utmost wrath, there was not a particle of malice. How should there? As a scholar, Bentley had that happy exemption from jealousy, which belongs almost inevitably to conscious power in its highest mode. Reposing calmly on his own supremacy, he was content that pretenders of every size and sort should flutter through their little day, and be carried as far beyond their natural place as the intrigues of friends or the caprice of the public could effect. Unmolested, he was sure never to molest. Some people have a litch for unmasking impostors, or for avenging the wrongs of others. Porson, for example—what spirit of mischief drove him to intermeddle with Mr Archdeacon Travis? How Quixotic again in appearance—how mean in its real motive—was Dr Parr's defence of Leland and Jortin; or, to call it by its true name, Dr Parr's attack upon Bishop Hurd! But Bentley had no touch of this temper. When instances of spurious pretensions came in his way, he smiled grimly and good-naturedly in private, but forbore (sometimes after a world of provocations) to unmask them to the public.*

Some of his most bitter assailants, as Kerr, and Johnson of Nottingham, he has not so much as mentioned; and it remains a problem to this day, whether, in his wise love of peace, he forbore to disturb his own equanimity by reading the criticisms of a malignant enemy, or, having read them, generously refused to crush the insulter. Either way, the magnanimity was equal—for a man of weak irritability is as little able to abstain from hearkening after libels upon himself, as he is from retorting them. Early in life (Epist. ad Mill.) Bentley had declared—"Non nostrum est acerbioris irascibilis," It is no practice of mine to trample upon the prostrate; and his whole career in literature re-

* Take, for instance, his conduct to Barnes, the Cambridge Professor of Greek. Bentley well knew that Barnes was an indifferent scholar, whose ponderous erudition was illuminated by neither accuracy of distinction, nor elegance of choice. Yet Barnes spoke of himself in the most inflated terms, as though he had been the very Laureate of the Greek muses; and, not content with these harmless vaunts, scattered in conversation the most pointed affronts to Bentley, as the man under whose superiority he secretly groaned. All this Bentley refused to hear; praised him whenever he had an opportunity; even when Barnes intruded himself into the Phalaris dispute, and did him effectual services. At length Barnes published his Homer, and there shot his final arrow against Bentley, not indeed by name, but taking care to guide it to his mark, by words scattered in all companies. Bentley was now roused to put an end to this persecution. But how? He wrote a most masterly examination of a few passages in the new edition, addressed it as a confidential letter to Dr Davies, a common friend, desiring him to shew it to the Professor, by way of convincing him how easy a task such a critic would find it to ruin the character of the book, and thus appealing to his prudence for a cessation of insults; but at the same time assuring Dr Davies that he would on no account offer any public disparagement to a book, upon which Barnes had risked a little fortune. Could a more generous way have been devised for repelling public insults?

flected a commentary upon that maxim. To concede, was to disarm him. How opposite the temper of his enemies! One and all, they were cursed with bad tempers, and unforgiving hearts. Cunningham,* James Grouvius, and Johnson, Conyers Middleton,† and Colbatch, all lost their peace of mind—all made shipwreck of their charity during the progress of this dispute; some of them for life. But from Bentley, whether wrong or right, as to the materia litis, the manner of conducting it drew no qualities but those which did him honour; great energy; admirable resources and presence of mind the skill and address of a first-rate lawyer; and courage nearly unparalleled under the most disastrous turns of the case, those even, which, on two memorable occasions, (the deprivation of his degrees, and his ejection from the mastership of Trinity College,) seemed to have consigned him to ruin. In the very uttermost hurly-burly of the storm, it is not upon record that Bentley's cheerfulness forsook him for a day. At a time when Colbatch and Middleton were standing before judges as convicted delinquents, absconding from arrests, surrendering to jailors, sneaking to great men's levees, or making abject interest for the reversion of some hollow courtier's smile, or an insinuation of his treacherous promise, Bentley was calmly pursuing his studies in his castle of the Master's Lodge of Trinity College; sat on unconcernedly even after public officers were appointed to pull him out; and never allowed the good humour of his happy fireside to be disturbed by the quarrels which raved outside. He probably watched the proceedings of "the enemy," with the same degree of interest with which we all read the newspapers during a foreign war: and the whole of the mighty process, which the bad passions of the other faction made gall and

* With respect to this elegant and acute scholar, the most formidable of Bentley's literary opponents, the following remarkable statement is made by Dr Monk, (p. 461):—"Between Alexander Cunningham, the historian, and Alexander Cunningham, the editor of Horace, there are so many particulars of resemblance, that Thompson, the translator of the history, was forced, after a minute enquiry, to remain in suspense whether or not they were the same individual. It appears that they were both Scotchmen, had both been travelling tutors, both resided at the Hague at the same period, both were intimate with certain distinguished public characters, both were eminent chess-players, both accomplished scholars, and both lived to an advanced age. These and many other coincidences long baffled all enquiry respecting the identity or diversity of the two namesakes: and it has, I believe, but recently been ascertained beyond a doubt, that the critic died at the Hague in 1730, and the historian died in London in 1737." How truly disgusting that they would not die at the same time and place! This perverseness counteracts what Mr Wordsworth calls "the mighty stream of tendency:" undoubtedly they ought to have died on the same day of the same year, in which case the confusion would have been complete and inextricable.

As it is, we understand from a learned Scotch friend, that in certain papers which he communicated some years ago to Dr Irving for his Life of Buchanan, and which doubtless will there be found, this curious case of Doppelgänger is fully cleared up.

† This celebrated man was the most malignant of a malignant crew. In his Review of Bentley's Proposals for Editing the Greek Text of the New Testament, he stings like a serpent—more rancorous party pamphlets never were written. He hated Waterland with the same perfect malignity; and his letters to Warburton, published in a 4to collection of his Miscellaneous Tracts, shew that he could combine a part of sycophant upon occasion with that of assassin-like lampooner. It is, therefore, no unacceptable retribution in the eyes of those who honour the memory of an. Waterland and Bentley, men worth a hecatomb of Middletons, that the reputation of this venomous writer is now decaying—upon a belief at last thoroughly established, that in two at least, and those two the most learned of his works, he was an extensive plagiarist. This detection first threw light upon a little anecdote often related by Mr Prebendary Lowth, brother to Bishop Lowth. Just before the publication of the Life of Cicero, Lowth happened to be with Middleton. A gentleman came in, and abruptly asked him, if he had read the works of Bellenden? Middleton turned pale, fallerel, and acknowledged that he had. The whole scene was a mystery to Lowth. Parr's Preface to Bellendenus made all clear. So much for Conyers Middleton!

wormwood to them, to him appears to have given no more than the pleasurable excitement of a game of chess.

Having thus bespoke the favourable opinion of our readers for Dr Bentley, and attempted to give that impulse to the judgments upon his conduct, which the mere statement of the circumstances would not always suggest, until after a large examination of the contemporary documents, we shall draw up a rapid sketch of his life, reserving an ampler scale of analysis for the Phalaris controversy, and the college quarrel, as the two capital events which served to diversify a passage through this world else unusually tranquil and uniform.

Richard Bentley was born on the 27th of Jan., 1662, at Oulton, not far from Wakefield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Between his grandson, the celebrated Mr Cumberland, and his present biographer, there is a difference as to the standing of his parents. Cumberland labours to elevate the family to a station of rank and consideration, for which he receives the usual rebukes from Dr Monk, who pronounces them to have belonged to "the higher description of English yeomen," and thinks it more honourable to Bentley "to have raised himself from obscurity by the force of genius and merit," than "to have been born of gentle blood." But the two cases stand in no real opposition. For a man with Bentley's object, low birth is not otherwise an obstacle to success in England, than as the poverty, which it generally presumes, may chance to exclude him from the universities. Once there, he will find that the popular provisions of those great bodies ensure the fullest benefit to any real merit he may possess; and without that, even noble blood would have failed in procuring those distinctions which Bentley obtained. Besides, for Dr Monk's purpose, Bentley was not low enough—his friends being at any rate in a condition to send him to college. The zeal of Cumberland, therefore, we think rightly directed. And after all, with Dr Monk's leave, since the question is not, which sort of parentage would be the most creditable to Bentley, but which answers best to the facts, we must say that we incline to Cumberland's view. Finding it made out that, during the Parliament war, Bentley's family adhered to the Royal cause; and that of his two grandfathers, one was a captain, and the other a major, in the Cavalier army; we must think it probable that they belonged to the armigerous part of the population, and were entitled "to write themselves Esquire in any bill, quittance, &c., whatsoever." On the paternal side, however, the family was impoverished by its loyalty.

From his mother, who was much younger than his father, Bentley learned the Rudiments of Latin Grammar. He was afterwards sent to the grammar school of Wakefield, and, upon the death of his father, Bentley (then thirteen years old) was transferred to the care of his maternal grandfather, who resolved to send him to college. This design he soon carried into effect; and in the summer of 1676, at what would now be thought too early an age by three years at the least, Bentley was matriculated at St John's College, Cambridge. Of his studies at college nothing further is recorded than that he applied himself even thus early to the res metrica; and amongst his familiar companions, the only one mentioned of any distinction is the prodigious William Wotton. Of this monster in the annals of premature erudition, we remember to have seen several accounts; amongst others, a pretty good one in Birch's Life of Tillotson. But Dr Monk mentions some facts which are there overlooked: for instance, that at six years of age he read Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, together with some Arabic and Syriac. In his tenth year he entered at Catherine Hall, in Cambridge, on which occasion he was matriculated by the head of that College as Gulielmus Wotton infra decem annos nec Hammondo nec Grotio secundus. As this could be true only with a limited reference to languages, the entry seems boyish and precipitate. At thirteen, being then master of twelve languages, and his proficiency in several of these attested by undoubted judges, he took his degree of B.A., an honour for which there was no precedent. It is evident, however, from Wotton's case, that attainments of this kind are found generally, (as Butler says of He-brew in particular,) "to flourish best in barren ground." Dr Monk, indeed, seems to think that Wotton did not afterwards belie the splendour of his promise. We cannot agree with him. Surely his book on Ancient and Modern Learning, the most popular of his works, though necessarily entertaining from its subject, is superficial in a degree scarcely to be explained in one of so much reading, and commanding so much powerful assistance. Another of his works, a History of the Roman Empire, written expressly for the Duke of Gloucester, then heir apparent, has no conspicuous merit of any kind, either of popular elegance on the one hand, or of learned research on the other. In fact, Wotton's position in the world of letters was most unfortunate. With accomplishments that were worth little except for show, he had no stage on which to exhibit them; and, sighing for display, he found himself confounded in the general estimate with the obscure drudges of the age. How much more useful, and finally how much more brilliant, to have possessed his friend Bentley's exquisite skill in one or two languages, than a shallow mediocrity in a score!

Bentley took his first degree with distinction, his place in the arrangement of honours corresponding with that of third wrangler in the present system. Having now closed his education, he was left to speculate on the best way of applying it to his advancement in life. From a fellowship in his own college, the most obvious resource of a young scholar, he was unfortunately excluded by a by-law, not rescinded until the reign of George IV. At length, after two years' interval, spent (as Dr Monk supposes) at Cambridge, he was appointed by his college to the head mastership of the Spalding Grammar School. This situation, after holding it about a year, he quitted for the very enviable one of domestic tutor to the son of Stillingfleet, then Dean of St Paul's. For this also he was indebted to the influence of his college: and perhaps no sort of preferment could have been more favourable to Bentley's views. Stillingfleet was a truly good man; a most extensive and philosophic scholar; a gentleman, and acquainted with courts; and with a liberal allowance for the claims of a tutor, having himself officiated in that character. Another great advantage of the place was the fine library belonging to the Dean, which, excepting the celebrated ones of Moore, Bishop of Ely, and of Isaac Vossius, was perhaps the best private collection in the kingdom. It was besides a library of that particular composition which suited Bentley's pursuits; and in the Dean's conversation he had the very best directions for using it to advantage. Meantime, with this ample provision for intellectual wants, worldly ones were not likely to be overlooked. How possible it was at that day for a private tutor to reap nothing from the very highest connexions, was seen in the case of Dr Colbatch, one of Bentley's future enemies. This man had held that situation successively in the families of Bishop Burnet, and of the proud Duke of Somerset: and yet neither from the political Bishop, though all-powerful with Queen Mary, nor from the proud Duke, though Chancellor of his university, could he obtain any preferment. But Stillingfleet loved real merit; and, fortunately for Bentley, in the next reign, being raised to the mitre, possessed the ear of royalty beyond any ecclesiastical person of his own time.

It was in this fortunate situation that Bentley acquired that Biblical learning which afterwards entitled him to the Divinity Professorship, and which warranted his proposals for a revised text of the New Testament, even after that of his friend Mill. About six years being spent in this good man's family, most delightfully no doubt to himself,—and then chiefly laying the foundations, broad and deep, of his stupendous learning,—Bentley removed with his pupil early in 1689 to Oxford. Wadham College was the one selected; and both pupil and tutor became members of it. Stillingfleet was now raised to the see of Worcester: and from his extensive connexions, Bentley had the most useful introductions in every quarter. In particular, he had the privilege of disporting himself, like Leviathan, in the ocean of the Bodleian library: and it is certainly not going too far to say, that no man ever entered those sacred galleries so well qualified to make a general use of their riches. Of his classical accomplishments it were needless to speak. Mathematics, it is thought, by Dr Monk, that he studied at Cambridge: and it is certain, that in Dean Stillingfleet's family, he had, by a most laborious process of study, made himself an eminent master of the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac.

Dealing much in cattle, a man's talk is of oxen; and living in this El Dorado of books, it was natural that a man should think of writing one. Golden schemes floated in Bentley's mind; for he was a golden scholar, and these were the golden hours of his early manhood. Amongst other works, he projected at this period an entire edition of the Fragments of the Greek Poets, and also a Corpus of the Greek Lexicographers, (Hesychius, Suidas, Pollux, &c.) To the irreparable loss of Grecian literature, neither scheme was accomplished. Already in his Epist. ad Mill. he speaks of the first as abandoned—"Sed hæc fuerunt," is the emphatic expression. It was in the fates that Bentley's maiden performance as an author should be in other and more obscure society. Amongst the manuscript riches of the Bodleian there was a copy—the one sole* copy in this world—of a certain old Chronicler, about whose very name there has been a considerable amount of learned dust kicked up. Properly speaking, he ought to be called Joannes Malēlas Antiochenus: but, if you are not particular about your Greek, you may call him Malēla, without an s. This old gentleman, a fellow of infinite dullness, wrote a Chronicle beginning with Adam, and coming down to the 35th year of Justinian. And here lies the necessity of calling him either Malela or Malēlas; for, strange to say, as there were two Alexander Cunninghams, who at this very time were going about the world mere echoes or mocking-birds of each other, so there were two Johns, both of Antioch, both Chroniclers, both asses, (no distinction there,) and both choosing to start from Adam. The publication of this Chronicle had been twice meditated before, but interrupted by accidents. At length, in 1690, it was resumed under the superintendence of Mill; who claimed from Bentley a promise he had made to throw together any notes which might occur to him upon the proof sheets, as they came reeking from the press. These notes took the shape of an Epistola ad Millium: and thus the worthy old jackass of Antioch had the honour of coming forth to the world with the notes of Chilmead, (one of the two early projectors of an edition,) Prolegomena by Hody, a learned chaplain of Bishop Stillingfleet's, and this very masterly collection of disquisitions by Bentley upon topics† either closely connect-

* By the way, it should be borne in mind, that, over and above the translations which yet survive into the Arabic, (a resource obviously of little hope, except in the case of scientific books,) there are in all three avenues by which we may have a chance for recovering any of the lost classics: 1st, The Palimpsests, as in repeated instances of late in the Ambrosian Library; 2d, The Pompeii MSS. (for the sensible way of dealing with which, see a letter of Lord Holland to Dr Parr); and, 3d, The great chests of Greek MSS. in the Sultan's Library at Constantinople, packed up ever since the triumph of the Crescent in 1453.

† Amongst these is the name Malelas, which Hody disputed, contending for Malēla. Bentley replies by arguing the case on two assumptions: 1st, That the names were Greek. Here the sum of his pleading is this—that naturally the Latin language had no such termination as that of as with a parasyllabic genitive; that, in compliance with this original structure, all Greek names in as, were in early Latin rendered a; and that this conformity to the popular idiom might be looked for the more certainly, as the situation of the usage was one which appealed to the populace: whence it is that, in the comic drama of Rome, we meet with Phœdria, Cheria, Sosia, &c., to so great an extent. But in proportion as literature prevailed, a practice arose of giving to Greek names in as their real Greek termination, without any Roman deflexion. Hence even Varro, though somewhat of an antiquarian bigot in old Romanisms, has Archytas, Athenagoras, &c.; and Cicero is overrun with such names. One exception, however, in even Cicero's usage, is alleged upon the authority of Quintilian, viz.

ed with the work, or remotely suggested by it.

Here, by the way, we have a crow to pluck with Dr Monk. How he came to make such a mistake we know not; prima facie, one would suppose he had not read the work. But this is impossible, for he states very well the substance of the most important discussions in the epistle: yet certainly in the following sentence he prefers a charge against Bentley, which is altogether without foundation:—"In addressing his learned correspondent," says Dr Monk, "he is not satisfied with marking their intimacy by the terms $\phi\lambda\eta\kappa\iota\phi\alpha\lambda\eta$, Milli jucundissime, suavissime, &c.; but in one place he accosts him $\delta\iota\iota\omega\alpha\nu\theta\iota\sigma\iota\nu$ —an indecorum which neither the familiarity of friendship, nor the license of a dead language, can justify towards the dignified head of a house." Certainly Dr Monk aliud agbat when he wrote this censure, which at any rate from him, who elsewhere attempts to cheapen the dignity of Academic heads, would come with a peculiar want of grace. The case is this:—From a long digression, which Bentley confesses to be too discursive, he suddenly recalls himself to the old Chronicler—Sed ad Antiochensem redeo, (p. 486 of Lennep's republication;) and then, upon an occasion of an allusion to Euripides, he goes on to expose some laughable blunders of Malelas: one of these is worth mentioning;—the passage,

"Ἡκουσεν εἰς τὴν κυανεῖαν Συμπληγάδων Πέτρων φύβουτος"—

it seems, the old boy had so construed, as to make κυανεαν not a genitive but an accusative, and thus made a present to geography of the yet undiscovered country of the Cyanean land. Upon this, and a previous discovery of a "Scythian† Aulis," by the sharp-sighted man of Antioch, Bentley makes himself merry; rates the geographers for their oversights; and clapping old Malelas on the back, he thus apostrophizes him—"Euge vero, $\omega\iota\omega\alpha\nu\theta\iota\sigma\iota\nu$; profecto aptus natus es ad omnia abdita et retrusa contemplanda!" (Well done, Johnny! you are the boy for seeing through a mill-stone!) Manifestly, then, the I. M. that he is here addressing is not his correspondent John Mill, but the subject of his review, John Malelas, the absurd old jackass of Antioch. This passage, therefore, in mere justice, Dr Monk will cancel in his next edition: in fact, we cannot conceive how such a mistake has arisen with a man of his learning.

We must also very frankly state our disagreement with Dr Monk upon the style (meaning the temper) of this epistle. He charges it with "slippancy," and thinks some of the expressions "boastful." We have lately read it carefully with a view to these Hernagora. "Ego vero," says Bentley, "Cicronem ita scripsisse ne ipsi quidem Ciceroni affirmanti crediderim." And certainly the dismal hiatus of Hernagora inventor, makes it probable that Cicero wrote Hernagoras. Bentley grants, however, that Cicero wrote Phania Appii libertus; but why? Because names of slaves, being household words, naturally followed the mother idiom, and not the learned idiom of books. 2dly, However, let it be assumed, that the name is not Greek, but Barbarous, like that of $\delta\ \Sigma\iota\epsilon\rho\alpha$ in the Old Test., $\delta\ \Sigma\alpha\rho\alpha$ in the New. Bentley argues the case on this footing. But this, says he, I marvel at, "quod, ut de Græco nomine cognitio habeatur, ad barbaras nationes provocant"—(that, although the judicial investigation we are holding concerns a Greek name, yet the appeal is made to barbarians.) "However, no matter," says he, "as they choose to take the Huns for umpires, to the Huns we will go." And he then shews that the name of Attila became in Greek always $\delta\ \Lambda\tau\tau\iota\lambda\alpha\varsigma$. Yet here again he makes a subtle distinction. The ancient patriarchal names of the Old Test., as $\iota\alpha\kappa\omega\beta$, $\iota\omega\sigma\epsilon\phi$, $\Sigma\alpha\delta\lambda$, &c., are retained in Greek unmodified. But the very same names, borne by modern persons, become $\iota\alpha\kappa\omega\beta\epsilon\varsigma$, $\iota\omega\sigma\epsilon\phi\epsilon\varsigma$, $\Sigma\alpha\delta\lambda\epsilon\varsigma$, &c. Upon that analogy also, semi-barbarous names in α , as Abdalla, Mustapha, Juba, &c., which, had they been ancient, would have retained their final α , being modern, all become $\alpha\varsigma$ in Greek. Such is the outline of the refinements in this piece of learned special pleading, which is universally allowed to have settled the question.

* An emendation of Bentley's for $\Pi\lambda\acute{\alpha}\tau\eta\ \phi\iota\lambda\acute{\omicron}\nu\tau\iota\varsigma$.

censures; and we cannot find any foundation for them in a single instance. Se faire valoir is peculiarly the right of a young man on making his début. The mere history of the case obliges Bentley sometimes to make known the failure of Isaac Casaubon suppose, of Vossius, or of Gataker, when he had himself brilliantly succeeded: and supposing that the first of these heroes had declared a corruption desperate which Bentley restored with two strokes of his pen, was it altogether his duty to dissemble his exultation? Mere criticism, and a page covered with Greek, do not of themselves proclaim the pretensions of a scholar. It was almost necessary for Bentley to settle his own rank, by bringing himself into collision with the Scaligers, with Salmasius, and Pearson. Now, had this been done with irreverence towards those great men, we should have been little disposed to say a word in his behalf. But far otherwise. In some passage or other, he speaks of all the great critics with filial duty. Erravit in re levi, says he of one, gravioribus opinor studiis intentus, rursus amulationem nostram longissime positus. Of Pearson, in like manner, at the very moment of correcting him, he said on another occasion, that the very dust of his writings was gold. Æmilius Porcius, indeed, he calls hominum futilissimus, justly incensed with him for having misled a crowd of great writers in a point of chronology. But speaking of himself, he says—Nos pusilli hominuli; and that is always his language when obliged to stand forward as an opponent of those by whose labours he had grown wise.

On this work, as Bentley's first, and that which immediately made him known to all Europe, we have spent rather more words than we shall be able to do on the rest. In dismissing it, however, we cannot but express a hope, that some future editor will republish this and the other critical essays of Bentley, with the proper accuracy and beauty: in which case, without at all disturbing the present continuity of the text, it will be easy, by marginal figures and titles, to point out the true divisions and subdivisions of this elaborate epistle; for want of which it is at present troublesome to read.

It sometimes happens to men of extraordinary attainments, that they are widely talked of before they come forward on the public arena. Much "buzz" is afloat about them in private circles: and as in such cases, many are always ready to aid the marvellous, a small minority are sure, on the other hand, to affect the sceptical. In so critical a state of general expectation, a first appearance is every thing. If this is likely to be really splendid, it is a mistaken policy which would deprecate the raising of vast expectations. On the contrary, they are of great service, pushed even to the verge of extravagance, and make people imagine the splendour of the actual success even greater than it was. Many a man is read by the light of his previous reputation. Such a result happened to Bentley. Unfathered rumours had been wandering through "the circles," about an astonishing chaplain of the Bishop of Worcester; and so great was the contrast of power and perfect ease in his late work, that his trumpeters and heralds were now thought to have made proclamation too faintly. This state of public opinion was soon indicated to Bentley by a distinction which he always looked upon as the most flattering in his long life. Robert Boyle had died on the last day but one of the year 1691. By his will this eminent Christian left an annual stipend of 50*l.* for the foundation of a lecture in defence of religion against infidels. The appointment to this lectureship has always been regarded as a mark of honour: à fortiori, then, the first appointment. That there could have been little hesitation in the choice, is evident; for, on the 13th of February, 1692, Bentley was nominated to this office. The lectures which he preached in discharge of this duty, are deservedly valued—presenting as much, as various, and as profound philosophy as perhaps was compatible with the popular treatment of the subject. Bentley flattered himself that, after this assault, the atheists "were silent, and sheltered themselves under deism." But this was imaginary. Spinoza, in particular, could not have had that influence, which Bentley, Sam. Clarke, and so many others have fancied: for B. D. S. Opera Posthuma, 1677, where only his philosophic system can be found, has always been a very rare book;* and it was never reprinted until Professor Paulus, in our own days, published a complete edition of Spinoza's works. Bayle, it is true, gave some account of the philosophy, but a most absurd, and besides a contemptuous one. In fact, Bayle—spite of the esteem in which his acuteness was held by Warburton, and even by Leibnitz—must be now classed as a spirited litterateur rather than philosopher. Hobbists, however, we may believe Bentley, that there were in abundance: but they were a weak cattle; and on Bentley's particular line of argument, even their master hardly knew his own mind.

The lectures answered their end. They strengthened the public opinion of Bentley's talent, and exhibited him in a character more intimately connected with his sacred calling. Once only they were attacked from a quarter of authority. Dr Monk, it appears to us, undervalues the force of the attack, and, perhaps unduly, ascribes it to an impulse of party zeal. Keill, a Scotchman of talent, whose excellent lectures on Natural Philosophy are still quoted as a textbook in Germany, was led, (and—our impression is—led naturally,) in his Examination of Burnet's Theory of the Earth, to notice two errors of Bentley,—one of which, as Dr Monk puts it more on the footing of a verbal ambiguity than our impression of it would have warranted, we will not insist on. The other, unless our memory greatly deceives us, was this: Bentley, having heard that the Moon always presents the same face to our earth, inferred, from that fact, that she had no revolution upon her own axis; upon which, Keill told him, that the fact he stated was a ground for the very opposite inference; since the effect of the Moon's motion about the earth to bring a different face before us could not be counteracted but by a coincident revolution on her own axis. Keill was a coarse man, who called a spade a spade, as was afterwards sufficiently shewn in his almost brutal treatment of Leibnitz on behalf of his friend Sir Isaac Newton. And it is possible, undoubtedly, that, being a Professor at Oxford, he might have conceived some personal pique to Bentley while resident in that university. But we really see no reason for ascribing to any ungenerous motive a criticism, which, though preevishly worded, was certainly called for by the conspicuous situation of the error which it exposed.

In this year, Bentley was appointed a Prebendary at Worcester, and, in April 1694, Keeper of all the King's Libraries. During the same year, he was a second time summoned to preach the Boyle Lecture; and in the following year, was made one of the Chaplains in ordinary to the King.

Early in the year 1696, Bentley quitted the town house of the Bishop of Worcester, and commenced house-keeping in his own lodgings as Royal Librarian. These lodgings, had he reaped nothing else from his office, were, to him, as a resident in London, a royal preferment. They were in St James's palace, adjoining to those of the Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne, and looked into the Park. In this year, Bentley took the degree of Doctor of Divinity; and somewhere about the same time appeared the edition of Callinachus by his friend Greavius, with contributions from himself, of memorable splendour.

In 1697 commenced, on Bentley's part, that famous controversy about the Epistles of Phalaris, which has chiefly conferred immortality on his name. The circumstances in which it originated are briefly these: The well-known dispute in France, upon the intellectual pretensions in a comparison with each other of the Ancients and Moderns, had been transferred to England by Sir William Temple. This writer, just then at the height of his popularity, had declared for the ancients with more elegance than weight of matter; and, by way of fortifying his judgment, had alleged the Epistles of Phalaris and the Fables of Æsop as proofs that the oldest parts of literature are also the best. Sir William was aware that both works had been challenged as forgeries. However, the suspicions of scholars were as yet unmaturing; and, in a matter of taste, which was the present shape of the question, Sir William Temple's opinion seemed entitled to some consideration. Accordingly, the Honourable Charles Boyle, nephew to the illustrious philosopher of that name, who was at this time pursuing his studies at Christ Church, in Oxford, and, upon the suggestion of Aldrich, the head of that college, had resolved to undertake an edition of some Greek book, as an academic exercise, was directed to Phalaris in particular, by this recent opinion of a friend, to whom he looked up with filial confidence and veneration. To ensure as much perfection to his edition as was easily within his reach, Boyle directed Bennet, his London publisher, to procure a collation of a MS. in the King's Library. This brought on an application to Bentley, who had just then received his appointment as librarian; and his behaviour, on this occasion, scandalously misrepresented to Mr Boyle, furnished the first ground of offence to Boyle. How long a calumny can keep its ground, after the fullest refutation, appears from the Preface to Lennep's Latin version of Bentley's Dissertation, (edit. of 1781,) where, in giving a brief history of the transaction, the writer says,—“Bentleius tergiversari primum; et ægre quod sæpius efflagitatum erat concedere;” and again,—“ecce subito Bentleius iter parans Londino, maxima ope contendere a Benneto ut codex ille statim redderetur.” All this is false. Let us here anticipate the facts as they came out on both sides some years after. Bentley, by the plainest statements, has made it evident that he gave every facility for using the MS.; that he reclaimed it only when his own necessary absence from London made it impossible to do otherwise; that this necessity was foreseen and notified at the time of lending it; and that, even on the last day of the term prefixed for the use of the MS., sufficient time for dispatching the business twice over^t was good-naturedly granted by Bentley, after his first summons had been made in vain.

* How rare is evident from this, that at a great book sale in London, which had congregated all the Fancy, on a copy occurring, not one of the company but ourself knew what the mystical title-page meant.

These facts are established. That he lent the MS. under no sort of necessity to do so, nay, at some risk to himself, is admitted by Bennet; that he reclaimed it, under the highest necessity to do so, is not denied by any body. At what point of the transaction is it, then, that the parties differ? Simply as to the delay in lending, and on the matter of giving notice, that on such a day it would be resumed. A little procrastination in lending, and forgetting to give notice, would not have justified a public stigma, had either one or the other been truly imputed to Bentley. But both imputations he solemnly denied. It is painful that the stress of any case should rest upon a simple comparison of veracity between two men; yet, as Mr Bennet has made this inevitable, let us state the grounds of comparison between himself and Dr Bentley. In external respectability there was, in the first place, a much greater interval between[†] them than the same stations would imply

* Bentley ascertained, by an experiment upon one-third of the MS., that, without any extraordinary diligence, it could be collated throughout in a space of four hours. Now, his first summons was at noon; but he indulgently extended the term to “candle-light.” How soon was that? The day has since been ascertained to be Saturday, May 23. But as the year was upwards of half a century before the English reformation of the calendar, that day would correspond to the 2d of June at present. Being, therefore, within three weeks of the longest day, we may assume, that, in the latitude of London, “candle-light” could not be understood as earlier than 9 o'clock P. M. Allowing the collator, therefore, one hour for any other sort of collation, he had just double the time requisite for the collation of the MS.

† No two classes have, within the last century, so much advanced in social consideration as Bankers and Booksellers, (meaning Publishers.) The bankers of that day were merely goldsmiths; whence the phrase, hardly yet obsolete among elderly people, of “bankers' shops.” Booksellers, again, having rarely stood forward until Pope's time in the character of enlightened co-operators with literary men, naturally took their place amongst the mechanical agents of the press. At present, an influenat this day. Dr Bentley, in the next place, was never publicly convicted of a falsehood; whereas Beunet was, in this case at any rate, guilty of one. Thirdly, whilst the Doctor had no interest at stake which required the protection of a falsehood, (since, without a falsehood, he was clear of the discourtesy charged upon him,) Bennet had the strongest: he had originally brought forward a particular statement, in a private letter, as a cloak for his own and his collator's indolence, without any expectation that it would lead to public consequences; but now, what he had begun in policy, he clung to from dire necessity; since, unless he could succeed in fastening some charge of this nature upon Dr Bentley, his own excuse was made void; his word of honour was forfeited; and, from the precipitate attack on Bentley, into which he had misled his patron, all colour of propriety vanished at once.

However, Bennet's private account was, as yet, uncontradicted; and, on the faith of that, Boyle acquainted the public, in the Preface to his edition of Phalaris, that, up to the 40th Letter, he had taken care to have the book collated with the King's MS.; but that, beyond that, the librarian had denied him the use of it, agreeably to his peculiar spirit of courtesy. Upon the very first publication of the book, Bentley saw it, and immediately wrote to Mr Boyle, explaining the matter in a polite and satisfactory manner. Boyle replied in gentlemanly terms, but did not give him that substantial redress, which Bentley had reason to expect, of cancelling the leaf which contained the affront. No further steps were taken on either side for some time; nor does it certainly appear that any would have been taken, but for an accidental interference of a third party. This was Wotton, Bentley's college friend. His book on Ancient and Modern Learning, originally published in 1694, and called out by Sir W. Temple's Essay on the same subject, was now (1697) going into a second edition; and as a natural means of increasing its interest, he claimed of Bentley an old promise to write a paper exposing the spurious pretensions of Phalaris and Æsop. This promise had been made before the appearance of Mr Boyle's book, and evidently had a reference to Sir William Temple's strange judgment upon those authors. But, as matters had altered since then, Bentley endeavoured to evade a task which would oblige him to take a severe notice of Mr Boyle's incivility and injustice. Wotton, however, held him to his engagement, and Bentley (perhaps reluctantly) consented.—Here again the foreign editor of Leuvenp is too rash: he says of Bentley, that "cupide occasionem amplexus est." But we are not to suppose that the sincerity with which a man declines a fierce dispute, is always in an inverse ratio to the energy with which he may afterwards pursue it. Many a man shrinks with all his heart from a quarrel, for the very reason that he feels too sensibly how surely it will rouse him to a painful activity, if he should once embark in it, and an irritation fatal to his peace. In the following year, Boyle, or the Christ-Church faction who used his name, replied at length. And certainly a more amusing* book, upon a subject so unpromising, has rarely been written. In particular, we agree with Dr Monk, that few happier efforts of pleasantry exist, than that piece of raillery upon Bentley, where his arguments for the spuriousness of Phalaris are turned against himself, some critic of a future age being supposed to tial publisher belongs to a profession, which it belongs to himself to render dignified. In Bennet's time, he had not ceased to be (what a mere seller of books still is) a tradesman. After all, Gibson, the collator, has confessed in Bentley's favour.

* Hardly less amusing is the first Dissertation of Bentley, as published in the second edition of Wotton, (but in the third edition, 1705, and all subsequent ones, omitted.) This, where the heads only of the arguments are touched, without that elaborate array of learning which was afterwards found necessary, and where the whole is treated with irresistible fun and merriment, is a most captivating piece of criticism. A general reader, therefore, who is careless of the minute learning of the case, should read merely this first Dissertation, and Boyle's answer.

argue for the spuriousness of the Doctor's dissertation, as a work obviously impossible to have proceeded from a great scholar and a person of dignified station. As to learning, certainly the joint-stock of the company made but a poor exchequer for defraying a war upon Bentley; yet it was creditable to wits and men of fashion: and in one point of view it was most happily balanced, for it was just shallow enough to prevent them from detecting their own blunders; yet, on the other hand, deep enough to give them that colourable show of being sometimes in the right, which was indispensable for drawing out Bentley's knowledge. Had it been a little deeper, they would have forborne their attack on Bentley: had it been a little shallower, Bentley could have had no motive for replying to them. Partly from the real merit of the book in those points which the public could best appreciate, partly from the extensive and brilliant connexions of the writers, it was eagerly read—a second edition was immediately demanded, and Bentley was supposed to have been defeated. He, meantime, "hushed in grim repose," was couchant; and, with his eye upon the gambols of his victims, was settling himself at leisure for his fatal spring. Spite of the public applauses, some ominous misgivings were muttered: one or two of the Boyle party began to "funk;" they augured no good from the dead silence of Bentley; and Boyle, in particular, who was now in Ireland, sent to Atterbury some corrections furnished by his earliest tutor Gale, the Dean of York; an intimation of error, which Atterbury, who had been a chief contributor to the book, deeply resented. But errors, or corrections, were now alike past notice. Pelides was now armed for the field: the signal was given; and at length, with the fullest benefit of final revision, which left no room for friend or foe to point out a flaw, that immortal Dissertation (immortalis ista Dissertatio, to speak the words of Porson) descended like a thunder-bolt upon the enemy,

—————"And in one night
The trumpets silenced, and the plumes laid low."

In 1699, being then in his 38th year, Bentley received that main preferment which was at once his reward and his scourge for the rest of his life. At the latter end of that year, Dr J. Montague was transferred (we cannot say, with Dr Monk, promoted) from the Mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge, to the Deanery of Durham. Learning, services to religion, and (according to one rather scandalous tradition*) the firmness which he had manifested in governing the family of Bishop Stillingfleet, all conspired to point out Bentley as a person pre-eminently eligible to this station. Accordingly, he received the appointment; and on the first day of February, 1700, he was solemnly installed in his office. It is evident that he rated its value somewhat differently† from Dr Monk; for he refused, in

* The story is this:—Bishop Stillingfleet is reported to have said, "We must send Bentley to rule the turbulent Fellows of Trinity College. If any body can do it, he is the person; for I am sure that he has ruled my family ever since he entered it." Upon this Dr Monk argues, that the anecdote is doubly refuted; first, by the fact that Stillingfleet had been some time dead when the vacancy occurred; secondly, because the Fellows had not been turbulent before Bentley's accession to the headship. Now, a little consideration will shew, that the anecdote may be substantially true for all that, and probably was so (since it rests on too pointed and circumstantial an allusion to have been invented). Full two years before Bentley's instalment, it appears that a vacancy had been anticipated, and a canvass made, upon the rumoured appointment of Dr Montague to the see of Worcester. That was the occasion, no doubt, of Stillingfleet's remark. Then, as to the word turbulent, besides that allowance must be made for the laxity of an oral story, the Fellows might be riotous in another sense than that of resisting the master's authority; and throughout Dr Montague's time, who perhaps was as riotous as they, it is pretty certain that they were so.

† Dr Monk's undervaluation of college headships is so pointedly affected, and really so extravagant, that we cannot but suspect some personal pique or jealousy, how caused we pretend not to guess, as the foundation of it. Everywhere he speaks after years, to exchange it for the poor Bishopric of Bristol; and, being asked by the Minister what preferment he would consider worth his acceptance, wisely replied, that which would leave him no reason to wish for a removal.

This appointment was made under the unanimous recommendation of an Episcopal Commission, to whom King William, better fitted for a guard-room than the civil duties of the cabinet, had delegated the disposal of all church preferment within the gift of the crown. By the public it could not but have been approved; but it was unpopular in the college, composed chiefly of indolent sots, who were not likely to anticipate with pleasure the disadvantageous terms on which they would stand with so accomplished a head. And our own conviction is, that the appointment would hardly have been carried, had it not been backed by the influence of the Princess Anne. Since the death of Queen Mary, whose rancorous quarrel with her sister had never been settled, the natural influence of the Princess had been allowed to revive. That excellent lady regarded with particular favour the learned champion of Christianity; and had designed that her son, the Duke of Gloucester, should be sent, at a proper age, to the college over which so meritorious a person presided. In this scheme so much stress was laid on the personal co-operation of Bentley, that, by an arrangement unheard of in English universities, his Royal Highness was to have resided under the master's roof. But these counsels were entirely defeated by the hand of Providence, which then lay heavy upon that illustrious house: in six months after Bentley's installation, the young Prince was summoned to the same premature death which had carried off all the children of his parents.

Finding himself now able to offer a suitable establishment to the woman of his heart, on the 4th of January, 1701, Bentley married Mrs (or, in modern language, Miss) Joanna Bernard, daughter of Sir John Bernard of Brampton, in the county of Huntingdon. This lady, whom he had been accustomed to meet in the family of Bishop Stillingfleet, brought him four children, two daughters and two sons, of whom one died in infancy. He found her a most faith-of deaneries as of course superior in dignity to headships, forgetting that he himself has occasion to mention one dean (a dean of York) who looked to the mastership of Trinity as an object of ambition. And in one place he takes a slight beyond our comprehension: for, according to him, in a dispute between the head of a college and an archbishop, the parties stand "upon such unequal ground," that it is matter of astonishment to find it lasting beyond a moment. How! is it in England that we hear such language, and in 1830? Why, but the other day, we had the edifying spectacle of an archbishop descending to a newspaper altercation with a mob orator, on the subject of his own money concerns! There was unequal ground. But, with justice on his side, we really see nothing alarming in an archdeacon and a head of a college maintaining a controversial correspondence with a prince of the blood. A Master of Trinity Coll. Cambridge, presumptuous in disputing with an archbishop on a matter of literature and academic interest!! What false impressions would a foreigner carry away on the relations of English dignities from Dr Monk's book! The fact is, that, in popular consideration, a head of one of the smaller colleges, in either Cambridge or Oxford, is equal at the least to a dean; and the head of Christ Church in Oxford, or Trinity in Cambridge, (perhaps some of the other colleges in both,) and the heads of the single colleges, which constitute the whole university in Dublin, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, are equal to bishops. We appeal to Dr Monk himself, to say candidly which is the greater man in Oxford—the Dean of Christ Church, or the Bishop of Oxford? But Oxford is a poor bishopric. True; and that introduces a fresh ground of comparison. As stations of profit, sometimes the headships have the advantage (united, as they often are, with complementary livings,) sometimes the bishoprics. As stations of comfort, however, they stand in no comparison. A college head has the most delightful sinecure in the world; whereas bishoprics, by those who are determined to do the work of them, are found to be the most laborious situations in the whole establishment. But here there are secrets: See the very opposite reports, for instance, of the see of Worcester, when held by bishops of different character.

ful companion through the storms of his after life; and as her family connexions were of considerable distinction, and two years afterwards emerged into a blaze of court favour, she had the happiness of giving a powerful assistance to her husband at a moment of imminent danger. There is a story current, that during his courtship Bentley had nearly forfeited her favour by speaking sceptically of the Book of Daniel—a story resting, it seems, on the slight authority of “wicked” Will. Whiston,* and which, as Dr Monk observes, is “exceedingly improbable.”

About five months after his marriage, he was collated to the Archdeaconry of Ely, which brought with it not only honour, but two church livings.

After this, Dr Bentley never actively solicited any further preferment, except once. This was in 1717, when the Regius Professorship of Divinity, by far the richest in Europe, became vacant by the death of Dr James. It was held that Bentley was indigible as head of Trinity; for it might have happened, by the letter of the statutes, that he himself, in one character, would become judge of his own delinquencies in the other. However, there was at least one precedent in his favour; and as the real scruples of his opponents grew out of any thing but principle, whilst his very enemies could not deny that his qualifications for the place were unrivalled, it is agreeable to record, that the intrigues for defeating him were met and baffled by far abler intrigues of his own; and, on the 2d of May, 1718, he was installed in this most lucrative office.

Referring to the earlier years of his connexion with Trinity College, we may characterise his conduct generally as one continued series of munificent patronage to literature, beneficial reforms in college usages and discipline, many of which are still retained at this day with gratitude, and, finally, by the most splendid and extensive improvements of the college buildings. His acts of the first class were probably contemplated by the Fellows with indifference; but those of the second, as cutting off abuses from which they had a personal benefit, or as carried with too high a hand, and by means not always statutable, armed the passions of a large majority against him, whilst the continued drain upon their purses for public objects, which, it must be confessed, was in some instances immoderately lavish, sharpened the excitement against him by the irritation of immediate self-interest. Hence arose a faction so strongly organized for the purpose of thwarting him in future, and of punishing him for the past, as certainly no delinquencies of the most eminent state criminal have ever yet called forth in any nation. Bentley, however, resisted with one hand, and continued to offend with the other. The contest soon became a judicial one; and as it was the most memorable one in every respect that England has ever witnessed—for duration, and the inexhaustible resources of the person whose interest was chiefly at stake upon its issue—we shall give a faithful abstract of all its revolutions, condensed from many scores of pages in Dr Monk's quarto. In any life of Bentley, this affair must occupy a

* This epithet, bestowed playfully upon Whiston by Swift, in ridicule of his sanctimony, would almost seem to have been seriously justified by his general bad faith in scattering injurious anecdotes about every body who refused to fall in with his follies. His excuse lies in the extreme weakness of his brain. Think of a man, who had brilliant preferment within his reach, dragging his poor wife and daughter for half a century through the very mire of despondency and destitution, because he disapproved of Athanasius, or because the Shepherd of Hermas was not sufficiently esteemed by the Church of England! Unhappy is that family over which a fool presides. The secret of all Whiston's lunacies may be found in that sentence of his Autobiography, where he betrays the fact of his liability, from youth upwards, to flatulency. What he mistook for conscience was flatulence, which others (it is well known) have mistaken for inspiration. This was his original misfortune: his second was, that he lived before the age of powerful drastic journals. Had he been contemporary with Christopher North, the knout would have brought him to his senses, and extorted the gratitude of Mrs Whiston and her children.

foremost place; and, considering the extreme intricacy of Dr Monk's account, and the extreme falsehood of that in all former biographies, we hope to earn the thanks of our readers by the closeness of our analysis.

On the 21st of December, 1709, the feuds of Trinity College, which had been long ripening to a crisis, were first brought under the eye of a competent manager. On that day, Mr Edmund Miller, a Fellow of Trinity, coming on a Christmas visit to his old friends, happened to enter the College at the very moment when a fresh encroachment of Dr Bentley's had flung the whole society into agitation. To Miller, as a lawyer and a Fellow, their grievances were submitted by the College; and as he lost no time in avowing himself their champion, and in very insolent terms, Dr Bentley lost as little in forcibly dispossessing him of his Fellowship—an act of violence which was peculiarly mistimed; for it did not lessen Miller's power, stimulated his zeal, and added one more to the colourable grounds of complaint. Miller's name was struck off the College boards on the 18th of January; on the 19th, it was restored by the Vice-master and some senior Fellows; and on the 24th, it was again struck off by Bentley. Matters, it may be supposed, were now coming to extremities: and about this time it was that Bentley is said to have exclaimed—"Henceforward, farewell peace to Trinity College!"

For all important disputes which can arise in the different colleges (about 45 in number) which compose the English universities, the final appeal lies to the Visitor of each college. But in the present case a previous question arose, "Who was the visitor?" the Crown, or the Bishop of Ely? Two separate codes of statutes, each in force, held a language on this point inconsistent with each other; and the latter code was even inconsistent with itself. However, as it happened that the particular statute which met the present case spoke unequivocally of the Bishop as visitor, it was resolved to abide by that assumption. And therefore, after communicating with the Bishop, a formal petition was addressed to his lordship, and on the 6th of February, 1710, signed by the Vice-master and twenty-nine Fellows. The Bishop, having received the petition without delay, made as little in sending Bentley a copy of it. And to this Bentley replied in a printed letter to his lordship. The two general heads, under which the charges against Bentley had been gathered, were dilapidation of the College-funds, and violation of the statutes. These charges in the present letter are met circumstantially; and in particular on that principal attempt of Bentley's to effect a new and different distribution of the college income, which had in fact furnished the determining motive to the judicial prosecution of the quarrel, Dr Monk admits that he makes out a very powerful case. Mortified vanity and disappointed self-interest, Bentley describes as the ruling impulses of his enemies: "Had I," says he, "herded and sotted with them; had I suffered them to play their cheats in their several offices, I might have done what I would; I might have devoured and destroyed the College, and yet come away with their applauses for a great and good master." Bentley, in fact, was a most unpopular head succeeding to a very popular one. From whatsoever motive, he had not courted the society of his Fellows: that of itself was a thing that could not be forgiven; and perhaps it is true that from pure mortified amour propre, united with those baser impulses which Bentley points out, fastening upon such occasions as the rashness of Bentley too readily supplied, the prosecution against him did radically take its rise.

What was the prevailing impression left by Bentley's pamphlet we do not learn. However, as it was well understood to be really his, it did not fail to provoke numerous answers; amongst which Mr Miller's was eminent for the closeness of its legal arguments, and Blomer's for wit and caustic personality. After the petition, however, with the exception of some attempts on Bentley's side to disunite his enemies by holding out temptations which, as often as they failed, were immediately carried to account by the opposite faction as meditated breaches of the statute—it does not appear that either side made any movement until the 11th July, 1710, when the charges against Bentley were finally digested into fifty-four separate articles. These, having first been presented to the Bishop of Ely, were published in the shape of a pamphlet—supported by such extracts from the statutes as seemed necessary to illustrate or substantiate the charges. The Bishop's first step was to send a copy of the articles to Bentley, who on his part appears "to have taken no notice of them whatever." This, be it observed, for many a good year continued to be a right-hand mode of manœuvring with Bentley: unless stirred up by a very long pole, he would not roar for any man.

Meantime, in this year, 1710, had occurred that most memorable of all intrigues, which, out of no deeper root than the slippery tricks of a waiting woman, had overset the policy of Europe. The Whigs were kicked out: the Tories were kicked in; so far the game went just the wrong way for Bentley, his name being always for fancy borne on the Whig lists—but that was a trifle. All the public disadvantages of his party being ousted, were compensated a thousand times over by the private benefit, that his wife happened to be related in blood to Lord Boliughbroke, (then Mr Secretary St John,) and also to Mr Masham, husband of the favourite. "On this hint" he moved. By one or both of these channels he reached the ear of Mr Harley, the Lord Treasurer. The Queen was already won over to his cause; for she had been acquainted of old with the Doctor; and Mrs Bentley's court connexions took care that the scandalous lives of some amongst Bentley's opponents should lose nothing in the telling. The Doctor was "invited" by the Prime Minister to sketch a scheme of conciliation; and in obedience he drew up the projet of a Royal Letter, which has since been found amongst the Harleian papers. Let it not offend the reader to hear, that in this letter each separate point in dispute was settled in favour of the Doctor himself. Reasonable as that was, however, Dis aliter visum est: the Minister was far too tortuous himself to approve of such very plain dealing. Indeed, as a lesson upon human nature, the "Royal Letter" must have been a perfect curiosity: for by way of applying a remedy to the Master's notorious infirmity of excessive indulgence and lax discipline, the letter concluded with strictly enjoining him "to chastise all license among the Fellows," and promising royal countenance and co-operation in the discharge of duties so salutary.

Whether this bold stroke came to the knowledge of the enemy, is hard to say; for Dr Monk gives us reason to think that it did, and did not, in the very same sentence. Certain it is that Bentley's Royal Letter was forwarded to the Premier on the 10th November, 1710; and on the 21st of that month he received a peremptory summons from the Bishop of Ely to answer the articles against him by the 18th of December. At one time Bentley avowed a design of appealing to the Convocation; but for this, when steps were taken to baffle him, he substituted a petition to the Queen, explaining that her Majesty was the true visitor of Trinity College, that the Bishop of Ely was usurping her rights, and that Richard Bentley, resisting this usurpation, threw himself on her royal protection.

This petition met with immediate attention, and was referred by Mr Secretary St John to the Attorney and Solicitor-General, who meantime stayed the Bishop's proceedings. Five months were spent in hearing all parties; and on May 29, 1711, the two officers made their report, which was favourable to the Bishop's claim as respected Bentley, but pointed out to the Queen and the Doctor a legal mode of resisting it. As this decision left Bentley to no more than a common remedy at law, he determined to obtain higher protection; and on July 12, he addressed a letter to Harley, now Earl of Oxford, congratulating him on his recent escape from assassination, stating his own situation, and concluding with the offer of dedicating to his lordship the edition which he had been long preparing of Horace. This appeal obtained for him the Minister's active protection; the Bishop was again directed to stay proceedings; and on the 8th of December the Horace was published, with a dedication, taking due notice of Harley's honours* of descent from the Veres and Mortimers. Bentley avowed his own change of party by saying, that "Horace was not less in favour with Mæcenæ from his having once served under the banners of Brutus and Cassius."

In 1712, after above seven months' deliberation, the crown lawyers made a report on the question of—Who was Visitor? It was unfavourable to Bentley; for though declaring the Crown visitor in a general sense, it decided, notwithstanding, for the Bishop of Ely, in the single case of delinquency charged upon the Master—the very case in question; and one of the lawyers, Sir Joseph Jekyll, declared for the Bishop unconditionally. Now, then, it was expected that the interdict on the Bishop would be immediately taken off. However, it was not; and some speculations arose at that time upon this apparent mystery, which have since appeared to be unfounded. Mrs Bentley's influence was supposed to be at work. But the secret history of the intrigue was very different. The truth was this: Bentley's enemies had now found their way to Lord Oxford's ear; this should naturally have operated to Bentley's ruin; but fortunately for him, the Treasurer viewed the whole case as one not unworthy of his own management upon Machiavelian principles. A compromise of the dispute was probably what the Minister proposed; and if that were found impossible, an evasion, by a timely removal of Bentley to some other situation.

Meantime, these conciliatory intentions on the part of the Premier were suddenly defeated by a strong measure of Bentley's. In the winter of 1712, he refused his consent to the usual division of the College funds. Attacked in this quarter, the Fellows became desperate. Miller urged an application to the Court of Queen's Bench, with a view to compel the Bishop of Ely to proceed as Visitor; for it was believed that the royal interdict would not be recognised by that court. Upon this the Ministers shrank from the prospect of being publicly exposed as partisans in private cabals; and Lord Bolingbroke wrote hastily to the Bishop of Ely, giving him the Queen's permission to proceed "as far as by law he was empowered." Thus warranted, the Fellows brought their cause before the Queen's Bench, and before the end of Easter term, 1713, obtained a rule for the Bishop to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue to compel him to discharge his judicial functions.

Two considerable advantages had been obtained by Bentley about this time; he had been able to apply the principle of divide et impera in the appointment to an office of some dignity and power: a success which, though it really amounted to no more than the detaching from his enemies of that single member who benefited by the bribe, he had dexterously improved into a general report that the party arrayed against him were repentant and disunited. The other advantage was of still higher promise. Early in the summer of 1712, the negotiations then pending at Utrecht had furnished the Whigs with an occasion for attack upon Ministers which was expected to unseat them. How sanguine were the hopes embarked upon this effort, appears by the following passage from Swift's Journal to Stella—"We got a great victory last Wednesday in the House of Lords, by a majority, I think, of twenty-eight; and the Whigs had desired their friends to bespeak places to see Lord Treasurer carried to the Tower." In this critical condition, it was important to Oxford and Bolingbroke that their security should appear to stand not merely upon Parliamentary majorities, but also on the general sense of the country. Addresses, therefore, expressing public confidence, were particularly welcome at court; and Bentley managed one for them at Cambridge, which he was deputed to present.

But these were advantages which could avail him nothing in the new posture of the dispute. The Court of Queen's Bench had relieved the Bishop of Ely from the royal interdict. The Bishop lost no time in throwing Bentley upon his defence. Bentley replied laconically (June 18, 1713); and after some further interchange of written pleadings with his accusers, he attempted to bring the whole affair to an abrupt issue at Cambridge; in which case, for want of mature evidence, an acquittal must have followed. But the Bishop was on his guard. He had engaged the late Whig Lord Chancellor, (Lord Cowper,) and Dr Newton, an eminent civilian, as his assessors; and he replied dryly, that if it suited their convenience, November would be the time of trial; but at all events, London would be the place, as best furnished for both sides with the proper legal aids.

* We know not how true Harley's pretensions in this particular may be; certainly Lord Bolingbroke ridicules them harshly, in his Letter to Sir William Wyndham, as mere jovial inspirations from the fumes of claret.

However, it happened, from the political agitations of that period, that the trial did not in fact come on until May, 1714. The great hall of Ely House was the court-room, and eight of the most eminent lawyers of the day assisted on one side or other as counsel. On the charge of wasting the College goods, Bentley made out a strong case. He produced the sanction of a majority; and the funds, it appeared, had been applied, at any rate, to the adorning and repairing of the College. As to the other charge of violating the statutes, it had been Bentley's custom to palliate his strong measures by shifting between the statute and the practice, just as either happened to afford him most countenance; but there were some acts oppressive beyond the countenance of either precedent or statute. Public opinion, and, it is supposed, the private opinion of the Bishop, had hitherto powerfully favoured Bentley, but forsook him as the trial advanced; and tradition records, that on some remarkable expression of this, Bentley fainted away. At length, after six weeks' duration, the Visitor was satisfied that the case had been established, and ordered a sentence of ejection from the Mastership to be drawn up. This was done, and the sentence was afterwards found amongst his papers. Meantime, the good Bishop Moore had caught cold during the long sittings; and on the 31st of July, before any of his apparitors could execute the sentence, he was himself summoned away by a sterner apparitor, to the other world. On the day following died Queen Anne; and in one moment the favour of Oxford and Bolingbroke had become something worse than worthless. Thus suddenly did Bentley see both friends and foes vanish from the scene, and the fine old quarrel of Trinity College fell back to the status quo ante bellum, and was welcome to begin the world again.

So passed the first five years of the feud. Fleetwood, the new Bishop of Ely, declined to act as Visitor of the Master, unless he could also visit the Fellows. Upon this significant hint, the prosecutors of Bentley, now reduced by six who had died during the struggle, acceded to a compromise. Sensible, however, that so long as Miller continued to be a Fellow, the stifled fire would be continually rekindled, Bentley applied the whole force of his mind to eject him. A former pretext had been quashed; he now found a new one, but all in vain. The result for the present was simply to refresh the fury of Miller. He was now become a Sergeant; and he laid fresh articles before the Bishop, who persisted, however, in declining to act.

At this point of the history, a new actor came upon the stage, who brought to the management of the quarrel, self-devotion like that of a Christian martyr, and malignity like that of a Pagan persecutor. This was Dr Colbatch, Professor of Casuistry. As a Fellow of Trinity College, he had unavoidably taken some interest in the affair from the first; but from duty or gratitude he had supported the Master; or had passed into a state of strict neutrality; or, finally, had acquiesced with reluctance in the measures of Miller. At length, however, it is said that some affair of college leases, in the terms of which Bentley seemed to sacrifice reversionary to present interests, put an end to his languor; and he parted from the Master in a state of enmity that in this life was destined to no repose.

Now, then, the College was in perfect anarchy; yet the Bishop of Ely still refused to interfere, unless ordered by the King. In this dilemma the Archbishop of Canterbury, Wake, (the same, we think, who entertained the mad project for some sort of union with the Popish or Gallican Church,) pointed out the steps to be taken, amongst which the first was a petition to the King in Council. His Grace had himself lately received an affront from Bentley, and he now declared the jolly old Doctor to be "the greatest instance of human frailty that he knew of." After some delay, caused by the weakness of the Fellows in neglecting a prudent caution of the Archbishop, the petition was called for by the council and read. Then came a scene, in the history of public business, worthy of Swift. The council remits the case to Sir Edward Northey, at that time Attorney-General; Mr Attorney remits to the Bishop of Ely; the Bishop back again to Mr Attorney; and finally exit Mr Attorney in a hurry with all the papers in a bundle; for Sir Edward was soon dismissed from office, and carried off the quarrel in his pocket. This was in 1716: for the three years which succeeded, Colbatch allowed himself to be amused with the merest moonshine by the Chancellor, Lord Macclesfield, who secretly protected Bentley. In 1719 the Petition came again to light; and being read at the Council board, was referred by the Lords Justices, who represented the absent King, to a committee of the Privy Council. This resurrection from Sir Edward Northey's pocket, was a sad blow to Bentley: three years' slumber gave him hopes that the petition had been applied to some "culinary or post-culinary purpose," in which case he was well assured that another of equal weight could no longer be substituted. However, the next step was to get it laid, and that could be done only by a compromise with Sergeant Miller. This had been attempted in vain some years back, as it happened that the Sergeant was at that time discharging his wrath in a book against the Doctor. That book, however, hurt nobody but its author; and the Sergeant now listened favourably to an overture, which offered him a profitable retreat. He retired for ever from the contest, with the reputation of a traitor, and 528 pounds sterling in his purse; he rose afterwards to be a member of Parliament, and a Baron of Exchequer in Scotland, but in Cambridge he never retrieved his character.

For eleven years the quarrel had now raged in the courts; for the next seven, in consequence of this compromise with Miller and the Bishop of Ely's inertia, it was conducted by the press; and strange it is to record, that all attempts in this way of Bentley's enemies, though practised authors, recoiled heavily on themselves—How many pamphlets, so many libels. Sergeant Miller had already paid dearly for his. Next came Conyers Middleton, who, in two particular sentences, seemed to intimate that justice could not be had (or even a hearing) from the King in Council. In November, 1721, the King and Richard Bentley taught him in Westminster Hall to take a new view of the subject. He was compelled to ask pardon, and heavily amerced in costs. Colbatch, with this warning before his eyes, committed exactly the same fault in a more dangerous shape. He was prosecuting Bentley as the supposed author of a supposed libel on himself in the University Courts; and in support of the University jurisdiction, he published a book called Jus Academicum. Circumstances arose, however, to convince him that more danger was at hand to himself than his antagonist, and he declared himself willing to drop the proceedings. "Are you so?" said Bentley; "but so am not I." There is a vulgar story of a gentle Quaker, who, finding a dog in the act of robbing his larder, declined rough modes of punishment, but said he would content himself with a parting admonition; upon which, opening the door to the dog, he cried after him—"Mad dog! good people, a mad dog!" In the same fashion did Bentley, not troubling himself to institute prosecutions, quietly beg leave, by his counsel, to read a sentence or two from the Jus Academicum before the Judges of the King's Bench. That was enough: the Judges bounced like quicksilver, for their jurisdiction was questioned; and Dr Colbatch, in Mr Thurtell's language, was "book-ed." The troubles he went through in skulking from justice, and running after great men's intercession, would really make a novel. The following extracts from Dr Monk's account, lift up the veil upon the wretched condition of him who is struggling in the meshes of the law. After mentioning that the two Secretaries of State had promised their intercession with the Chief Justice, the account goes on thus :—

"He himself preferred his application to the Lord Chancellor, now Earl of Macclesfield, who, however great might be his faults, was remarkably accessible and affable. He indulged Colbatch with many interviews; and although he condemned, without reserve, the offending passages of his book, promised him his good offices with the Chief Justice, to make the consequences light. But the patronage of these great ministers was not calculated to render the unfortunate divine any real service. The distinguished judge, who presided on the bench, entertained a high notion of the dignity of his court. He had also too just an opinion of the sanctity of the judicial character, not to be jealous of the interference of persons in power with the administration of justice. He therefore heard the representations of the Cabinet ministers, without the least disposition to attend to them; insomuch, that the Premier accounted for his inflexibility by observing, that Pratt had got to the top of his preferment, and was, therefore, refractory, and not to be governed by them."

Soon after this the publisher, Wilkin, was brought to the bar :—

"The affrighted bookseller made an effort to save himself, by declaring that Dr Colbatch was the author; but the Chief Justice told him that he might do as he pleased about giving up the author, for it should not save him from the punishment due to the offence of circulating the pamphlet; and that his fate should be a warning to other publishers; adding, that the court would serve the author in the same way if brought before them. Wilkin's terrors were greatly augmented, when, upon applying in the evening at the chambers of Mr Justice Fortescue to be bailed, he was informed by his lordship that he had that day taken as bail, of the publisher of the Freeholder's Journal, (a treasonable paper.) £1000, and £500 for each of his sureties; and he was actually required to produce the same amount, the Judge saying that his offence was as great, or greater."

The danger now thickened, and Colbatch was advised to keep out of the way, and with the utmost speed to procure the King's pardon, which had been promised him by both Secretaries of State. In what manner great men kept their promises in those days, the reader shall hear:

"When he renewed his application for the interference of the great Ministers in his favour, he found their tone much altered. Lord Carteret, in particular, had at first been profuse in his assurances of protection in case of the worst; Should the Doctor be sent to prison, here, said he, brandishing his pen, is Mercury's wand which will soon fetch him out. Now, however, his lordship's language was altered; he advised so and so, and he would undertake that nothing should hurt him. But Dr Friend, whose heart misgave him on this point, begged his lordship to pledge his word, that, in case of the worst, Mercury's wand should be put in operation. He encouraged by a fresh promise, the delinquent, who had changed his lodgings to escape notice, now put on his gown, and appeared publicly in the streets and in Westminster Hall. But here some lawyers, upon learning the grounds of his security, told him to despair his charm, for that, if he confessed himself the author of Jus Academicum, the King himself could not hinder his being sent to prison."

In this trying situation, Colbatch in 1722 strengthened himself by new friends, such as the Archbishop of York, the President of the Council, and many others; but at length he discovered "that there was a lion in the path, which intercepted all his prospects of powerful mediation." And who should this lion be? Why, simply that friend, the Chancellor, to wit, who was the warmest of all in professions. What a picture of courts does the following passage expose!

"The minister (Lord Townshend) then sent him to wait upon the Chief Justice, with a message from himself, intimating that the Crown would interfere to stay proceedings, and wishing to know in what manner that object could most properly be effected. Colbatch proceeded immediately to Sir John Pratt's, but found that he was just gone out; whereupon an unfortunate idea came across his mind, that he ought to go and communicate the Minister's designs to the Lord Chancellor, lest he should appear to distrust the promise of the latter. This wily lord, having learnt the state of the case, determined to counteract what was doing; and, under pretence of smoothing the way, made the Doctor promise not to deliver Lord Townshend's message to the Chief Justice, till he had himself seen him upon the subject. Colbatch, however, presently perceiving that he had been surprised and tricked by this exalted personage, went back to Lord Townshend, and candidly told him what had passed. The Minister revived his spirits, by promising to procure him the King's pardon the next day, and directed him to call upon him again in the evening at his office, when he should see and talk with the Chancellor. Going at the time appointed, he found a cabinet meeting just broken up. Lord Townshend, as soon as he saw him, ordered Lord Macclesfield to be recalled, and the two great men held a long conversation apart, in which the Chancellor contrived to intercept the favour designed for the unfortunate Colbatch. They then joined him, and Lord Macclesfield urged that nothing more was required of him but to make a reasonable apology to the court, and that he would be committed to satisfy form; that this would be only nominal, as he would regain his liberty the next day; and earnestly advised him to undergo this trivial ordeal. Lord Townshend then joined in the recommendation, saying—Do, good Doctor, do. Thus pressed, he had no alternative but to acquiesce, although he was no longer deceived, but saw himself the victim of a hard-hearted policy."

Certainly, if the Doctor's friends were knaves, ou à-peu-pres, the Doctor himself was a fool, ou à-peu-pres. And the very perfection of folly—pig-headed folly, (opposed to equal pig-headedness in the judge,)—appears in the final scene of this little drama, which we transcribe as a fair rival to any of the same kind in Gil Blas:—

"After, &c. &c. Dr Colbatch was again brought up before the King's Bench, to petition for his discharge; whereupon Sir Littleton Powis, the senior puisne judge, delivered him his final objurcation. His lordship had just been reading Jus Academicum, and was master of its contents; but, unfortunately for the author, he considered some of the reflections, intended for Dr Bentley, as levelled against the Court. He termed the appeals made to foreign lawyers quite foreign to the purpose;—a conceit which took his lordship's fancy so much, that he repeated it three or four times in the course of his speech. But the most disastrous point was the motto of the book,—Jura negat sibi nata, nihil non arrogat. He accused Colbatch of applying to the Court of King's Bench the most virulent verse in all Horace,—Jura negat sibi nata, nihil non arrogat. The culprit immediately set him right as to Horace's word; and told him besides, that the motto was intended to apply, not to the Judges, but to Dr Bentley. Sir Littleton, however, would not be driven from what he considered his stronghold; he thrice recurred to this unhappy quotation, which accused their lordships of abrogating the laws; and each time Colbatch was imprudent enough to interrupt and correct him. At last the Court remarked to his counsel, Kettelbey, that his client did not appear to be sensible of his being in contempt; and, to convince him of that fact, sentenced him to pay £50, to be imprisoned till it was paid, and to give security for his good behaviour for a year."

It will appear like judicial infaturation in Bentley's enemies, that, on that same day when this scene took place in the King's Bench, another process was commenced against Conyers Middleton for a libel upon the same Court. "The pamphlet being handed to the Bench, the Chief Justice pronounced, that, if Dr Middleton was really the author, he must be the most ungrateful man alive, considering that the Court had already treated him with so much lenity." In fact, this unhappy coincidence in time of the two cases, gave to the reverend libellers the appearance of being in a conspiracy. However, though Middleton would not take a lesson from his friend to avoid his offence, he did as regarded the management of his defence. He applied to no Lord Macclesfields or Secretaries of State; and, in consequence, he met precisely the same punishment as Colbatch, without the same protracted suffering. And so ended the sixth suit which Bentley had prosecuted to a triumphant issue, within three years, in the King's Bench, himself enjoying all the time the most absolute otium cum dignitate, whilst his malicious enemies were mere footballs to the fury of law.

These, however, were no more than episodes in the great epos of the original quarrel. In the latter end of 1727, after a seven years' rest, this began to revive. Bishop Fleetwood had been succeeded in the see of Ely by Greene, who was willing to act, provided his expenses were guaranteed, and certain legal questions answered favourably. His demands were granted; and five eminent lawyers, having separately returned satisfactory answers, preparations were making for assault. Though managed silently, Bentley heard of them; and immediately petitioned the King, telling him that the Bishop of Ely was going to rob him of his rights. After three months' waiting for the result, the Bishop in turn petitioned the King to be heard on behalf of his See. A committee of the Privy Council was then appointed. Delays, as usual, were devised by Bentley; and it was not before March 1729, that the committee decided, that "they could not advise his Majesty to interfere at all, but that the Bishop was at liberty to proceed as he thought proper."

Richard Bentley had come to a different decision, as he soon made Bishop Greene understand. In November, his lordship began to stir; but Bentley soon pulled him up by moving the King's Bench for a prohibition, on the ground, that before he could be "visited," he must be twice admonished by the Vice-master; now, as he took care to have a Vice-master of his own choosing, this was not likely to happen before the Greek calends. The judges at length refused the prohibition, holding that the preliminary admonition was required only in cases of petty delinquencies. Bishop Greene was therefore once more declared at liberty to proceed; and at last it was thought, says Dr Monk, "that all Bentley's resources were at an end."

Little did they know of Richard Bentley who thought thus. On the 2d June, 1729, steps were again taken at Ely House, and a further day assigned. Before that day came, again had Bentley put a spoke in the Bishop's wheel. He applied to the King's Bench for a writ of prohibition on new grounds; and this time he succeeded. Next term, the Bishop applied to have the prohibition taken off. But that was more easily asked than granted. Bentley had bothered the judges with a paper which cost a week even to copy. The judges had no time to read it, and were obliged to continue the prohibition; and then came the long vacation. In November, 1729, the campaign opened again; but the Court declared that no case like this had ever come before them, and declined to pronounce judgment until it had been argued by way of declaration and answer.

In 1730, with the vernal resurrection of nature, up rose the everlasting process. "Up rose the sun, and up rose Emily." Bishop Greene put in his plea. Bentley took no notice of it; nor would to this hour, had not a rule been applied for to compel him. At the last minute of the time allowed, he replied, by asking for time,—a month, for instance. The Court granted a week. At the last minute of the week he put in a replikation, which, in Strange's Reports, is described as "immaterial."

Upon this the Bishop, in technical phrase, demurred. But here, again, Bentley got Bishop Greene under his arm, and "fibbed" him. It is presumed in law, that, for his own interest, a plaintiff will proceed quickly; so that, if he should not, the rules of Court make no provision for compelling him. Now, it is true that Bentley was defendant on the main case; yet, on that part of it which came before the Court of King's Bench, he was plaintiff; of course he made no sign of proceeding. In Trinity term measures were taken to compel him. But next came another step, which also belongs to plaintiff. Plaintiff failed. As this was no more than making up what is called a "paper book," defendant did it for him. But this Bentley would not hear of. "By no means," said he; "it is my duty to do it. I have failed; and I insist on being compelled to do my duty." And in this way again he whiled away the year until the long vacation arrived, when all men rest from their labour. Who will deny that his friends in Cambridge did right in giving the unconquerable old man a triumphal reception, meeting him at Bourn Bridge, and preparing him a welcome in Trinity College, in a manner similar to that of his Majesty's late reception in Cambridge?

Michaelmas term, 1730, the judges, after hearing three days' argument, gave judgment against two of Bentley's pleas; on the third, they postponed their decision.

Easter term, 1731, arrived, and new light dawned for Bentley. The charges against him all went upon a presumed validity of certain statutes, known as Queen Elizabeth's, which had superseded the elder statutes of Edward VI., and no question had arisen, but as to which set of statutes were valid for this particular case. Suddenly the judges themselves started a question. Were these statutes valid for any case? Counsel on neither side had heard a whisper in that direction. Being uninstructed, they were silent. The judges differed amongst themselves, and the result seemed doubtful. But all at once they discovered a screw loose in another quarter. It was this: The Bishop had described himself as "Visitor especially authorized and appointed by the 40th of Queen Elizabeth's statutes." Now, waving the other question, at any rate it was the elder statutes which had created his jurisdiction, the Elizabethan (supposing them valid) having at most recognised it. This flaw was held fatal by the whole bench, in other respects not unanimous, and a sufficient reason for continuing the prohibition.

So terminated this stage of the interminable process; damages to the prosecutors—little less than L.1000; and to Bentley, whose costs fell on the College, (and in their proportion, therefore, upon the prosecutors,) L.1300. Prosecutors had to pay Bentley L.269, as costs contracted in discussing objections of his raising, notwithstanding every one of these objections had been dismissed. Such a result of their malice it is delightful to record.

How Dr Monk reconciles it with the fact of the continued prohibition, we pretend not to guess; so it is, however, that we now find him speaking of Bishop Greene, as being at liberty to proceed "at discretion." However, we must take things as we find them. In July, 1731, Bentley, on suspicion that Bishop Greene was meditating a choice of courses, resolved to spare Bishop Greene any course at all. With that view he petitioned the King to prohibit him by a stat of the Attorney-General. This new attack exhausted Bishop Greene's entire stock of patience. Bishop Greene began to sing out furiously; and, when the petition, after two hearings, was dismissed as illegal in its prayer, his lordship resolved to go in to his man, and finish him in as few rounds as possible. Yet how? After much deliberation, it was resolved to adopt the plan of an appeal to the House of Lords for a reversal of the late judgment of the King's Bench.

It is ludicrous to mention, that whilst this grand measure was pending, a miniature process occurred, which put all the parties to the great one through what had now become regular evolutions. Bentley had expelled a gentleman from Trinity College. Of course, the man appealed to the Bishop of Ely;—of course, the Bishop of Ely cited Bentley before him;—of course, Bentley treated the citation with contempt, and applied to the King's Bench for his old familiar friend—the rule to prohibit;—and, of course, the Court granted it. Upon which this feud merged quietly into the bosom of the main one, which now awaited the decision of the Upper House of Parliament.

On the 6th of May, the case opened before this illustrious Court, who were now to furnish a perpetuum to an affair which had occupied and confounded all sorts of courts known to the laws or usages of this kingdom. "The interest attached to the cause, and the personage whose fortunes were at stake," says Dr Monk, "produced full houses on almost every day that it was argued." The judges were ordered to attend the House during its continuance; and, from the novelty of the case, or some other reason, it was followed by the Peers with singular zest and attention.

On the 8th of May, the judgment of the King's Bench was reversed, chiefly (it is believed) through a speech of Bishop Sherlock's. The House then undertook, after some debate, to deliberate separately upon all the articles of accusation preferred against Bentley. This deliberation extended into the next session; and, upon the 15th of February, 1733, final judgment was pronounced, giving to the Bishop of Ely permission to try the Master of Trinity on twenty of the sixty-four articles. The first court was held at Ely-House on the 13th of June, 1733; and, on the 27th of April, 1734, the whole trial being concluded, Bishop Greene, unsupported, however, by his assessors, both of whom, it is known, were for a sentence of acquittal, "in terms of great solemnity," declared that Dr Bentley was proved guilty both of dilapidating the goods of his College, and violating its statutes; and, accordingly, pronounced him to be deprived of the Mastership of Trinity College.

At length, then, after infinite doubles through a chase of five-and-twenty years, the old fox is hunted to earth: but who shall be the man to smoke him out? Bentley saw no reason why the matter of execution might not be made to yield as good sport as the matter of trial. He had already provided an evasion; it was this: the statute says, that when convicted, the Master shall, without delay, be stripped of his office by the Vice-master. He only was authorized to execute the sentence. The course then was clear: a Vice-master was to be provided who would not do his duty. The Bishop had a sort of resource in such a case. But Bentley had good reasons for believing, that it would be found unserviceable. Wanted therefore immediately, for Trinity College, a stout-hearted son of thunder, able to look a bully in the face. How ardently must Bentley have longed to be his own Vice! As that could not be, he looked out for the next best on the roll.

Meantime the Bishop issued three copies of his sentence—one to Dr Bentley, one for the college gates, and a third to Dr Hacket, the Vice-master, requiring him to see it executed. The odious Colbatch already rioted in his vengeance: more than delay he did not suspect; yet even this exasperated his venom, and he worried the poor Vice with his outcries.

Bentley, be it remembered, was now in his seventy-third year: his services to Trinity College, to classical literature, to religion, were greater than can be readily estimated. Of his prosecutors and judge, on the other hand, with a slight change in Caligula's wish, any honest man might desire for the whole body one common set of posteriors, that in planting a single kick he might have expressed his collective disdain of them, their acts, and their motives. Yet old as Bentley was, and critical as he found his situation, he lost no jot of his wonted cheerfulness: "He maintained," says his biographer, "not only his spirits, but his accustomed gaiety;" and in allusion to his own predicament, gave the candidates, as a subject for a theme, the following words of Terence—

—"hoc nunc dicis
Ejectos hinc nos: omnium rerum, heus, vicissitudo est!"

Hacket, however, was not a man to depend upon; he "felt uneasy, and had no mind to become a victim in defence of one whom he regarded with no affection." Luckily he was willing to resign: luckily, too, just then, Dr Walker became eligible—a devoted friend, of whom Dr Monk believes, that he "would have cheerfully risked his life in the protection of his master."

Dr Walker was elected. He was not a man to be terrified by ugly words, nor by grim faces. Bishop Greene sent his mandate to Dr Walker, requiring him immediately to deprive the Master: no attention was paid. Colbatch put bullying questions: Dr Walker "declined to give any reply." Then Bishop Greene petitioned the House of Lords, the very court which had directed him to try the Doctor: the House kicked the petition out of doors. Then Bishop Greene turned to the Court of King's Bench; and the Court granted a mandamus to Dr Walker to do his duty. But that writ was so handled by Bentley's suggestions, that the judges quashed it. Then Bishop Greene procured another mandamus in another shape, viz. a mandamus to himself to compel Dr Walker to do his duty. But that writ was adjudged, after long arguments, to be worse than the other. Then Bishop Greene obtained a third mandamus, which included some words that were thought certain to heal all defects: but upon argument it was found, that those very words had vitiated it. And in this sort of work Bentley had now held them in play four years since the sentence. Now, then, all mankind, with Bishop Greene at their head and Colbatch at their tail, verily despaired. Dr Bentley had been solemnly sentenced and declared to be ejected; yet all the artillery of the supreme courts of the kingdom could not be so pointed as to get him within their range. Through four consecutive years after his sentence, writ upon writ, mandamus after mandamus, had been issued against him; but all in vain: budge he would not for gentle or simple: the smoke of his pipe still calmly ascended in Trinity Lodge. And like the care-hating old boy of Beaumont and Fletcher, he argued that it always had been so, and doubtless it always would be so. At length, when the third writ was quashed by the Judges of the King's Bench, after a solemn hearing on the 22d of April, 1738, his enemies became finally satisfied that "this world was made for Cæsar;" and that to dislodge Dr Bentley, by any forms of law yet discovered amongst men, was a problem of sheer desperation. From this day, therefore, that idle attempt was abandoned by all human beings, except Colbatch, who could find nobody to join him: and from this date, twenty-nine years from the opening of the process, and about thirty-eight from the opening of the quarrel, its extinction may be dated. The case appears to have been fatal to the See of Ely; for Bishop Moore had lost his life in trying Bentley; Bishop Fleetwood saved his by letting him alone; and Bishop Greene, after floundering in his own sentence for four years, departed this life in a few days after finding out that it never would be executed.

Thus ended this great affair, which occupied about two-thirds of Dr Bentley's manhood.* After this, he amused himself with prosecuting old Colbatch for 3s. 6d. which Colbatch (upon principles of ecclesiastical polity) vehemently desired to cheat him of. It is gratifying to add, that he trounced Colbatch, who was sentenced to pay 3s. 6d., together with 2s. 6d. arrears, and L.20 costs.† Colbatch talked of applying to a higher court: but afterwards thought better on that subject, and confined his groans to a book—which, it is to be hoped, no mortal ever read.

This last of his thousand-and-one lawsuits terminated in 1740: after which, he enjoyed a clear space of more than two years for assailing himself from the irritation of earthly quarrels, and preparing for his end. His last appearance of a public nature, was on occasion of something which we must not call foolery in the offending parties, since Dr Monk considers it "alarming;" and here it was that he delivered his final jest. A youth, whose name has not reached posterity with much lustre, one Strutt, had founded a sect of atheists, by a book published in 1732. The Struttian philosophy had been propagated by Mr Tinkler Duckett, a Fellow of Caius College. Tinkler, ambitious (it seems) of martyrdom in the cause of Struttism, privately denounced his own atrocities: a great fuss ensued: bishops and archbishops were consulted: and, finally, Tinkler was brought to trial upon a charge of Strutting. He was fully proved to have Strutted, though he attempted to deny it: and on the last day of trial, Dr Bentley being wanted to make up a quorum of heads, and by way of paying honour to the father of the university, who could not easily go to them, the court, with its appendages, atheist and all, adjourned to him. Court being seated, Bentley begged to know which was the atheist: and upon Tinkler being pointed out to him, who was a little meagre man, "Atheist!" said he, "how! is that the atheist? Why, I thought an atheist would be at least as big as Burrough the beadle!" Burrough, it may readily be supposed, was a burly personage, fitted to enact the part of leader to a defying philosophy.

This incident occurred early in 1739. Some time further on in the same year, is fixed, conjecturally, as the period of a paralytic attack, from which it is certain that he suffered at some time in his latter years. That it was a slight one, is evident from the fact, that he acted as an examiner for a scholarship within a month of his death.

* As evidence of the violent and unjust hostility to Bentley which prevailed in Cambridge, it ought to be mentioned, that, during the progress of this main feud, without a trial, and on the merest ex parte statement, Bentley was solemnly degraded and stripped of his degrees, to which he was restored only after a struggle of five and a half years, by a peremptory mandamus from the King's Bench.

† By the way, Colbatch must have been pretty well cleaned out by this time, which is pleasing to believe; for Dr Monk, by examining the bursary books of Trinity College, has found, that the costs of the suit were nominally L.3657, but really not less than L.4000: so that, at one time, a pleasant prospect of starvation was before the College. Over and above his share of all this, Colbatch had little pet libels of his own to provide for. Well is it that malice is sometimes a costly luxury!

About the beginning of the next year he lost his wife, in the fortieth year of a union memorably happy. His two daughters, both married, united their pious attentions to soothe his old age, and to win his thoughts from too painful a sense of this afflicting trial: and one of them, Mrs Cumberland, having four children, filled his else desolate mansion with the sounds, long silent, of youthful mirth and gladness.—“Surrounded with such friends, the Doctor experienced the joint pressure of old age and infirmity as lightly as is consistent with the lot of humanity. He continued to amuse himself with reading; and, though nearly confined to his arm-chair, was able to enjoy the society of his friends, and several rising scholars, (Markland, John Taylor, Thomas Bentley, &c.,) who sought the conversation of the veteran Grecian: with them he still discussed the readings of classical authors, recited Homer, and expounded the doctrine of the Digamma.”

Mr Cumberland's portrait of his grandfather's amiable old age, we forbear to quote, as probably familiar to most of our readers: but one or two peculiarities in the domestic habits of his latter years, as less known, we add from Dr Monk:—“It is recorded that Bentley enjoyed smoking with his constant companion (Dr Walker); a practice which he did not begin before his seventieth year: he is stated also to have been an admirer of good port wine, while he thought contemptuously of claret; which, he said, would be port if it could. He generally wore, while sitting in his study, a hat with an enormous brim—as a shade to protect his eyes; and he affected more than ever a fashion of addressing his familiars with the singular pronouns thou and thee.”

There is, it seems, a tradition in Cambridge, that Bentley was accustomed to describe himself as likely to attain the age of fourscore years; but on what particular ground, is not said. In making this remark, he would observe, by way of parenthesis, that a life of that duration was long enough to read every thing worth reading; and then reverting to the period he had anticipated for himself, he would conclude—

“Et tunc magna mei sub terris ibit imago.”

If this anticipation were really made by Bentley, it is a remarkable instance of that unaccountable spirit of divination which has haunted some people, (Lord Nelson, for instance, in the obstinate prediction before his final victory—that the 21st of October would be his day:) Bentley did accomplish his eightieth year, and a few months more. About the 10th of July, he was seized with what is supposed to have been a pleuritic fever. Dr Heberden, at that time a young physician in Cambridge, for some reason not stated, (perhaps the advanced age of the patient,) declined to bleed him—a measure which Bentley himself suggested, and which is said to have been considered necessary by Dr Wallis. That the indications of danger were sudden and of rapid progress, is probable from the fact, that Dr Wallis, who was summoned from Stamford, arrived too late. Bentley expired on the 14th of July, 1742; and in his person England lost the greatest scholar by far that she ever has produced; greater than she will produce, according to all likelihood, under the tendencies of modern education. Some account of his principal works, and a general estimate of his services to literature, and of his character and pretensions as a scholar, we reserve to a separate paper.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

No. VI.

SIX WEEKS OF A NEW REIGN.

THERE is no transformation in the whole of Ovid's Metamorphoses, comparable to that which a man undergoes, who passes from the expectancy of a crown to the possession of it. In the former state, he is a mere mortal; he eats and drinks, walks, talks, and sleeps, like the rest of God's creatures; but, in the latter, there is something of the miraculous and wonderful, appertaining to the exercise of all his functions, bodily and mental. Before he is a king, he challenges no more observation than the sun, so "common-hackney'd in the eyes of men;" the moment he ascends a throne, he is the comet, at which the amazed vulgar gaze with mingled awe and astonishment. He no longer eats, or drinks, or walks, as he was wont; at least, it must be presumed so, because then, for the first time, during a life of more than threescore years, perhaps, circumstances are discovered connected with each of those operations deemed worthy of special record. Above all, the change wrought in the words he utters is most remarkable; and resembles the gift bestowed by the good fairy upon some deserving little girl, whose name we really forget, so that whenever she opened her mouth to speak, nothing but pearls and diamonds fell from it. If such august personages were to reason upon their two states of being, their surprise must sometimes partake of that which was felt by Christophero Sly, when he had to forget he ever knew "Cicely Halket," and "old John Naps of Greece;" or ever said he would "present Marian Hacket, the fat alewife of Wincot," at "the leet, because she brought stone jags, and no sealed quarts."

Somewhat of these strong contrasts may be found in every accession; but it is hardly possible for any monarch to present them in a more striking degree, than our beloved Sovereign William the Fourth. The transformation seems to have been alike sudden and perfect. Sudden, because it took place in a few hours only, (those which elapsed between going to bed on Friday night, June 25, as Duke of Clarence, and getting up at six o'clock the next morning, no longer Duke of Clarence, but King William;) and perfect, because from that same moment it appears to have struck every one with a concurrent and unanimous conviction of its reality. We know what his Royal Highness was during the fifty years, or thereabouts, that his many princely virtues, his affable demeanour, and his intellectual qualities, attracted public attention; we might consequently give a shrewd guess as to what he would have continued to be, so long as he remained Duke of Clarence; but it was beyond all human calculation to foresee what William the Fourth was to prove. Nevertheless, although the fact be now indisputable, it is not a whit the less mysterious or incomprehensible; for it would be at once peevish and illiberal to call it delusion, or, with the poet, ascribe it to the influence of station:—

" 'Tis from high life high characters are drawn :

A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn;
A judge is just; a chancellor juster still;
A gownman learn'd; a bishop—what you will :

Wise, if a minister; but, if a king,

More wise, more learn'd, more just, MORE EVERY THING !"

It is mortifying to reflect, however, that great, and good, and beloved, and magnanimous, and condescending, and wise, and paternal, and glorious, and popular, and "every thing," as his Majesty has proved himself during his auspicious reign of six weeks, (all these epithets have already been bestowed upon him.) there is a lurking spirit of envy and detraction, a disloyal and ungenerous spirit, (in quarters which might be named,) on the watch to pervert and calumniate these very virtues. That the malignants will be disappointed—that their machinations will be frustrated—and that they will be made to "digest the venom" of their own spleen, "though it do split them," I most fervently hope and most dutifully pray. At the same time, as there is nothing which so surely tends to discomfit an enemy, as to fathom his plans and cripple his means, I shall avail myself of my knowledge of both, to throw a timely shield between our new King and his old friends.

I have seen it stated, for example, in several of the daily papers, with a sort of insidious ostentation, and I have heard the circumstance animadverted upon in private society with fastidious reprobation, that the Fitzclarences, male and female, are obtruded upon public notice; that they are brought within the circle of the court; that Colonel Fitzclarence was "dispatched on a special mission to the continent;" that "the barony of De Lisle will be conferred upon Mr Sydney, son-in-law to his Majesty;" that, "in a private interview with Captain Adolphus Fitzclarence of the Royal Navy, his Majesty stated his intention of dining on board his ship," (the Pallas,) adding, "here, my boy, is a five hundred pound note to defray your expenses;" that "Colonel Fitzclarence has been nominated by his Majesty Deputy-ranger of Bushy Park;" that "his Majesty, accompanied by the Queen, Miss Fitzclarence, &c., left Frogmore, &c., in a pony phaeton;" that "his Majesty, when Duke of Clarence, often expressed his determination, if ever it were in his power, to bestow a peerage upon Colonel Fitzclarence," &c. &c. &c. Heaven knows whether any, or all, or none of these statements, be true; but the purpose for which they are so indefatigably made, is not only too obvious, but too successful. There are some who already talk of the immoralities of the reign of Charles II., when his natural children were elevated to the rank of peers, and whose descendants still sit in Parliament as hereditary legislators; and of the appointments, in the gift of the crown, which were lavished upon them. Others injuriously contrast the alleged conduct of his Majesty with that of our late Sovereign, who studiously abstained from parading his illegitimate offspring in the eyes of his subjects, though it is well known he never neglected his paternal duties towards them. These are among the mischievous consequences of assertions made by those who pretend to be his Majesty's friends. I know it is mere hypocritical cant, overstrained prudery, in those who affect to be scandalized; and that nothing would be easier to prove the difference between Charles II. and his Majesty in this respect, independently of the strong ground of defence which may be taken in reference to the parental affections of the latter, as compared with the profligate sensuality of the former. But, then, it is so difficult to make some people comprehend the force of the clearest reasonings; while it must always be a matter of regret, to see our Sovereign wantonly and maliciously placed in a situation to need apology or defence. Besides, it must, after all, be confessed, there are causes which are best served by discreet silence; and therefore I shall say no more.

It is an old proverb, that "the King's chaff is better than other folk's corn." This may be true for aught I know; but it cannot be true that Kings deal in nothing but chaff; and it is neither just nor politic, consequently, in his Majesty's friends, to invent for his Majesty such speeches as it is quite impossible his Majesty could have made. Is it to be supposed, for example, that when his Majesty went down to Woolwich, to review the artillery and engineers, and happened to go into one of the rooms in the barracks, where a party of soldiers' wives were taking their tea, who were frightened out of their wits at the royal intrusion, he would, after calling to them in the kindest and most affable manner to remain, finish by observing, "that if there were no women, there could be no good soldiers?" It is not to the physical truth, or the philosophical acumen, of this assertion that I object. They are beyond all dispute. But will it be contended, that if his Majesty designed to say something appropriate to the occasion, he would have balked his own design by saying that which was absurdly inappropriate? Impossible!

Again. When Sir John Sinclair was introduced to kiss hands at the first court held by his Majesty, (a few hours after his brother's death,) it is pretended that he said to him, "in the most emphatic manner," "Be assured, Sir John, I shall ever be friendly to the Land of Cakes and agriculture." I know there are some who affect to admire the frank, unceremonious simplicity of this style of address; and it is simple enough, I admit. But it is too far removed from that dignity which is associated with our ideas of a King, and therefore incompatible with the known character and habits of our beloved Monarch. I would as soon believe, if Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, or Sir John Newport, had kissed hands, that his Majesty would have said to the former, "Be assured I shall ever be friendly to the Land of Leeks;" or to the latter, "Be assured I shall ever be friendly to the Land of Praties and Shillelugs." I am equally incredulous, thank God, and for the same loyal reasons, with regard to the statements, that our Gracious Monarch takes a walk by himself now and then, through the streets, "attired in a black coat and white trowsers;" that he "prefers riding on the dicky of his carriage to boxing himself within;" that, instead of signifying his royal commands, desiring the attendance of the friends whom he honours with his intimacy, he invites them after this fashion—"G——, come and dine with me to-day, if you have nothing better to do with yourself;" that he "chats with the guard in the stable-yard;" that when "the loyal acclamations of his people are heard at his presence, he by no means whispers his acknowledgments;" and that he wrote to Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, the Usher of the Black Rod, "Dear Sir Tom—I am determined to prorogue the House myself on Friday, so take care to have all ready." Neither can I believe, when his Majesty received the corps diplomatique, that upon their retiring from the royal presence, he had nothing better to say to them than "that he hoped frequently to see them at his court, and to find them the bearers of good news." These, and a multitude of similar absurdities, which are in every mouth, have no other origin, I am persuaded, than the lurking spirit of envy and detraction to which I have already alluded.

Far different are those traits of the royal mind, (equally in every mouth,) which carry with them their own impress of authenticity, which are at once recognised as its emanations, or worthy of being its characteristics. I have no doubt, for instance, that "Brighton is convulsed with joy,"—in absolute hysterics of loyal delight, in consequence of the "gracious message sent by its High Constable," in these few and empathic words—"Tell the inhabitants of Brighton that I shall soon be with them;" or that Colonel D'Aguilar (I don't know who he is) is "the most deserving object of patronage in the whole army," after reading the following conversation between him and his Majesty at the horse Guards: "What service have you seen?" The gallant Colonel was in the middle of his answer—"Well, Colonel, that will do—that will do—I'll take care of you. How many children have you?"—"Three."—"I'll take care of them too; the eldest shall be one of my pages." Happy Colonel D'Aguilar! Had you no brothers and sisters—no uncles and aunts—no cousins—nothing but yourself and three children for his most gracious Majesty to take care of? What a mere luncheon, in the way of benevolence, to set before the royal appetite! It is said, however, the gallant Colonel was so overpowered by the unexpected kindness, that he could not help exclaiming, in the words of Macduff—"What! all my pretty ones? Did you say all?"

It would be tedious, if not impossible, to mention every circumstance that has happened since the 26th of June, confirmatory of my hypothesis, as to the transformation effected by passing from the expectancy of a crown to the possession of it. I shall select a few, however; but first, I must advert to one fact by itself, because I do not know exactly under what general head it can be classed. I allude to the pilosity of chin which used to distinguish their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of Sussex and Cumberland. "They have been the first," we are informed, "to testify their respect to his Majesty's wishes," by being clean shaved. Our admiration may here be divided: between the fraternal affection of the two illustrious individuals, and the minute objects which find a place in his Majesty's mind, amid all the vast and solemn cares of sovereignty. And now for my selection.

During the many years there was a Duke of Clarence, we knew nothing—positively nothing—about the following curious facts, all of which have been duly ascertained, and diligently promulgated, since the memorable 26th of June. His Majesty rises at eight o'clock—breakfasts at nine—half an hour after goes into his library—eats a hearty luncheon at two—cares little for dinner—drinks about a pint of small sherry—seldom eats of any made dish—has discharged three French cooks, because he is “perfectly satisfied with English fare”—amuses himself in cheerful conversation with men of all parties when not engaged in business—goes to bed early—and is constitutionally subject to the asthma—but “may live to a very old age,” which God grant! Moreover, his Majesty “has cast aside his French kid gloves, and wears Woodstock doe;” has “expressed himself in terms of the most unqualified regard towards the Established Church;” was pleased to say, in the presence of several prelates, that “he wished to impress upon them a firm conviction, that of all the Sovereigns who had preceded him on the throne of England, not one would be found to exceed him in regard for the church;” has “commanded the orders requiring officers of the Navy to wear white breeches, &c., to be annulled,” from a “just sense of what confers real splendour on the throne,” and a “kind consideration for the means of individuals;” intends to “throw open the walks and drives of Windsor Great Park;” has “ordered a passage to be made from Waterloo Place to St James’s Park,” for which the House of Commons gave his Majesty three cheers, when Sir Robert Peel assured it, in his gravest manner, that the munificent act was positively, however incredible it might seem, “the spontaneous suggestion of his Majesty himself, without the aid of any of his Ministers!!” that at the Chapel Royal, “he pronounced the responses in an audible tone, and seemed to pay the greatest attention to the sermon;” that at a review in Hyde Park, he “commanded the guards by no means to injure the people, and, in particular, to take care of the females;” that at the levee, he told Sir Alured Clarke “he was happy to see him, as it gave him an opportunity of communicating to him in person that he should be made a field-marshal on Friday;” that he read the speech from the throne “with astonishing energy, emphasis, and almost exultation,” as if “he wished the public to know and feel, a royal speech was not to be considered as part of a mere state ceremony, but as the sacred pledge of a constitutional sovereign to his people;” that “with the affability and condescension for which he has ever been distinguished,” he was pleased to address one of his dinner guests, (in London) thus:—“Though we shall be somewhat farther apart, if you will come and see me at Windsor, I daresay we shall be able to find you a bed in the Castle;” and, lastly, that when the Duke of Norfolk called upon him at Bushy, (I believe on the very 26th of June, or soon after,) as his Grace was leaving, his Majesty, in the most familiar manner possible, said, “You have not seen the Queen;” then ringing the bell, “Tell the Queen,” he added, to the servant who answered, “that I want to speak with her.”

If it had so happened that his Majesty had dropped from the clouds on the 26th of June, to take upon himself the government of these realms, as William the Fourth,—if we had never known or heard of such a person till that day, then it would be natural enough that every thing he said and did should be observed, by those who heard or saw him, and listened to with eager curiosity, by those who had no opportunities of either. But when we know that the William the Fourth of the month of July, was the Duke of Clarence of the month of June, and not of that month only, but of the last fifty years nearly, there is no other way of accounting for the sudden change, except from that metamorphosis which is wrought in the head, by putting a crown on the head.

Most sincerely do I wish that these transformations were the only features of the new reign that challenge observation. But they are not so: And if, in what I am about to say, I assume a graver tone, it is because (to my mind, at least) the subjects themselves are of a graver character. I own, too, when I see William the Fourth specially singled out for unqualified praise by such persons as Sir Francis Burdett, Mr Brougham, and Mr Hunt, I am irresistibly impelled to pause, and to examine, not merely what are the peculiar merits which distinguish his Majesty from his late royal brother and father, (neither of whom was so fortunate as to obtain these zealous panegyrics,) but whether there may not be just cause to doubt the real value of merits which are of a quality to win applause from such eulogists. We are already blest with a Tory Administration acting upon Whig principles, according to my Lord Darlington; and we may be upon the eve of a discovery equally profound with regard to the crown.

Far, very far, be it from me to impute to the royal mind the intention of doing that which seems, however, to be the legitimate conclusion, from the things that are done; I mean a desire of indirectly stigmatizing certain acts of the last reign by an almost indecorous haste in reversing them in the present. That the reversal has taken place, in manifold instances, (some of them trivial enough, but therefore the more seemingly indicative of premeditation,) cannot be denied; while the construction put upon it is equally undeniable. It is very true, a sovereign may observe too much state—he may maintain too austere and ceremonious a reserve—he may live in too great seclusion;—all these, perhaps, were the faults of George IV.;—but it is no less true, that the error is signal and mischievous which mistakes for their dignified converse, not a relaxation, but an abjuration almost, of all the imposing attributes of majesty. The times are passed in which any “divinity” is supposed “to hedge a king;” and they have been succeeded by an age, in which there is a much greater disposition to scrutinize the utility, than to acquiesce in the necessity, of that costly affair, a monarchy. Hence, the friends and supporters of monarchy, when any attempt is made to abridge the revenues of the crown, by applying the principle of economy to the income of the civil list, zealously and wisely resist the attempt, on the ground that it is essential to the maintenance of monarchy itself to surround it with adequate pomp and splendour. But why, it will surely be asked in the next Parliament, when the future amount of the civil list is discussed, why continue this magnificent scale of expenditure, when the throne is happily filled by a sovereign of such primitive and simple habits, that it is his delight, on every possible occasion, to lay aside the royalties of his august station; a sovereign who prefers to walk out alone, unattended by lords, grooms, or equerries; who takes his unostentatious seat in the dicky of his own carriage; who breakfasts, dines, and sups in the most friendly way with this or that minister, or this or that acquaintance—even my Lord Holland—and who shews, in every thing, a decided predilection for the freedom and simplicity of private life? And if these questions be asked, it will be as difficult to answer them, as it would be to prove that the true interests of the throne are consulted in shewing how useless and cumbersome are its trappings; or its true dignity maintained in paying morning and evening visits to the King of Wirtemberg at a common tavern, to the admiration of the waiters and delight of the chambermaids.* It was not thus George IV., when Prince Regent, did the honours of a British monarch to his illustrious visitors, the Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, and their distinguished suite of princes and victorious generals. These amiable condescensions naturally charm the populace; but the populace is alike fickle and vulgar in its tastes, and when the first novelty of popping upon a king at the corner of every street has worn off, it will sicken at the repetition. That populace, too, has a shrewd discerning quality of its own. I heard an adust carpenter, in his shirt-sleeves, to whom one of his companions had been giving some account of the royal ubiquity and locomotive energies, very quietly remark, "I think his Majesty is just as fond of shewing himself because he is a king, as I should be, for a bit, if they were to make a king of me."

* I find the following almost incredible statement in the papers: “About half past four, (Wednesday, July 28, after holding a levee,) the King, attended by Lord Glenlyon and Lord Combermere, went to Grillon’s hotel to take leave of the King of Wirtemberg, but his Majesty was absent!!!” and so his Britannic Majesty’s horses turned their tails and went home again; just as a doctor’s lady might have done who paid a morning visit to Mrs Shuffbottom, the wife of Mr Shuffbottom the dentist. How Mr Grillon himself, if there be such a person, must have wondered! and more especially as he doubtless knew that the King of Wirtemberg had gone to the levee, for the express purpose of taking his leave; a circumstance which exonerates his Majesty from any charge of disrespect, as he could not expect a second leave-taking at the hotel.

Sir Robert Wilson, too! he has been restored to honours of which he was deprived, and, as I think, justly deprived, by the late King. A vindictive sovereign, or a stern and severe ministry, would have dealt less leniently with him. Never did an officer, holding his Majesty's commission, commit a grosser outrage—a more flagrant insult, than he did on the memorable occasion of the funeral of Queen Caroline. Yet, within a month of his death, whom he so outraged and insulted, he is reinstated! Why, I again ask, are these things done? In what spirit are they done? What is the opinion they are meant to convey? What popularity is sought to be raised, in derision and contempt, as it were, over the grave of George IV.? I put these questions with the less hesitation, because I find the restoration of the "starless knight" has been the act of his Majesty's responsible advisers; the same advisers, I presume, that counselled the general order from the Horse Guards, (July 28th,) appointing "Colonel George Fitzclarence Deputy Adjutant-General to the Forces!" It has been publicly stated, and, as the statement remains uncontradicted, it is doubtless authentic, that when Lieutenant-General Sir Robert Wilson was presented to the King at the levee, his Majesty, "after shaking him cordially by the hand," was thanked by Sir Robert in a short speech for his kindness and gracious condescension in restoring him to his rank in the army. "His Majesty," says the account, "who continued to hold Sir Robert by the hand, addressed him thus: 'Sir Robert, do not thank me—I never tell an untruth. [Was there an emphasis, I wonder, upon the I, to mark any distinction as to royal untruths?] Your restoration was so strongly recommended to me by my ministers, that it was my duty to comply; for God forbid that I should ever stand in the way of the favours of the crown to a brave officer. I have now the satisfaction of congratulating you on your restoration, because I know, that if ever your services should be wanted, I shall find in you a brave officer, and a loyal subject!'"

It was certainly as honourable to his Majesty's feelings, as it is creditable to his high moral sense never to tell an untruth, thus to give the credit where it was due—to his ministers: as his ministers, on a former occasion, (delightful reciprocation of candour!) gave his Majesty all the credit of having ordered a passage to be made from St James's Park to Waterloo Place. But let that pass. Who are the ministers that so strongly recommended to William the Fourth the restoration of Sir Robert Wilson? The very same ministers, (with few exceptions, and those unimportant,) who as strongly recommended to George IV. that Sir Robert Wilson should be deprived of his rank. Consistent counsellors! Obsequious advisers! If you did your duty to your dead master, you have betrayed it to your living one. If you have advised justice in 1830, you advised injustice in 1821. But perhaps you have an escape from this dilemma—worthy of the dilemma itself—and are prepared to say, Sir Robert has been sufficiently punished for his offence; like a criminal sentenced to seven years' transportation, who, having served out his sentence, is entitled to return to that society from which he had been banished. If this be your defence, tell me how long is it since you made the discovery—and how much longer you might have lived without making the discovery, had it pleased Heaven to spare the monarch we have lost?

But, "is there no sequel at the heels" of these things? Would I had the power to make his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and Sir Robert Peel, and the rest of the cabinet, turn their thoughts inside out. Then should we see those secret springs, whose true movements, however, are sufficiently denoted to my mind in what is visible. Then should we behold the attainment of political objects, the reiteration of power, the enjoyment of place, balanced against servile subserviency to frivolous whims and puerile caprice. Then should we know the real cause of Sir Robert Wilson's restoration; of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex's reappearance at court, after an eclipse of nearly twenty years; of the promotion and introduction of the Fitzclarences; of that round of festivities, parades, visitings, and court gaieties, triumphing, (in bitter mockery of all our better feelings) the state grief of the morning, where an address of condolence is to be replied to, with the merriment of the evening, when the palace rings with rejoicings; and of that ceaseless exhibition in the public eye, from parade to parade, from levee to levee, and from Apsley House to Downing Street, Whitehall, and Privy Gardens. But it will all fail. Burdett may tell us, "we have now a King of England, and not the King of a faction;" that the "present King, in the short time he has been upon the throne of his forefathers, has displayed more true English feeling than has been displayed by any British sovereign for reigns past." (Poh!) Hunt may say the same things—Brougham, in talking to the Yorkshire freeholders, may dilate upon the glorious beginnings "of the new reign"—yet, a ministry essentially weak in itself, and rendered still weaker by its divisions and heart-burnings, will not be able to stand against public opinion, singly supported by the King's countenance. The Parliament you have to meet, will not be the Parliament, thank God! which assisted you in breaking in upon the Constitution!

THE SILENT MEMBER.

THE SHEPHERD POET OF THE ALPS.

BY MRS HEMANS.

God gave him reverence of laws,
Yet stirring blood in Freedom's cause—
A spirit to his rocks akin,
The eye of the hawk, and the fire therein!
COLERIDGE.

SINGING of the free blue sky,
And the wild-flower glens that lie
Far amidst the ancient hills,
Which the fountain-music fills;
Singing of the snow-peaks bright,
And the royal eagle's flight,
And the courage and the grace
Foster'd by the chamois-chase;
In his fetters, day by day,
So the Shepherd-poet lay.

Wherefore, from a dungeon-cell
Did those notes of freedom swell,
Breathing sadness not their own,
Forth with every Alpine tone?
Wherefore!—can a tyrant's ear
Brook the mountain-winds to hear,
When each blast goes pealing by
With a song of liberty?

Darkly hung th' oppressor's hand
O'er the Shepherd-poet's land;
Sounding there the waters gush'd,
While the lip of man was hush'd;
There the falcon pierced the cloud,
While the fiery heart was bow'd:
But this might not long endure,
Where the mountain-homes were pure;
And a valiant voice arose,
Thrilling all the silent snows;

His—now singing far and lone,
Where the young breeze ne'er was known;
Singing of the glad blue sky,
Wildly—and how mournfully!

Are none but the Wind and the Lammer-Geyer
To be free where the hills unto heaven aspire?
Is the soul of song from the deep glens past,
Now that their Poet is chain'd at last?—
Think of the mountains, and deem not so!
Soon shall each blast like a clarion blow!
Yes! though forbidden be every word
Wherewith that Spirit the Alps hath stirr'd,
Yet even as a buried stream thro' earth
Rolls on to another and brighter birth,
So shall the voice that hath seem'd to die,
Burst forth with the Anthem of Liberty!

And another power is moving
In a bosom fondly loving:—
Oh! a sister's heart is deep,
And her spirit strong to keep
Each light link of early hours,
All sweet scents of childhood's flowers!
Thus each lay by Erni sung,
Rocks and crystal caves among,
Or beneath the linden-leaves,
Or the cabin's vine-hung eaves,
Rapid though as bird-notes gushing,
Transient as a wan cheek's flushing,
Each in young Teresa's breast
Left its fiery words impress'd;
Treasured there lay every line,
As a rich book on a hidden shrine.
Fair was that lone girl, and meek,
With a pale transparent cheek,
And a deep-fringed violet eye
Seeking in sweet shade to lie,
Or, if raised to glance above,
Dim with its own dews of love;
And a pure, Madonna brow,
And a silvery voice, and low,
Like the echo of a flute,
Even the last, ere all be mute.
But a loftier soul was seen
In the orphan sister's mien,
From that hour when chains defiled
Him, the high Alps' noble child.
Tones in her quivering voice awoke,
As if a harp of battle spoke;
Light, that seem'd born of an eagle's nest,
Flash'd from her soft eyes, unrepress'd;
And her form, like a spreading water-flower,
When its frail cup swells with a sudden shower,
Seem'd all dilated with love and pride,
And grief for that brother, her young heart's guide.
Well might they love!—those two had grown
Orphans together and alone:
The silence of the Alpine sky
Had hush'd their hearts to piety;
The turf, o'er their dead mother laid,
Had been their altar when they pray'd;
There, more in tenderness than woe,
The stars had seen their young tears flow;

The clouds, in spirit-like descent,
 Their deep thoughts by one touch had blent,
 And the wild storms link'd them to each other—
 How dear can peril make a brother!

Now is their hearth a forsaken spot,
 The vine waves unpruned o'er their mountain-cot;
 Away, in that holy affection's might,
 The maiden is gone, like a breeze of the night;—
 She is gone forth alone, but her lighted face,
 Filling with soul every secret place,
 Hath a dower from heaven, and a gift of sway,
 To arouse brave hearts in its hidden way,
 Like the sudden flinging forth on high,
 Of a banner that startleth silently!
 She hath wander'd through many a hamlet-vale,
 Telling its children her brother's tale;
 And the strains, by his spirit pour'd away,
 Freely as fountains might shower their spray,
 From her fervent lip a new life have caught,
 And a power to kindle yet bolder thought;
 While sometimes a melody, all her own,
 Like a gush of tears in its plaintive tone,
 May be heard 'midst the lonely rocks to flow,
 Clear through the water-chimes—clear, yet low.

"Thou'rt not where wild flowers wave
 O'er crag and sparry cave;
 Thou'rt not where pines are sounding,
 Or joyous torrents bounding—
 Alas, my brother!

"Thou'rt not where green, on high,
 The brighter pastures lie;
 Ev'n those, thine own wild places,
 Bear of our chain dark traces:
 Alas, my brother!

"Far hath the sunbeam spread,
 Nor found thy lonely bed;
 Long hath the fresh wind sought thee,
 Nor one sweet whisper brought thee—
 Alas, my brother!

"Thou, that for joy wert born,
 Free as the wings of morn!
 Will aught thy young life cherish,
 Where the Alpine rose would perish?
 Alas, my brother!

"Canst thou be singing still,
 As once on every hill?
 Is not thy soul forsaken,
 And the bright gift from thee taken?—
 Alas, alas, my brother!"

And was the bright gift from the captive fled?
 Like the fire on his hearth, was his spirit dead?
 Not so!—but as rooted in stillness deep,
 The pure stream-lily its place will keep,
 Though its tearful urns to the blast may quiver,
 While the red waves rush down the foaming river,
 So freedom's faith in his bosom lay,
 Trembling, yet not to be borne away!

He thought of the Alps and their breezy air,
 And felt that his country no chains might bear;
 He thought of the hunter's haughty life,
 And knew there must yet be noble strife;
 But, oh! when he thought of that orphan maid,
 His high heart melted—he wept and pray'd!
 For he saw her not as she moved e'en then,
 A wakener of heroes in every glen,
 With a glance inspired which no grief could tame,
 Bearing on Hope like a torch's flame,
 While the strengthening voice of mighty wrongs
 Gave echoes back to her thrilling songs;
 But his dreams were fill'd by a haunting tone,
 Sad as a sleeping infant's moan;
 And his soul was pierc'd by a mournful eye,
 Which look'd on it—oh! how beseechingly!
 And there floated past him a fragile form,
 With a willowy droop, as beneath the storm;
 Till wakening in anguish, his faint heart strove
 In vain with its burden of helpless love!
 —Thus woke the dreamer one weary night—
 There flash'd through his dungeon a swift strong light;
 He sprang up—he climb'd to the grating-bars,
 —It was not the rising of moon or stars,
 But a signal flame from a peak of snow,
 Rock'd through the dark skies, to and fro!
 There shot forth another—another still—
 A hundred answers of hill to hill!
 Tossing like pines in the tempest's way,
 Joyously, wildly, the bright spires play,
 And each is hail'd with a pealing shout,
 For the high Alps waving their banners out!
 Erni, young Erni! the land hath risen!
 —Alas! to be lone in thy narrow prison!
 Those free streamers glancing, and thou not there!
 —Is the moment of rapture, or fierce despair?
 —Hark! there's a tumult that shakes his cell,
 At the gates of the mountain citadel!
 Hark! a clear voice through the rude sounds ringing!
 —Doth he know the strain, and the wild, sweet singing?

“ There may not long be fetters,
 Where the cloud is earth's array,
 And the bright floods leap from cave and steep,
 Like a hunter on the prey!

“ There may not long be fetters,
 Where the white Alps have their towers;
 Unto eagle-homes, if the arrow comes,
 The chain is not for ours!”

It is she!—She is come like a day-spring beam,
 She that so mournfully shadow'd his dream!
 With her shining eyes and her buoyant form,
 She is come! her tears on his cheek are warm
 And O! the thrill in that weeping voice!
 “ My brother, my brother! come forth, rejoice!

—Poet! the land of thy love is free,
 —Sister! thy brother is won by thee!

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAP. II.

Cancer ;—The Dentist and the Comedian ;—A Scholar's Death-Bed ;—Preparing for the House ;—Duelling.

ONE often hears of the great firmness of the female sex, and their powers of enduring a degree of physical pain which would utterly break down the stubborn strength of man. An interesting exemplification of this remark will be found in the short narrative immediately following. The event made a strong impression on my mind at the time, and I thought it well worthy of an entry in my Diary.

I had for several months been in constant attendance on a Mrs St——, a young married lady, of considerable family and fortune, who was the victim of that terrible scourge of the female sex—a cancer. To great personal attractions, she added uncommon sweetness of disposition: and the fortitude with which she submitted to the agonizing inroads of her malady, together with her ardent expressions of gratitude for such temporary alleviations as her anxious medical attendants could supply, contributed to inspire me with a very lively interest in her fate. I can conscientiously say, that during the whole period of my attendance, I never heard a word of complaint fall from her, nor witnessed any indications of impatience or irritability. I found her, one morning, stretched on the crimson sofa in the drawing room; and though her pallid features, and gently corrugated eyebrows, evidenced the intense agony she was suffering,—on my enquiring what sort of a night she had passed, she replied in a calm but tremulous tone, “Oh, Doctor, I have had a dreadful night—but I am glad Captain St—— was not with me—for it would have made him very wretched!” At that moment a fine flaxen-haired little boy, her first and only child, came running into the room, his blue laughing eyes glittering with innocent merriment. I took him on my knee, and amused him with my watch, in order that he might not disturb his mother. The poor sufferer, after gazing on him with an air of intense fondness for some moments, suddenly covered her eyes with her hand (oh, how slender—how snowy—how almost transparent was it!)—and I presently saw the tears trickling through her fingers—but she uttered not a word. There was the mother!—The aggravated malignity of her disorder rendered an operation at length inevitable. The eminent surgeon, who, jointly with myself, was in regular attendance on her, feelingly communicated the intelligence, and asked whether she thought she had fortitude enough to submit to an operation. She assured him, with a sweet smile of resignation, that she had for some time been suspecting as much, and had made up her mind to submit to it—but on two conditions—that her husband (who was then at sea) should not be informed of it till it was over; and that during the operation she should not be in any wise bound, or blindfolded. Her calm and decisive manner, convinced me that remonstrance would be useless. Sir —— looked at me with a doubtful air. She observed it; and said, “I see what you are thinking, Sir ——; but I hope to shew you that a woman has more courage than you seem willing to give her credit for.” In short, after the surgeon had acquiesced in the latter condition—to which he had especially demurred—a day was fixed for the operation—subject, of course, to Mrs St——’s state of health. When the Wednesday arrived, it was with some agitation that I entered Sir ——’s carriage, in company with himself, and his senior pupil, Mr —— . I could scarce avoid a certain nervous tremor—unprofessional as it may seem—when I saw the servant place the operating case on the seat of the carriage. “Are you sure you have every thing ready, Mr ——?” enquired Sir ——, with a calm and business-like air, which somewhat irritated me. On being assured of the affirmative, and after cautiously casting his eye over the case of instruments,* to make assurance doubly sure, we drove off. We arrived at Mrs St—'s,—who resided a few miles from town,—about two o'clock in the afternoon, and were immediately ushered into the room in which the operation was to be performed—a back parlour, the window of which looked into a beautiful garden. I shall be pardoned, I hope, for acknowledging, that the glimpse I caught of the pale and disordered countenance of the servant, as he retired, after shewing us into the room, somewhat disconcerted me; for in addition to the deep interest I felt in the fate of the lovely sufferer, I had always an abhorrence, for the operative part of the profession, which many years of practice did not suffice to remove. The necessary arrangements being at length completed,—consisting of a hateful array of instruments,—cloths,—sponge,—warm water, &c., &c.,—a message was sent to Mrs St—, to inform her all was ready.

Sir — was just making a jocular and not very well-timed allusion to my agitated air, when the door was opened, and Mrs St— entered, followed by her two attendants. Her step was firm—her air composed—and her pale features irradiated with a smile—sad, however, as the cold twilight of October. She was then about twenty-six or seven years of age—and under all the disadvantageous circumstances in which she was placed, looked at that moment a beautiful woman. Her hair was light auburn, and hung back neglectedly over a forehead and neck white as marble. Her full blue eyes, which usually beamed with a delicious pensive expression from beneath —“the soft languor of the drooping lid,”

were now lighted with the glitter of a restlessness and agitation, which the noblest degree of self-command could not entirely conceal or repress. Her features were regular—her nose and mouth were exquisitely chiselled—and her complexion fair, almost to transparency. Indeed, an eminent medical writer has remarked that the most beautiful women are generally the subjects of this terrible disease. A large Indian shawl was thrown over her shoulders, and she wore a white muslin dressing-gown. And was it this innocent and beautiful being who was doomed to writhe beneath the torture and disfigurement of the operating knife? My heart ached. A decanter of port-wine and some glasses were placed on a small table near the window; she beckoned me towards it, and was going to speak.

“Allow me, my dear madam, to pour you a glass of wine,” said I.

“If it would do me good, Doctor,” she whispered. She barely touched the glass with her lips, and then handed it to me, saying, with assumed cheerfulness, “Come, Doctor, I see you need it as much as I do, after all. Yes, Doctor,” she continued with emphasis, “you are very, very kind and feeling to me.” When I had set down the glass, she continued, “Dear Doctor, do forgive a woman's weakness—and try if you can hold this letter which I received yesterday from Captain St—, and in which he speaks very fondly—so that my eyes may rest on his dear hand-writing all the while I am sitting here—without being noticed by any one else—will you?”

“Madam, you must really excuse me—it will agitate you—I must beg”—

“You are mistaken,” she replied with firmness; “it will rather compose me. And if I should—” expire, she was going to have said—but her tongue refused utterance. She then put the letter into my hand—hers was cold, icy cold, and clammy—but I did not perceive it tremble.

“In return, madam, you must give me leave to hold your hand during the operation.”

“What—you fear me, Doctor?” she replied with a faint smile, but

* I once saw the life of a patient lost, merely through the want of such laudable precaution as that of Sir —, in the present instance. An indispensable instrument was suddenly required, in the middle of the operation; and to the dismay of the operator and those around him, there was none at hand!

did not refuse my request. At this moment, Sir — approached us with a cheerful air, saying, "Well, madam, is your tête-à-tête finished? I want to get this little matter over, and give you permanent ease." I do not think there ever lived a professional man who could speak with such an assuring air as Sir —!

"I am ready, Sir —. Are the servants sent out?" she enquired from one of the women present.

"Yes, madam," she replied, in tears.

"And my little Harry?" Mrs St — asked, in a fainter tone. She was answered in the affirmative.

"Then I am prepared," said she, and sat down in the chair that was placed for her. One of the attendants then removed the shawl from her shoulders, and Mrs St — herself, with perfect composure, assisted in displacing as much of her dress as was necessary. She then suffered Sir — to place her on the corner side of the chair, with her left arm thrown over the back of it, and her face looking over her right shoulder. She gave me her right hand; and with my left, I endeavoured to hold Captain St —'s letter, as she had desired. She smiled sweetly, as if to assure me of her fortitude; and there was something so indescribably affecting in the expression of her full blue eyes, that it almost broke my heart. I shall never forget that smile as long as I live! Half closing her eyes, she fixed them on the letter I held—and did not once remove them till all was over. Nothing could console me at this trying moment, but a conviction of the consummate skill of Sir —, who now, with a calm eye, and a steady hand, commenced the operation. At the instant of the first incision, her whole frame quivered with a convulsive shudder, and her cheeks became ashy pale. I prayed inwardly that she might faint, so that the earlier stage of the operation might be got over while she was in a state of insensibility. It was not the case, however—her eyes continued riveted in one long burning gaze of fondness on the beloved handwriting of her husband; and she moved not a limb, nor uttered more than an occasional sigh, during the whole of the protracted and painful operation. When the last bandage had been applied she whispered almost inarticulately, "Is it all over, Doctor?"

"Yes, madam," I replied, "and we are going to carry you up to bed."

"No, no—I think I can walk—I will try," said she, and endeavoured to rise; but on Sir — assuring her that the motion might perhaps induce fatal consequences, she desisted, and we carried her, sitting in the chair, up to bed. The instant we had laid her down, she swooned—and continued so long insensible, that Sir — held a looking-glass over her mouth and nostrils, apprehensive that the vital energies had at last sunk under the terrible struggle. She recovered, however; and under the influence of an opiate draught, slept for several hours.

* * * * *

Mrs St — recovered, though very slowly; and I attended her assiduously—sometimes two or three times a-day, till she could be removed to the sea-side. I shall not easily forget an observation she made at the last visit I paid her. She was alluding, one morning, distantly and delicately to the personal disfigurement she had suffered. I, of course, said all that was soothing.

"But, Doctor, my husband—" said she, suddenly, while a faint crimson mantled on her cheek—adding falteringly, after a pause—"I think St — will love me yet!"

THE DENTIST AND THE COMEDIAN.

Friday, — 18—. A ludicrous contretemps happened to-day, which I wish I could describe as forcibly as it struck me. Mr —, the well-known comedian, with whom I was on terms of intimacy, after having suffered so severely from the tooth-ach, as to be prevented for two evenings from taking his part in the play, sent, under my direction, for Mons. —, a fashionable dentist, then but recently imported from France. While I was sitting with my friend, endeavouring to "screw his courage up to the sticking-place," Monsieur arrived, duly furnished with the "tools of his craft." The comedian sat down with a rueful visage, and eyed the dentist's formidable preparations with a piteous and disconcerted air. As soon as I had taken my station behind, for the purpose of holding the patient's head, the gum was lanced without much ado; but as the doomed tooth was a very formidable broad-rooted molar, Monsieur prepared for a vigorous effort. He was just commencing the dreadful wrench, when he suddenly relaxed his hold, retired a step or two from his patient, and burst into a loud fit of laughter! Up started the astounded comedian, and with clenched fists demanded furiously, "What the d—! he meant by such conduct?" The little bewhiskered foreigner, however, continued standing at a little distance, still so convulsed with laughter, as to disregard the menacing movements of his patient; and exclaiming, "Ah, mon Dieu!—ver good—ver good—bien! ha, ha!—Be Gar, Monsieur, you pull one such d— queer, extraordinaire comique face—Be Gar, like one big fiddle!" or words to that effect. The dentist was right: Mr —'s features were odd enough at all times; but, on the present occasion, they suffered such excruciating contortions—such a strange puckering together of the mouth and cheeks, and upturning of the eyes, that it was ten thousand times more laughable than any artificially distorted features with which he used to set Drury-Lane in a roar.—Oh that a painter had been present!—There was, on one side, my friend, standing in menacing attitude, with both fists clenched, his left cheek swelled, and looking as if the mastication of a large apple had been suddenly suspended, and his whole features creating a grotesque expression of mingled pain, indecision, and fury. Then there was the operator beginning to look a little startled at the probable consequences of his sally; and, lastly, I stood a little aside, almost suffocated with suppressed laughter! At length, however, —'s perception of the ridiculous prevailed; and after a very hearty laugh, and exclaiming, "I must have looked d—d odd, I suppose!" he once more resigned himself into the hands of Monsieur, and the tooth was out in a twinkling.

A SCHOLAR'S DEATH-BED.

[The following short but melancholy narrative, will, it is hoped, be perused with additional interest, when the reader is assured that it is fact. Much more might have been committed to press; but as it would have related chiefly to a mad devotion to alchemy, which some of Mr —'s few posthumous papers abundantly evidence, it is omitted, lest the reader should consider the details as romantic or improbable. All that is worth recording is told; and it is hoped, that some young men of powerful, undisciplined, and ambitious minds, will find their account in an attentive consideration of the fate of a kindred spirit.—Bene facit, qui ex aliorum erroribus sibi exemplum sumat.]

Thinking, one morning, that I had gone through the whole of my usual levee of home-patients, I was preparing to go out, when the servant informed me there was one yet to be spoken with, who, he thought, must have been asleep in a corner of the room, or he should not have failed to summon him in his turn. Directing him to be shewn in immediately, I retook my place at my desk. The servant in a few moments ushered in a young man, who seemed to have scarce strength enough, even with the assistance of a walking-stick, to totter to a chair opposite me. I was much struck with his appearance, which was that of one in reduced circumstances. His clothes, though perfectly clean and neat, were faded and threadbare; and his coat was buttoned up to his chin, where it was joined by a black silk neck-kerchief, in such a manner as to lead me to suspect the absence of a shirt. He was rather below than above the average height, and seemed wasted almost to a shadow. There was an air of superior ease and politeness in his demeanour; and an expression about his countenance, sickly and sallow though it was, so melancholy, mild, and intelligent, that I could not help viewing him with peculiar interest.

"I was afraid, my friend, I should have missed you," said I, in a kind tone, "as I was on the point of going out.”—“I heard your carriage drive up to the door, doctor, and shall not detain you more than a few moments; nay, I will call to-morrow, if that would be more convenient,” he replied faintly, suddenly pressing his hand to his side, as though the effort of speaking occasioned him pain. I assured him I had a quarter of an hour at his service, and begged he would proceed at once to state the nature of his complaint. He detailed—what I had anticipated from his appearance—all the symptoms of a very advanced stage of pulmonary consumption. He expressed himself in very select and forcible language; and once or twice, when at a loss for what he conceived an adequate expression in English, chose such an appropriate Latin phrase, that the thought perpetually suggested itself to me, while he was speaking—“a starved scholar!”—He made not the most distant allusion to poverty, but confined himself to the leading symptoms of his indisposition. I determined, however, (hanc præteritorum inmemor!) to ascertain his circumstances, with a view, if possible, of relieving them. I asked if he ate animal food with relish,—enjoyed his dinner,—whether his meals were regular. He coloured, and hesitated a little, for I put the question searchingly; and replied, with some embarrassment, that he did not, certainly, then eat regularly, nor enjoy his food when he did. I soon found that he was in very straitened circumstances; that, in short, he was sinking rapidly under the pressure of want and harassing anxiety, which alone had accelerated, if not wholly induced, his present illness; and that all he had to expect from medical aid, was a little alleviation. I prescribed a few simple medicines, and then asked him in what part of the town he resided.

“I am afraid, doctor,” said he modestly, “I shall be unable to afford your visiting me at my own lodgings. I will occasionally call on you here, as a morning patient,”—and he proffered me half a guinea. The conviction that it was probably the very last he had in the world, and a keen recollection of similar scenes in my own history, almost brought the tears into my eyes. I refused the fee, of course; and prevailed on him to let me set him down, as I was driving close past his residence. He seemed overwhelmed with gratitude; and with a blush, hinted, that he was “not quite in carriage costume.” He lived in one of the small streets leading from May-fair; and after having made a note in my tablets, of his name and number, I set him down, promising him an early call.

The clammy pressure of his wasted fingers, as I shook his hand at parting, remained with me all that day. I could not dismiss from my mind the wild and sorrowful countenance of this young man, go where I would; and I was on the point of mentioning the incident to a most excellent and generous nobleman, whom I was then attending, and soliciting his assistance,—but the thought that it was premature, checked me. There might be something unworthy in the young man; he might possibly be an-impostor. These were hard thoughts—chilling and unworthy suspicions, but I could not resist them; alas! an eighteen years’ intercourse with a deceitful world has alone taught me how to entertain them!

As my wife dined a little out of town that evening, I hastily swallowed a solitary meal, and set out in quest of my morning patient. With some difficulty I found the house; it was the meanest, and in the meanest street, I had visited for months. I knocked at the door, which was open, and surrounded by a babbling throng of dirty children. A slatternly woman, with a child in her arms, answered my summons. Mr —, she said, lived there, in the top floor; but he was just gone out for a few moments, she supposed, “to get a mouthful of victuals, but I was welcome to go up and wait for him, since there was not much to make away with, howsoever,” said the rude and vulgar creature. One of her children led me up the narrow, dirty staircase, and having ushered me into the room, left me to my meditations. A wretched hole it was in which I was sitting! The evening sun streamed in discoloured rays through the unwashed panes, here and there mended with brown paper, and sufficed to shew me that the only furniture consisted of a miserable, curtainless bed, (the disordered clothes shewing that the weary limbs of the wretched occupant had but recently left it)—three old rush-bottomed chairs—and a rickety deal table, on which were scattered several pages of manuscript—a letter or two—pens, ink, and a few books. There was no chest of drawers—nor did I see any thing likely to serve as a substitute. Poor Mr — probably carried about with him all he had in the world! There was a small sheet of writing paper pinned over the mantel-piece, (if such it deserved to be called,) which I gazed at with a sigh; it bore simply the outline of a coffin, with Mr —'s initials, and “obit — 18 —,” evidently in his own handwriting. Curious to see the kind of books he preferred, I took them up and examined them. There were—if I recollect right—a small Amsterdam edition of Plautus—a Horace—a much be-fingered copy of Aristophanes—a neat pocket edition of Æschylus—a small copy of the works of Lactantius—and two odd volumes of English books. I had no intention of being impertinently inquisitive, but my eye accidentally lit on the uppermost manuscript, and seeing it to be in the Greek character, I took it up, and found a few verses of Greek sapphics, entitled—Εἰς τὴν νύκτα τελευταίαν—evidently the recent composition of Mr —. He entered the room as I was laying down the paper, and started at seeing a stranger, for it seems the people of the house had not taken the trouble to inform him I was waiting. On discovering who it was, he bowed politely, and gave me his hand; but the sudden agitation my presence had occasioned, deprived him of utterance. I thought I could almost hear the palpitation of his heart. I brought him to a chair, and begged him to be calm.

“You are not worse, Mr —, I hope, since I saw you this morning?” I enquired. He whispered almost inarticulately, holding his hand to his left side, that he was always worse in the evenings. I felt his pulse; it beat 130! I discovered that he had gone out for the purpose of trying to get employment in a neighbouring printing-office, but having failed, was returned in a state of deeper depression than usual. The perspiration rolled from his brow almost faster than he could wipe it away. I sate by him for nearly two minutes, holding his hand, without uttering a word, for I was deeply affected. At length I begged he would forgive my enquiring how it was that a young man of talent and education like himself could be reduced to a state of such utter destitution? While I was waiting for an answer, he suddenly fell from his chair in a swoon. The exertion of walking, the pressure of disappointment, and, I fear, the almost unbroken fast of the day, had completely prostrated the small remains of his strength. When he had a little revived, I succeeded in laying him on the bed, and instantly summoned the woman of the house. After some time, she sauntered lazily to the door, and asked me what I wanted. “Are you the person that attends on this gentleman, my good woman?” I enquired.

“Marry come up, sir!” she replied in a loud tone. “I’ve no manner of cause for attending on him, not I; he ought to attend on himself: and as for his being a gentleman,” she continued with an insolent sneer, for which I felt inclined to throw her down stairs, “not a stiver of his money have I seen for this three weeks for his rent, and”—— Seeing the fluent virago was warming, and approaching close to my unfortunate patient’s bedside, I stopped her short by putting half a guinea into her hand, and directing her to purchase a bottle of port wine; at the same time hinting, that if she conducted herself properly, I would see her rent paid myself. I then shut the door, and resumed my seat by Mr —, who was trembling violently all over with agitation, and endeavoured to soothe him. The more I said, however, and the kinder were my tones, the more was he affected. At length he burst into a flood of tears, and continued weeping for some time, like a child. I saw it was hysterical, and that it was best to let his feelings have their full course. His nervous excitement at last gradually subsided, and he began to converse with tolerable coolness.

“Doctor,” he faltered, “your conduct is very—very noble—it must be disinterested," pointing, with a bitter air, to the wretched room in which we were sitting.

"I feel sure, Mr —, that you have done nothing to merit your present misfortunes," I replied, with a serious and enquiring air.

"Yes—yes, I have!—I have indulged in wild ambitious hopes—lived in absurd dreams of future greatness,—been educated beyond my fortunes—and formed tastes, and cherished feelings, incompatible with the station it seems I was born to—beggary or daily labour!" was his answer, with as much vehemence as his weakness would allow.

"But, Mr —, your friends—your relatives—they cannot be apprized of your situation."

"Alas, doctor, friends I have none—unless you will permit me to name the last and noblest, yourself; relatives, several."

"And they, of course, do not know of your illness and straitened circumstances?"

"They do, doctor—and kindly assure me I have brought it on myself. To do them justice, however, they could not, I believe, efficiently help me, if they would."

"Why, have you offended them, Mr —? Have they cast you off?"

"Not avowedly—not in so many words. They have simply refused to receive or answer any more of my letters. Possibly I may have offended them, but am content to meet them hereafter, and try the justice of the case—there," said Mr —, solemnly pointing upwards—"Well I know, and so do you, doctor, that my days on earth are very few, and likely to be very bitter also." It was in vain I pressed him to tell me who his relatives were, and suffer me to solicit their personal attendance on his last moments. "It is altogether useless, doctor, to ask me further," said he, raising himself a little in bed,—"my father and mother are both dead, and no power on earth shall extract from me a syllable further. It is hard," he continued, bursting again into tears, "if I must die amid their taunts and reproaches." I felt quite at a loss what to say to all this. There was something very singular, if not reprehensible, in his manner of alluding to his relatives, which led me to fear that he was by no means free from blame. Had I not felt myself very delicately situated, and dreaded even the possibility of hurting his morbidly irritable feelings, I felt inclined to have asked him how he thought of existing without their aid, especially in his forlorn and helpless state; having neither friends, nor the means of obtaining them. I thought, also, that short as had been my intimacy with him, I had discerned symptoms of a certain obstinacy, and haughty imperiousness of temper, which would sufficiently account, if not for occasioning, at least for widening, any unhappy breach which might have occurred in his family. But what was to be done? I could not let him starve; as I had voluntarily stepped in to his assistance, I determined to make his last moments easy—at least as far as lay in my power.

A little to anticipate the course of my narrative, I may here state what little information concerning him was elicited in the course of our various interviews. His father and mother had left Ireland, their native place, early, and gone to Jamaica, where they lived as slave-superintendents. They left their only son to the care of the wife's brother-in-law, who put him to school, where he much distinguished himself. On the faith of it, he contrived to get to the college in Dublin, where he stayed two years: and then, in a confident reliance on his own talents, and the sum of £50 which was sent him from Jamaica, with the intelligence of the death of both his parents in impoverished circumstances, he had come up to London, it seems, with no very definite end in view. Here he had continued for about two years; but in addition to the failure of his health, all his efforts to establish himself proved abortive. He contrived to glean a scanty sum, God knows how, which was gradually lessening at a time when his impaired health rather required that his resources should be augmented. He had no friends in respectable life, whose influence or wealth might have been serviceable; and at the time he called on me, he had not more in the world than the solitary half-guinea he proffered to me as a fee. I never learnt the names of any of his relatives; but from several things occasionally dropped in the heat of conversation, it was clear there must have been unhappy differences.

To return, however. As the evening was far advancing, and I had one or two patients yet to visit, I began to think of taking my departure. I enjoined him strictly to keep his bed till I saw him again, to preserve as calm and equable a frame of mind as possible, and to dismiss all anxiety for the future, as I would gladly supply his present necessities, and send him a civil and attentive nurse. He tried to thank me, but his emotions choked his utterance. He grasped my hand with convulsive energy. His eye spoke eloquently—but, alas! it shone with the fierce and unnatural lustre of consumption, as though, I have often thought in such cases, the conscious soul was glowing with the reflected light of its kindred element—eternity. I knew it was impossible for him to survive many days, from several unequivocal symptoms of what is called, in common language, a galloping consumption. I was as good as my word, and sent him a nurse, (the mother of one of my servants), who was charged to pay him the utmost attention in her power. My wife also sent him a little bed-furniture, linen, preserves, jellies, and other small matters of that sort. I visited him every evening, and found him on each occasion verifying my apprehensions, for he was sinking rapidly. His mental energies, however, seemed to increase in an inverse ratio with the decline of his physical powers. His conversation was animated, various, and, at times, enchainingly interesting. I have sometimes sat at his bedside for several hours together, wondering how one so young (he was not more than two or three and twenty) could have acquired so much information. He spoke with spirit and justness on the leading political topics of the day; and I particularly recollect his making some very noble reflections on the character and exploits of Bonaparte, who was then blazing in the zenith of his glory. Still, however, the current of his thoughts and language was frequently tinged with the enthusiasm and extravagance of delirium. Of this he seemed himself conscious; for he would sometimes suddenly stop, and pressing his hand to his forehead, exclaim, "Doctor, doctor, I am failing here—here!" He acknowledged that he had from his childhood given himself up to the dominion of ambition; and that his whole life had been spent in the most extravagant and visionary expectations. He would smile bitterly when he recounted some of what he justly stigmatized as his insane projects. "The objects of my ambition," he said, "have been vague and general; I never knew exactly where, or what, I would be. Had my powers, such as they are, been concentrated on one point—had I formed a more just and modest estimate of my abilities—I might possibly have become something...* Besides, doctor, I had no money—no solid substratum to build upon—there was the rotten point!—Oh, doctor," he continued, with a deep sigh, "if I could but have seen these things three years ago, as I see them now, I might at this moment have been a sober and respectable member of society; but now I am dying a hanger-on—a fool—a beggar!" and he burst into tears. "You, doctor," he presently continued, "are accustomed, I suppose, to listen to these death-bed repinings—these soul-scourings—these wallings over a badly-spent life!—Oh, yes—as I am nearing eternity, I seem to look at things—at my own mind and heart, especially—through the medium of a strange, searching, uncouthly light. Oh, how many, many things it makes distinct, which I would fain have forgotten for ever! Do you recollect the terrible language of Scripture, doctor, which compares the human breast to a cage of unclean birds!"—I left him that evening deeply convinced of the compulsory truths he had uttered; I never thought so seriously before. It is some Scotch divine who has said, that one death-bed preaches a more startling sermon than a bench of bishops.

* * * * *

Mr — was an excellent and thorough Greek scholar, perfectly well versed in the Greek dramatists, and passionately fond, in particular, of Sophocles. I recollect his reciting, one evening, with great force and feeling, the touching exclamation of the chorus, in the Œdipus Tyrannus—

Ω πόποι—ἀναρίθμητα γὰρ φίρω πάματα,
νοσῶ δὲ μοί πρόπας στόλος,
οὐδ' ἐνὶ Φροντίδος ἔγχος
ᾧ τις ἀλλέγεται.*

&c. &c. 167-171.

—which, he said, was never absent from his mind, sleeping or waking. I once asked him, if he did not regret having devoted his life almost exclusively to the study of the classics. He replied, with enthusiasm, “No, doctor—no, no! I should be an ingrate if I did. How can I regret having lived in constant converse, through their works, with the greatest and noblest men that ever breathed! I have lived in Elysium—have breathed the celestial air of those hallowed plains, while engaged in the study of the philosophy and poetry of Greece and Rome. Yes, it is a consolation even for my bitter and premature death-bed, to think that my mind will quit this wretched, diseased, unworthy body, imbued with the refinement—redolent of the eternal freshness and beauty of the most exquisite poetry and philosophy the world ever saw! With my faculties quickened and strengthened, I shall go confidently, and claim kindred with the great ones of Eternity. They know I love their works—have consumed all the oil of my life in their study, and they will welcome their son—their disciple!” Ill as he was, Mr — uttered these sentiments (as nearly as I can recollect, in the very words I have given) with an energy, an enthusiasm, and an eloquence, which I never saw surpassed. He faltered suddenly, however, from this lofty pitch of excitement, and complained bitterly that his devotion to ancient literature had engendered a morbid sensibility, which had rendered him totally unfit for the ordinary business of life, or intermixture with society. * * *

Often I found him sitting up in bed, and reading his favourite play, the Prometheus Vinculus of Æschylus, while his pale and wasted features glowed with delighted enthusiasm. He told me, that, in his estimation, there was an air of grandeur and romance about that play, such as was not equalled by any of the productions of the other Greek dramatists; and that the opening dialogue was peculiarly impressive and affecting. He had committed to memory nearly three-fourths of the whole play! I on one occasion asked him, how it came to pass that a person of his superior classical attainments had not obtained some tolerably lucrative engagement as an usher or tutor? He answered, with rather an haughty air, that he would rather have broken stones on the highway.

“To hear,” said he, “the magnificent language of Greece—the harmonious cadences of the Romans, mangled and disfigured by stupid lads and duller ushers—oh, it would have been such a profanation as the sacred groves of old suffered, when their solemn silence was disturbed by a rude unhallowed throng of Bacchanals. I should have expired, doctor! I told him, I could not help lamenting such an absurd and morbid sensitiveness—at which he seemed exceedingly piqued. He possibly thought I should rather have admired than reprobated the lofty tone he assumed! I asked him if the stations, of which he spoke with such supercilious contempt, had not been joyfully occupied by some of the greatest scholars that had ever lived? He replied simply, with a cold air, that it was his misfortune—not his fault. He told me, however, that his classical acquirements had certainly been capable of something like a profitable employment; for that about two months before he had called on me, he had nearly come to terms with a bookseller, for publishing a poetical version of the comedies of Aristophanes; that he had nearly completed one—the ΝΕΦΕΑΙ, if I recollect right—when the great difficulty of the task, and the wretched remuneration offered, so dispirited him, that he threw it aside in disgust.* His only means of subsistence had been the sorry pay of an occasional reader for the press, as well as a contributor to the columns of a daily paper. He had parted with almost the whole of his slender stock of books, his watch, and all his clothes, except what he wore when he called on me. "And you never try any of the magazines?" I enquired; "for they afford to many young men of talent a fair livelihood." He said he had indeed struggled hard to gain a footing in one of the popular periodicals, but that his communications were invariably returned, "with polite acknowledgments." One of these notes I saw, and have now in my possession. It was thus:

"Mr M—— begs to return the enclosed 'Remarks on English Versions of Euripides,' with many thanks for the writer's polite offer of it to the E—— M——; but fears that, though an able performance, it is not exactly suited for the readers of the E—— M——."

A series of similar disappointments, and the consequent poverty and embarrassment into which he sunk, had gradually undermined a constitution naturally feeble; and he told me with much agitation, that had it not been for the trifling but timely assistance of myself and family, he saw no means of escaping literal starvation! Could I help sympathizing deeply with him? Alas! his misfortunes were very nearly paralleled by my own. While listening to his melancholy details, I seemed living over again the four first wretched years of my professional career.

* * * *

I must hasten, however, to the closing scene. I had left word with the nurse, that when Mr —— appeared dying, I should be instantly summoned. About five o'clock, in the evening of the 6th July, 18—, I received a message from Mr —— himself, saying that he wished to breathe his last in my presence, as the only friend he had on earth. Unavoidable and pressing professional engagements detained me until half past six; and it was seven o'clock before I reached his bedside.

"Lord, Lord, doctor, poor Mr —— is dying, sure!" exclaimed the woman of the house, as she opened the door. "Mrs Jones says he has been picking and clearing the bed-clothes awfully, so he must be dying!"† On entering the room, I found

* Among his papers I found the following spirited and close version of one of the choral odes in the Nubes, commencing,

Ἄμφι μὲν αὖτε Φοῖβ' ἄναξ
Δῖλ'ι, &c,

"Thee, too, great Phæbus, I invoke,
Thou Delian King,
Who dwel'st on Cynthia's lofty rock!
Thy passage hither wing,
Blest Goddess! whom Ephesian splendors hold
In temple bright with gold,
'Mid Lydian maidens nobly worshipping!
And thee, our native deity,
Pallas, our city's guardian, thou!
Who wieldst the dreadful Ægis. Thee,
Thee, too, gay Bacchus, from Parnassian height,
Ruddy with festive torches' glow—
To crown the sacred choir, I thee invite!"

Those who are conversant with the original, will perceive that many of the difficult Greek expressions are rendered into literal English.

† This very prevalent but absurd notion is not confined to the vulgar; and as I have, in the course of my practice, met with hundreds of respectable and intelligent people, who have held that a patient's "picking and clearing the bed-clothes" is a symptom of death, and who consequently view it with a kind of superstitious horror, I cannot refrain from explaining the philosophy of it to the numerous unprofessional readers of this Magazine, in the simple and satisfactory words of Mr C. Bell:—

"It is very common," he says, "to see the patient picking the bed-clothes, or catching at the empty air. This proceeds from an appearance of motes or flies passing be-he had dropt asleep. The nurse told me he had been wandering a good deal in his mind. I asked what he had talked about? "Larning, doctor," she replied, "and a proud young lady." I sate down by his bedside. I saw the dews of death were stealing rapidly over him. His eyes, which were naturally very dark and piercing, were now far sunk into their sockets; his cheeks were hollow, and his hair matted with perspiration over his damp and pallid forehead. While I was gazing silently on the melancholy spectacle, and reflecting what great but undisciplined powers of mind were about soon to be disunited from the body, Mr — opened his eyes, and seeing me, said, in a low, but clear and steady tone of voice—"Doctor—the last act of the tragedy!" He gave me his hand. It was all he could do to lift it into mine. I could not speak—the tears were nearly gushing forth. I felt as if I were gazing on my dying son.

"I have been dreaming, doctor, since you went," said he, "and what do you think about? I thought I had squared the circle, and was to perish for ever for my discovery."

"I hope, Mr —," I replied, in a serious tone, and with something of displeasure in my manner—"I hope that, at this awful moment, you have more suitable and consolatory thoughts to occupy your mind with than those?" He sighed. "The clergyman you were so good as to send me," he said, after a pause, "was here this afternoon. He is a good man, I dare say, but weak, and has his head stuffed with the quibbles of the schools. He wanted to discuss the question of free will with a dying man, doctor!"

"I hope he did not leave without administering the ordinances of religion?" I enquired.

"He read me some of the church prayers, which were exquisitely touching and beautiful, and the fifteenth chapter of Corinthians, which is very sublime. He could not help giving me a rehearsal of what he was shortly to repeat over my grave!" exclaimed the dying man, with a melancholy smile. I felt some irritation at the light tone of his remarks, but concealed it.

"You received the sacrament, I hope, Mr —?" He paused a few moments, and his brow was clouded. "No, doctor, to tell the truth, I declined it!"—

"Declined the sacrament!" I exclaimed, with surprise.

"Yes—but, dear doctor, I beg—I entreat you not to ask me about it any further," replied Mr —, gloomily, and lapsed into a fit of abstraction for some moments. Unnoticed by him, I dispatched the nurse for another clergyman, an excellent and learned man, who was my intimate friend. I was gazing earnestly on Mr —, as he lay with closed eyes; and was surprised to see the tears trickling from them.

"Mr —, you have nothing, I hope, on your mind, to render your last moments unhappy?" I asked, in a gentle tone.

"No—nothing material," he replied with a deep sigh; continuing, with his eyes closed, "I was only thinking what a bitter thing it is to be struck down so soon from among the bright throng of the living—to leave this fair, this beautiful world, after so short and sorrowful a sojourn. Oh, it is hard!" He shortly opened his eyes. His agitation had apparently passed away, and delirium was hovering over and disarranging his thoughts.

"Doctor, doctor, what a strange passage that is,"—said he suddenly, startling me with his altered voice, and the dreamy, thoughtful expression of his eyes,—"in the chorus of the Medea—

*"Αν ποταμῶν ἱερῶν χωροῦσι παγαὶ καὶ δῖα καὶ πάντα πάλιν στρέφεται.

fore the eyes, and is occasioned by an affection of the retina, producing in it a sensation similar to that produced by the impression of images; and what is deficient in sensation, the imagination supplies: for although the resemblance betwixt those diseased affections of the retina, and the idea conveyed to the brain, may be very remote, yet, by that slight resemblance, the idea usually associated with the sensation will be excited in the mind."—Bell's Anatomy, vol. iii. pp. 57-58.

The secret lies in a disordered circulation of the blood, forcing the red globules into the minute vessels of the retina.

Is not there something very mysterious and romantic about these lines? I could never exactly understand what was meant by them." Finding I continued silent,—for I did not wish to encourage his indulging in a train of thought so foreign to his situation,—he kept murmuring at intervals, metrically, ὄντο παταμῶν ἱερῶν,

in a most melancholy, monotonous tone. He then wandered on from one topic of classical literature to another, till he suddenly stopped short, and turning to me, said, "Doctor, I am raving very absurdly. I feel I am; but I cannot dismiss from my thoughts, even though I know I am dying, the subjects about which my mind has been occupied nearly all my life through.—Oh!" changing the subject abruptly, "tell me, doctor, do those who die of my disorder generally continue in the possession of their intellects to the last?" I told him I thought they generally did.

"Then I shall burn brightly to the last! Thank God!—And yet," with a shudder, "it is shocking, too, to find oneself gradually ceasing to exist.—Doctor, I should recover, I am sure I should, if you were to bleed me," said he—his intellects were wandering.

The nurse now returned, and, to my vexation, unaccompanied by Dr —, who had gone that morning into the country. I did not send for any one else. His frame of mind was peculiar, and very unsatisfactory; but I thought it, on the whole, better not to disturb or irritate him by alluding to a subject he evidently disliked. I ordered candles to be brought, as it was now nearly nine o'clock. "Doctor," said the dying young man, in a feeble tone, "I think you will find a copy of Lactantius lying on my table. He has been a great favourite with me. May I trouble you to read me a passage—the eighth chapter of the seventh book—on the immortality of the soul? I should like to die thoroughly convinced of that noble truth—if truth it is—and I have often read that chapter with much satisfaction." I went to the table and found the book—a pocket copy—the leaves of which were ready turned down to the very page I wanted. I therefore read him, slowly and emphatically, the whole of the eighth and ninth chapters, beginning, "Num est igitur summum bonum immortalitas, ad quam capiendam, et formati a principio, et nati sumus." When I had got as far as the allusion to Cicero's vacillating views, Mr — repeated with me, sighing, the words, "harum inquit sententiarum, quæ vera sit, Deus aliquis viderit."—As an instance of the "Ruling passion, strong in death,"

I may mention, though somewhat to my own discredit, that he briskly corrected a false quantity which slipped from me. "Allow me, doctor—'expetit,' not 'expetit.'" He made no other observation, when I had concluded reading the chapters from Lactantius, than, "I certainly wish I had early formed fixed principles on religious subjects—but it is now too late." He then dropped asleep, but presently began murmuring very sorrowfully—"Emma, Emma! haughty one! Not one look?—I am dying—and you don't know it—nor care for me! * * How beautiful she looked stepping from the carriage! How magnificently dressed! I think she saw—why can't she love me? She cannot love somebody else—No—madness—no!"—In this strain he continued soliloquizing for some minutes longer. It was the first time I had ever heard any thing of the kind fall from him. At length he asked, "I wonder if they ever came to her hands?" as if striving to recollect something. The nurse whispered that she had often heard him talk in the night time about this lady, and that he would go on till he stopped in tears. I discovered, from a scrap or two found among his papers, after his decease, that the person he addressed as Emma, was a young lady in the higher circles of society, of considerable beauty, whom he first saw by accident, and fancied she had a regard for him. He had, in turn, indulged in the most extravagant and hopeless passion for her. He suspected himself, that she was wholly unconscious of being the object of his almost frenzied admiration. When he was asking "if something came to her hands," I have no doubt he alluded to some copy of verses he had sent to her—of which the following fragments, written in pencil, on a blank leaf of his Aristophanes, probably formed a part. There is some merit in them, but more extravagance.

"I could go through the world with thee,
To spend with thee eternity!"

* * * * *
"To see thy blue and passionate eye,
Light on another scornfully,
But fix its melting glance on me,
And blend"——

"Read the poor heart that throbs for thee,
Imprint all o'er with thy dear name—
Yet withering 'neath a lonely flame,
That warms thee not, yet me consumes!"

* * * * *
"Aye, I would have thee all my own,
Thy love, thy life, mine, mine alone;
See nothing in the world but me,
Since nought I know, or love, but thee!"

"The eyes that on a thousand fall,
I would collect their glances all,
And fling their lustre on my soul,
Till it imbibed, absorb'd the whole."

These are followed by several more lines; but these will suffice. This insane attachment was exactly what I might have expected from one of his ardent and enthusiastic temperament. To return, however, once more. Towards eleven o'clock, he began to fail rapidly. I had my fingers on his pulse, which beat very feebly, almost imperceptibly. He opened his eyes slowly, and gazed upwards with a vacant air.

"Why are you taking the candles away, nurse?" he enquired feebly. They had not been touched. His cold fingers gently compressed my hand—they were stiffening with death. "Don't, don't put the candles out, doctor," he commenced again, looking at me, with an eye on which the thick mists and shadows of the grave were settling fast—they were filmy and glazed.

"Don't blow them out—don't—don't!" he again exclaimed, almost inaudibly.

"No, we will not!—My dear Mr —, both candles are burning brightly beside you, on the table," I replied, tremulously—for I saw the senses were forgetting their functions—that life and consciousness were fast retiring!

"Well," he murmured almost inarticulately, "I am now quite in darkness!—Oh, there is something at my heart—cold, cold!—Doctor, keep them off! *—Why—oh, death—" He ceased. He had spoken his last on earth. The intervals of respiration became gradually longer and longer; and the precise moment when he ceased to breathe at all could not be ascertained. Yes; it was all over. Poor Mr — was dead. I shall never forget him.

PREPARING FOR THE HOUSE!

"Do, dear doctor, be so good as to drop in at — Place, in the course of the morning, by accident—for I want you to see Mr —. He has, I verily believe, bid adieu to his senses—for he is conducting himself very strangely. To tell you the truth, he is resolved on going down to the House this evening, for the purpose of speaking on the — bill, and will, I fear, act so absurdly, as to make himself the laughing-stock of the whole country—at least I suspect as much, from what I have heard of his preparations. Ask to be shewn up at once to Mr —, when you arrive, and gradually direct the conversation to politics—when you will soon see what is the matter. But mind, doctor, not a word of this note! Your visit will be quite accidental, you know. Believe me, my dear doctor, yours, &c. &c."—Such was the note put into my hands by a servant, as my carriage was driving off on my first morning round. I knew Mrs —, the fair writer of it, very intimately—as, indeed, the familiar and confidential strain of her note will suffice to shew. She was a very amiable and clever woman—and would not have complained, I was sure, without reason. Wishing, therefore, to oblige her by a prompt attention to her request, and in the full expectation, from what I knew of the worthy member's eccentricities, of encountering some singular scene, I directed the horses' heads to be turned towards — Place. I reached the house about twelve o'clock, and went up stairs at once to the drawing-room, where I understood Mr — had taken up quarters for the day. The servant opened the door and announced me.

* I once before heard these strange words fall from the lips of a dying patient—a lady. To me they suggest very unpleasant, I may say, fearful thoughts. What is to be kept off?

"Oh—shew Dr — in." I entered. The object of my visit, I may just say, was the very beau ideal of a county member; somewhat inclined to corpulency, with a fine, fresh, rubicund, good-natured face—and that bluff old English frankness of manner, which flings you back into the age of Sir Roger De Coverley. He was dressed in a long, grey woolen morning-gown; and, with his hands crammed into the hind pockets, was pacing rapidly to and fro from one end of the spacious room to the other. At one extremity was a table, on which lay a sheet of foolscap, closely written, and crumpled as if with constant handling—his gold repeater, and a half-emptied decanter of sherry, with a wine-glass. A glance at all these paraphernalia convinced me of the nature of Mr —'s occupation; he was committing his speech to memory!

"How d'ye do—how d'ye do, doctor?" he exclaimed, in a hearty but hurried tone; "you must not keep me long: busy—very busy indeed, doctor." I had looked in by accident, I assured him, and did not intend to detain him an instant. I remarked that I supposed he was busy preparing for the House.

"Ah, right, doctor—right! Aye, by —, a d—d good hit, too! I shall peg it into them to-night, doctor! D—e, I'll let them know what an English County member is! I'll make the House too hot to hold them!" said Mr —, walking to and fro, at an accelerated pace. He was evidently boiling over with excitement.

"You are going to speak to-night, then, on the great — question, I suppose?" said I, hardly able to repress a smile.

"Speak, doctor? I'll burst on them with such a view-halloo as shall startle the whole pack! I'll shew my Lord — what kind of stuff I'm made of—I will, by —! He was pleased to tell the House, the other evening—curse his impudence!—that the two members for —shire were a mere couple of dumb-bells—he did, by —! But I'll shew him whether or not I, for one of them, am to be jeered and flamm'd with impunity! Ha, doctor—what d'ye think of this?" said he, hurrying to the table, and taking up the manuscript I have mentioned. He was going to read it to me, but suddenly stopped short and laid it down again on the table, exclaiming, "Nay, d—e, I know it off by this time—so listen! Have at ye, doctor!"

After a pompous hem! hem! he commenced, and with infinite energy and boisterousness of manner, recited the whole oration. It was certainly a wonderful—a matchless performance—parcelled out with a rigid adherence to the rules of ancient rhetoric. As he proceeded, he recited such astounding absurdities—such preposterous, high-flown, Bombastes-furioso declamations—as, had it but been uttered in the House, would assuredly have procured the triumphant speaker six or seven distinct rounds of convulsive laughter! Had I not known well the simplicity and sincerity—the perfect bonhomie—of Mr —, I should have supposed he was hoaxing me—but I assuredly suspected he was himself the hoaxed party—the joking-post of some witty wag who had determined to afford the House a night's sport at poor Mr —'s expense! Indeed I never in my life listened to such pitifully puerile—such almost idiotic gallimatia. I felt certain it could never have been the composition of fox-hunting Mr —! There was a hack-nied quotation from Horace—from the Septuagint, (!) and from Locke; and then a scampering through the whole flowery realms of rhetorical ornament—and a glancing at every topic of foreign or domestic policy that could conceivably attract the attention of the most erratic fancy. In short there never before was such a speech composed since the world began! And this was the sort of thing that poor Mr — actually intended to deliver that memorable evening in the House of Commons! As for myself, I could not control my risible faculties; but accompanied the peroration with a perfect shout of laughter! Mr — laid down the paper, (which he had twisted into a sort of scroll) in an ecstasy, and joined me in full chorus, slapping me on the shoulder, and exclaiming—"Ah! d—e, doctor, I knew you would like it! It's just the thing—isn't it? There will be no standing me at the next election for —shire, if I can only deliver all this in the House to-night! Old Turnpenny, that's going to start against me, backed by the manufacturing interest—won't come up—and you see if he does!—Curse it! I thought it was in me—and would come out, some of these days.—They shall have it all to-night—they shall, by —! Only be on the look-out for the morning papers, doctor—that's all!" and he set off, walking rapidly, with long strides, from one end of the room to the other. I began to be apprehensive that there was too much ground for Mrs —'s suspicions, that he had literally "taken leave of his senses." Recollecting, at length, the object of my visit, which the amusing exhibition I have been attempting to describe had almost driven from my memory, I endeavoured to think, on the spur of the moment, of some scheme for diverting him from his purpose, and preventing the lamentable exposure he was preparing for himself. I could think of nothing else than attacking him on a sore point—one on which he had been hipped for years, and not without reason—an hereditary tendency to apoplexy.

"But, my dear sir," said I, "this excitement will destroy you—you will bring on a fit of apoplexy, if you go on for an hour longer, in this way—you will indeed!" He stood still, changed colour a little, and stammered "What! eh, d—e, apoplexy! You don't say so, doctor? Hem! how is my pulse?" extending his wrist. I felt it—looked at my watch, and shook my head.

"Eh—what, doctor! Newmarket, eh?" said he, with an alarmed air—meaning to ask me whether his pulse was beating rapidly.

"It is, indeed, Mr —. It beats upwards of one hundred and fifteen a minute," I replied, still keeping my fingers at his wrist, and my eyes riveted on my watch—for I dared not trust myself with looking in his countenance. He started from me without uttering a syllable; hurried to the table, poured out a glass of wine, and gulped it down instantly. I suppose he caught an unfortunate smile or a smirk on my face—for he came up to me, and in a coaxing but disturbed manner, said—"Now, come, come, doctor—doctor, no humbug! I feel well enough all over! D—e, I will speak in the House to-night, come what may, that's flat! Why, there'll be a general election in a few months, and it's of consequence for me to do something—to make a figure in the House. Besides—it is a great constitutional!"—

"Well, well, Mr —, undoubtedly you must please yourself," said I, seriously; "but if a fit should—you'll remember I did my duty, and warned you how to avert it!"—"Hem, ahem!" he ejaculated, with a somewhat puzzled air. I thought I had succeeded in shaking his purpose. I was, however, too sanguine in my expectations. "I must bid you good morning, doctor. I must speak! I will try it, to-night, at all events;—but I'll be calm—I will! And if I should die—but d— that's impossible, you know! But if I should—why, it will be a martyr's death; I shall die a patriot—ha, ha, ha! Good morning, doctor." He led me to the door, laughing, as he went, but not so heartily or boisterously as formerly. I was hurrying down stairs, when Mr — reopened the drawing-room door, and called out, "Doctor, doctor, just be so good as to look in on my good lady before you go. She's somewhere about the house—in her boudoir, I dare say. She's not quite well this morning—a fit of the vapours—hem! You understand me, doctor?" putting his finger to the side of his nose, with a wise air. I could not help smiling at the reciprocal anxiety for each other's health simultaneously manifested by this worthy couple.

"Well, doctor, am not I right?" exclaimed Mrs —, in a low tone, opening the dining-room door, and beckoning me in.

"Yes, indeed, madam. My interview was little else than a running commentary on your note to me."

"How did you find him engaged, doctor?—Learning his speech, as he calls it—eh?" enquired the lady, with a chagrined air, which was heightened, when I recounted what had passed up stairs.

"Oh, absurd! monstrous! Doctor, I am ready to expire with vexation to see Mr — acting so foolishly. But it is all owing to that odious Dr —, the village rector, who is up in town now, and an immense crony of Mr —'s. I suspected there was something brewing between them; for they have been laying their wise heads together for a week past. Did not he repeat the speech to you, doctor?—the whole of it?"

"Yes, indeed, madam, he did," I replied, smiling at the recollection.

"Ah—hideous rant it was, I dare say!—I'll tell you a secret, doctor. I know it was every word composed by that abominable old addle-head, Dr —, a doodle that he is!—(I wonder what brought him up from his parish!)—And it is he that has inflamed Mr —'s fancy with making a great hit in the House, as they call it. That precious piece of stuff which they call a speech, poor Mr — has been learning for this week past; and has several times woke me in the night with ranting snatches of it." I begged Mrs — not to take it so seriously.

"Now, tell me candidly, Dr —, did you ever hear such nonsense in your life? It is all that country parson's small-beer trash! I'm sure our name will run the gauntlet of all the papers in England, for a fortnight to come!" I said, I was sorry to be compelled to acquiesce in the truth of what she was saying.

"Really," she continued, pressing her hand to her forehead, "I feel quite poorly myself, with agitation at the thought of to-night's farce. Did you attempt to dissuade him? You might have frightened him with a hint or two about his tendency to apoplexy, you know."

"I did my utmost, madam, I assure you; and certainly startled him not a little. But, alas, he rallied, and good-humouredly sent me from the room, telling me, that, if the effort of speaking killed him, he should share the fate of Lord Chatham, or something of that sort."

"Preposterous!" exclaimed Mrs

—, almost shedding tears with vexation. "But, entre nous, doctor, could not you think of any thing—hem!—something in the medical way—to prevent his going to the House to-night?—A—a sleeping draught—eh, doctor?"

"Really, my dear madam," said I, seriously, "I should not feel justified in going so far as that."

"Oh, dear, dear doctor, what possible harm can there be in it? Do consent to my wishes for once, and I shall be eternally obliged to you. Do order a simple sleeping draught—strong enough to keep him in bed till five or six o'clock in the morning—and I will myself slip it into his wine at dinner."—In short, there was no resisting the importunities and distress of so fine a woman as Mrs —; so I ordered about five-and-thirty drops of laudanum, in a little sirup and water. But, alas, this scheme was frustrated by Mr —'s, two hours afterwards, unexpectedly ordering the carriage, (while Mrs — was herself gone to procure his quietus,) and leaving word he should dine with some members that evening at Brookes's. After all, however, a lucky accident accomplished Mrs —'s wishes, though it deprived her husband of that opportunity of wearing the laurels of parliamentary eloquence; for the ministry, finding the measure against which Mr — had intended to level his oration, to be extremely unpopular, and anticipating that they should be dead beat, wisely postponed it sine die.

DUELLING.*

I had been invited by young Lord —, the nobleman mentioned in my former chapter, to spend the latter part of my last college-vacation with his lordship at his shooting-box in —shire. As his destined profession was the army, he had already a tolerably numerous retinue of military friends, several of whom were engaged to join us on our arrival at —; so that we anticipated a very gay and jovial season. Our expectations were not disappointed. What with shooting, fishing, and riding, abroad—billiards, songs, and high feeding, at home, our days and nights glided as merrily away as fun and frolic would make them. One of the many schemes of amusement devised by our party, was giving a sort of military subscription-ball at the small town of —, from which we were distant not more than four or five miles. All my Lord —'s party, of course, were to be there, as well as several others of his friends, scattered at a little distance from him in the country. On the appointed day all went off admirably. The little town of — absolutely reeled beneath the unusual excitement of music, dancing, and universal feting. It was, in short, a sort of miniature carnival, which the inhabitants, for several reasons, but more especially the melancholy one I am going to mention, have not yet forgotten. It is not very wonderful, that all the rustic beauty of the place was there. Many a village belle was there, in truth, panting and fluttering with delighted agitation at the unusual attentions of their handsome and agreeable partners; for there was not a young military member of our party but merited the epithets. As for myself, being cursed—as I once before hinted—with a very insignificant person, and not the most attractive or communicative manners—being utterly incapable of pouring that soft delicious nonsense—that fascinating, searching, small-talk, which has stolen so often right through a lady's ear, into the very centre of her heart—being no hand, I say, at this, I contented myself with dancing a set or two with a young woman, whom nobody else seemed inclined to lead out; and continued, for the rest of the evening, more a spectator than a partaker of the gaieties of the scene. There was one girl there—the daughter of a reputable retired tradesman—of singular beauty, and known in the neighbourhood by the name of “The Blue Bell of —.” Of course, she was the object of universal admiration, and literally besieged the whole evening with applications for “the honour of her hand.” I do not exaggerate, when I say, that, in my opinion, this young woman was perfectly beautiful. Her complexion was of dazzling purity and transparence—her symmetrical features of a placid bust-like character, which, however, would perhaps have been considered insipid, had it not been for a brilliant pair of large, languishing, soft, blue eyes, resembling —“blue water-lilies, when the breeze Maketh the crystal waters round them tremble,” which it was almost madness to look upon. And then her light auburn hair, which hung in loose and easy curls, and settled on each cheek like a soft golden cloud flitting past the moon! Her figure was in keeping with her countenance—slender, graceful, and delicate—with a most exquisitely turned foot and ankle. I have spent so many words about her description, because I have never since seen any woman that I thought equalled her; and because her beauty was the cause of what I am about to relate. She riveted the attention of all our party, except my young host, Lord —, who adhered all the evening to a sweet creature he had selected on first entering the room. I observed, however, one of our party, a dashing young captain in the Guards, highly connected, and of handsome and prepossessing person and manners, and a gentleman, of nearly equal personal pretensions, who had been invited from — Hall, his father's seat, to exceed every one present in their attentions to sweet Mary —; and as she occasionally smiled on one or the other of the rivals, I saw the countenance of either alternately clouded with displeasure. Captain — was soliciting her hand for the last set—a country dance—when his rival, (whom, for distinction's sake, I shall call Trevor, though that, of course, is very far from his real name,) stepping up to her, seized her hand, and said, in rather a sharp and quick tone, “Captain —, she has promised me the last set; I beg, therefore, you will resign her.—I am right, Miss —?” he enquired of the girl, who blushing replied, “I think I did promise Mr Trevor—but I would dance with both, if I could. Captain, you are not angry with me; are you?” she smiled, appealingly.

“Certainly not, madam,” he replied, with a peculiar emphasis; and after directing an eye, which kindled like a star, to his more successful rival, retired haughtily a few paces, and soon afterwards left the room. A strong conviction seized me, that even this small and trifling incident would be attended with mischief between those two haughty and undisciplined spirits; for I occasionally saw Mr Trevor turn a moment from his beautiful partner, and cast a stern enquiring glance round the room, as if in search of Captain —. I saw he had noticed the haughty frown with which the Captain had retired.

Most of the gentlemen who had accompanied Lord — to this ball were engaged to dine with him the next Sunday evening. Mr Trevor and the Captain (who, I think, I mentioned, was staying a few days with his lordship) would meet at this party; and I determined to watch their demeanour. Captain — was at the window, when Mr Trevor, on horseback, attended by his groom, alighted at the door, and on seeing who it was, walked away to another part of the room, with an air of assumed indifference; but I caught his quick and restless glance invariably directed at the door through which Mr Trevor would enter. They saluted each other with civility—rather coldly, I thought—but there was nothing particularly marked in the manner of either. About twenty sat down to dinner. All promised to go off well—for the cooking was admirable—the wines first-rate, and conversation brisk and various. Captain — and Mr Trevor were seated at some distance from each other—the former was my next neighbour. The cloth was not removed till a few minutes after eight—when a dessert and a fresh and large supply of wine were introduced. The late ball, of course, was a prominent topic of conversation; and after a few of the usual bachelor toasts had been drunk with noisy enthusiasm, and we all felt the elevating influence of the wine we had been drinking, Lord — stood up, and said—“Now, my dear fellows—I have a toast in my eye that will delight you all—so, bumpers, gentlemen—bumpers!—up to the very brim,—so make sure your glasses are full—while I propose to you the health of a beautiful—nay, by —!

the most beautiful girl we have any of us seen for this year—Ha! I see all anticipate me—so, to be short—here is the health of Mary —, the Blue Bell of —!” It was drunk with acclamation. I thought I perceived Captain —’s hand, however, shake a little, as he lifted his glass to his mouth.

“Who is to return thanks for her?” —“Her favourite beau, to be sure.” —“Who is he?” —“Legs—rise—legs—whoever he is!” was shouted, asked, and answered, in a breath. “Oh—Trevor is the happy man—there’s no doubt of that—he monopolized her all the evening—I could not get her hand once,” exclaimed one near Mr Trevor—“Nor I!” —“Nor I!”—echoed several. Mr Trevor looked with a delighted and triumphant air round the room, and seemed about to rise, but there was a cry—“No—Trevor is not the man—I say Captain — is the favourite!” —“Aye—ten to one on the Captain!” roared a young hero of Ascot. “Stuff—stuff!” muttered the Captain, hurriedly cutting an apple to fritters,—and now and then casting a fierce glance towards Mr Trevor. There were many noisy maintainers of both Trevor and the Captain.

“Come—come, gentlemen,” said a young Cornish baronet, good-humouredly, seeing the two young men appeared to view the affair very seriously—“The best way, since I dare be sworn the girl herself does not know which she likes best, will be to toss up who shall be given the credit of her beau!” A loud laugh followed this droll proposal; in which all joined except Trevor and the Captain. The latter had poured out some claret while Sir — was speaking, and sipped it with an air of assumed carelessness. I observed, however, that he never removed his eye from his glass—and that his face was pale—as if from some strong internal emotion. Mr Trevor’s demeanour, however, also indicated considerable embarrassment; but he was older than the Captain, and had much more command of manner. I was amazed, for my own part, to see them take up such an insignificant affair so seriously; but these things generally involve so much of the strong passions of our youthful nature,—especially our vanity and jealousy, that, on second thoughts, my surprise abated.

"I certainly fancied you were the favourite, Captain; for I saw her blush with satisfaction when you squeezed her hand," I whispered. "You are right, —," he answered, with a forced smile.—"I don't think Trevor can have any pretensions to her favour." The noisiness of the party was now subsiding—and nobody knew why an air of blank embarrassment seemed to pervade all present.

"Upon my honour, gentlemen, this is a vastly silly affair altogether, and quite unworthy such a stir as it has excited," said Mr Trevor; "but as so much notice has been taken of it, I cannot help saying, though it is monstrously absurd, perhaps, that I think the beautiful 'Blue Bell of —' is mine—mine alone! I believe I have good ground for saying I am the sole winner of the prize, and have distanced my military competitor," continued Mr Trevor, turning to Captain —, with a grim air, which was very foreign to his real feelings, "though his bright eyes—his debonaire demeanour—that fascinating je ne sais quoi of his" —

"Trevor! Don't be insolent!" exclaimed the Captain sternly, reddening with passion.

"Insolent! Captain?—What the deuce do you mean? I'm sure you don't want to quarrel with me—oh, it's impossible! If I have said what was offensive, by —, I did not mean it—and, as we said at Rugby, indictum puta—and there's an end of it. But as for my smart little Blue Bell, I know—am perfectly certain—aye, spite of the Captain's dark looks—that I am the happy man. So, gentlemen, de jure and de facto—for her, I return you thanks." He sat down. There was so much kindness in his manner, and he had so handsomely disavowed any intentions of hurting Captain —'s feelings, that I hoped the young Hotspur beside me was quieted. Not so, however.

"Trevor," said he, in a hurried tone, "you are mistaken—you are, by —! You don't know what passed between Mary — and myself that evening. On my word and honour, she told me she wished she could be off her engagement with you."

"Nonsense! nonsense! She must have said it to amuse you, Captain—she could have had no other intention. The very next morning she told me" —

"The very next morning!" shouted Captain —, "why, what the — could you have wanted with Mary — the next morning?"

"That is my affair, Captain—not yours. And since you will have it out, I tell you, for your consolation, that Mary and I have met every day since!" said Mr Trevor, loudly, even vehemently. He was getting a little flushed, as the phrase is, with wine, which he was pouring down, glass after glass, or of course he could never have made such an absurd—such an unusual disclosure.

"Trevor, I must say you act very meanly in telling us,—if it really is so," said the Captain, with an intensely chagrined and mortified air; "and—if you intend to ruin that sweet and innocent creature—I shall take leave to say, that you are a—a—a—curse on it, it will out—a villain!" continued the Captain, slowly and deliberately. My heart flew up to my throat, where it fluttered as though it would have choked me. There was an instant and dead silence.

"A villain—did you say, Captain? and accuse me of meanness?" enquired Mr Trevor, coolly, while the colour suddenly faded from his darkening features; and rising from his chair, he stepped forward, and stood nearly opposite to the Captain, with his half-emptied glass in his hand, which, however, was not observed by him he addressed. "Yes, sir, I did say so," replied the Captain, firmly—"and what then?"

"Then, of course, you will see the necessity of apologizing for it instantly," rejoined Mr Trevor.

"As I am not in the habit, Mr Trevor, of saying what requires an apology, I have none to offer," said Captain —, drawing himself up in his chair, and eyeing Mr Trevor with a steady look of composed intrepidity.

"Then, Captain, don't expect me to apologize for this!" thundered Mr Trevor, at the same time hurling his glass, wine and all, at the Captain's head. Part of the wine fell on me, but the glass glanced at the ear of Captain —, and cut it slightly; for he had
